
SIGILL. SCHOLÆ RELIGIONIS PACIFICÆ
CONDITA AD. 1866
PRO
VERITATE
ET REGNO
DEI
CHARLES HOLBROOK LIBRARY
Pacific School of Religion

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2023 with funding from Kahle/Austin Foundation

https://archive.org/details/gtu_32400002520918_14

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOLUME FOURTEEN

1915—1916

FROM OCTOBER 16, 1915, TO APRIL 8, 1916, INCLUSIVE

HOLBROOK LIBRARY
PACIFIC SCHOOL OF RELIGION

NEW YORK

THE AMERICA PRESS

80481 v. 14 1915/16

INDEX

VOLUME XIV—OCTOBER 16, 1915, TO APRIL 8, 1916, INCLUSIVE

PAGE

Accents, Leaving Out the (Ed.) 86
Agriculture, Scientific, The Young Man and 561
American Character and the Religious State.. 295
American Mothers and the Race 319
Anarchy in Thought and Deed (Ed.) 494
Angel of Riverside Drive, The (Ed.), (Joan of Arc Statue) 230
Anglican Claims, Mr. Morse and 229
Ancestor, My Lost (Darwin) 293
Apocrypha, The 605
Art, A New Spirit in 586
Auctioneering, The Young Man and 413
Automobilia 273
Authority, By What? (Ed.), (Pan-American Conference) 86

Back Home with the Women 11
Bacchanalia, The Annual (Ed.) 279
Baker and the Baptist, The (Ed.) 183
Ballot and the People, The (Ed.) 64
Baltimore, Catholic Landmarks of 587
Benefaction, The Noblest (Ed.) 351
Bibles and Trade Catalogues (Ed.) 447
Bible Societies, Dr. Gates and (Ed.) 256
Birth Control League, The National (Ed.) 544
Bond of Peace, The (Ed.) 230
Books and Men, 203; 250; 298; 321
Boston, Catholic Landmarks of 105
Boys of Our City, The, Baltimore, 151; New York, 199; New Orleans, 270; Chicago, 438; Brooklyn, 487; Omaha 534
Boy, Your 417
Brandeis Appointed to Supreme Court (Ed.). 399

Capital Punishment, 200; and Moral Order, 223; Some Objections 272
Carcassonne, Who has not Known a? (Ed.).. 255
Carranza, Recognition of 30
Carroll's, Dr., Census Again (Ed.) 422
Castelnau, General de 514
Catholina Lambert Collection, The 489
Caught at Last (Ed.), (Jesuits) 232
Cave Man an Artist, The 177
Catholic, News Association, A, 152; College's Advantages, The (Ed.), 159; Chaplains in the British Army, 468; Landmarks of St. Paul and Minneapolis, 345; Baby Week, A (Ed.), 446; Books in Our Public Libraries. 610
Catholics, Are They Narrow? 33; and Morals (Ed.), 303; and the Atlantic Monthly (Ed.), 304; Neglect High Schools (Ed.), 329; The Amusements of (Ed.), 544; In Public Office (Ed.) 592
Celt and Politics, The 229
Censorship Needed but Not Wanted (Films). 606
Chaplains in English Army (Ed.) 326
Charity or Philanthrophy (Ed.) 208
Chicago, Boys of, 438; Catholic Landmarks of 467
Child, Don't be an Only (Ed.), 182; Rights of The, 390; Labor, 398; Welfare of The (Ed.) 518
Christ, The World Needs (Ed.), 254; What Think You of? (Ed.) 543
Christ's Nature, No Room for (Ed.) 278
Christians, Hyphenated (Ed.) 87
Christmas Day, For, 221; in Serbia, 297; Pageant, A (Ed.) 302
Christianity, The Success of, 488; Rejecting.. 584
Church, and the Laity, The, 103; Unity Octave, The (Ed.), 303; and Prohibition (Ed.) 495
Churches, An Essay on Two 607
College, Parents and the Notorious (Ed.) 495
Colleges, Catholic 417
Comparison, By Way of (Ed.) 134
Compromise in Protestant Episcopal Church.. 471
Comstock's Latest Critic (Ed.) 111
Congregational Singing 178
Conscience Money, The Source of (Ed.) 567
Constantinople and the Turk 317
Converts, Something about 318
Creed Consciousness (Ed.) 15
Country's Narrow Escape, Our (Ed.) 400

Daily, A Philadelphia Catholic 582
Darwin and Dickens 153
Daughter, The Governor's (Ed.) 113
Dawn Man, Re-Re Discovery of The 535
Debtors, The Nation's Delinquent (Ed.) 111
Defective Babies, The Fate of 149
Despair, The New Philosophy of 57

PAGE

Detroit, Catholic Landmarks of 249
Dickens, The Death of (Ed.) 471
Divorce Record, A 15
Drama, Why Not a Catholic? 247
Dunning, The Psychology of (Ed.) 568
Duty, The Doctor's (Ed.) 183

Economic Equality 56
Elections versus Religion 391
End, For What? (Ed.), (Our Drifting Civilization) 519
Expert, Who Pays the? (Ed.) 495
Extinguishing the Lights (Ed.), (Viviani Ministry) 64
Evening Post on New Mexican Revolutions, The 389
Evolution, ("Mankind in the Making") 343

Families, Which Are Our First? (Ed.) 591
Farming, The Young Man and 222
Florida, What Flag in? (Ed.), (A. P. A.) 39
Foes, Our Harvest of 342
Freedom, The Nobler (Ed.) 592
French Province, In a 320

Generosity, Dangerous (Ed.) 422
George's, Mr., Progress in Enlightenment (Ed.) 566
Goose, Mother and the Censor (Ed.) 254
Governor's Daughter, The (Ed.) 113
Grotto, The Empty (Ed.) 279

Hate, Prayers of (Ed.), 88; The Land of... 461
"Heresy," Is, Speaking the Truth? (Ed.), 158; No Compromise with 79
Hints, Gentle 559
History, Protestant (Ed.) 424
Holland in War Time 345
Homicide Excusable and Felonious 9
Huxley and St. Paul (Ed.) 255
Hymnals, Catholic English 82
Hymnody, Popular 130
Hyphen, and the K. of C., The (Ed.), 40; How to Lose the (Ed.) 134

Immigrant and the Nation, The 6
Index, The 439
Inebriates, Hypnotism for (Ed.) 279
Invalids, Happy 510
Invention and Progress 225
Ireland, Farmer Ownership in 394
Iscariot, The House of (Ed.) 519
Issue, The Real (Ed.), (Church Unity) 351
It's the Way of Me (Ed.) 494

Japan, Non-Catholics in 537
Jesus and Legal Crime 31
Judge, What the, Said (Ed.) 206

Kikuyu, A Military (Ed.) 326
Krishna or Christ? (Ed.) 160

Law and the Lawless, The (Ed.) 207
Lawlessness and the Sob Sisters (Ed.) ... 470
Law, What is the Natural? 557
Laymen, Catholic, A Challenge to 131
Lenten Thoughts (Ed.) 518
Libel Decision, A New Criminal (Ed.) 519
Life and Mr. Carranza (Ed.) 135
Literature, Popular Taste in (Ed.) 470

Madeleine, The Euchite 154
Maeterlinck's Vision (Ed.) 520
Man, Party or Principle? 414
Man, Not Such a Bad (Ed.) 256
Marriage Rings, The Three 583
Mass, The Sanctity of the (Ed.) 328
Massachusetts, Baptist Sympathy in (Ed.) 136
Medieval Achievement, The 588
Medical Missions, Catholic (Ed.) 591
Meteorite, An Exploded (Ed.), (Socialism)... 614
Metropolis, The Shame of the (Ed.), (Theaters) 40
Mexican Church, The Failure of the (Ed.) 568
Mexico, Reflections on (Ed.), 38; For All But (Ed.) 350
Mexico's Plight 225
"Midrash," A, Merely? (Ed.) 135
Mission Sunday (Ed.) 615
Missions, The Foreign (Ed.) 327
Model for Our Age, A (Ed.) 543
Modern Achievement, The Sources of 274

PAGE

Moral Law, The Evolution of the (Ed.), 63; Atmosphere What of the? (Ed.) 615
"Morts, Aux" 58
Mothers and "Movies" (Ed.) 423
Moving-Picture Censorship (Ed.) 496
Mulry, Thomas M. (Ed.) 542
Mummers, The 562
Murder in the United States (Ed.) 302
Music and Religion 53
Music in Our Churches 563

Name, Roman Catholic, The (Ed.) 399
Nation, A Slaughtered (Ed.) 14
National University, The Proposed 462
Nation's Destiny, A 509
Neo-Malthusian, Mrs. Partington and the (Ed.) 62
Novels, The Mirrors of 269

Occupations, The Superfluous (Ed.) 590
Ouija Board, The 126

Pacifism, On False 393
Pageantry, The Return of 245
Pan-Protestant Congress, The (Ed.), 465 496
Papal Bulls and the News Business 558
"Parasites," Are Home-Keepers? (Ed.) 616
Patroness, Our Country's (Ed.) 182
Patricia, but Not Brigid 538
Peace Tribunals and Movements of the Past.. 395
Persecution, No (Ed.) 182
Philosophy, The Advantages of (Ed.) 328
Poet's, The Prosperous, "Don'ts" (Ed.) 616
Political Equality 29
Pope, Bating Still (Ed.), 158; and the Pact of London (Ed.), 398; Our "Modernist 472
Potatoes, In Praise of (Ed.) 184
Poverty and Character (Ed.) 278
Prendergast, Archbishop (Ed.) 110
Preparedness, The Supreme (Ed.), 231; That Blessed Word (Ed.) 423
Press, Our Yellow (Ed.) 447
Professional Conscience, Have Journalists No? (Ed.) 206
Protestant Problem, A 533
Proverb, A Much Abused (Ed.) 38
Public Education, Mr. Taft on (Ed.) 207
Pulpit, A Secularized (Ed.) 566

Reading, Examens After (Ed.) 252
Rebel Poet, The (Socialism) 175
Re-Resolutions, Our (Ed.) 280
Ridder, Herman (Ed.) 112
Right Reason the Cure (Woman Suffrage) 101
Rome, "Truckling, Venal" (Ed.) 568
Russian Ballet, The (Ed.) 399

Sacrament, Less a (Ed.) (Marriage) 87
Self-Realization (Ed.) 341
Seraphim, The Hermitage of 418
Sin, The Wages of (Ed.) 471
School Buildings, An Abuse of (Ed.) 590
Science, The Spiritual Side of 513
Scientific Character Analysis (Ed.) 112
Shakespeare's Poetry 609
Shame, Whose? (Ed.) 446
Shipman, Andrew Jackson (Ed.) 62
Social Disorder Spread of 78
Social Problems, The Church and Some 464
Socialist, An Open Letter to a 581
Socialistic Misunderstandings 102
Soul, Has Woman a? (Ed.) 566
Spain, Premiers and Policies in 491
Spanish Clergy, The Social Action of the 611
Specializing (Ed.) 39
Spell, A Broken (Ed.) 543
Spiritual Birth of a Nation, The 174
Spray, Cosmic (Ed.) 86
St. Paul and Minneapolis, Catholic Landmarks of 345
Stage and License (Ed.) 424
Stream, The Tainted (Ed.) 16
Superstition, A Monstrous (Ed.) 542
Symbol, A Significant 54

Temper, The Breakfast (Ed.) 159
Terpsichore and Mars 485
"Through, I Am" (Suicide) (Ed.) 614
Tidings, Glad 248
Tolerance (Ed.) 327
Tongue, The Evil 511
Treated Like a Dog (Ed.) 231
Tumulty and Mexico, 173 197

PAGE

University, The Proposed, 415 437
Up, Up We Go (Socialist Papers) (Ed.) 63
Unutterable, High Priests of the 441

Vincent de Paul Society, The St. (Ed.) 304
Votes for Women (Ed.) 110

Wage, The Daily (Ed.) 448
War Time in a London Suburb, 201; Some Problems 417
Washington's Birthday (Ed.) 446
White List, Additions to the (Ed.) 230
White is Black (Ed.) 207
Wisconsin, Law in (Ed.) 135
Wisconsin's Esthetic Kine (Ed.) 159
Wine, Cana, The Mass 125
Wives, Let, Be Subject 246
Woman Suffrage, 61; Genesis of 5
Women, Votes for 111
Women, What, Wanted 128
Writers' Syndicate, Catholic 8
Writing, Easy (Ed.) 280

Youngstown, Ohio, Strike (Ed.) 350
Young Man, The, and Illustrating, 34; Scientific Salesmanship, 77; Forestry, 105; Textile Industry, 294; Scientific Agriculture 561
Ypres, The Nuns of 442

AUTHORS

Abbott, Lyman, Reminiscences 330
Aldrich, Mildred, A Hilltop on the Marne 114
Anderson, Isabel, The Spell of Belgium 210
Austin, Mary, The Man Jesus 140
Baden-Powell, Sir R., Memories of India 210
Bain, R. N., Russian Fairy Tales 90
Balfour, A. J., Theism and Humanism 306
Bangs, John Kendrick, From Pillar to Post ... 572
Barbour, Ralph Henry, Left Tackle Thayer ... 260
Baxter, James P., The Greatest of Literary Problems 283
Bell, Aubrey F. G., Portugal of the Portuguese 594
Bell, Ralcy Husted, Taormina 571
Belloc, Hilaire, The Path to Rome, 42; High Lights of the French Revolution 137
Benjamin, S. G. W., Life and Adventures of a Free Lance 620
Bennett, Arnold, Over There, 162; These Twain 212
Benson, A. C., Escape and Other Essays 138
Benson, E. F., The Oakleyites 451
Birmingham, G. A., Gossamer 500
Bodkin, M. McD., Recollections of an Irish Judge 115
Bolton, Herbert Eugene, Texas in the Middle Eighteenth Century, 498; Spanish Explorations in the Southwest, 1542-1706 (Ed.) 618
Botrel, Théodore, Songs of Brittany 330
Botsford, G. W. (Ed.), Hellenic Civilization 355
Brewer, Daniel C., Rights and Duties of Neutrals 546
Brooke, Rupert, The Collected Poems of 234
Brown, Rollo W., How the French Boy Learns to Write 475
Brown, Ivor, The Years of Plenty 428
Bryan, William Frank, The English Familiar Essay 619
Buxton-Wilmot, E. M., A Book of English Martyrs 66
Burgess, John W., The Reconciliation of Government with Liberty 450
Burnett, Frances H., The Lost Prince 212
Busnelli, Giovanni, Manuale di Teosofia 426
Butler, Mrs. John Wesley, Historic Churches in Mexico 259
Cable, Boyd, Between the Lines 162
Caine, Hall, The Drama of 365 Days 115
Callan, Chas. J., The Shepherd of My Soul .. 354
Callender, Geoffrey, Spindriff 284
Cammaerts, Émile, Belgian Poems 282
Campbell, T. J., Pioneer Laymen of North America 233
Canfield, D., The Bent Twig 164
Carter, Elsie Hobart, In Christmas Candles ... 211
Chalmers, Stephen, The Beloved Physician 355
Chesterton, G. K., Poems, 20; The Crimes of England 474
Chrysostom, Brother, The Pedagogical Value of the Virtue of Faith 284
Cladder, H. J., Als die Zeit erfüllt war 356
Clapp, E. J., Economic Aspects of the War ... 308
Combs, Josiah Henry, All That's Kentucky ... 619
Commons, Jno. R., Races and Immigrants in America 307
Concannon, Mrs. Thomas, The Life of St. Columban 618
Cone, Helen Gray, A Chant of Love for England 451
Conrad, Joseph, Within the Tides 403
Conway, Bertrand L., Studies in Church History 306
Conway, Sir Martin, The Crowd in Peace and War 546
Conroy, Joseph P., Talks to Boys 548
Cooper, Clayton A., American Ideals 187
Comstock, Sarah, Old Roads from the Heart of New York 91

PAGE

Cram, R. A., Heart of Europe 209
Cromie, William J., Keeping Physically Fit ... 549
Crow, M. F., The American Country Girl 308
Davis, William Stearns, A History of Mediæval and Modern Europe for Secondary Schools 476
Dawson, Miles Menander, The Ethics of Confucius 523
Delamare, H. E., The Little Ambassadors 236
Deland, Margaret, Around Old Chester 236
Devine, Edward T., The Normal Life 90
Dewey, John, The School and Society 283
Dewey, John and Evelyn, Schools of Tomorrow 283
Dickinson, Thomas H., The Case of American Drama 163
Dodd, Loring Holmes, Everyday Rhetoric 475
Donnelly, Francis P., Chaff and Wheat 259
Dore, Henry, Researches into Chinese Superstitions 475
Dunton, Theodore Watts, Old Familiar Faces. 619
Durham, Willard Higley, Critical Essays of the Eighteenth Century 284
Dwight, H. G., Constantinople Old and New .. 66
Elder, Benedict, A Study in Socialism 428
Elson, Arthur, The Book of Musical Knowledge 236
Essen, Léon Van der, A Short History of Belgium 473
Eudes, Bl. John, The Wondrous Childhood of the Mother of God 235
Eulalia, Infanta, Court Life from Within 236
Fabre, J. Henri, The Hunting Wasps 500
Farnol, Jeffrey, Beltane the Smith 211
Ferber, Edna, Emma McChesney & Co 189
Finlay, Peter, The Church of Christ 161
Finn, F. J., That Office Boy 138
Fisher, Irving, How to Live 235
Forbes, F. A., St. Monica 212
Forbush, William Byron, Child Study and Child Training 595
Foster, William H., Debating for Boys 91
Fuber, Alex., The Neutrality of Belgium 114
Frank, M. M., Great Authors in Their Youth. 211
Franklin, Fabian, The Cost of Living 524
Fraser, Mrs. Hugh, Storied Italy 138
Garrigou-Lagrange R., Dieu, son existence et sa nature 89
Garvin, Brother John E., In Memoriam: Rt. Rev. Mgr. T. J. Broydrick 620
Gauthey, Mgr., Les paroles de la guerre 427
Gavin, Basil, Michael Freeburn Gavin 354
Gayda, Virginio, Modern Austria 355
George, D. Lloyd, Through Terror to Triumph 162
Gibson, Herbert A., The Blackest Page of Modern History 546
Glover, William, Know Your Own Mind 356
Graham, R. B. Cunninghame, The Life of Bernal Diaz del Castillo 65
Graham, Stephen, The Way of Martha and the Way of Mary 570
Grafton, Reginald, Probation 475
Graves, A. P., The Book of Irish Poetry 42
Graves, C. L., Humors of Irish Life 42
Green, J. R., A Short History of the English People 428
Green, Horace, The Log of a Non-Combatant. 115
Green, L. W., Two American Boys in the War Zone 236
Gustavus, Brother, History of the Catholic Church 547
Gwynn, Stephen, The Famous Cities of Ireland 234
Hamilton, Walter Hale, Current Economic Problems 547
Haskell, H. E., Katrinka, the Story of a Russian Child 164
Haskins, Charles Hower, The Normans in European History 258
Hay, Ian, Scally the Story of a Perfect Gentleman 164
Hearn, Lafcadio, Interpretations of Literature 259
Hebard, Dom, Le livre de la consolation 189
Heinen, A., Aus dem Glauben leben! 187
Herrick, Robert, The World Decision 402
Herschell, William, Songs of the Streets and Byways 451
Heuser, Herman J., Mother Mary Veronica ... 499
Hewlett, Joseph, The Little Iliad 92
Hewitt, Arthur Wentworth, The Harp of the North 595
Hill, Owen A., An Idyl, Some Sermons and a Song 138
Hinchman, Walter S., The American School .. 524
Hogan, Mgr. Thaddeus, Sermons 354
Holborn, I. B. S., Children of Fancy 451
Holgar, Paxton, From the Shelf 18
Holley, Horace, The Social Principle 235
Howlett, W. J., Life of Rev. Charles Nerinckx 571
Hudson, H. N., The New Hudson Shakespeare, 403; W. H., Green Mansions 620
Hull, Ernest R., The German Jesuit Fathers of Bombay 114
Huntington, Ellsworth, Civilization and Climate 524
Husband, Joseph, America at Work 164
Hutton, Edward, Attila and the Huns 260
Hyde, Douglas, Legends of Saints and Sinners 42
Isard, Forest, Heroines of the Modern Stage. 572

PAGE

Jacobi, M. Putnam, "Common Sense" Applied to Woman Suffrage 116
Jacobs, Joseph, Europa's Fairy Book 403
Johnson, Clifton, Battleground Adventures in the Civil War 260
Johnson, F. W., Problems of Boyhood 19
Johnson, Henry, Teaching of History in Elementary and Secondary Schools 91
Johnson, Mary, The Fortunes of Garin 92
Johnson, Owen, The Spirit of France 594
Jones, Jefferson, The Fall of Tsingtau 114
Jordan, David Starr, Ways to Lasting Peace. 546
Kane, William T., For Greater Things 90
Keable, Robert, The Loneliness of Christ 164
Kettle, T. W., Irish Orators and Oratory 42
King, Basil, The Side of the Angels 548
Kinnicutt, L. N., To Your Dog and My Dog. 308
Kipling, Rudyard, France at War, 162; The Fringes of the Fleet 402
Kleyntjens, J., Leerboek der Algemeene Geschiedenis, 355; der Neredlandsche Geschiedenis 355
Klein, H. H., Standard Oil or the People 452
Koch, F. J., A Manual of Apologetics 308
Ladd, George Trumbull, What May I Hope?. 353
Lagarde, André, The Latin Church in the Middle Ages 139
Lagerlöf, Selma, Jerusalem 44
Lalande, Louis, Causons 449
Lambert, W. A., Religious Education 331
Langdon, Stephen, Sumerian Epic of Paradise 163
Langley, Ernest A., The Poetry of Giacomo Da Lentino 523
Lasance, F. X., The New Missal in English .. 404
Lauriat, Charles E., The Lusitania's Last Voyage 115
Lavell, E., The Life of Father de Smet, S.J .. 185
Leake, A. H., The Means and Methods of Agricultural Education 452
Lee, Sir Sidney, A Life of William Shakespeare 450
Leonard, William E., Socrates Master of Life 475
Linden, James, Catechism of the Catholic Religion 140
Lindsay, Vachel, The Art of the Moving Picture 427
Loisy, Alfred, The War and Religion 546
Lounsbury, Thomas R., The Life and Times of Tennyson 450
MacEachen, Rev. R., The Catholic Library. Dogmatic Series 473
Macfarlane, Peter Clarke, Held to Answer ... 524
MacKail, J. W., Modern Essays 619
MacKensie, A. S., The Evolution of Literature 165
MacKensie, Compton, Plashers Mead 210
MacVeagh, Mrs. Charles, Fountains of Rome. 209
Magennis, P. E., Scapulare B. M. V. de Monte Carmelo 620
Macnarama, Rachel S., Drifting Waters 571
Maher, Richard Aumerle, The Shepherd of the North, 595; The Heart of a Man 66
Mainage, Th., La Psychologie de la Conversion 282
Malone, I. J., Talks about Poets and Poetry .. 188
Mannix, Mary E., On the Old Camping Ground 620
Marvin, Dwight Edwards, Curiosities in Proverbs 500
Martindale, C. C., The Goddess of Ghosts 89
Masefield, John, Good Friday and Other Poems 594
Maxwell, W. H., Wild Sports of the West ... 42
McCall, Samuel W., The Liberty of Citizenship 499
McEnnery, C. D., Father Tim's Talks with People He Met 139
McGuire, James K., What Could Germany Do for Ireland? 524
McClellan, George B., The Heel of War 474
Mercier, Charles, A New Logic 67
Mooney, M. S., A Rosary of Mystery Plays .. 20
Moore, B. B., From Moscow to the Persian Gulf 451
Moore, Charles L., Incense and Iconoclasm ... 18
Moore, Ernest C., What is Education? 595
Moore, Leslie, The Wiser Folly 595
Morse, Herbert, Back to Shakespeare 331
Moulton, R. G., The Modern Study of Literature 163
Morgan, Augustus de, A Budget of Paradoxes 163
More, Paul Elmer, Aristocracy and Justice ... 188
Mozley, J. K., The Doctrine of Atonement ... 619
Muir, John, Travels in Alaska 331
Mullen, Julius W., The Invasion of America. 331
Mumford, Edith E. Read, The Dawn of Religion in the Mind of the Child 570
Munson, Asley, Kipling's India 189
Murray, Gilbert, The Stoic Philosophy 140
Naab, Ingbert, Der Gymnasiast 187
Nearing, Scott, Anthracite 547
Newbolt, Henry, Aladore 354
Newbolt, Sir Henry, The Book of the Thin Red Line 237
Newton, W. D., The Undying Story 307
Noel, L., Louvain, 891-1914 332
Noyes, A., The Lord of Misrule 186
O'Boyle, James, Life of George Washington .. 140
O'Donnell, Charles L., Newman's Gentleman .. 403
O'Donnell, Eliot, The Irish Abroad 115
O'Dwyer, Michael, Confirmation 593

PAGE

O'Neill, Arthur Barry, Clerical Colloquies.... 522
O'Rorke, B. G., In the Hands of the Enemy.. 162
Pallen, Condé B., Collected Poems..... 89
Palmer, George H., A Marriage Cycle..... 188
Parish, Gladys, Carfrae's Comedy..... 572
Partridge, Emelyn N., Joyful Star..... 236
Patrick, George Thomas White, The Psychology of Relaxation..... 500
Peattie, Ella M., Lotta's Career..... 116
Pepper, George W., A Voice from the Crowd 90
Percy, W. A., Sappho in Levkas..... 186
Petrovitch, W. M., Serbia, Her People, History and Aspirations..... 92
Perry, A. C., Discipline as a School Problem. 451
Pine, M. S., John Bannister Tabb..... 210
Philpotts, Eden, Old Delabole..... 164
Plater, Charles (Ed.), A Primer of Peace and War 162
Plunket, Ierne, Isabel of Castile..... 353
Porter, Eleanor H., Just David..... 595
Poulain, A., The Spiritual Journal of Lucie Christine 187
Powell, John W., What is a Christian?..... 427
Pratt, James B., India and Its Faiths..... 426
Prestage, Edgar, The Sweet Miracle..... 235
Pritchard, K. S., The Pioneers..... 428
Pryce, Richard, David Penstephen..... 284
Putnam, George H., Memories of a Publisher 186
Reid, Christian, The Secret Bequest..... 284
Reid, Forest, At the Door of the Gate..... 572
Reynolds, G. A., The Red Circle..... 66
Rinehart, Mary R., Kings, Queens and Pawns 307
Rickaby, Joseph, The Lord My Light..... 92
Rittenhouse, J. B., The Little Book of American Poets..... 186
Robinson, Albert G., Cuba, Old and New..... 499
Robinson, Charles H., History of Christian Missions 67
Robinson, George W., The Life of St. Boniface 499
Roche, Alexis, Journeys with Jerry the Jarvey 571
Roche, W., Mysteries of the Mass in Reasoned Prayers 427
Rolle, Richard, The Incendium Amoris..... 18
Rollston, T. W., Thomas Davis..... 42
Roosevelt, Theodore, Fear God and Take Your Own Part 522
Ropes, James Hardy, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Epistle of St. James.... 619
Routh, James, The Rise of Classical English Criticism 68
Rusk, Robert E., The Religious Education of the Child 19
Sadler, M. T. H., Belgium's Agony..... 282
Sanborn, Kate, Memories and Anecdotes..... 283
Sexton, W. W., Some New Sources for the Life of Bl. Agnes of Bohemia..... 43
Schoff, Hannah K., The Wayward Child..... 19
Shallo, M. W., Lessons in Scholastic Philosophy 137
Singmaster, Elsie, Emmyline..... 524
Skelly, A. W., The Falsity of the Theory of Evolution 501
Solovyof, Vladimir, War and Christianity.... 332
Spalding, H. S., The Camp by Copper River.. 236
Stapley, Miidred, Christopher Columbus..... 116
Steele, Frances M., The Life and Visions of St. Hildegarde 66
Stebbing, George, The Story of the Catholic Church 547
Stephens, James, The Rocky Road to Dublin.. 186
Stevenson, B. S., Mysterium Arcæ Boule..... 474
Steward, T. S., The Haitian Revolution 1700-1804 67
Stirling, A. M. W., A Painter of Dreams.... 522
Stork, Theophilus B., The Will in Ethics..... 139
Strahorn, Carrie A., Fifteen Thousand Miles by Stage 500
Strother, E. V., Eve Dorre..... 67
Sullivan, Mark, National Flood Marks..... 140
Sutcliffe, A. C., Robert Fulton..... 165
Taft, William Howard, Ethics in Service..... 403
Taggart, Marion Ames, Hollyhock House.... 620
Tarbell, Ida M., The Ways of Woman..... 307
Terry, Charles E., A Short History of Europe 1806-1914 571
Thomas, Joseph, Universal Pronouncing Dictionary of Biography and Mythology..... 259
Thompson, Vance, Drink and Be Sober..... 260
Thorpe, Merle (Ed.), The Coming Newspaper 91
Tomlinson, E. T., Prisoners of War..... 236
Towns, C. B., Habits That Handicap..... 188
Usher, Roland G., The Challenge of the Future 546
Vacandard, E., The Inquisition..... 306
Waggaman, M., White Eagle..... 236
Wagner, Richard, My Life..... 66
Walsh, Thomas, The Pilgrim Kings..... 114
Walsh, W. S., Heroes and Heroines of Fiction 236
Ward, Mgr. Bernard, The Sequel to Catholic Emancipation 234
Ward, Mrs. H., Eltham House..... 44
Warren, Patience, Clouded Amber..... 188
Warren, Maude Redford, Robin Hood and His Merry Men..... 620
Waxweiller, Emile, Belgium Neutral and Loyal 162
Webb, Clement G. J., A History of Philosophy 19
Wells, H. G., The Research Magnificent..... 68
Wibbelt, Augustine, The Blessed Peace of Death 620
White, Bouck, Letters from Prison..... 308
Williams, H. S., Luther Burbank, His Life and Work 474
Winter, William, Vagrant Memories..... 186
Woodbridge, Elizabeth, More Jonathan Papers 284
Woodhull, Maxwell Van Z., West Point in Our Next War..... 546
Wright, Cuthbert, One Way of Love..... 356
Young, James T., The New American Government and Its Work..... 450
Zahm, Joseph A., Through South America's Southland 521
Zueblin, Charles, American Municipal Problems 525

BOOKS

Addresses at Patriotic and Civic Occasions by Catholic Orators 501
Agnes of Bohemia, Blessed, Some New Sources for the Life..... 43
Agricultural Education, The Means and Methods of 452
Aladore 354
Alaska, Travels in..... 331
Allemagne L', et les Alliés devant la Conscience chrétienne 402
Als die Zeit erfullt war..... 356
Ambassadors, The Little..... 236
America at Work..... 164
America, The Invasion of..... 331
American Municipal Problems..... 525
American Government, The New, and Its Work 450
American Poets, The Little Book of..... 186
American School, The..... 524
Angels, The Side of the..... 548
Anthracite 547
Apologetics, A Manual of..... 308
Argentine, The Real..... 43
Aristocracy and Justice..... 188
Atonement, The Doctrine of the..... 619
Beltane the Smith..... 211
Bent Twig, The..... 164
Belgium, A Short History of..... 473
Belgium Neutral and Loyal..... 162
Belgium, The Neutrality of..... 115
Belgium, The Spell of..... 210
Belgium's Agony..... 282
Between the Lines..... 162
Boniface, St., The Life of..... 499
Brittany, Songs of..... 330
Brooke, Rupert, Collected Poems of..... 234
Browning, Robert, Complete Poetical Works of 162
Broydrick, In Memoriam Rt. Rev. Mgr. T. J. 620
Burbank, Luther, His Life and Work..... 474
Camping Ground, On the Old..... 620
Carfrae's Comedy 572
Castillo, Life of Bernal Diaz del..... 65
Catholic Church, History of the..... 547
Catholic Church, The Story of the..... 547
Catholic Emancipation, The Sequel to..... 234
Catholic Library, The..... 473
Catholic Religion, Cathechism of the..... 140
Causons 449
Chaff and Wheat..... 259
Challenge of the Future, The..... 546
Chemistry, First Principles of..... 189
Chester, Around Old..... 236
Child, Religious Education of the..... 19
Child, The Wayward..... 19
Child Study and Child Training..... 595
Children of Fancy..... 451
Chinese Superstitions, Researches into..... 475
Christian, What Is a?..... 427
Christine, Lucie, The Spiritual Journal of.... 187
Christmas Candles, In..... 211
Church History, Studies in..... 306
Church of Christ, The..... 161
Circle, The Red..... 66
Citizenship, The Liberty of..... 499
Civilization and Climate..... 524
Civil War, Battleground Adventures in the... 260
Clerical Colloquies..... 522
Clouded Amber..... 188
Columban, St., The Life of..... 618
Columbus, Christopher..... 116
Common Sense Applied to Woman Suffrage.. 116
Confirmation 593
Confucius, The Ethics of..... 523
Consolation, Le Livre de la..... 189
Conversational French Reader..... 164
Constantinople, Old and New..... 66
Copper River, The Camp by..... 236
Court Life from Within..... 236
Country Girl, The American..... 308
Conversion, La Psychologie de la..... 282
Cuba, Old and New..... 499
Curiosities in Proverbs..... 500
Crowd, A Voice from the..... 90
Crowd in Peace and War, The..... 546
David Penstephen..... 284
Davis, Thomas..... 42
Death, The Blessed Peace of..... 620
Debating for Boys..... 91
De Smet, Father, The Life of..... 185
Dieu son existence et sa nature..... 89
Dictionnaire Apologétique de la Foi Catholique 570
Dictionary, Universal Pronouncing, of Biography and Mythology..... 259
Discipline as a School Problem..... 451
Drama, American, The Case of..... 163
Drama of 365 Days, The..... 115
Dreams, A Painter of..... 522
Drifting Waters..... 571
Drink and Be Sober..... 260
Dublin, The Rocky Road to..... 186
Education, Religious..... 331
Education? What is..... 595
Economic Problems, Current..... 547
Eighteenth Century, Critical Essays of the.... 284
Eltham House..... 44
Emma McChesney & Co..... 189
Emmyline 524
Enemy, In the Hands of the..... 162
England, A Chant of Love for..... 451
England, The Crimes of..... 474
English Criticism, The Rise of Classical..... 68
English Martyrs, A Book of..... 66
English People, A Short History of the..... 428
Epistle of St. James, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on..... 619
Escape, and other Essays..... 138
Essay, The English Familiar..... 619
Essays, Modern..... 619
Ethics in Service..... 403
Europe, A Short History of 1806-1914..... 571
Europe, Heart of..... 209
Europa's Fairy Book..... 403
Eve Dorré..... 67
Evolution, The Falsity of the Theory of..... 501
Faces, Old Familiar..... 619
Faith, Pedagogical Value of the Virtue of the 284
Father Tim's Talks with People He Met..... 139
Fear God and Take Your Own Part..... 522
Fiction, Heroes and Heroines of..... 236
Field Afar Stories..... 212
Fifteen Thousand Miles by Stage..... 500
Folly, The Wiser..... 595
France, The Spirit of..... 594
French Boy, How the, Learns to Write..... 475
France at War..... 162
French Revolution, High Lights of the..... 137
Fringes of the Fleet, The..... 402
Fulton, Robert..... 165
Garin, The Fortunes of..... 92
Gate, At the Door of the..... 572
Gavin, Michael Frecburn..... 354
German Jesuit Fathers of Bombay, The..... 114
Ghosts, The Goddess of..... 89
Glauben leben, Aus dem!..... 187
Good Friday and Other Poems..... 594
Gossamer 500
Government, The Reconciliation of, with Liberty 450
Great Authors in Their Youth..... 211
Green Mansions 620
Gymnasiast, Der..... 187
Habits That Handicap..... 188
Haitian Revolution, The..... 67
Heel of the War, The..... 474
Held to Answer..... 524
Hellenic Civilization..... 355
Hero Tales and Legends of the Serbians..... 90
Hildegarde, St., The Life and Visions of.... 66
Hilltop, A, on the Marne..... 114
Historical Records and Studies..... 162
History of Medieval and Modern Europe for Secondary Schools..... 476
History, Teaching of, in Elementary and Secondary Schools..... 91
Hollyhock House..... 620
Humors of Irish Life..... 42
Huns, Attila and the..... 260
Ideals, American..... 187
Idyl, An, Some Sermons and a Song..... 138
Iliad, The Little..... 92
Incense and Iconoclasm..... 18
Incendium Amoris, The..... 18
India and Its Faiths..... 426
India, Memories of..... 210
International Encyclopedia, The New, 283.... 523
Inquisition, The..... 306
Ireland, Famous Cities of..... 234
Irish Abroad, The..... 115
Irish Judge, Recollections of an..... 115
Irish Orators and Oratory..... 42
Irish Poetry, The Book of..... 42
Isabel of Castile..... 353
Italy, Storied..... 138
Johnson, Lionel, Poetical Works of, 402; Appraisal of His Work..... 428
Jonathan Papers, More..... 284
Joyful Star..... 236
Journeys with Jerry the Jarvey..... 572
Jerusalem 44
Just David 595
Katrinka, the Story of a Russian Child..... 164
Kentucky, All That's..... 619
Kings, Queens and Pawns..... 307
Kings, The Pilgrim..... 114
Kipling's India..... 189
Know Your Own Mind..... 356
Latin Church, The, in the Middle Ages..... 139
Leerboek der Algemeene Geschiedenis, 355; der Neredlandsche Geschiedenis..... 355
Legends of Saints and Sinners..... 42

PAGE

Lentino, Giacomo da, The Poetry of..... 523
Life, My, 66; Life, The Normal, 90; and Adventures of a Free Lance..... 620
Literature, Interpretations of..... 259
Literature, The Evolution of..... 165
Literature, The Modern Study of..... 163
Literary Problems, The Greatest of..... 283
Live, How to..... 235
Living, The Cost of..... 524
Logic, A New..... 67
Loneliness of Christ, The..... 164
Lord, The, My Light..... 92
Lotta's Career..... 116
Louvain, 891-1914..... 332
Lusitania's Last Voyage, The..... 115
Man Jesus, The..... 140
Man, The Heart of a..... 66
Man, The Spirit of..... 594
Marne, A Hilltop on the..... 114
Marriage Cycle, A..... 188
Mass, Mysteries of the, in Reasoned Prayers. 427
Martha, The Way of, and the Way of Mary. 570
McGee, W. J., Life of..... 452
Memories and Anecdotes..... 28
Mexico, Historic Churches in..... 25
Miracle, The Sweet..... 22
Misrule, The Lord of..... 186
Missal in English, The New..... 104
Missions, History of Christian..... 67
Modern Austria..... 355
Modern History, The Blackest Page of..... 546
Monica, St..... 212
Moscow From, to the Persian Gulf..... 451
Mother Goose..... 426
Mother of God, The Wondrous Childhood of the Blessed..... 235
Movies, Making the..... 427
Moving Picture, The Art of the..... 427
Musical Knowledge, The Book of..... 236
Mysterium Arcæ Boule..... 474
Mystery Plays, A Rosary of..... 20
National Floodmarks..... 140
Nerinckx, Life of Reverend Charles..... 571
Neutrals, Rights and Duties of..... 546
Newman's Gentleman..... 403
Newspaper, The Coming..... 91
New York, Old Roads from the Heart of..... 91
Noble Lives of a Noble Race..... 140
Noncombatant, The Log of a..... 115
Normans in European Literature, The..... 258
North, The Harp of the..... 595
North, The Shepherd of the..... 595
Oakleyites, The..... 451
Office Boy, That..... 188
Old Delabole..... 164
One Way of Love..... 356
Over There..... 162
Pallen, The Collected Poems of Condé Benoist 89
Papal Chancery, Lectures on the History of the..... 426
Paradoxes, A Budget of..... 163
Paroles de la Guerre, Les..... 427
Payne, Father..... 500
Peace and War, A Primer of..... 162
Philosophy, A History of..... 19
Physically Fit, Keeping..... 549
Physician, The Beloved..... 355
Pillar to Post, From..... 572
Pioneer Laymen of North America..... 233
Pioneers, The..... 428
Plashers Mead..... 210
Plenty, The Years of..... 425
Poems (G. K. Chesterton)..... 20
Poets and Poetry, Talks about..... 185
Portugal of the Portuguese..... 594
Probation..... 475
Problems of Boyhood..... 19
Prince, The Lost..... 212
Principle, The Social..... 234
Prison, Letters from..... 308
Prisoners of War..... 236
Publisher, Memories of a..... 186
Queen of Sheba and Other Dramas..... 524
Queen's Gift Book, The..... 476
Races and Immigrants in America..... 567
Recollections of an Irish Judge..... 115
Relaxation, The Psychology of..... 500
Religion, The Dawn of, in the Mind of the Child..... 570
Reminiscences..... 330
Research Magnificent, The..... 68
Rhetoric, Everyday..... 475
Robin Hood and His Merry Men..... 620
Rome, Fountains of Papal..... 269
Rome, The Path to..... 42
Rubaiyat, New, from a Southern Garden..... 452
Russian Fairy Tales..... 90
Sappho in Levkas..... 186
Savio, Dominic, The Life of..... 476
Secret Request, The..... 284
Serbia, Her People, History and Aspirations. 92
Sermons (Mgr. Hogan)..... 354
Scally, The Story of a Perfect Gentleman..... 164
Scapulare B. M. V. de Monte Carmelo..... 620
Scholastic Philosophy, Lessons in..... 137
School and Society, The..... 283
Schools of Tomorrow..... 283
Shakespeare, A Life of William..... 450
Shakespeare, Back to..... 331
Shakespeare, The New Hudson..... 403
Shelf, From the..... 18

PAGE

Silesian Folk Tales..... 236
Socialism, A Study in..... 428
Sociology, Outlines of..... 68
Socrates Master of Life..... 475
Songs of the Streets and Byways..... 451
Soul, The Shepherd of My..... 354
Spanish Explorations in the Southwest..... 618
Spindrift..... 284
Sumerian Epic of Paradise..... 163
Sunday Gospels, Homilies on All the..... 308
Stage, Heroines of the Modern..... 572
Standard Oil or the People..... 452
Strasbourg..... 548
Stoic Philosophy, The..... 140
Singer, A Cathedral..... 573
Story, The Undying..... 307
Tabb, John Bannister..... 210
Talks to Boys..... 548
Taormina..... 571
Tennyson, The Life and Times of..... 450
Teosofia, Manuale di Giovanni Busnelli..... 426
Texas in the Middle Eighteenth Century..... 498
Thayer, Left Tackle..... 260
Theism and Humanism..... 306
These Twain..... 212
Things, For Greater..... 90
Thin Red Line, Book of the..... 237
Through Terror to Triumph..... 162
Through South America's Southland..... 521
To Your Dog and My Dog..... 308
Tsingtau, The Fall of..... 114
Vagrant Memories..... 186
Veronica, Mother Mary..... 499
War and Christianity..... 332
War and Religion, The..... 546
War, Economic Aspects of the..... 308
War, The Heel of..... 474
War Zone, Two American Boys in the..... 236
Washington George, Life of..... 140
Wasps, The Hunting..... 500
Ways to Lasting Peace..... 546
Weltmission im Weltkrieg, die christliche..... 476
West Point in Our Next War..... 546
What Could Germany Do for Ireland?..... 524
What May I Hope?..... 353
White Eagle..... 236
Within the Tides..... 403
Wild Sports of the West..... 12
Will in Ethics, The..... 139
World Decision, The..... 402
Woman, The Ways of..... 307
Yone Noguchi, The Story of..... 18

CHRONICLE

Armenia: Massacres..... 50
Austria-Hungary: Cabinet Ministers Resign, 194; "Diseased Hypernationalism," 601; German Cities, A League of, 530; New Coat of Arms, 98; New Vistas for Commerce, 458; Press Views, 434; Reconstruction, 146; Rumania and Hungary, 411; War Loan and Clergy..... 122
Belgium: Cardinal Mercier's "Annexes," 601; Episcopate, Letter of the..... 411
Canada: Archbishops, New, 244; Volunteer Army Increased, 337; War Loan, 194..... 459
China: Yuan, Emperor, 242; Revolt Against, 290; President, Still, 577; Powers Protest Against Monarchy..... 122
France: Academy Awards, The, 266; Anti-clerical Outbreak, 290; Briand Ministry, 74; Broken Truce, 2; Catholic Generals, 578; Clerics in the Army, 170, 554; Elections Adjourned, 435; Finances, 26, 98; Institute of Paris, Reopening of the Catholic, 170; Luçon's, Cardinal, Pastoral, 602; Lourdes Meeting, The, 483; Manifestation of Faith, 74; Missions, War Toll of the, 146; Population, 122; Resumption of Work, 122; School Libraries, 459; War Orphans' Bill, The..... 530
Germany: Alsace-Lorraine Diet Loyal to Germany, 459; Business Failures, 459; Catholics and the War, 74; Central Europe, The New, 530; Emperor's Birthday, The, 386; Food Problem, 98; Hohenzollern 500th Anniversary, 51; Industries, Social Work of the German, 314; Intensive Cultivation, 435; Inviting American Business, 26; Marine, A New Minister of, 555; Poland—Educational Question, 2; Polish University Opened, 146; Prussian Diet Opened, 338; Reichstag Sixth War Session, 194; Resourcefulness, 170; Socialists, 291, 578; Surmounting the Insurmountable, 602; Taxes on War Profits, 483; Trade League for South America, 26; War Damage in East Prussia, 411; War Loan, 50, 578; War Taxes, Additional..... 554
Great Britain: Bristol Labor Congress, 387; British Premier Calls on the Pope, 603; Calling to the Colors, 484; Commerce and Labor, 603; Conscription Bill, 315; Coordination between Allies, 147; Criticizing the Cabinet, 26; Dardanelles Campaign, 99; Derby Report, The, 315; England's Aid to Allies, 51; Enlisting, 507; Foundation at Cambridge, 171; Labor and Conscription, 195, 338; Munition Workers, 266; Military Conscription, 435; Navy, The, 530; Need of Economy, 506; New War Credit, 483; Parliament Prorogued, 387; Reassembles, 460; Politics, Factional, 555; Premier and House of Commons, 99; Recruiting, 219, 578; Roseberry on Recruiting, 75; Staff Changes, 243; Trades, Statistics of, 555; War Council, The New..... 123
Holland: Floods, The..... 579
Home News: Congress, Opening the Sixty-fourth, 217; Garrison, Secretary, Resigns, 433; Industrial Unrest, Economic Causes of, 241; Mexico, War Measures and, 553; Mundelein Poison Dinner at Chicago, 457; Municipal Government, 265; Ohio, Riots in, 313; Pan-American Congress, 289; Philippine Freedom Bill, 410; Preparedness, 242; Revenue Law Emergency, 241; Trade Statistics, 265; Treaties, New, 481; Wilson, President, Pan-Americanism, 313; Appoints Brandeis, 385; Speaking Tour, 385..... 409
India: Catholic Education, 507; Substitutes for Interned Jesuits..... 147
Ireland: Conscription, Protests Against, 220; Press on, 243; Depopulation, 123; Effects of the War, 75; Flax Crop, The, 531; Immigrants, Refusing Passage to, 171; Bishop O'Dwyer on Treatment of Irish, 196; Home Rule, Immediate, 435; Protestants on, 75; Military Organization, 315; Munitions Crisis, The, 603; National Records, 460; Retrenchment, 267; A Failure, 291; and Home Rule, 338; Recruiting, 99, 484; New Campaign for, 147; Redmond on, 99; Taxes, 47, 51, 555; Protest Against..... 579
Italy: Apologetics, the Paduan Academy of. 315
Japan: Papal Envoy's Reception, The..... 531
Mexico: Americans Killed, 339; Carranza, Recognized, 3, 52; Press on, 28; Persecutions, 220; Cardinal Gibbons on, 339; Churches, Seized, 267; Damages to the, 172; Farley, Letter of Cardinal, 507; Granados's Execution, 148; Hierarchy Makes Statement, 124; Massacre, Another, 531; Oaxaca's Manifesto, 508; Persecutions, Religious, 244, 436; Cardinal O'Connell on, 412; Terrorism, 316; Query and an Answer, A (Ed.), 14; Red Cross on Conditions, 100; Religion and Morality, 580, 603; War on, 460; Villa, and the United States, 580; The Pursuit of, 604; Yucatan, Religious Conditions in, 76; Persecutions in, 28, 124, 292, 387; Feminists, 412; Radicalism, 388; After the Recognition..... 484
Portugal: Commerce and Trade, 556; Persecution Active..... 292
Rome: Cardinals, New, 196; Falconio, New Honors for Cardinal, 604; Gotti, Cardinal Dead, 556; Irish Martyrs, Cause of the, 556; Pope, The and Emperor of Ethiopia, 4; and Proselyters, 244; and Poland, 580; Allocution to the Lenten Preachers, 604; Saints, Future..... 436
Russia: Duma, The..... 268
Spain: Badajoz's, Bishop of, Pastoral Letter, 532; Bigotry in Cortes, Rebuked, 340; Bull for the Crusades, 172; Congress, A Catholic, 268; Ship Decree, 532; Jealousies, Provincial and Commercial, 556; Neutrality in War..... 388
War: Ancona Sunk, 121; Note to Austria on, 218, 242, 266, 289; Appam Arrives at Norfolk, 410; Erzerum Captured by Russians, 458; German Attachés Recalled, 218; Men, Another Million, 267; Montenegro Campaign, 337; Nish, Fall of, 97; Peace Discussion in Reichstag, 219; Persia Sunk, 290; Serbia, Invasion of, 25; Central Campaign Complete, 193; Submarine Controversy, 314, 434, 458, 482, 529; Verdun, 482, 505, 529, 554, 577..... 601

COMMUNICATIONS

America, Winning for the Church..... 85
Anglican "Branch" Theories, The..... 180
Anglicans, Sincerity of the, 37..... 61
Apostolic Spirit, The..... 493
Argument and Poetry..... 492
"Articles" The, and the Sacraments..... 108
Athletics, Rational, 12, 60, 109, 227, 323, 349 421
Boys of Our City, The..... 324
"Britannica's" Offenses, Repeating the..... 612
"Cardinal," The Place of..... 613
Catechism, Correspondence Courses in..... 157
"Catholic" and "Reformation"..... 445
Catholic Press, The 155; Defects of the..... 36
Catholic Week, The..... 491
Catholics, The Amusements of..... 565
Catholicism, Accusations against..... 443
Celt and Politics, The, 300, 347, 397..... 445
Chaplain, Where Was the?..... 517
Charity, Well Directed..... 277
Chesterton, A Word to Mr..... 13
Children's, Crusade, A New..... 323
Children's Books..... 492
Children, Teaching, to Play..... 517
Christianity and the Present..... 469
Christmas Masque, The..... 397
Coincidence, A Disconcerting..... 181
Congregational Singing, 253..... 444

PAGE

Conrad, Joseph, Religious Belief of..... 421
Editors, How "Attuned" Act..... 539
Farm, Back to The..... 253
Films, Censorship of, 444..... 540
Flowers at Funerals..... 444
Fort Lauderdale, not Florida..... 35
Fraternity Evil, The..... 252
Guardians of Liberty, The, 396..... 541
Heresy, No Compromise with..... 157
Hymnal, A Systematic, 301..... 349
Impropriety in Drama and Film..... 492
Institutions, Names of Catholic, 37..... 108
International Aid..... 349
Jastrow's Civilization of Babylonia and Assyria..... 445
Kindergarten, The..... 492
Marie-Odile, 444..... 493
Marry, Can He Afford to? 565..... 613
McErlane, Father..... 564
Names, A Confusion of (T. Gavan Duffy)..... 589
Newspapers Diocesan-Owned..... 13
Non-Catholics, Reaching..... 541
"Operatic Voluntaries"..... 613
Palais, Bishop St., of Vincennes..... 541
Panama Missionaries, Home Work of..... 589
Papal Supremacy, Mr. Morse and, 277..... 300
Parochial Schools, Music in the..... 515
Patrick St., The First Church of..... 564
Pioneer Sisters' Friends..... 493
Pole and a Catholic, A..... 181
Politics, Less..... 180
Popular Art, Mr. Yeats and..... 325
Protestant Revolt, The..... 492
Prison Methods, Modern..... 107
Queries, Two..... 565
San Francisco, Public Spirit in..... 83
Shakespeare, Back to..... 252
Shop, The Open, 107, 180, 228..... 324
Socialists' Tactics..... 516
Social Work for Women..... 277
Suppression of Vice Society..... 469
Thanksgiving, Shortening the..... 469
Transubstantiation, Mr. Moore and, 133, 228. 275
University, The National..... 541
Votes for Women..... 132
Woman Suffrage, 12, 83, 179, 205, 227, 251, 276, 298, 348..... 419
Woman, Has She a Soul? 347..... 516

EDUCATION

Boarding School, The Boy and the..... 621
Child, The Mysterious..... 405
Civics in the Secondary School..... 190
College Spirit, The True..... 21
Dabble and Cram..... 93
Educational Misfits..... 453
Engineering, The Cooperative Principle in... 549
Fractious Johnny..... 213
Gary School Plan, What is the? 69; in New York, 45, 117; A Popish Plot, 165; Mooted Points in the..... 285
Guy Fawkes in Chicago..... 525
Learning to "Don't"..... 573
Mantua, The Schoolmaster of..... 597
Morals, A New Code of..... 333
Pedagogy, A Pioneer in..... 477
Percy, Bringing Up..... 261
Raffia Schools..... 357
School Discipline and the "Fond Parent"..... 237
Teacher, In Defense of the..... 429
Textbooks, After Free, What?..... 501
Washing and Extras..... 309
We Practise What You Preach..... 141

ECONOMICS

Economic Fetish, The..... 46
Jobless Man, The..... 239
Planting Time, The..... 190
Socialism and a Peasantry..... 550

LITERATURE

Animalism in Literature..... 41
Bear that Walks Like a Man, The..... 136
Books for Children, The Best Sort of..... 472
Catholic Literature's Possibilities..... 184
Cervantes (Crusader and Romancer)..... 617
Conrad, Joseph..... 113
Dante Alighieri..... 208
English Garden, In an Old..... 520
Golden Legend, The..... 257
Habington, William..... 305
Harland, Henry..... 545
Herbert, George..... 497
Images, The Makers of..... 282

PAGE

Lamb, Charles..... 352
Literary Style and the War..... 569
Library, How to Collect a..... 281
Manzoni, Alessandro..... 448
Mexican Poets and Poetry..... 88
Non-Catholic Historians and the Middle Ages 329
Repplier, Agnes..... 17
Shelley and Byron..... 425
Tabb, Father..... 401
Thomas Aquinas, St..... 160
Wasmann, Father..... 64
Wordsworth..... 592

NOTE AND COMMENT

Academic Freedom, Official Justification of... 432
Accidents in Coal Mines..... 551
Amusements, Indecent and Vulgar..... 480
Anti-Catholic Literature on Railways, 215; in the Philippines..... 311
Artificial Hand, A Dexterous..... 480
Bible in, The Schools..... 72
Bigotry, Congressman Kendall on..... 552
Billiart, Bl. Julie, Centenary, Death of the... 624
Borglum, Gutzon, Sculptor..... 575
Bosco, Don, Centenary..... 216
Boston's Catholic Architecture..... 119
Burden of Catholic Schools..... 191
Caldey School for Boys..... 288
Canada's Criminal Statistics..... 311
Cancer's Ravages..... 599
Capper, Gov. on Preparedness..... 336
Catholic, Alumnæ Federation, 119, 215; Educational Association, Report of, 143; Evening Schools, 47; Extension Society, Work of, 216; Immigrants, Leo House for Care of, 480; Indian Missions, 359; Practical Managers for Institutions, 288; Social Enterprises, Centralizing..... 71
Catholics and the Civil War..... 504
Chain Prayers..... 360
Charity, Real, The Beginning of 96; Proper Spirit of..... 455
Chewing Gum, Cost of Habit..... 599
Chicago Poison Case, Mgr. Kelley and the... 504
Children's Lack of Respect for Authority.... 263
Christ, Our Knowledge of, 120; Child Society of Chicago..... 192
Church, in United States, 360; Papers, Readers of, 479; False Charges Against the..... 524
Colors of Distant Stars..... 407
Confederate States, Heroes of the..... 407
Convent Education, Old-Fashioned..... 480
Conversion of America, League for the..... 479
Converts, New Plan for Making..... 432
Conway, Rev. John, S.J., Death of..... 24
Death, Causes of, 287; During 1914..... 408
Dempsey, Father, Social Influence..... 72
Diaz, Father Pompelio, Death of..... 47
Distribution of Wealth in United States..... 143
Doran, Bishop, Death of..... 335
Economic Prosperity of United States..... 335
Education Bureau, The Purpose of the..... 288
Educational Institutions, Statistics of..... 335
Editor, Responsibilities of an..... 408
Employment Bureau, Catholic..... 360
Episcopalians, Proposed Reunion of American 600
Fabre, Henri, the "Insects' Homer"..... 95
Faith, Society for Propagation of the..... 432
Films, Reprehensible, 575; Censorship..... 359
Financial Position of United States..... 336
Fleming, Father David, Death of..... 144
Floral "Uplift," A..... 311
Foreign Trade, Stimulating Our..... 455
Garcia, Tomas Santos, Reconciled to Church.. 143
German Charity Bazaar..... 600
Gesticulation, To Abolish..... 480
Gibbons, Cardinal and Billy Sunday..... 311
Gild Hall for Catholic Girls..... 599
Gold Cradles and Wooden Coffins..... 552
Hedley, Bishop, Death of..... 192
Holy Name Rallies..... 72
Immigration, Problem the, 120; Administration of Laws on..... 168
Imports and Exports, Statistics of..... 239
Industrial Accidents in New York..... 71
Infant Mortality in United States..... 336
Innocent People in Jail..... 240
Iowa, Education in..... 336
Ireland, Criminal Statistics of..... 264
Italian Problem, Our Ever Recurring..... 264
Jewish Statistics..... 191
Kennel, A Chinese..... 552
Labor Legislation..... 575
Lætare Medal for Dr. Walsh..... 623
Latin America, Ignorance about..... 551
Liberality of the Poor..... 119
Luther's Wedding Ring, 503; Centenary, Discord in..... 240

PAGE

Marquette University, 575..... 623
Marist Brothers in Japan..... 95
Martha, The Order of..... 528
Materialistic Evolution, Jean Henri Fabre on 336
Maura, Don Miguel, Death of..... 95
Mexico's Cathedrals..... 599
Militia and Labor..... 360
Millions for Fraudulent Schemes..... 95
Minimum Wage in Massachusetts..... 24
Missionary Congress, the Guerilla..... 527
Missions, Protestant Generosity towards..... 479
Moderate Drinker, The..... 264
Monument to French and German Heroes Fallen in War..... 240
Mortality Statistics..... 71
"Movie" Industry Reform in the, 408; Censorship of..... 623
Mundelein, Archbishop..... 431
Negro, American Economic Progress of the 47; and Indian Missions, 527; Work Among the..... 455
New York Alien Labor Law, Valid..... 239
Ortynsky, Death of Bishop..... 623
Outlook, The, and Woman Suffrage, 47; On Panama Congress..... 168
Oxford, A Touch of..... 119
Pan-Protestant Congress, The, 120..... 624
Parish Sodalities, Union of..... 239
Polish Immigrants, Night Schools for..... 168
Poor, Pennies of the..... 119
Pope, and Bible Circulation, 144; Money for the..... 455
Popular Science, The Credulity of Modern.... 528
Preparedness and Cold Cash..... 47
Priests in Italy..... 287
Prosperity after the War..... 407
Protestant Sermons, Sources of..... 288
Protestantism in Japan..... 95
Public Schools, A Cold Admirer of the, 47; Results..... 455
Religious Education, Necessity of..... 432
Racial Elements in Modern Americans..... 407
Rat Menace, The..... 599
Satan, Devotees of..... 552
Scannell, Bishop, Death of..... 336
Science, Ignorance of Modern..... 600
Sisters of Providence, Diamond Jubilee of the 72
Social and Religious Revolution in New England..... 192
Socialist Arcadia, A New..... 455
Socialists and Suffragists, 119; and Religion.. 23
Society of Incarnate Word..... 24
Soul, Has Woman a? 264..... 624
State Prison Labor Board..... 216
Stipends and High Schools..... 24
Stockholm System, The..... 168
Street Accidents..... 144
Students in Jesuit Colleges..... 191
Suffrage Marriage, An Ideal..... 527
Sweat Shop Impositions..... 96
Sweated Labor in Tenements..... 503
Ten Leading American Cities..... 96
Theaters, Some Reflections on Our..... 524
Three R's, Neglect of the..... 263
True Thought of the Age..... 96
Unconstitutional Anti-alien Law, An..... 168
Usury in National Banks..... 240
Vacant Sees Filled..... 216
War, Cost of, 24; Casualty Lists, 24; Business, Serious Menace of, 311; and Catholic Charity, 312; Second Thoughts on This, 312; Moral Evils of..... 575
Washington, Booker T., Death of..... 144
Woman and Child Wage-Earnings..... 528
Y. M. C. A., Progress of..... 47

SOCIOLOGY

Capital Punishment..... 334
Child, Legislation, 166; The Catholic, in the Children's Court..... 406
Contempt of Court, Wholesale..... 430
Crib, At the..... 262
Fairy Tale, Another (Woman's Moral Influence)..... 22
Free Speech and Revolt..... 478
Generation, Conserving the Next..... 574
Heaven on Earth (True Philanthropy)..... 214
Law for Theaters..... 454
Lemon Frappé, and the Y. W. C. A..... 94
Marry, Can He Afford to? 70..... 613
Over-Population and Diminishing Returns.... 502
Parents, Are They Superfluous?..... 118
Parole System, A New..... 358
Prison Reform, Fallacies of..... 598
Social Influence, Catholic..... 310
Sociologist, Dickens as a Scientific..... 286
Woman's Right..... 142

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIV, No. 1
WHOLE No. 340

OCTOBER 16, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, Oct. 5, p. m.-Oct. 11, a. m. Serbia Again Invaded—Diplomatic Developments—The Crisis in Greece—Bulgaria's Peril. France: The Broken Truce. Germany: Educational Decree for Poland—The Polish Question. Mexico: Carranza; His Recognition. Rome: Legg Yiassu and Benedict XV.....1-4

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Genesis of Woman Suffrage—The Immigrant and the Nation—A Catholic Writers' Syndicate—Homicide, Excusable and Felonious—Back Home with the Women.....5-12

COMMUNICATIONS

Rational Athletics—The Morality of Woman Suffrage—A Word to Mr. Chesterton—Diocesan-Owned Newspapers—Catholic Booking Bureau. 12, 13

EDITORIALS

A Query and an Answer—A Slaughtered Nation—A Divorce Record—"Creed Consciousness"—The Tainted Stream—"Self-Realization"...14-17

LITERATURE

XI. Agnes Repplier.

REVIEWS: The "Incendium Amoris"—The Story of Yone Nogouchi—From the Shelf—Incense and Iconoclasm—Problems of Boyhood—The Religious Education of the Child—The Wayward Child—A History of Philosophy.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: Chesterton's New "Poems"—The October Queen's Work—Some Dramatic Works—"The Bowmen and Other Legends of the War"—"Sir Christopher Leighton"—Two Historical Quarterlies—Books for the Little Ones.

BOOKS RECEIVED:.....17-21

EDUCATION

The True College Spirit.....21, 22

SOCIOLOGY

Another Fairy Tale.....22, 23

NOTE AND COMMENT

Socialists and Religion—Death of the Reverend John Conway, S.J.—Stipends and High Schools—Minimum Wage in Massachusetts—Casualty Lists—Cost of the War—Society of the Incarnate Word 23, 24

CHRONICLE

The War.—In spite of very sanguinary contests on many fronts, and especially in Champagne, where the French have slightly improved their situation, the interest of the week has been a diplomatic one. The only military event to which much importance has been attached is the beginning of the invasion of Serbia by the Central Powers. Already they have got a footing on the Serbian side of the Drina, the Save, and the Danube, have captured Belgrade, Servia's capital, and are pushing south along the Morava. It is not thought that Serbia is strong enough by herself to defend her territory on these three fronts, especially as Bulgaria is threatening her on a fourth with an army of perhaps 450,000 men. During the coming week the progress of the Teutonic armies will be watched with great interest, as it has been predicted that Austria and Germany will have forced a way through Serbia before the Allies can send sufficient reinforcements to bar their way effectually.

Bulletin, Oct. 5, p.m.-Oct. 11, a.m.

Serbia Again Invaded

Events in the Balkans are moving with great rapidity. Bulgaria's reply to the ultimatums sent by Russia and Great Britain, for it now appears that Great Britain also made demands that were final in character, though not in writing, having been judged unsatisfactory, the British, French, Italian, Russian and Serbian Ministers asked for their passports; and M. Savinski, the Russian Minister at Sofia, informed M. Radoslavoff, the Bulgarian Premier, that diplomatic relations between Bulgaria and Russia were at an end. The Bulgarian Minister at Petrograd thereupon left the Russian Capital, and King Ferdinand, who had been requested by Pope Benedict to settle his country's difficulty without bloodshed, telegraphed to the Vatican that such a course was now inconsistent with Bulgaria's honor.

Diplomatic Developments

Rumania notified Bulgaria that she regarded the mobilization of Bulgarian armies as an unfriendly act, and France proceeded to land troops at Salonica in Greece. A week earlier this step would have aroused hostile demonstrations, for the offers made to Bulgaria by the Allies with the purpose of buying her neutrality, were thought to be favoring Bulgarian aspirations at the expense of the rest of the Balkans. The withdrawal however of these offers by the Allies, which followed on Bulgaria's reply to their ultimatums, and the subsequent sending of troops to assist Serbia, caused a change of feeling, and the people witnessed the disembarkation of foreign soldiers on their territory, not only with equanimity but even with applause. M. Venizelos, the Greek Premier, interposed a formal protest against this violation of the nation's neutrality. At a stormy meeting in the Chamber of Deputies he defended his abstention from armed resistance on the grounds that it would be useless, and also that such action would exceed Greece's obligations. For the action of the Allies was meant for the defense of Serbia, Greece's ally, whom Greece had solemnly bound herself by treaty to defend, a duty which he felt Greece could not and should not in honor repudiate.

The Crisis in Greece

His position, which was interpreted as a first step toward aligning the Greeks with the Allies, displeased the King, and as a consequence M. Venizelos, and with him his Cabinet resigned, although just a few hours before they had received an overwhelming vote of confidence in the Chambers. King Constantine called M. Zaimis and asked him to form a Cabinet. This has already been done. It is questioned, however, whether this new Government will have the nation's confidence, and it has been predicted that the King will eventually be forced, as happened in the case of the King of Italy and M. Salandra, to recall the ex-Premier to the head of the Government. In the meantime both British and French troops continue to land on Greek soil, nor has any attempt been made to prevent either this or their transportation to Serbia over the Greek railroad. Greece is passing through a severe crisis, King and people apparently being divided in sympathy.

Bulgaria still protests that she is armed for neutrality only, but she is in a precarious condition. On the north is Rumania with her army practically though not officially mobilized, a state of affairs that has existed for a month. On the east Russia is already reported to be bombarding her seaports on the Black Sea, and especially Varna, toward which, however, Turkish troops are said to be hurrying. On the south British and French warships are patrolling her Ægean coast, and Greece is drawn up along the Kavala boundary; while a large Italian army is reported to be ready to land at short notice. On the west, Great Britain, France, and Serbia are massing troops, although they have delayed so long that they are inferior in number to the Bulgarians.

Bulgaria's Peril

France.—Ministers of State and military chiefs, men of every creed and political opinion, Protestants, Jews, Freethinkers and Radicals have openly expressed their admiration for the patriotism of the French soldier-priests and chaplains at the front, and of the clergy ministering to their flocks close to the war-zone and throughout the country. But there are many irreconcilable enemies of the faith of the vast majority of their countrymen who foolishly and criminally maintain "that the Catholic Church is responsible for the outbreak of a war considered by it a visitation and punishment of God for the persecution of priests and religious by the French Government." The violently anti-Catholic paper La Lanterne protests that the sacred union for national defense will not make them forget or neglect "lay defense." Catholics well know what this means, a renewal, once the war is over, of the odious persecution of the clergy, of the religious, of the entire Catholic body in France. Even now, the truce supposed to prevail among all parties and creeds has been shamefully broken by the enemies of the Church. Some time ago the mayors of the Department of Jura having petitioned the President of the Republic, in the name of their Communes to allow the members of their religious Congregations to return, the President through his secretary replied: "The President of the Republic instructs me to request you to inform the petitioners that all members of religious Congregations, who have asked permission to return to France to be attached to sanitary establishments, have been immediately authorized to do so." This trifling concession aroused the indignation of the readers of La Lanterne, who pointed out several instances of religious tolerance which they deemed dangerous to the country. Therefore the paper felt called upon to say:

The Broken Truce

> We refrain for the time being from commenting on these facts, but it is necessary to take great care that if all the members of the religious Congregations thus return to France, one by one, they must not be allowed to seize a propitious moment to reconstitute their prohibited Congregations. In that possibility lies a danger for the future. We must and will be prepared to guard against it.

The Lanterne does not by any means represent the country's views. It is, however, the organ of a large and unfortunately influential party that breathes rancor and hate against a patriotic body of men and women, who now ask but one privilege from the motherland which has treated them so harshly: that of helping her in the hour of her need and suffering.

Germany.—An important decree regulating education in the schools of Poland, west of the Vistula, has been issued by Field Marshal von Hindenburg. The schools, in general, are placed under the supervision of the Civil Government, from which all authorization in educational matters is to be obtained. The most notable clause is that which makes the "principle of denominationalism" fundamental in the public schools. The decree says:

Educational Decree for Poland

> The schools are to foster religious sentiments; train youth in virtue and discipline; promote obedience, industry, truthfulness and unsullied ideals; and develop moral character and manly effort. The providing and conducting of religious instruction will be in the hands of the respective religious communities (Evangelical, Catholic, Jewish) under the supervision of the civil Government. Wherever religious instruction is not sufficiently provided for by the religious denominations the duty will fall upon the Government, in order that the thorough religious education of youth may be assured.

For all higher public or private schools the permission of the civil authorities is required. Full account is taken in the public schools of the desire of the Poles for their own language. It is to be the established language in all except German and Jewish public schools. Russian is permitted as a special language course. The principals and teachers in charge of secondary schools are chosen by those responsible for the schools themselves and confirmed by the civil authorities.

With the advance of the Austro-Hungarian arms the "Polish Question" is becoming of increasing political importance in Germany. According to the Allgemeine Rundschau, a majority of voices from the Polish camp are advocating "a policy of mutual understanding and conciliation with the German Empire." Among others the former Polish Representative Napieralski and Prince Drucki-Lubecki recently expressed themselves in this sense. Count Kwilecki, who has been called to take part in the civil government of Russian Poland, says in a recent brochure that the Poles in their entire being, their history, culture and tradition belong to Western civilization and have been separated from the Germans in particular merely by purely political disagreements. Similar sentiments are expressed by v. Jackowski in the Polish Goniec Wielkopolski. He looks forward to a bright future for Poland, but believes that it must rest upon a good understanding with Prussia, such as he thinks can now more readily than ever be brought about. Count Szoldrski, writing in the Tag, sees the true purposes of Russia laid bare in its recent attempt to "Russify" Galicia and render it schismatic through military force. He believes that the declarations of the German Government can be trusted, and says it would be foolish and impolitic not to clasp the offered hand of friendship. Mutual confidence and co-operation, he tells the Poles, will be crowned with success. The Czas, the conservative organ of the Polish National Committee, publishes the following important declaration:

The Polish Question

> The speech of the German Imperial Chancellor has made a deep, and we may add, a favorable impression upon Polish society. We take full account of the fact that the German Chancellor made no decisive statement about the fate of Poland. Its significance lies in the principle established by the Chancellor that the opposition between Germans and Poles must now come to an end, and that this must be brought about by acknowledging the rights of Poland to liberty and national development.

There is question, says Count Szoldrski, "of erecting a strong Polish bulwark as an effective protection for the conquests of Western European civilization against the onsets of the East."

Mexico.—Comment on Carranza is still plentiful. An American, who left Mexico City recently, writes in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of October 3:

Carranza; His Recognition

> All the military chiefs in Mexico, in the opinion of the great majority of well-informed Americans and also in the opinion of the great majority of Mexicans themselves, must be completely eliminated if permanent peace is to come to Mexico. First among these is Venustiano Carranza, first chief of the Constitutional party. . . .
>
> When I reached Mexico City last February, the Capital was in a state of utter anarchy, as it still remains until this day. Few men, whether natives or foreigners, dared drive on the streets with an automobile, for it was certain to be commandeered by the Carranzista troops. Plunder and murder were unconfined, and foreigners were warned against showing themselves in public after nightfall if they valued their lives. . . . . Such outrages as these took place while the Carranzistas were in power in Mexico City; and they, with similar occurrences of tyranny, misrule and weakness, have led me to share the prevalent opinion in Mexico that Carranza's recognition by the United States would be fatal to Mexico's hopes for a permanent peace. . . . .
>
> I have said that Carranza is for peace, but he is for peace with a difference. He is for peace on terms of unconditional surrender to himself. When the Aguascalientes Convention, composed of leaders from every State asked the military chieftains to lay down their arms and permit a free plebiscite to be taken for the choice of a Provisional President, Carranza, in the words of the convention's report, "insultingly declined," while Villa agreed.
>
> It can be said without exaggeration that Carranza's egotistic ambition to make himself dictator of Mexico has been the only factor for the last several months which has prevented peace in Mexico. Villa, conscious of his terrible record, and Zapata, knowing he is an unlettered Indian, each admits his unfitness to become ruler of Mexico. Both have repeatedly expressed their willingness to eliminate themselves as possible candidates. But I have found it to be the consensus of opinion in Mexico City that Carranza is committed to the "rule or ruin" policy.
>
> In character he is uncompromising, rigid and so selfish that his own ambitions are to him more important than peace for his country. He is also weak, and is in the hands of a little group of advisers who, I regret to say, are Americans. They would jeopardize all Mexico for their personal aggrandizement, and are moving heaven and earth to win recognition for Carranza in Washington. . . . .
>
> When I left (Mexico City) it was being predicted that if Carranza is not eliminated as Huerta was, and if he is recognized by the United States, revolts against his rule will break out anew. His vindictive temper, it was said, would lead him to attempt to take revenge on his enemies, with the result that these would be driven to resume their arms in self-defense. I am speaking not only for myself but for the general opinion in Mexico as I learned it when I say that the recognition of Carranza by the United States would be a disaster and calamity for Mexico.

The Outlook for October 6 contains the first of a series of articles on Mexico by Edward I. Bell, a Protestant, sometime editor and publisher of La Prensa and the Daily Mexican of Mexico City. He asserts that Carranza had prepared a revolt against Madero, whom he now calls the martyr, and parleyed with Huerta for suitable terms of submission to Huerta's government. The writer has this to say of Carranza as Governor:

> Carranza possessed no governing talent. He had been an automaton in the Senate and as Governor he was the butt of local wit. His vanity soon became a State liability. His time was devoted to banquets and speech-making. State affairs ran down hill right speedily; discipline disappeared; office routine fell in arrears; graft ran riot; taxes were doubled and in instances multiplied by three, but little of the money reached the treasury. In the northern section of the State, which lies along the border of Texas, bands of brigands raided haciendas and small towns and supplied material for the enemies of Madero to exploit in American newspapers.

Continuing, he writes:

> Secretary Bryan knew little about Carranza, but he promptly tendered him support. It was this support and nothing else which brought about Carranza the semblance of leadership. Thousands of irresponsible or vicious men in Northern Mexico were hungry to despoil their prosperous neighbors. They rose in little bands and cried, Viva Madero! Viva Revolucion! And, as an afterthought, they cried, Viva Carranza! because behind him was the privilege of selling stolen goods in the United States, and bringing over the border the powder and shot they purchased with the money.
>
> The progress of this "plunderbund" during nearly three years has been made familiar in the news dispatches of the daily press. . . . . The method of the Carranzistas is a clean sweep; what they cannot carry away or store up for sale they destroy: grain in storage and growing corn in the fields, farm implements, imported farm machinery, immense power plants and railway systems of haciendas, sugar mills, flour mills, cotton mills, house furnishings, costly irrigation systems and great storage reservoirs for water by which alone the arid lands can be made productive, hacienda residences and peon houses, whatever the evil spirit of destruction could vent itself upon, millions of dollars' worth of equipment essential to the agricultural and industrial life of the nation, built up slowly and painfully during more than a half-century. This is the Carranza way.

Not much has been printed of this wanton wiping out by the Carranzistas of the industries in which peons were employed or the confiscation of the crops or the foodstuffs they have raised. In many places in the north, in the center, and in the south utter desolation marks the spot where industrial establishments supplied employment for the peon, and the men Carranza claims as his generals are the ones who have been responsible for it. Revenge has not prompted this miserable work to any great extent. Destructive frenzy and a vicious hope of driving the poor to desperation and to enlistment in the army of destruction are the only assignable causes for these acts. In other respects, in the outrages upon the Church and the Church people, and in the universal desecration of Mexico's womanhood there is no noticeable difference in the methods of the factions. . . . .

Of all the special American investigators who have reported to the Administration on Mexican conditions, the best-informed, and therefore the most dependable is Dr. Henry Allen Tupper, of the International Peace Forum. . . . . His discoveries, promptly communicated to Mr. Bryan, proved unwelcome. Dr. Tupper kept on, at his own expense, but his secret advices to Bryan have not yet seen the light of day.

The lawlessness of Carranza's advance agent, Blanco, and his savages when they entered Mexico City in August, 1914, was a vivid demonstration to Dr. Tupper of the awfulness of the thing we were aiding, and he withheld nothing of it from the Secretary of State. He was in Mexico City during the months Carranza was enthroned there. The burlesque of government carried on by the First Chief, the desperate greed of his officers and men and the free hand they were allowed in robbing and killing, the unprintable outrages on churchmen and churchwomen and the debauching and ruin of churches, these things Dr. Tupper reported with exactness to Mr. Bryan at Washington. It was dependable information, and it came with deep regret from Dr. Tupper, who saw the abyss into which we had plunged by the Administration's unwise support of unworthy men. . . . .

Carranza started out in March, 1913, with 30,000 pesos, worth then $15,000. Villa had nothing. Where did they and their followers get the $50,000,000 spent with us or now on deposit with our banks and commercial houses?

Ransoms from rich merchants and churchmen, fines, arbitrary export and import duties, gambling-house licenses, etc., etc., raised perhaps $8,000,000. The other $42,000,000 was realized by dealing with us. First, by selling to us all manner of merchantable stuff taken by force from those who owned it. Second, by exchanging their fiat issues of worthless paper currency for the currency of the United States with our border traders, our bankers, and those of us who attempted to do business of any kind beyond the Rio Grande. Official statistics of exports and imports to and from the United States substantiate these assertions. I will content myself with one item. In the year ending June 30, 1911, the last year of normal conditions, our imports from Mexico amounted to $57,000,000. For the year ending June 30, 1915, when three-quarters of the area of Mexico was in turmoil and the inhabitants were starving, our imports from Mexico amounted to $92,000,000. Of this amount substantially all the cattle and coffee and a large part of the hides and henequen, amounting altogether to $47,000,000, were sent to us through revolutionary, that is to say, bandit, venders. This merchandise was taken by force from its rightful owners, and Carranza was a party to the transactions. When we bought it, we knew it to be so; we bought it at lower prices on that account. We knew that for the most part the money we paid for it would be used to buy arms to be employed in killing and coercing people in order that more merchantable stuff might be offered to us at the same favorable rates.

This dispatch sent from Merida by way of Havana shows later conditions:

On September 24 the Carranzistas forced the doors of the cathedral and three other churches, profaned the Blessed Sacrament, burned the statues of the Saints and later confiscated three colleges conducted by Sisters.

On October 9 the Pan-American conference decided in favor of the recognition of Carranza who gave these pledges:

(1) That the lives and property of Mexicans and foreigners will be respected and safeguarded by the Carranza Government. (2) That persons connected with any religion in Mexico will be permitted to return to Mexico and will be secured in life and property if they have not and will not participate in politics. (3) That general amnesty will be granted to Mexicans, although it is not expected that amnesty will be granted to certain leaders of the opposition to the Constitutional cause. (4) That the de facto government will take the necessary steps to restore law and order in the country, to provide general elections for the choice of officers of the Government, and that there will be a restoration of the Constitutional order in Mexico.

Comment on this is reserved for the editorial pages of further issues of AMERICA.

Rome.—The Civiltà Cattolica, quoting from the Osservatore Romano, gives an interesting account of the embassy sent by his Majesty Legg Yiassù, Emperor of Ethiopia, to Benedict XV, to offer to his Holiness the homage of the young prince and to congratulate him on his elevation to the Pontifical throne. For this purpose Father Basilio da Combrand was sent to Rome to give the Pope this autograph letter from the Ethiopian monarch:

Legg Yiassu and Benedict XV

Legg Yiassù, hereditary Prince of the throne of Ethiopia, son of the Emperor Menelik II, to his Holiness, the most glorious Pope Benedict XV, Supreme Head of Bishops, whose See is in Rome: With profound respect, I present to your August Person, the homage of my esteem and devotion.

Earnestly desirous of continuing with your Holiness the friendly relations which your Illustrious Predecessors deigned to establish with my father, I entrust to the Reverend Father Basilio da Combrand this present letter as a proof of my sincere and respectful sentiments. And since, Most Holy Father, the Lord God has found you worthy to ascend the Chair of Peter and has granted me the grace to live in these days and to witness such an event, I beg your August Person to deign to accept the expression of the homage which I hereby send you; and with all the confidence which your Holiness inspires in me, I dare to ask you to give me a place in your solicitude and care in order that God may give me the grace to govern wisely and to bring about the happiness of the people of Ethiopia.

The letter deeply moved the Holy Father, and he commissioned the envoy to carry the expression of his gratitude to the young sovereign.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Genesis of Woman Suffrage

THE sources and development of woman suffrage show plainly that original design is discredited as a worn-out legend fit only for the childhood of the race. There is, for the progenitors of sex-rebellion, no "In the beginning"; no God's plan unrolling in time and space, from out of eternity into time; no perfect pattern marred, but not ruined, by the disobedience of the first man and woman and by every mere man and woman save our Blessed Mother Mary.

The Darwinians and Spencerians have made popular the notion that the monogamic family is a produce of gradual evolution. Dozens of reasons are given by psuedo-scientists for its development. But, of course, as they find no basic reason for its existence, they assume no necessity for its maintenance. After all their facts and fancies have been gathered, the monogamic family is found by some to be best in producing and rearing children, as one method of breeding cattle is proved to be best fitted in securing excellent animals for domestic and commercial purposes.

Humanists have graciously acknowledged the monogamic family to be worth saving in the interest of the race. Even though might, not right, put men in possession of personal wealth, it is certain that in order to hold their ill-gotten gains, there arose the budding desire to dwell in organized communities. Splendid! Human experience in family forms is so varied that the commandment not to commit adultery is seen to be a shrewd piece of legislation to keep the family intact. The modern materialists popularized the idea that the monogamic family was found to be the self-conscious means by which strong men secured to their own advantage and to the offspring of their loins the social results of their conquests over their unfortunate fellows. Wonderful! This securely established the dogma that private property called the monogamic family into existence and, against nature, subjected woman to man: this dogma, of course, deals the death-blow to God's creation of man and woman. It has for its authority the theory of man's origin from the monkey with the link missing. Worse yet, in this philosophy of life there is missing a reason for the human desire to leave its "fish hooks and arrows" to its own kith and kin. Besides, God being dismissed, the "self-conscious" enjoyment of private wealth comes from nowhere.

Too bad, to spoil a well-thumbed theory of sex equality with little matters like these! Having gathered such philosophical strength as to color public opinion, "equal rights" broke out into political action. The die was cast in rebellion! As private property and sex slavery came into the scheme of human evolution together, they must go out together, to make way for the "new society." Clearly the bursting womb of the present order shall bring forth the economic and sex independence of men and women with the consequence that the individual shall supersede the family as the unit of the "social organism."

The means seem easily at hand, when workmen vote. Therefore, shall not justice be done? By majority vote "all-the-people" may become sole owner of all the capital now owned by private persons. Surely it is plain enough that, if private property is abolished, the monogamic family must die out for want of material support, unless individual sex passion keeps it alive.

In the "new society" women will be just as free as men, though man has a handicap from nature: with no home they may seek presidential votes for John or for Arabella. At its roots, this is the "economic freedom" upon which votes for women rest. The "Communist Manifesto," 1848, set these principles down succinctly, by demanding, "abolition of all right of inheritance," and "equal liability of men and women to labor." From that time on the radical political platforms, in words more or less explicit, attacked the family and demanded votes for women. In this country as early as 1851 the demand for "universal suffrage" was made in Richmond, Va., by the Social Democrats. In Germany, the Gotha platform, 1875, demanded "universal, equal and direct suffrage." The Belgian Labor Party, 1893, demanded the abolition of the "husband's liability to support the wife or children." The Social Democratic Party of Austria, 1901, demanded "abolition of all laws subordinating woman to man in public or private life." The Socialist Party of France, 1902, demands "the abrogation of every law establishing the civil inferiority of women and natural or adulterine children." Bebel rightly says that "the Socialist Party is the only one that has made the full equality of women an integral part of its program, from [logical] necessity."

In England, before the British Parliament, 1867, John Stuart Mill, when pleading for votes for women, opened up the issue with a masterful evasion. While abstract human rights were waived as irrelevant to the issue, the rights of the family were utterly ignored. Mr. Mill rests the case solely upon expediency. "To lay the ground for a denial of the franchise to anyone, it is necessary to allege either personal unfitness or public danger."

Abstract rights are truly irrelevant, but in denying the franchise to women, the rights of the family are preserved, and so public disorder averted.

Meantime, women were not quite content to let men settle the matter. In 1848 the Woman's Rights Convention (New York) resolved to secure their "sacred right to the elective franchise." Their "Declaration of Sentiments" scathingly rehearsed woman's "wrongs." But the grievances alleged set forth proof that the husband and father was performing his political and economic duty of keeping the family intact. Abroad, Harriet Martineau was at once attacking the integrity of the family and destroying human confidence in God's providence, by advocating the voluntary limitation of offspring à la Malthus. On this side of the ocean, Frances Wright, a member of Robert Owen's "New Harmony Colony," first insisted that politics is the high road to sex freedom. "Fanny" devoted her time and fortune to laying down affection as the one foundation of marriage, "kind feeling and kind action, the only religion." Margaret Fuller the while was dazzling the minds of men with the woman's version of the Concord School of Philosophy, and from Mrs. Julia Ward Howe, came protestations before the Massachusetts Legislature as to the intellectual fitness of women to vote and a denial that the emancipation of women would endanger the home. Victoria Claflin Woodhull went further by memorializing Congress for woman suffrage, and presenting herself to the nation as a presidential candidate. Miss Woodhull carried logic further, advocating the doctrine of sex-independence baldly. Of course, at that time the open advocacy of free love gained but a small following.

Perhaps Mary Wollstonecraft most vitally influenced the early propaganda of "political rights" for women. Her break from a Catholic environment was violent, weakened by no Protestant ancestry. Margaret Fuller says Miss Wollstonecraft's career was the more heroic from the fact that she belonged to a class "so narrow" that women in breaking their bonds "become outlaws." In her "Vindication of the Rights of Women" Miss Wollstonecraft argues in strict materialist fashion that "sexual distinction is arbitrary" and that woman will change her character and "emulate the virtues of men" once she is emancipated from the "authority that chains" her to her "duty." Miss Wollstonecraft and Frances Wright's names head the list as a "constant inspiration" to whom are "affectionately inscribed" those volumes on "The History of Woman Suffrage," edited by Elizabeth C. Stanton, Susan B. Anthony and Matilda Joslyn Gage.

This history is voluminous. Its premise is laid upon the assumption that under "freedom of education," "woman would not only outgrow the power of the priesthood, and religious superstition, but would invade the pulpit, interpret the Bible anew from her own standpoint, and claim an equal voice (with men) in all ecclesiastical councils." Proof that progress in woman's emancipation has been made by rebellion is cited by the authors of "The History of Woman Suffrage." "The Reformation . . . loosened the grasp of the Church upon women, and is to be looked upon as one of the most important steps in this reform. . . . When Elizabeth ascended the throne, it was not only as queen, but as the head of the newly-formed rebellious Church," and she bent "alike priest and prelate to her fiery will."

Regarding the education of children, Ellen Key has, no doubt, exerted the most powerful influence upon the Feminist propaganda. It is positive that: "At the present moment the most demoralizing factor in education is Christian religious instruction." . . . "The children are now taught the Old Testament account of the world as absolute truth, although it wholly contradicts their physical and historical instruction." (The Century of the Child).

Once a competent view of the movement demanding votes for women is had, the conclusion becomes necessary that it takes its rise in opposition to, not in logical extension from, Christian principles as related to the sexes, that the Feminist phenomena is in fact, but following after the fire of sex rebellion, set aflame at the time of the so-called Protestant Reformation; that the moral vision has become so obscured that both men and women are at work destroying God's authority and practically denying that the family is a moral body with the man politically and economically responsible for his wife and children as a necessary corollary.

MARTHA MOORE AVERY.

The Immigrant and the Nation

If the immigrant presents a knotty problem to the Church authorities, he is as great a problem for the State. Coming as he does in excessive numbers and from almost every corner of the globe, he becomes the subject of anxious questionings on the part of American citizens who fear for the homogeneity, the selfhood, the future of the Commonwealth. Are we assimilating the newcomers; or are they being alienated from us by irreconcilable differences of language and interests? Are we destined to see history repeat itself as in the case of the Roman Empire, which split up into many distinct, self-governing nations?

The rôle of political prophet is a particularly dangerous one. But we may and must note tendencies of the present day, and with this knowledge to guide us, we may form a fairly accurate notion as to whither we are drifting.

The descendants of the "Pilgrim Fathers," and all who claim kinship with them, are heard at times to ask whiningly: What is to become of this Nation of ours, founded on popular education and the equality of all, when we allow the uneducated immigrant to overwhelm us by sheer numbers, to fling his exotic habits of life in our teeth, to taunt us with the power of the vote we have so unselfishly bestowed upon him and perhaps by means of it to wrest from us our political self-control?

As a matter of fact this whimpering patriot is not making any serious effort to hold his own in competition with the immigrant. His doleful wail will help him little as long as he deliberately continues to refuse compliance with the law of race preservation: increase and multiply. Those Pilgrim forbears whose vanishing heritage he so pitifully bemoans, he might imitate to his great advantage. Their family spirit, their religious spirit, are traits that stand out conspicuously as the mainsprings of whatever they accomplished worth while. Of eugenics they knew nothing, but they gave to the land a progeny of rugged, earnest, self-sacrificing men and women. Many of those who today appeal to them almost in despair of their own position, they would disown as unworthy descendants. The characteristic imprint which the Pilgrim stamped on the young Nation, is being obliterated a little more every day, not so much by the immigrant as by the native American who is undergoing a radical change.

Along with his evolution in outlook, habits and character, family and religion, he has developed political and economic tendencies of far-reaching import. There was a time not so many years ago, when the political boss, and he generally was native-born, could, on election day, swear in for naturalization practically as many voters as he could muster. The result of the election was largely in his hands. The new naturalization law made this high-handed procedure impossible. However, the power of the boss has not waned very seriously. By shrewd appeal to racial prejudice and antagonism, in other words by an unchaining of those elements of disruption which a united homogeneous Nation must by all means seek to hold in leash he succeeds in keeping himself in power, and the component parts of the Nation in contention and strife. But that is of little concern to him, since on occasion his fiery patriotic utterances can scarcely be matched.

As a captain of industry the native American's methods have called forth not only protests, strikes and sometimes violence, but, what is better, remedial laws. He brought thousands of immigrants into his factories. He took advantage of their ignorance and of their need of daily bread to force upon them low wages, dangerous working conditions, unhealthful surroundings. Out of all these and out of the women and children besides he made enormous profits; he piled up millions in a few years, and then stood aghast in holy indignation at the low standards of living of "the aliens." He rented to them his rickety, ill-lighted, ill-ventilated tenements, and then he had philanthropic commissions appointed to look into the housing problem of the immigrants. He planted saloons at the entrance to his mammoth shops, and was innocently ignorant that some of his properties were rented for immoral purposes. And then he virtuously exclaimed that the Country was in danger: the aliens are not being assimilated; they are not coming up to American standards; they are "backward men who must inevitably retard our social progress."

It is not necessary to make the generalization too sweeping; but the type here sketched is to be met on the streets, and the Nation has everything to gain from his complete disappearance. And the reverse of the medal? How do matters stand from the immigrant's point of view?

In an intensely industrial Connecticut town the foreign population is ten times greater than the native population. Thirty nationalities are represented, and eighteen languages are spoken. In this typically foreign settlement there was found but one man who was not aware that he might, if he chose, become an American citizen. That incident speaks volumes for the assimilative powers of our Commonwealth, and the assimilable propensities of the foreigner. In general he is quick to ask for naturalization. He is often coached by voters of his own nationality who have learned to appreciate their newly acquired rights and understand their duties, and he is led on by them to the final test.

After the oath of allegiance has been sworn, the immigrant is intensely loyal to his adopted country. In our largest centers of population he is often preyed upon by the most degraded types of political vampires, and exploited by demagogues who are as unscrupulous as they are unpatriotic. But outside of the larger agglomerations with their artificial life and unsound undercurrents, in the smaller cities and the country districts, when left free to develop his own best qualities, he is a staunch supporter of the Government he lives under and loves with all his heart. To see him eager to become incorporated with the Nation; to see him join whole-heartedly and in large numbers in all patriotic celebrations; to see him enroll in the Army and Navy, in the National Guard or the Naval Reserves, is to realize that he has at heart the welfare of his adopted land. That, underneath, there remains smouldering a childlike affection for his native hearth and kinsfolk, is as natural as it is harmless. The naturalized immigrant has undergone an inner transformation such that with him the government and principles of this Nation take precedence over all else.

In these days of quickly-roused passions the hyphen has acquired a notoriety altogether out of proportion to its importance. At times the specious virtues of his native American neighbor come in for some merciless criticism on the part of the naturalized citizen. Should it be made a basis for impugning his good faith? Or some unscrupulous demagogue perpetrates his villainies under cover of the law, violates all canons of decency, overrides or sets at naught the will of the majority. Shall we consider him as a type of every man and woman in the land, say that all are felons, that there is no longer any probity or sense of right among us? Similarly some naturalized citizen may overstep the bounds of duty and justice, and forgetful of his obligations toward his adopted land, seek to betray its interests. Washington had his Benedict Arnold. As long as our poor human nature remains beset by moral infirmities, we may as well resign ourselves to find an Arnold now and then, but be firmly determined to repress his nefarious activity whenever it becomes manifest.

Our immigrants have built up the Country, and had their share, a generous one, in bringing it to its present state of prosperity. It is fair to rule all their accomplishments out of court by the sweeping and inane remark "that they come to us for the most part destitute not only of money but of knowledge, of useful experience, of any serviceable mental equipment"? It must be an uncommonly sturdy race indeed which with all these handicaps has succeeded in opening for cultivation the immense wilderness from the Alleghenies to the Pacific, in extracting from mines unknown and untouched since the day of creation such a vast wealth of treasure as to make this land the richest on earth. Well might we apply with a slight modification the words of Tertullian to the Roman emperor: if the vast army of immigrants and their descendants were to withdraw from the land, there would be left a mere handful of inhabitants to stare in mute astonishment at the deserted temples, mansions, theaters, factories and farms. But there is no fear of such a calamity ever overtaking us. The foreign-born citizen has not only borne the burden of the heat and the day in bringing this Nation to an unprecedented stage of material prosperity, in the dark days of foreign war and internecine strife he has given his blood and his all that this Country might be free, great and united. Among the battle-scarred veterans who have answered the last bugle call; among those still left with us in hamlet and city, one finds a generous proportion of men who call some country of Europe their native home. Their whole connection with it, however, is merely one of sentiment. They always fully understood where their first duty lay, and to this they were never recusant.

The Catholic Church has taught this sacred duty with especial care to all her children, young and old alike. Love of God and Country has ever been her motto. Never has she ranged herself on the side of those deluded teachers who, in furtherance of their unpatriotic propaganda, go about preaching the essential injustice of war under any and all circumstances. The repression by war of an unjust aggressor; the righteous defense by war of violated rights, with all the death and havoc such a course involves, have been universally approved by the most authoritative exponents of her doctrines.

And if the day should ever come that our armies are again bidden march forth in defense of home and country, the Catholic immigrant will rejoice in being able to send to the battle front a numerous array of sons and daughters as soldiers and nurses to triumph or to die for the land which he calls peculiarly his own.

J. B. Culemans.

A Catholic Writers' Syndicate

AND now we are at it again, hammer and tongs, pro and con, discussing the Catholic press, its merits and demerits, its virtues and defects, and, in especial, the problem of what we are to do in order to make it better. Good; this is very good. Only limited and little matters get themselves disposed of; big and vital things refuse to be settled.

For one, I am rather glad that the subject of the daily is not paramount in the present discussion. Catholics talking about a great and wonderful Catholic daily in the existing state of our journalism reminds me of the Socialists and other Ism-ites talking about Utopia, dreaming about the heaven upon earth which is to be, and meanwhile neglecting to make themselves more fit for the life of earth as it is, to say nothing about the life not of this earth, which is to come. In a word, the project of a successful daily is so staggering a task for us to tackle, poorly equipped as American Catholics are with enthusiasm for Catholic journalism and Catholic literature and Catholic art, indifferent as wealthy American Catholics are to the support of these things, that surely it is better, much better, to set to work improving what we have before we waste too much energy chasing chimeras.

Now, there are already excellent Catholic weeklies, or, to be more exact, at least several which are excellent. And there are many more which are not so good as they ought to be. Surely, without being accused of pessimism or of what is worse, foolish optimism, one may take this safe position.

What can be done to improve the good ones, and make the poor ones good?

Well, speaking as one with twenty years of journalism behind him from which to draw suggestions, I would say that there are two practical steps possible and entirely feasible whereby the Catholic weeklies may be radically and permanently improved. The first step is to better their news service. The second step is to improve their literary features.

There are two concrete plans in my mind in regard to these two needed things. The first plan, dealing with the improvement of the news service, I will pass over now, for its discussion would involve too much space and the subject is too important to be slightly sketched. The second step, the improvement of the literary features of our existing weeklies, can be effected, I believe, very easily. The idea I have in mind was tried out some years ago, and worked admirably, among the Socialists. I was in that camp myself at the time, and well remember the enthusiasm it created among Socialist writers and artists, and how that enthusiasm was transformed into a practical force of propaganda. The plan was as follows:

A large number of Socialist writers and artists agreed to give, to give, for nothing, without a penny in return, at least one story, poem, essay, article, cartoon or sketch at stated intervals, in order to help on the cause of Socialism. These editorials, poems, stories, essays, sketches, and so forth, were then handled by a central bureau, which paid its necessary expenses by selling this material at the smallest possible rate to Socialist papers. The material was duplicated and handled in syndicate form, a single article often appearing in a large number of papers simultaneously. Thus its impact was widened without being dissipated. Its force was multiplied. Its effect was more spontaneous and timely. And the Socialist press was immensely enriched by contributions from clever, often brilliant, and in some cases very eminent writers; writers who could not afford to work entirely for the Socialist press, but who very cheerfully, very enthusiastically, very willingly and freely, gave some of their best work to the cause they favored. These Socialists applied self-sacrifice and generosity to their cause.

Surely Catholics can do the same? Indeed, and I know that they can, and I know that they do! Why not concentrate this scattered and spasmodic force? Why not organize it for the glory of God, in His service, through the powerful agency of the Catholic press? Why can we not adopt this plan which the Socialists proved to be practical, but which petered out, in the end, with them, simply because Socialists rarely retain their enthusiasm, seldom "stay put," and, being intellectually restless, and morally unsettled folk, pass on into the unholy service of other Ism-itic idols. But Catholics do stay put; thanks be to the God of Truth! We, I am sure, could make a better job of this particular thing. Come, let us do it!

Let's make AMERICA, if it will, the central agency. Let Catholic writers agree to contribute to begin with, say, one article or poem, essay or editorial or book review, every quarter. Let these be set up in type, the best of them, I mean, for the writers must not be sensitive; they must let the central agency be an editorial bureau with all which that implies; proofs must be taken, and sold at a small price for simultaneous publication in as many Catholic weeklies in the United States and Canada, with Canadian writers joining in, of course, as will buy. The money would pay the editorial and clerical expenses.

We have splendid Catholic writers in the United States and Canada; poets, essayists, historians, editorial writers, critics of music and art and literature, dramatists and advertising writers; yes, there is a multitude of them, some of them working entirely for the secular press, but all would be glad to put in a few good "licks" for Catholicism if the chance afforded.

A little later on, ways and means of utilizing Catholic artists should be devised. Cartoons, both comic and serious, are mighty agencies for good and for evil. We have plenty of Catholic artists in the country. It does not cost very much to make electrotype plates, to be sold at a small sum for simultaneous publication.

In this way a writer or an artist could reach an audience of a million, say, or five million, instead of the small public attached to one periodical. Only high grade work should be put forth; nothing but the best. And we would get "good stuff," the very best stuff, with the thrill and the movement of life, for our Guardian Angels, the ministering spirits assigned by God to help as at the very spring and fountainhead of thought, would delight to whisper good ideas, inspiring notions for verse and story and special article!

Would not our editors welcome such a syndicate? Its material would brighten and strengthen their pages, without in any way detracting from the individuality and particular spirit of each periodical. Not a stiff uniformity of material and manner and form should be the ideal of our Catholic press; but rather a rich and varied difference springing from the one soil of thought, like the myriad flowers of the earth. But our Catholic weeklies could give the products of our best writers a tremendous circulation without in any way interfering with their own local treatment of their own local problems and conditions. Precisely in the same way they could give national and international Catholic news a tremendous circulation without interfering with their own local news, by means of a central bureau of Catholic news. But this topic I must leave for another article. In the meantime, what think you, Catholic writers, editors, readers, of this plan?

MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

Homicide, Excusable and Felonious

JUST at present two spectacular moving-picture productions are occupying the attention, it is scarcely too much to say, of hundreds of thousands of people in many cities of the United States. In one, there is a case of what some people would erroneously call suicide; and in the other, a double murder and a homicide in self-defense occur. All three instances are presented to the spectator in such a way as to evoke approval, and in no case is there any criticism or comment either for or against the deed. The situation which results in the taking of human life is practically identical in all three cases, but is dealt with in three different ways. Virtue is endangered in each instance, but in one case the person endangered leaps from a cliff, with only one chance in a thousand of escaping death; in the second case the person endangered shoots the unjust aggressor; and in the third, a mother sends a bullet through the hearts of her two imperiled children, being goaded to her awful deed by the frenzied fear of a fate for them, which she regards as far worse than death. The widespread publicity which these vast scenic representations have enjoyed and are likely to enjoy for an indefinite time to come, makes a discussion of the homicides timely and even necessary.

There is no doubt whatever that homicide in general is forbidden by the natural law and by positive Divine command. The precept, "Thou shalt not kill," was not merely engraved on the tablets of Mt. Sinai, it is written unmistakably in every human heart. Directly, deliberately and on one's own authority, to take the life of another who is innocent, is an unjust invasion of the rights of the individual, of the State of which he is a member, and of God. Civilized society is unanimous in its reprobation of such a deed, and almost universally punishes it with death. The public executioner in the performance of his duty may put an end to the existence of a condemned criminal; and in a just war, an individual may, at his country's bidding, do his best to disable his enemy even with the certain prospect of inflicting a mortal wound. But no man in his private capacity, may lawfully, by his direct action, seek to kill another, unless that other is unjustly, here and now, actually assailing or certainly about to assail his own or a third person's right to life or limb, or to property of great value, or to virtue.

"Lynch Law" therefore is an outrageous crime, being the usurpation of an authority over life and death, to which no private citizen, nor any group of private citizens has any claim. Similarly no motive, whether it be to prevent insult and shame, or to put an end to hopeless suffering, or to save the life of another, justifies the taking of an innocent life. Putting a mortally wounded comrade out of agony, therefore, as soldiers are sometimes asked to do on the battlefield, taking a child's life to preserve the mother's, or to save the child itself from disgrace, are all unjustifiable: such acts constitute murder. The mother, therefore, in the moving-picture is guilty of murder, although in her frenzied state she is not perhaps altogether responsible; thus too husbands and fathers who during the Boxer movement put pistols into their wives' hands with the counsel to use them against their daughters when all hope of saving the legations was gone, advised the commission of murder, pure and simple. The reason is that human life belongs to God alone, and in the above-mentioned cases He refuses to transfer His dominion over it to another. Even should the one who is killed consent to the killing, it would be murder none the less, because God's rights over that life would remain.

On the other hand, homicide, in the case where it is a necessity of self-defense, has always been held to be justifiable before the tribunal of God and excusable in the eyes of the law. Every man has a right, given him by nature itself, to his life; although not in the sense that he may keep it or terminate it at his pleasure, for being a gift of God that is intended primarily and essentially for the service of God, he is bound to take ordinary means to preserve it until it shall have run the course and rendered the service assigned to it by Divine Providence. Life, however, belongs to man in the limited sense that it is his to possess, to use, to enjoy and to defend against all unjust attacks. Individuals, therefore, who assail this right, so long as the one attacked is not himself guilty of unjust aggression on the rights of others, do so at their peril. Life is so precious a gift, that a man may take such means to save it as are necessary, even to the extent of causing the death of an unjust assailant. Of course, no man may licitly inflict more injury on his assailant than is required for legitimate self-defense; but jurists, ethicists and moral theologians are agreed that he may licitly proceed to any length that is necessary to resist murderous attacks, not excluding the infliction of death on the person by whom his own life is put in jeopardy.

The man attacked is not ordinarily obliged in conscience to take his adversary's life to save his own, for such an action is clearly not one of the ordinary means of preserving life which every man is bound to employ; but he is justified in doing so, whenever it is the only means of escaping death. For in the collision of the two rights, the right of the persons attacked and the right of the assailant, the latter right gives way. It is abdicated so to speak by the free act of the wrong-doer. Nor is any injury done to the State, for it exists precisely to defend the rights of its citizens. God, too, in such cases signifies by the prompting of the natural law that He gives permission for what would otherwise be a usurpation of His dominion over life and death; for by the very fact that God gives a man a right to defend his life, which no one denies, He also gives him the right to use such means to that end as are necessary: in other words, to take the life of the unjust assailant, where without this, self-defense is impossible.

It is to be noted also that what one is justified in doing for himself in this matter, he may do for another. Provided he be certain that the attack on the third person's life is unjust, and that there is no other way of saving him except by killing his assailant, not only will he be free from blame, in saving the life of the person attacked by taking the life of the one who assails him, but he will perform an act of virtue.

Again, where an attempt is made on a person's virtue, not in the moral sense by temptation, but in the technical sense of an outrageous assault on chastity, the life of the person who makes the attempt, may be taken either by the person who is actually endangered or by another who comes to the rescue. The same is true of cases where goods of great value are in danger of being lost by robbery, and there is no hope of saving them except by killing the thief, although this last point, which relates to goods of value, is only probable and is not so easy of application. In both these cases, however, as in the former instances, no greater violence may be used than the case actually demands.

Except in very exceptional instances no one is obliged in conscience to resist. In circumstances therefore, where there is felt a violent disinclination to the shedding of human blood, or where all efforts at resistance are seen to be fruitless, escape from the attack may be sought in other ways, as in the case of the leap from the cliff, even though the chances of not being killed by means of escape, in the example by the leap itself, are very slight. Suicide indeed is always forbidden. No one may ever for any motive, directly, deliberately and on his own authority end his own life. But in cases of extreme peril to either life or virtue, one may take means to escape the pressing danger, even though these means may lead to death. The good which is directly sought being so great, it is deemed sufficient to justify the risk.

The examples referred to in this paper were chosen, not because they are strange and extraordinary, but because they are depicted in the most widely circulated and best attended of the moving-pictures of the day, and because they are typical of very many other instances, taken from fiction and life, and shown on the screen and in the papers, which call for an application of the elementary but not always understood principles which have been exposed. Human life is a sacred thing.

It is not a mere chattel or a plaything to be used for a day or as long as it amuses, and then carelessly cast aside. Dominion over human life belongs exclusively to God. He who trifles with the life of man, trifles with one of God's exclusive possessions and will be held to a strict account. Its use, however, belongs to man, and is a precious gift, the foundation gift of all God's personal gifts to man. We must be on our guard, therefore, lest our appreciation of its worth be cheapened by the light estimation in which it is apparently held in the press, and in the film. Its rights and privileges must be learned from the basic character of human nature, not from the whim or fancy of scenario writers, whose concern is to create striking or thrilling situations, not to expose the truth.

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

Back Home with the Women

IT was only to be expected that the humorists would suggest an expedition of England's athletic suffragettes to active service in Flanders. The humorists will never know how seriously their circumstantial wit was received. Hundreds of young English women, whose social and educational equipment fitted them for recruitment to the ranks of militant vote-seekers, have diverted their energy to a phase of national defense, and have the sanction of the War Office to appear in khaki skirts and blouses. They are known as the women soldiers, and in nine cases out of ten they look just as warlike as their male counterparts. That is one of the things which England, despite Nelson's succinct advice, did not expect: the spectacle of every woman doing her duty, or carrying out some sort of active program flattered by that sacred name. So keenly has the place of woman been realized that time is almost ripe for a play, called "An Englishwoman's Home," which would faithfully depict the steps to be taken by all good British housewives if the Germans should suddenly invade the back-kitchens of Merrie England. The production should prove quite as successful as "An Englishman's Home," which long ago passed away into the plentiful oblivion awaiting all problem plays.

At the front with the men you obtain a restricted insight into national fortitude with the war's dilatory progress. There your harvest is twenty-five per cent psychology and a good seventy-five per cent vocabulary. The women back home are the real thermometer; they turn on the tears and cheers. They read the war bulletins with their hearts and, therefore, thoroughly misunderstand them and accurately interpret them. Among thousands of lithographs plastered all over London you will find many pointed expressions to the women of Britain. The appeal is made to mothers, wives, sisters and sweethearts to clothe themselves in the garments of conscience and remind the young men that it is time to go. Now that was an obvious note for the War Office to strike. The garments of conscience fit almost any woman: they like wearing them. One extreme of this conscience-personification is called "nagging," "henpeckery," "hubby-bullying." Police and divorce courts both prove how popular this wifely privilege can be.

But the women of England were advised to nag by law. They were represented as standing, the poor woman and the patrician, hand in hand, gazing with calm, brave eye at their khaki-clad men marching off to the shambles. "Go!" is the dramatic monosyllable they are supposed to impart to hesitating swains, doubting husbands, and undecided sons and brothers. They have said much more. Middle-aged Englishwomen, those with experience of life, and years of suffering to their credit, have been moderate in their talk; but the young women of England, the creatures that catch the latest dance and lisp recent slang, they can hardly, as a class, look back on their war-behavior with placidity.

Take the white-feather fashion. A young man, sun-bronzed and athletic, was seated in the vestibule of a Strand hotel, smoking a cigarette. His air was lazily luxurious, so a chiffoned young lady, after whispering to her friends, stepped lightly toward him. "Here is a present, sir," she said. He accepted it, a small white feather. Blush? Not he. "That's the second present I've had today," he replied, as he dipped two fingers into an upper vest-pocket. "This is the first." He calmly displayed a "Distinguished Conduct Medal," and the chiffoned interloper fled dismayed. It served her right.

Small railroad tickets, marked "London to Berlin," have been distributed by girl "nosey-parkers" galore, and have done not a little bit of good. It is true that the twittering of lady friends has induced many a young Briton to exchange his disdained civilian clothes for the King's khaki; but men teased into joining the army are not likely to have the simple, sturdy mental makeup necessary for the conscientious soldier. Yet on the whole the feminine campaign has sadly failed, and led to an even further reduction of the male Briton's respect for the opposite sex.

In the poorer parts of London it has been no uncommon thing for women to shout after men in the streets, calling them cowards, execrating them for not joining the army. A case came to light just a few days ago where some poor devil had been driven to suicide by loud-mouthed women. The coroner discovered him to be quite ineligible for military service, and he issued a warning to women to hold their tongues. He might better have employed his official position to locate the women who had turned the unfortunate's mind to self-destruction. The lash would have been condign punishment for their caddishness.

Yes, caddishness is not a very gallant term to employ in regard to women; but you must understand that the type of woman referred to, really relishes the fact that her sex protects her from the call of the bugle. Oh, there are plenty such in England, masculine women, who will tell you quite gratuitously what they would do if they were men. That "if" is such a monument of strength to all ineligibles in war-time.

For weeks English women allowed their tongues the full luxury of giving advice to their male friends. One can almost imagine them making literal notes of their acquaintances of military age, and planning individual recruiting campaigns, also carrying them out. It is only now that the mischief has been finally checked. Imagine a girl approaching a young man, medically unfit for service, and thrusting her opinion upon him! Dreadful, indeed, to have kings and parliaments forcing other men to face dangers from which they themselves are personally immune, but conscription is a far lesser evil than a ragged-edged voluntary system whereby young men are cajoled, teased and even intimidated to enlist. If England had recognized this at the outset thousands of her daughters would not now be blushing at their brazen attacks upon young men whose reasons for withholding they knew nothing about.

It is so easy to suspect a man of cowardice because he does not take the only decisive step to disprove it. It is the way of women to do the easy thing, and in England they have done it with a vengeance. Who shall count the young men who have died on the field of battle, not necessarily as heroes, because they were pricked to the point by some foolish woman's sneer? The white-feather incidents, with the mental torment they involve, rank well with atrocities. The young man who ponders on the threshold of the recruiting office and asks himself whether the generic womanhood of England is worth dying or even fighting for is not engaged in idle musing.

Naturally, men are the protectors of women; but they will not be an intelligently efficient bulwark if they have to be placed in position by those they defend, and any woman who thinks she has added a soldier to the army by a caustic tongue labors under a delusion. She has merely helped to contribute a recruit, and not a promising one.

Of course the reaction is setting in. The first fact of man-scarcity brought it along. It is the most impressive economic lack in a country over-run with women, and somewhat by them. Then the woman's reading of the war is changing. As the mother of a Victoria Cross hero, Mrs. Belchern, told the writer, "We're sending the men out to slaughter." English women are by no means prone to panic. They have the steadiness of their race and the self-satisfied heritage. But it may be a case of the garments of conscience fitting tight, and hurting at the joints. The pseudo-Spartan attitude is mollified. The women now generally agree that it is the duty of the Government to decide whether or not a man shall go.

Yet the white-feather will not be readily forgotten by the men of England when they return from the wars; more vividly will it be remembered by the chronic shirkers who decline to go without assisted passages. No, the part played by the women of London and England (there are many noble, brave-souled, silent exceptions from the song-singing, badgering crowd) will not be a palatable argument for equal rights when peace returns.

JOHN B. KENNEDY.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

Rational Athletics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In many of the articles on athletics appearing in AMERICA and in other periodicals there has been a deal of hazy thinking, due largely to a careless use of words. For instance, "competitive athletics" is a misnomer. If you will take down the old Greek dictionary and look up athlesis, you will find that athletics is essentially a contest. That is the secret of its popularity. It is as natural for a real live boy to want to compete with his fellows as it is for him to breathe. The faculties of our schools and colleges have failed, however, to realize the importance of this instinct for competition. Instead of seizing on it and making it count for all it is worth in the development of intellect, will, and body, they have allowed athletics to fall into the hands of the boys themselves, of graduate advisers, and professional coaches, all relatively irresponsible people.

Dr. R. Tait McKenzie, Professor of Physical Training at the University of Pennsylvania, has summed up the case against school and college athletics under four heads: (1) Specialization, the tendency to train for one event only in order to excel in that rather than to train for all-around development and health; (2) Commercialism, the tendency toward a win-at-any-price policy, because the reputation and the livelihood of the professional coach depend on his turning out a winning team; (3) Exploitation of the individual, the tendency to lionize the star athlete, and, incidentally, to depreciate the real student; (4) Over-training the few, to the neglect of the many. Of these charges, the most serious, to my mind, is the last, the neglect of the many. Dr. Wingert, of Ohio State University, reports that, while over a million dollars a year are spent on college athletics alone in this country, only 16.4 per cent. of all college students take any active part in the sports. The others sit in the grand-stand and look on. The coaches will have nothing to do with them, because they are not good "'varsity" material.

And what is the remedy? Surely not to abolish athletics; nor, on the other hand, to try to correct this, that, or the other evil by more stringent rules, by closer supervision, or by talk about "higher ideals." The remedy is to get that crowd down out of the grand-stand on the field; to find out what games they would like to play, in what contests they would like to take part, and give them a chance. That is all they need, a chance. Substitute "extensive athletics" for the present "intensive" style and then watch for results. But do not, under any circumstances, introduce "compulsory athletics." This is a term to make one's hair curl. Imagine being compelled to take part in a game. That must be as joyful as a tenderfoot's dancing to the popping of a playful cowboy's gun.

Let the faculty adopt this step-child of the schools, and make it a full-fledged member of the family. Let them take charge of athletics and make them the basis of physical training for all students. Let the students select, if you will, certain groups of exercises, making for all-around development. Put up some prizes for individual and inter-class contests, and see what healthy boys and girls will do. Let the coach's salary depend on the number of boys he can train to play one or two games at least fairly well, and to give a good account of themselves in a pentathlon of track and field events. As I said before, do not make athletics compulsory. Make them interesting. Give everybody a chance. Award a little token, like the "Bronze Button" of the Public Schools Athletic League, to every boy or girl who attains a certain reasonable standard of all-around excellence, and you will have a rational system of athletics that will wipe out, at one fell swoop, "specialization, commercialism, exploitation, and the neglect of the many." Can this be done? The best answer is that there is one school where it is being done, and done so successfully that Drs. Sargent of Harvard, Anderson of Yale, Crampton of New York, Wood of Columbia, Storey of the City College, Raycroft of Princeton, McKenzie of Pennsylvania, Burdick of Baltimore, Savage of Oberlin, and others, all have expressed the hope that "the good work will be taken up by other schools."

New York. FREDERICK J. REILLY.

The Morality of Woman Suffrage

To the Editor of AMERICA:

There is a distinction between the suffragette and the suffragist. Your suffragette is a Feminist; not so your suffragist. Your suffragette is she who is aiming at "the emancipation of woman"; your suffragist is looking merely to a share in the government of the country. The distinction turns wholly on that catch-phrase, "the emancipation of woman." Someone has said that the phrase is meaningless; but this is not true. It signifies merely that woman no longer recognizes the unity of Christian marriage. It is for this that the suffragette or Feminist stands. And this, of course, right reason and the Catholic Faith condemn. The aim of the suffragist is to get a share in the government of the country, to stand on a political footing of equality with men. Such an aim would, at first sight, appear to be only political and, as such, justifiable. Miss Mary E. Rodgers, in AMERICA for September 25, says that "any one with only a superficial knowledge of the subject cannot but see that it is a moral issue too." And such it is, emphatically, but in a different sense from that in which Miss Rodgers understands it. And because it is a moral issue woman suffrage must stand condemned.

Woman's primary duty, ordained by God, is the bearing of children and the caring for them during their tender years. Of course I am speaking here of the average woman, the married woman. Even Miss Sara McPike, ardent suffragist as she is, owns that "the chief mission of a woman must ever be the perpetuation of the race." This being so, any activity which directly interferes with these primary duties is morally wrong.

Will woman suffrage directly interfere with the two-fold duty of woman? This depends upon what you mean by woman suffrage. If you mean mere votes, then I answer, obviously, no. But if you mean what the suffragists themselves mean, namely, political equality in every sense, then I answer, obviously, yes. For political equality means not only that women will share equally with men the rights and duties, the privileges and burdens of citizenship in the strict sense, but also that they will be governors, legislators, judges, congresswomen, senators and presidents; and the activities involved in such offices are, I claim, incompatible with the two-fold duty of a Christian wife. For her growing family will occupy all her time until she is far on in years; so that ordinarily she will not be free to give her undivided mind to political life until she is a grandmother. Miss Rodgers, as a matter of fact, admits that "most of the active workers are grandmothers," stating that "women whose children are of an age to require their whole attention are not needed in this work," and she might have added that they cannot in conscience engage in it. Grandmothers, therefore, and they alone, are morally free to enter upon political life. For public offices grandmothers will have, I suppose, a large stock of goodwill and a fairly active mind; but experience, large experience of men and things, are chief requisites in any candidate for public office. Would it be fitting to install in the governmental chair a sweet-faced old lady fresh from the tender intimacies of home, innocent of any knowledge of the ways of politicians? I do not altogether deny experience to these good grandams. They have had experience aplenty, but not the kind that fits one for public activity. If, therefore, grandmothers, from motives of expediency, are to be denied the suffrage, and mothers also, from motives of morality, what becomes of woman suffrage?

Chicago. MARK S. GROSS.

A Word to Mr. Chesterton

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In his article "American Religions," in AMERICA for September 25, 1915, our distinguished friend Mr. Cecil Chesterton refers to a song heard in America last year, whose popularity, to him, indicates that the doctrine of pacifism is not only popular but, what is more disquieting, is taken for granted by the American people at large.

To my knowledge two other English writers besides Mr. Chesterton, and no doubt others of whom I do not know, have taken this song more seriously than it deserves, as indicative of a certain sentiment in the hearts of the American people. The lilting melody of "I Didn't Raise My Boy to Be a Soldier" was boldly taken from a Gaelic war song and, with a lack of humor equaled only by the "composer's" lack of scruple, joined to words which would make a Gaelic warrior turn over in his grave on the battlefield. O, shade of Thomas Moore and his "Minstrel Boy"! This song was vastly popular in New York, but no one except an innocent foreigner takes New York to be American. The Semitic song-writer just now revels in songs of "peace at any price," in which he is quite consistent, as his forbears have been conspicuous for business acumen rather than for martial glory, but it is hardly fair to assume that this is the spirit of the American people.

In bravery and the spirit of self-sacrifice, the American woman has none to surpass her in the history of any country. From our earliest Colonial wars to the present time the American mother, and the same is true of the American wife and sweetheart, has cheerfully sent forth her dearest, smiling through her tears. It was her spirit that conquered the wilderness, overcame tyranny, preserved the Union, and will in the future have to uphold the ideals which were won at cost of blood and struggle. Please, therefore, Mr. Chesterton, do not judge of American war spirit by Semitic songs.

Brooklyn. M. G. M.

Diocesan-owned Newspapers

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The reason for the existence of the Catholic press is to promote the interests of the Catholic Church. This should be kept in mind in every criticism of the Catholic press. The individuals who are devoting their lives to this heart-breaking, back-breaking missionary work are giving the best that is in them to the cause of Catholic journalism. Let us be reasonable. When a man is doing his best and his best is not good enough, it is time for a change.

If each diocese owned its newspaper, that would mean cooperation, which is the one thing necessary and the one thing lacking in the Catholic paper of today. If the bishops instructed the priests to circulate the diocesan paper, and the priests instructed their congregations to subscribe for it, and families read it as a matter of duty, the Catholic press of America would be one of the wonders of the world, because with such support it could move mountains. Any bishop could force the local Catholic paper into every home in his diocese, by assessment, if necessary. And why should not this step be taken if, as is admitted, the Catholic paper should be in every home? Under such circumstances it would pay, and there would not be the present struggle to meet bills. Why should not the Catholic weekly be owned and operated, or at least subsidized, by the diocese in which it circulates?

Cleveland. WILLIAM A. MCKEARNEY.

Catholic Booking Bureau

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Why has not the Catholic Booking Bureau excited wider interest? Certainly it would be of extreme service to both entertainer and entertained. At present, Catholic entertainers find it difficult to get in touch with Catholic clubs, colleges, and academies. And yet all of these, and especially the academies, if they have any vitality at all, often employ the services of lecturers and readers and musicians. Entertainment is an essential part of every Catholic club's life, and it has come to be an important feature of every boarding school and college as well. There is, besides, a large field in these clubs and educational institutions for lecturers on Catholic subjects. The clubs and institutions are forced to depend largely on general lyceum bureaus, where their chances of securing good talent are, to say the least, dubious. Sisters especially must have extreme difficulty in finding lecturers that conform to their necessarily exacting tastes. On the other hand, many clever Catholics, who would meet the needs of clubs and schools like these, remain almost unknown outside of an immediate circle of acquaintances. If there were a central Catholic Booking Bureau, it would be possible for these entertainers and lecturers to exercise their talents under congenial and elevating conditions. Systematic courses of lectures on Catholic subjects could be easily obtained, for Catholic men and women would prepare for such work, if they were sure of an opening. Finally, the entertainments secured through such a bureau would be certain to meet the high requirements of wholesomeness that should be demanded by every Catholic club or institution.

St. Louis. GEORGE A. DOUGLAS.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1915.

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

A Query and an Answer

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Please let me know, at the earliest opportunity, what the attitude of Catholics is toward the official recognition by the United States of the Presidency of any leader of the Mexican revolution.

New York. L. E. Y.

THE recent decision of the Pan-American conference makes this request very pertinent. The answer is simple, for the attitude of American Catholics who are interested in Mexico is entirely clear and reasonable. They are not in any way concerned with that nation's purely internal affairs, whether these be political, economic or religious. As citizens of this country they are, however, concerned with the attitude of our Government toward Mexico. Such interest is at once their duty and their privilege, for this is a democracy, and since Catholics are true democrats they are unwilling to see the United States committed to a course of action that would appear not only to condone tyranny and excessive brutality, but also to support both. Our Government stands sponsor for the Mexican revolutionists before the world; and the Mexican revolutionists have been tyrannous and brutal. By decrees and other acts they have interfered with worship in a most meticulous way, they have attacked God and religion, they have committed excesses that shock every man whose sense of decency has not been destroyed. They have defiled churches, sacred vessels, vestments and the Blessed Sacrament; they have tortured some priests and murdered others; they have killed two Christian Brothers, and as for their treatment of Sisters, it cannot be described. In short, allowing for all exaggerations, it is safe to say that the Mexican revolutionists have written a new chapter in the history of tyranny and brutality. And though not long since Carranza taunted Villa on account of some of these deeds, yet not one of them has been repudiated. Indeed, the ideals that prompted them have been exalted in speech and writing. This is not democracy, it is not even civilization, and to give official recognition to men who stand for such acts is to commit the country to a policy that the Nation has repudiated time and again. In fact our Nation is a protest against just such a policy. This is the opinion of Catholics, and at one time at least, our Government true to the traditional policy held exactly the same views.

A Slaughtered Nation

THE world is dripping with blood; man is slaughtering man with a ferocity that has scarcely ever been equaled. Europe is a great charnel house through which war lords stride, all red with the blood of victims. This is the product of a brutal, demoniacal war that is disgracing not Christianity only, but civilization itself.

That is bad enough, God knows, but there is something worse. A whole nation, not of warriors able to give and take and die like men, but of women and girls and small boys, is in the shambles, and their conquerors, who are lustful demons, without the courage of manhood or the pity of human beings, are ruthlessly cutting them down. Mohammedans murder Christians. Armenian blood is flowing in rivers, and the Turk is rejoicing. He is swarming through town and village gathering together women and children, herding them like cattle, and slaughtering them. Not all, however, for the maidens and young girls are meeting the fate the Turk always prepares for a "Christian dog," if the Christian has the added misfortune of being a woman.

Was there ever a more atrocious deed? Armenian husbands, fathers and grown-up brothers hastened to the Turkish standard at the call of their sovereign, leaving wives, daughters, sisters safe, as they thought, in peaceful villages. Then the unspeakable Turk, drunk with animal passion—Note his gratitude, his chivalry, his humanity!—repaid the loyalty of Armenian husbands, fathers and brothers by swooping down upon their wives, daughters, sisters and little sons. They drove the victims off, corralled them, sabered them, shot them, drowned them; all except maidens and little girls. Their fate can be imagined; for the Turk is always the Turk. And now he gloats over the shedding of Christian blood, and revels in lust. But the cries of innocent, unprotected women and children have gone surging up to heaven in great waves to strike against the throne of the Father of Justice and surge back again freighted with His curse on the arms of a nation which called husbands and fathers and grown-up brothers to war and then slaughtered their defenseless women and children.

God will be avenged! The day of retribution will come. The Turks have slain the lambs of Christ's flock, and worse still, have defiled the temples of the Holy Ghost. God will surely arise in His wrath and smite the wretched Turk, and in that day the world will see what punishment He can inflict upon those who slaughter the innocent and defile womanhood and childhood.

A Divorce Record

THE United States is fast establishing an unenviable divorce record. When Justice Newburger took his seat at the opening of the present fall in special term, part three, of the Supreme Court, he was faced by a calendar of 193 undefended divorce cases. He was to be the patient listener to history after history of domestic discontent. The evidence in all these cases was upon one side only, the other party not caring to make any defense, or even to urge the slightest opposition to breaking one of the most sacred of human ties. The plaintiffs represented no particular race or nationality, as the cosmopolitan list of names offered the Court indicated. The evil so brazenly exhibited to the world, and already so common that it hardly evokes more than a cynical smile, may be said to be typically American. The radical Feminist and the Socialist glory in it; the rationalistic press defends or excuses it, and scarcely anybody denounces it.

Yet this evil is gnawing at the very heart of Society, and unless something is done to check its ravages, the State will suffer irremediable harm. And there is but one thing to be done: educate the children in the principles of morality and religion. In this is our only salvation.

A democracy is founded on the wills of the people; it is firm with the firmness of those wills, weak with their weakness, pure with their purity, corrupt with their corruption. Hence the necessity of strong characters unflinchingly devoted to uprightness. But our numerous divorces bespeak a widespread lack of just such characters. In one place, there is one divorce to every six marriages; in another, one to every twelve marriages; the story is the same everywhere. In view of such conditions, it is pitiable indeed to hear so much clamor for "adequate defense" and not a word about the regeneration of national morality. Defense from external foes is necessary; protection from domestic enemies is no less necessary. Thew and sinew and cannon and bayonet are useless, if souls are corrupt. Physical strength and instruments of war may beat off the foreign foe but neither will save a nation from a nation's vices, the most dangerous of all disintegrating elements. Safety from them comes from the individual will. Such the lesson of reason and history. America has not learned that lesson, however, or else has forgotten it. We are a boastful, swaggering people, devoted excessively to self and to selfish interests, which unfortunately only too often take the form of gross pleasures that eventually lead to the divorce court. A change must come: if it does not come spontaneously from out our souls, history will repeat itself once again and the whip of God will recoil from our backs, and sorrow and suffering will cause us to bend our proud heads in reflection, and force us to give thought to ways and means of bringing up our children in the love of God.

"Creed Consciousness"

NO change can be introduced into the institutions of a great city without evoking a bewildering expression of opinion. The Wirt system, lately introduced into Greater New York, has been no exception. Last week we recorded the fact that the perennial cry of "Wolf! Wolf!" the wolf being, as usual, the Pope, had been raised in the public press, although the Catholic Church had only an academic interest in the proposed scheme. The latest protest against allowing the children of the public schools to receive religious instruction according to their different beliefs has been raised in the name of democracy.

A Brooklyn rabbi objects to the proposal on the grounds that it will stir into activity a thing which, according to him, "We ought to be anxious to have dormant until the arrival of manhood and womanhood." This sleeping menace to the "spirit of democracy" is, in the excellent phrase of the gentleman, nothing less than "creed consciousness." He calls attention to the "needless distinctions" which religious segregation will awaken, and is pathetically concerned for the feelings of the "ethical culturist, and the agnostic, or even the lonely atheist." We confess that we do not share the rabbi's sympathy for the loneliness of those whose profession of disbelief is a revolt, conscious or not, against the most fundamental of Divine rights. How he, whose cloth proclaims his life-work to be that of making God's existence and God's claims known, can wish to perpetuate an attitude of mind which promotes ignorance of all that concerns God, passes our understanding.

This, however, is a personal matter; it is on the larger issue that we take exception to his statement. He deplores "creed consciousness" in the young. The Catholic Church, on the contrary, believes in it. To take no other ground than elementary psychology, she is convinced that without it there will be no religious observance, little consistent morality. Action springs from thought. Ideals determine conduct. Men will not ordinarily conform to moral standards unless they are conscious of them; and for most adults such standards are conscious factors of control, only when they have been built up in youth on definite teaching concerning man's relation to God, to himself, to his neighbor and to his country. Vague principles of morality, ethics identified with culture, are at best a haphazard sort of thing, extremely disappointing on the whole, and in time of temptation shifting and unstable. The isolated facts to the contrary are sporadic in occurrence, and leave untouched the general proposition that natural goodness, if it is to be relied upon, must be supplemented by clear instruction on the rational and revealed truths on which religious, and therefore civic, duties are based.

The Catholic Church stands for the democracy that was contemplated in the Declaration of Independence, a democracy therefore that is built on "the Laws of Nature and Nature's God." With the framers of that document she places her "reliance on the protection of Divine Providence." It is her conviction that citizens will observe those laws and merit that protection, only if they are trained to recognize them. She has besides a deep distrust of any instruction that does not lead to "creed consciousness." Conduct that will enable our people to enjoy the blessings of liberty, promised by the Constitution, can be secured only by inculcating clear, accurate and vivid principles of action, which spring from the knowledge, love and fear of God; and such instruction cannot be given without resulting in "creed conciousness." Moreover, the Church is of the opinion that it is fatal to delay this instruction till the years of maturity. Individuals may succeed in acquiring such principles after reaching the years of manhood and womanhood, but the religious convictions of a nation, if they are to be acquired at all, must be acquired when her children are susceptible and plastic.

The Tainted Stream

UNDER the conservation laws of the State of New York, chemicals and other materials may not be discharged into river-courses in such quantities as to destroy the fish or injure the health of those persons who use the water of the streams. A few weeks ago, a corporation in Western New York was fined $250.00 for violating the law. And the mere suspicion that the waters of Mohansic Lake, part of the water-supply of our city, might possibly come to be contaminated from the drainage of a near-by sanitarium, has aroused just fears and protests. Too much care cannot be exercised when the health, perhaps the lives, of thousands may be endangered. The State's Conservation Commission should be fearless in enforcing the laws which safeguard in so vital a matter the physical welfare of our people.

But there is a deadlier contamination than that of our inland fisheries or the waters of Mohansic Lake. A poisoned stream of immoral literature is flooding the country. Before it, the restraining dikes of decency and self-respect seem to have broken down. Its deadly ooze seeps into the millionaire's mansion and the poor man's home. That stream carries diseases more terrible than the typhus or the bubonic plague. The germs it bears do not attack the "royal tissues" of mere physical life, the heart, or the lungs, but man's nobler faculties, his mind, his soul. In the child they wilter the flower of innocence; they blight the lilies of modesty and purity. They stain the visions and ideals of youth and atrophy the strength and courage which is manhood's dower. The stream must be checked or it will sap the very bulwarks of our national life. Legislators wisely "conserve" the waters of our streams, officials watch over such homely yet necessary articles as the milk, fruit and meat supply of our cities. Is legislation doing enough to protect our citizens against the stygian waters of corruption of an infidel and immoral literature, of pornographic novels, of plays, the very names of which flaunted on our billboards, make an honest man clench his fists with indignation, and a good woman blush for shame? Is the law punishing with just severity the panderers of evil in high places, the purveyors of these scented, but death-dealing waters? Some pure hands, some noble and generous hearts are attempting the truly herculean task of draining and choking off this poisoned tide. God's blessing will surely follow them in their labors, for they are doing His work. The true-hearted American, the real and genuine Christian and Catholic can have no better watchword and program for his fellows than this: "Watch the tainted stream! Death lurks there! Close your house and your heart to the rising tide of an immoral, unchristian literature and press." Those who by voice or pen or leadership are in some way the guides of the people must imitate the great Hebrew prophet. When Moses and his people came to the waters of Mara, they could not drink them because they were bitter. By God's command Moses cast the wood of a miraculous tree upon their surface and the waters were sweetened. If the bitter flood we have described is to be sweetened we have the talisman and the antidote, the life-giving doctrines of Him who died upon the "Tree." Carried to every home they would change the deadly stream into fountains of living water for the strengthening and healing of the nation.

"Self-Realization"

IN an excellent paper contributed to the October Atlantic Monthly on "The Extirpation of Culture" that is now threatening our age and country, Katherine Fullerton Gerould assigns as the chief cause of this state of things the fact that materialism is seizing hold of all classes, and that "science" is the great object of popular idolatry. "We have become materialistic," she writes. "Our very virtues are more materialistic than they were," and science "has challenged the supereminence of religion; it has turned all philosophy out of doors except that which clings to its skirts; it has thrown contempt on all learning that does not depend on it; and it has bribed the sketches by giving us immense material comforts." Enlarging on the subject, the writer then observes:

> Ours is a commercial age, in which most people are bent on getting money. That is a platitude. It is also, intellectually speaking, a materialistic age, when most of our intellectual power is given either to prophylaxis or to industrial chemistry, or to the invention of physical conveniences—all ultimately concerned with the body. Even the philanthropists deal with the

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOLUME THIRTEEN

1915

FROM APRIL 17 TO OCTOBER 9, 1915 INCLUSIVE

NEW YORK

THE AMERICA PRESS

INDEX

VOLUME XIII—APRIL 17 TO OCTOBER 9, 1915, INCLUSIVE

PAGE

Absence, The Advantages of..... 481
Agreeing to Differ (Ed.)..... 180
All Souls' Day Masses..... 556
American "Punch" (Ed.)..... 154
America's Vocation (Ed.)..... 99
An Angry Old Girl (Ed.)..... 425
Ancient Carrion (Ed.)..... 179
Anglican Misrepresentations, More..... 172
Animal "Intelligence"..... 341
Answer, An..... 10
Anthony Comstock (Ed.)..... 280
Arizona (Constitution) (Ed.)..... 544
Artist Priest and Exile..... 197
"Assumpta Est Maria"..... 442
Athletics and Character, 195; Competitive, 586; and Health, 169; in Our Schools, 142; and Scholarships, 245; Why Have Competitive? 293
Atrocities (Ed.)..... 447
Australia: Catholic Press of..... 632
Austria-Hungary: Catholic Awakening, 315; Economic Relations With Germany, 458; New Triple Bond, 53; Peace Rumors, 2; Proposed Tariff Union, 314; Red Book, 362; Religion and German Alliance, 82; Russian Persecution, 26; Thanksgiving for Lemberg, 387; U. S. Reply to, 357; Renascent Galicia 626
Ave Maria's Fiftieth Year, The (Ed.)..... 233

Bagot and Blackwood's (Ed.)..... 402
Baiting the Pope (Ed.)..... 374
Bearing Witness (Ed.)..... 127
Because! (Ed.)..... 281
Belgium: Answer to the White Book, 243; Bishop Heylen Protests, 338; Scattered People, 506; Missions..... 479
Benedict XV and the Secular Press (Ed.)... 302
Benson, Mgr., Father Vaughan on..... 237
Bibles Here and There (Ed.)..... 154
Birth Restriction, What They Said (Ed.)..... 567
Blind Eyes (Ed.)..... 202
Boys, Our (Ed.), 178; Our Lost (Ed.)..... 254
Brandi, Father (Ed.)..... 616
Breaking Point, The (Ed.)..... 328
Brothers-in-Arms (Failure of Socialism) (Ed.) 519

Caesarism (Ed.)..... 375
Call to the Faithful, A (Indian Tribal Funds, (Ed.)..... 303
Canada, Catholics in Journalism..... 560
Capital Punishment..... 171
Carrying His Point (Ed.)..... 44
Castellane Case 479
Catholic, Conventions, A Month of (Ed.), 446; Educational Convention, (Ed.), 278; Landmarks of San Francisco, 147; Press, How to Improve the, 511; Another View, 486; Defects of the, 462; Ass'n Convention, 504; of Ireland, The, 585; in England, 609; Weeklies, A Century of, 537; Good Qualities of the,..... 415
Catholics and the Constitution (Ed.), 495; Will They Remain (Ed.)..... 566
Catholic Women's War Day, 479; Summer Camps 198
Cause, The, Again: (Materialism) (Ed.)..... 543
Censorship and the Movies (Ed.)..... 303
Cheap and Precious (Ed.)..... 231
Children, of France and the War, The, 418; Why are Our Children Different?..... 465
China: Is Monarchy Coming..... 626
Chinese Misrepresented..... 480
Christ and Woman..... 247
Christian or Pagan? (Ed.)..... 590
Christopher, St., The Cult of, (Ed.)..... 496
Church, The, and Socialism, 559; Constitution, and Flag (Ed.), 374; and Mexico, The 490; Music, Our Discarded, 369; of the Revolution, The, 33: The Civilizing (Ed.), 447; The Immigrant and the..... 629
Circus, The..... 119
Citizens, Training New..... 528
Clean-up Week (Ed.)..... 179
Coeducation and the Race (Ed.)..... 203
College Courses, A Graduate's Confession.... 485
College President's Reading, A (Ed.)..... 15
Columbia's Mother-Trainers (Ed.)..... 640
Commission, A Rash (Ed.)..... 518
Common School Education in the Middle Ages 58
Comparisons Are—(Ed.)..... 128
Comstock, Anthony (Ed.)..... 614

PAGE

Confession and "Economic Progress"..... 639
Constitution and the Status Quo, The (Ed.). 543
Convent Girl and the Paris Fashions, A (Ed.) 178
Converts' Leagues..... 147
Corpus Christi..... 175
Count Zeppelin Awakens London's Conscience 418
Crime at Marietta, The (Frank Case)..... 535
Crying to Heaven (Ed.)..... 422
Cuckoo Controversy, The (Ed.)..... 179

Daily Paper, The 35, 90 (Ed.)..... 126
Darwin, By Order of..... 414
Dead, The Thought of the (Ed.)..... 520
Deaf Mutes, Catholic..... 479
Difficulties of Aliens, The (Ed.)..... 233
Dodos and Mothers (Ed.)..... 204
Does It Pay? (Ed.)..... ,16
Dog or the Baby, The..... 223
Douay Bible, The..... 9
Drama, Comtemporary, The..... 512
Dunne, Governor, Philosophizes (Ed.)..... 542
Dutch Embassy at the Vatican, The..... 392
Dynamite, Christian Science and Lourdes (Ed.) 99

Eastland Investigation, The (Ed.)..... 448
"Ecclesia Anglicana Libera Sit" (Ed.). 278
End of Socialism, The..... 222
Entanglement (Ed.)..... 303
Ethical Societies, The God of the..... 489
Episcopalianism (Why Complain?)..... 561
Ethical Society Religion..... 322
Eugenics—A New Aristocracy (Ed.), 470; Folly of the Eugenists, the..... 272
Euntes Ibant et Flebant (Prison Discipline), (Ed.) 127
Euripides in New York..... 224
European Alcoholism..... 118
Every Woman..... 218
Evidence? May Lawyers Withold..... 115
Evil, At the Root of the (Ed.)..... 376

Faith: The Propagation of the..... 632
Felician, The Simoniac..... 394
Florida, An Incident (Ed.)..... 616
Food for Thought (Ed.)..... 154
Fool and His Money, The (Ed.)..... 327
France: Catholic Committee Manifesto on War, 530; Catholic Medical Gild, 578; Catholic Study of Birth Rate, 54; Class of 1917, The, 26; Falling Birth Rate, 314; Financial Readjustment, 110; Jesuits in the French Army, 2; Lenfant, Bishop of Digne, 602; Loyalty and Bigotry, 82; Munitions, 315; Munition Workers, 243; Munitions and Other Problems, 266; Young France, (Ed.), 615; New War Credit, 290; The Pope's Answer, 54; René Bazin's Appeal, 387; Revival of Religion, 266; Sister Barbara, 290; Workmen and the War, 214; The Church and the War in, 558; Wounded Soldiers... 434
Frank Case, 423; Crime at Marietta, 535; and Liberty of the Press (Ed.)..... 494
"Freebooting Pirates" (Ed.)..... 204
Freeman of the Universe (Ed.)..... 155
French Soldiers on Leave..... 633

Gary Plan? Who Invented the..... 639
Genesis and Woman's Rights..... 416
Georgia, Oh! (Ed.)..... 423
Germany: American Note, Bryce Commission, 139; Belgian Outrages on the German Soldiery, 362; Catholic Defense Committee, 338; Catholics and Protestants, 315; Commerce During the War, 167; Detention Camps, 290; Emperor's Declaration, The, 410; Brest-Litovsk Captured, 505; English Officers Ill-Treated, 110; Expansion of the German Empire, 243; Financial and Industrial Conditions, 339; Food Supplies Ample, 167; Chancellor's Speech on Italy and Poland, 482; Sinking of the Arabic, 418; Frye Case, U. S. Note in the, 481; German Jesuits in the War, 111; Germany and the Pope, 27; Internal Condition of, 3; Lissauer's "Chant of Hate" Repudiated, 458; National Confidence, 214; No Fear of Starvation, 267; Peace Rumors Denied, 290; Press Censorship, 290; Prosperity of War, 434; Sinking the Steamer Lusitania 111: Socialists, Patriotic Citizens, 82; Territorial

PAGE

Expansion, 266; Treatment of Prisoners, 83; A Third War Loan, 603; A White Book, 190; Munitions, American, 554; Two National Demonstrations..... 626
God, Freedom, the Constitution, (Ed.)..... 566
Godless Science (Ed.)..... 353
Governors' Annual Conference (Ed.)..... 567
Great Britain: Anglo-German Negotiations, 1912, 531; The American Note, 27; Anniversary Day, 435; Bristol Convention, 554; Bryce Commission, 139; The Budget, 111; Censorship, 83; The Coalition Cabinet, 190; Conscription, 482, 579; Conscription Plans, 458; Conservatism and the Munitions Bill, 267; "Deadly Complacency," 215; Dissatisfaction with the Cabinet, 167; Germany and the Lusitania, 111; Intervention of the Holy See, 55; Marquis of Lansdowne's Speech, 363; Income Tax, 602; Mortality Among the Officers, 139; The Munitions Bill, 244, 291; Munition Workers, 315; National Anger, Aroused, 139; Opinions on the New Cabinet, 191; Organizing the Workers, 215; Parliament Opened, 579; Recruiting, 111, 244; Recruiting Laborers, 168; Sir Ed. Grey's Reply to German Chancellor, 506; Science in Warfare, 339; Times, The, on Christian Doctrine, 27; War Babies, 83, 191, 267; Vote of Credit, 337; War Casualties, April-June, 315; Women Workers, 339; War Finance 627
Great Task: The 1863-1915, (Ed.)..... 302

Hazarding a Heritage (Ed.)..... 400
Healer's Hand, The (Ed.)..... 447
Hearn, Lafcadio..... 73
Hell, Bombardment of..... 144
"Hideous Self-Immolation" (Ed.)..... 328
High Schools, Catholic; We Need (Ed.)..... 590
Holding the Mirror up to Nature (Novels) (Ed.) 543
Holland, Papal Ambassador, 506; Neutrality. 62
Holy Father's Congratulations, The (Ed.).... 14
Homes, Our..... 607
Homesickness of the Soul, The (Ed.)..... 448
Howells and the Jesuits (Ed.)..... 70
Huss, John, "Martyrdom" of..... 370

I Have Been Dead (Ed.)..... 304
I Know Just How You Feel (Ed.)..... 256
Immigration Problem, The (Ed.)..... 542
Immortality, Annihilation or (Ed.)..... 71
Impediment, the One (Ed.)..... 230
Indecency vs. Good Taste (Ed.)..... 14
India: Indian Tribal Funds, 303; German Jesuits Interned, 507..... 531
International Law, A New Basis for..... 510
In the Midst of Life..... 174
Ireland: Agricultural Laborers, 603; Agriculture, 363; Coalition Cabinet Unpopular, 316; Bishop O'Dwyer and Mr. Redmond, 531; Col. Lynch and the Freeman's Journal, 28; Dillon on Recruiting, 482; Discontent with the Government, 244, 268; Emigration Statistics, 112; The French Government and Irish Sympathy, 83; Golden Jubilee of Brother O'Mahoney, 55; Home Rule Bill, 555; Home Rule Imperiled, 191; Industrial Development, 435; Industrial Progress, 388; The Irish and Enlisting, 215; Irish Martyrs' Decree, 3; Irish Organizations, 192; Liquor Taxation, 139; Minor Industrial Conditions, 410; The National Volunteers, 28; Nationalist Grievances, 579: Taxes, 604; The New Viceroy, 55; National Aspirations, 507; Political Discontent, 291; Population, Trade, Finance, 339; "Ireland, Nurse of Heroes," 6; War Prices and Trade..... 627
Irish in Argentina, The..... 146
Italia Æterna..... 274
Italy: Bari, Dominican Friars of, 483; Declares War on Turkey, 482; Press and the Pope, 507; War Agitation..... 140

Jesuit Alumni in the War..... 479
July 4, 1776, What Happened on..... 299

Kilmer, Joyce; Lecture Tour..... 452

Ladies and the Law Court, The (Ed.),180; Wept, Ladies, The (Ed.)..... 155
Lambs, Protect the (Ed.)..... 617

PAGE

"Lascivious Fictions" Spreading (Ed.) 495
Last Stand, The (Ed.) 255
Liberty, Its Use and Abuse (Ed.) 472
Lifting the Standards (Ed.) 401
Lodge, Hyslop and Telepathy 87
Looking Forward (Catholic College Graduates) 143
Louisiana Leper Home, The 250
Lovest Thou Me? (Ed.) 203
Lying Witness, (Ed.) 254

Magazines, Our Sublimated 114
Magna Charta's Seventh Centenary (Ed.), 230; "Month's Mind," of 344
Make-Ups (Ed.) 73
Marquette "The Imposter" 346
Marriages, Catholic, The Living Church on .. 464
Masons, American and Latin Lodges 504
"Mayo," God Help Us!" 323
Mayor and the Stage, A (Ed.) 232
Men, Our Young, 219 249
Methodist Quarterly, A, and the Ne Temere, 60; Making Italian Methodists (Ed.) 353
Mexico: The Blood Line, 411; Anti-U. S. Proceedings of Revolutionary Convention, 507; American's Appeal, 459; Plunder and Violence, 459; Pan-American Note, 460; Carranza, Recognition of, 604; Carranza and A. B. C. Republics, 555; Carranza's Proclamation, 244; Chaos and Famine, 216; Contemporary News-Letter, 84; Corolla Letter, 484; Disagreements Among the Revolutionaries, 140; Famine, 84; Famine and Chaos, 291; Famine in, 340; Food Riots, 168; General Devol's Report, 388; Huerta Complicates the Situation, 316; Important Conference, 436; Masonic Hostility, 28; The McManus Murder, 83; Mexican Ladies Protest, 113; Mexico's Salvation, 112; Pan American Conference, 580; Revolution Made to Order, 534; Suffrage and Revolutionists, 532; Mr. Bryan and Dr. Kelley, 55; Starvation in, 192; State of the Country, 4; Villa and Carranza Confer, 268; Villa's Note, 244; War, Hunger and Chicanery, 364; Witnesses to Atrocities, 4; Mexico of Today, 30; A Sad Letter, 628; Recognition of Carranza 628
Micrometor or Megaphone, Which? (Ed.) ... 100
Mistaken "Broadmindedness" (Ed.) 326
Modernism in England 366
Morality of the Songs we Sing, The 320
Mother Goose and "Efficiency" (Ed.) 353
Motherhood (Ed.) 127
"Movies," The Village (Ed.) 638
Moving Picture Censorship (Ed.), 98; Menace, The 582
Murder and Sentimentality, 171; and Tooth Brushes, (Materialistic Sociology) (Ed.) ... 519
Mystic, A Modern 563

Nerves, Our Natural 5
Netherlands, Resuming Relations with the Vatican 168
Neutrality, Cowardly (Ed.) 472
Newspapers—A Children's Text-Book (Ed.) .. 470
Newman and Gladstone 294
New Woman after God's Heart, The 91
New Zealand, Catholic Press of Australia and 632
Nickleby, Mrs., and the Crozer Professor 141

Offer, A Thousand-Dollar (Ed.) 615
Official Bulletin Writer, The (Ed.) 519

Pan-Americanism and the Church 413
Pankhurst, Mrs. in Paris (Ed.) 280
Pantaloon and Slapstick Legislation (Ed.) ... 72
Patrick's, Old St., New York 62
Patriots Again, The (Ed.) 14
Pauline Privilege, The 367
Peace by Constitution 390
Peace, Hatred, Arms (Ed.), 43; A New Plea for (Ed.) 422
Periodic Drunkenness and Tobacco 59
Poor, Large Families of the 299, 493 557
Poland's Great Sorrow (Ed.), 126: The Plight of, 514; Dirge of the Dolls (Ed.) 544
Pope and the Press, The (Ed.), 471; and Allies, (Groundless Fear) (Ed.), 568; and the War, The (Ed.), 202; Letter on Mexico, (Ed.), 42; and the Kaiser, (Ed.), 494; Outlook and the 479
Popular Song, A 342
Portugal, The New Revolt 140
Post-Impressionism 347
Praying, Is Ill-Bred? (Ed.) 591
Present-Day Fiction 8
Press, Catholic in England, 609; of Ireland, 585; Catholic, Defects of, 462; How to Improve, 511; Another View, 486; Century of Weeklies, 537; Catholic, of Australia and New Zealand 632
Prisoner and You, The 471
Prisons, Are Penal Institutions? (Ed.) 327
Problems About War (Ed.) 352
Professors and Spooks 640
Proofs of the Past, The 438
Proselyting the Filipinos 504
Protestantism, Limitations of 480
Protestant Tradition, The 297
Providence in Persecution 271
Purity Congress, International 528

Race and Religion (Ed.) 592
Radicalism 638
Rational Treatment of Criminals 528
Reading, What Are Our Children? 592
Real Menace, The 89
Religion of the Future, The, 217; New Theory of 113
Religions, American 583
"Religious but Creedless"! (Ed.) 71
Reno's Joy (Ed.) 43
Rescue the Kittens and Cats! (Ed.) 566
Revolution Made to Order(Mexico) 534
Right to Live, Her 515
Rights of the Child, The 437
Rome: The Pope and La Liberté, 316; The Pope's Letter on the Anniversary of the War, 411; The Pope and Peace, 56; The Pope and the War 392

Saint Francis and His City (Ed.) 98
"Save Us, We Perish" (Ed.) 70
Saving Up (Ed.) 376
Scandalized Contemporary, A 464
Scientific Faith, Reign of 538
Sentimentalism towards Crime 480
Serra, Father, The Influence of 605
Signs of Superior Civilization (Ed.) 100
Silence, Compulsory 441
Simplicity, Sociology and Religion 57
Sir Edward Grey and the German Chancellor 530
Social Uplift (Ed.) 423
Socialism, Battling With, 581; Collapse of, 461; The Church and 559
"Society's" Conversation (Ed.) 100
Songs We Sing, The 296
Sowers of Discord (Ed.) 102
South America, Dollars and Diplomacy 488
"Soyons Distingués" (Ed.) 231
Spain: Features of Conscription, 340; Anticlerical Agitation, 556; Attitude on the War, 484; Liturgical Congress, 436; Attitude on War, 532; Moroccan Question 628
Spreading Catholic Books (Ed.) 43
Starving Nations (Ed.) 279
State Socialism and Europe 533
String-Pulling Jesuit, A (Ed.) 42

Tact, Augustus V., The Art of 32
Taxing Education and Charity (Ed.) 255
That Blessed Word Automatic (Ed.) 205
Teaching Kine, The (Ed.) 520
Theaters Old and New (Ed.) 255
Thoughts on Heredity, 221, 246 270
Times and the Belgian Priests, The (Ed.) .. 204
Tolerance Today and Long Ago (Ed.) 375
Tremendousness of Trifles (Ed.) 354
Tribune and the Jesuit General, The (Ed.) ... 279
Twilight Sleep, The Ethics of 193

Vacation Time (Ed.) 401
Veneration of Relics, The (Ed.) 72
Viscount Bryce and the War (Ed.) 279

War: Advance on Warsaw, 409; Air Raids in England, 26; Arabic, German Note on, 553; The Argonne, 313, 361; Austro-Hungarian Protest on Ammunition, 361; American Note to Germany, 138; Armenian Torpedoed by German Submarine, 314; Austro-German Victory in Galicia, 137; British Note on Blockade, 433; British Victory in German West Africa, 337; Bulgaria Mobilizes, 602; Campaign in Galicia, 313; Carpathians and the Dardanelles, 53; China and Japan, 110; Cushing and Gulflight Cases, 214; Deadlock in the Carpathians, 25; Dumba Case, 554; Dumba's Explanation, 577; Eastern Theater of War, 165; Fall of Przemysl, 213; Fall of Warsaw, 433; Forcing the Dardanelles, 81; First German Reply to U. S. Note, 189; French Success at Les Eparges, 1; Galicia, 361; German Drive, 553; German Reply in the Frye Case, 433; German Reply Unsatisfactory, 337; Germany's Note of Protest, 1; German Success in the East, 385; Great Britain's Memorandum, 289: Italian Campaign, 190, 213, 265, 313, 337; Italian Demands on Austria, 166; Italy and Austria, 166; Italy Declares War on Austria, 166; Loss of British War Vessels, 190; Lusitania Destroyed by Germans, 110; Lusitania Protests, 165; Movements in Flanders, 53; Orduna Fired on by German Submarine, 361; Poland, 361; Resignation of Secretary Bryan, 241; Russian Advance in the Carpathians, 1; Russians Retire from the Dunajec, 109; Sea Raider Interned, 2; Southern Poland and Galicia, 337; Third American Note, 386; Third Note to Germany, 241; Warsaw's Peril, 385; Vilna Captured, 577; Conquest of Poland, 529; German Submarine Concession, 529; Hesperian Sunk, 599; Ypres and Carency, 137; Allies Gain in Artois and Champagne, 625; Balkan Situation, 625; East, Less Activity in the 625
War and Anti-Catholic Propaganda, 509; Capital and Labor (Ed.), 424; Wisdom in the 13th Century 610
Winning America for the Church (Ed.) 591
Was it "Fit to Print"? (Ed.) 16
Weismann and Some Fallacies as to Heredity 389
Wells, H. G., An Open Letter to 317
"Westward Ho!" (Ed.) 232
What Are Curmudgeons? (Ed.) 155
What is a Prisoner? (Ed.) 446
What Was Rationalism? (Ed.) 392
Why Doesn't the Pope Interfere? (Ed.) 326
Why Pray for Peace? (Ed.) 99
Will the Authorities Act? (Censoring the Mails) (Ed.) 518
Wine in the Holy Sacrifice 86
Woman, the New, After God's Heart, 91; Has She a Soul, 365; Suffrage and New York Sun 353
Women and Peace 440
Wonder Grows, The, Carranza's Recognition (Ed.) 614
World, The End of the? (Ed.) 496
Woman Suffrage 630

Xavier, Mother Mary (Ed.) 302

"Ye of Little Faith" (Ed.) 15
Young Man and the Brotherhood, The, 194; and Geology, The, 391; and Industrial Welfare Work, The, 606; and Music, The, 117; and the Navy, The, 269; and Public Accounting, The, 29; and Shorthand Reporting, The, 319; and Steamship Transportation, The, 170; and Stock Raising, The 463
Y. M. C. A. at Panama, 528; Hall Given for Bigots' Meeting 479
Youth and a Law, A (Ed.) 400

AUTHORS

Abercrombie, Lascelles: The Epic 46
Adams, Arthur: Grocer Greatheart 183
Adams, Professor John: Making the Most of One's Mind 19
Adams, Samuel H.: Little Miss Grouch 620
Aitkens, J. R.: The Christ of the Men of Art 258
Angell, Norman: America and the New World-State 130
Armstrong, Margaret: Field Book of Western Wild Flowers 499
Artzibashef, Michael: The Millionaire 357
Bacon, Leonard: The Song of Poland 47
Bacon, Paul V.: Vorwärts 184
Bainbridge, M. S.: A Walk in Other Worlds with Dante 548
Baring, Hon. Maurice: An Outline of Russian Literature 331
Barrett, T. S.J.: Compendium Theologiæ Moralis 546
Belloc, Hilaire: The Elements of the Great War 523
Benet, William Rose: The Falconer of God and Other Poems 20
Benson, Arthur Christopher: Hugh: Memoirs of a Brother 102
Benson, E. F.: Arundel 48
Benson, Robert Hugh: Poems, 19; Spiritual Letters 102
Blessed John Fisher: Commentary on the Penitential Psalms 131
Bond, Francis: Dedications and Patron Saints of English Churches 428
Bailey, John: Milton 572
Bimanski, F.: Phonetic Method of Hearing Confessions of the Slavic Peoples in Cases of Emergency 501
Bates, K. L.: In Sunny Spain 619
Bordeaux, Henry: The Will to Live 105
Birmingham, G. A.: Minnie's Bishop 596
Bleneau, Adele: The Nurse's Story 524
Bradley, Mary H.: The Splendid Chance 596
Brady, Cyrus Townsend: The Eagle of the Empire 183
Browning, R. and E. Barrett: New Poems ... 499
Burr, Amelia Josephine: A Dealer in Empire 105
Burroughs, John: The Breath of Life 452
Campbell, Rev. T. J., S.J.: Pioneer Laymen of North America 102
Canfield, Dorothy: Hillsboro People 104
Cannon, Gilbert: Satire 46
Cather, Willa Silbert: The Song of the Lark. 645
Chadwick, Rear Admiral French E.: The American Navy 306
Chapman, John Jay: Memories and Milestones 283
Chase, Beatrice: Through a Dartmoor Window 643
Chesterton, G K.: The Wild Knight 237
Churchill, Winston: A Far Country 307
Clarke, M. E.: Paris Waits: 1914 75
Cohen, Helen Louise: The Ballade 427
Cobb, W. H.: The Meaning of Christian Unity 523

PAGE

Coit, J. Eliot: Citrus Fruits 644
Conrad, Joseph: Victory 75
Conway, Daniel: Life of Ven. John Ogilvie, S.J. 284
Dall, Wm. H.: Spencer Fullerton Baird 404
Dalrymple, Leona: The Lovable Meddler 644
Davin, Olga A.: How I Became a Catholic 406
Davis, R. H.: Somewhere in France 572
Deming, Clarence: Yale Yesterdays 283
Dehey, Elinor Tong: Religious Orders of Women in U. S. 619
Doyle, Edward: Ginevra 331
Dragoumis, J. D.: Under Greek Skies 619
Driscoll, John T.: Pragmatism and the Problem of the Idea 259
Du Bois, W. E. Burghardt: The Negro 258
Dunbar, Seymour: A History of Travel in America 355
Earhardt, Lida B.: Types of Teaching 307
Eastman, Charles A.: The Indian Today 306
Eliot, Charles W.: The Road Toward Peace 130
Elliot, A. F. Scott: Prehistoric Man and His Story 183
Emmet, Thomas Addis: Thomas Addis Emmet and Robert Emmet 157
Englehardt, Fr. Zephyrin: The Missions and Missionaries of California 619
Ensor, R. C. K.: Belgium 611
Eucken, Rudolf: Collected Essays 235
Evans, Howell T.: Wales and the Wars of the Roses 499
Fabre, T. Henri: Bramble-Bees and Others 183
Fields, Anna P. L.: The Story of Canada Blackie 547
Finley, John: The French in the Heart of America 74
Fletcher, C. R. L.: The Making of Western Europe 571
Foote, Mary Hallock: The Valley Road 620
Forbes-Leith, W., S.J.: Pre-Reformation Scholars of Scotland in the XVIth Century 282
Fortescue, Father Adrian: The Mass 381
Funk, F. X.: Manual of Church History 548
Galsworthy, J.: The Freelands 524
Gardner, A. G.: The War Lords 595
Gardiner, A. G.: Prophets, Priests and Kings 547
Gibbs, Philip: The Soul of the War 594
Girardey, Rev. F., C.SS.R.: Sermon Matter 309
Gissing, Geo.: The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft 547
Goodchild, George: The Love of the Wanderer 547
Gorgas, Wm. C.: Sanitation in Panama 619
Granger, Canon, Guide in the Ways of Divine Love 549
Grant, Robert: The High Priestess 596
Green, E. M.: The Laird of Glentyre 619
Gretton, R. H.: History 46
Griffis, William E.: Millard Fillmore 20
Grimal, Rev. I., S.M.: The Priesthood and Sacrifice of Our Lord Jesus Christ 283
Grisar, Hartmann, S.J.: Luther, Vol. IV 330
Guthrie, William D.: The Catholic School 611
Haldane, Viscount: The Conduct of Life 405
Hall, S. Roland: Writing an Advertisement 332
Hannay, David: The Navy and Sea Power 331
Hare, Christopher: Life and Letters in the Italian Renaissance 611
Hastings, James: Prayer 620
Hastings, James: Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics 500
Hay, James, Jr.: The Man Who Forgot 105
Hill, Rev. M. P., S.J.: The Catholic's Ready Answer 234
Hoare, Alfred: An Italian Dictionary 380
Hodges, George: The Early Christian Church 18
Hogarth, D. A.: The Ancient East 331
Holborn, I. B. Stoughton: The Need for Art in Life 104
Holland, Olive: The Belgians at Home 105
Holland, W. J.: The Butterfly Guide 572
Hooker, Brian: Poems 450
Hope, Anthony: A Young Man's Year 596
Hull, Ernest R.: Civilization and Culture 476
Huneker, James: The New Cosmopolis 207
Hunting, Harold B.: The Story of Our Bible 620
Huss, John: The Church 370
Husslein, Joseph: The Children, a Message to Priests, Teachers, Parents 476
Irvine, Leigh H.: By Right of Sword 330
Ives, Ella Gilbert: The Evolution of a Preacher 427
Jacquin, Père., O.P.: The Friar Preacher Yesterday and Today 236
Jane, Lionel Cecil: The Interpretation of History 380
Jarret, Bede: Meditations for Layfolk 644
Jerome, Mother St.: Love's Gradatory 476
Johnson, W. S.: Prayer for Peace 548
Johnson, R. M.: Arms and the Race 548
Jourdan, Geo. V.: The Movement Towards Catholic Reform in the Early 16th Century. 522
Johnson, Henry: Dante's Divine Comedy 182
Kellner, Leon: American Literature 306
Kittredge, George Lyman: Chaucer and His Poetry 159
Kleist, James A., S.J.: The Dream of Scipio 76
Knox, James Carter: Henry August Coit 643
Kreisler, Fritz: Four Weeks in the Trenches 75

PAGE

Ladd, George Trumbull: What Ought I to Do? 75
Ladd, Geo. T.: What Shall I Believe? 474
Lake, Kirsopp; The Stewardship of Faith 284
Lane, Martha, A. L.: Arabian Nights' Entertainments 500
Lee, Chas.: The Widow Woman 547
Lees, Beatrice Adelaide: Alfred the Great 282
Lincoln, Joseph C.: Thankful's Inheritance 427
Little, Frances Delancy: Sketches in Poland. 451
Lynch, Ella Frances: Educating the Child at Home 356
MacCaffrey, Rev. James: Catholic Church History 45
MacCracken, Henry Noble: The College Chaucer 159
MacDonald, Rt. Rev. Bishop: Stray Leaves or Traces of Travel 309
MacEachen, Roderick: Child's Life of Christ 644
Mach, Ed. Von: Germany's Point of View 594
Mackintosh, Alex.: Joseph Chamberlain: An Honest Biography 595
Macksey, C.: De Ethica Naturali 474
MacRory, Rev. Joseph: The Epistles of St. Paul to the Corinthians 129
Mann, Horace K.: Lives of the Popes in the Middle Ages: Innocent III 306
Markham, Edward: The Shoes of Happiness 450
Marks, Jeanette: Early English Hero Tales 500
Marshall, Thomas W.: The Louisiana Purchase 1819-1841 283
Martin, L. C.: The Works of Henry Vaughan (Ed.) 522
Martindale, C. C.: In God's Army: Commanders in Chief 476
Mason, Caroline Atwater: The Spell of Southern Shores 130
Matthews, Brander: The Oxford Book of American Essays 379
Mauldsley, Daniel: The Solitaries of the Sambuca 158
McCormick, Patrick J.: History of Education 17
McLaughlin, Maurice E.: Tennis as I Play It 427
Mercier, Cardinal: On the Papacy 184
Meschler, Maurice, S.J.: The Life of Our Lord in Meditations 283
Messmer, Archbishop: Woman Suffrage 106
Miller, Elizabeth: Daybreak 183
Montague, Margaret Prescott: Closed Doors. 645
Montgomery, L. M.: Anne of the Island 525
Moore, Leslie: The Jester 76
Moore, Thomas Vernier: A Historical Introduction to Ethics 159
Moorman, F. W.: The Poetical Works of Robert Herrick 522
Maumigny, René de: The Practice of Mental Prayer 570
Meynell, Wilfrid: Aunt Sarah and the War. 571
More, Louis Trenchard: The Limitations of Science 331
Morris, Charles: Famous Days and Deeds in Holland and Belgium 236
Muller, Margarethe: Elsbeth 619
Muncunill, John, S.J.: Tractatus de Christi Ecclesia 307
Norris, Kathleen: The Story of Julia Page 620
Northcate, P. M.: The Curse of Adam 259
Olmstead, Florence: A Cloistered Romance 158
O'Neill, George V., S.J.: The Golden Legend 308
Oppenheim, E. P.: The Way of These Women 596
O'Sheel, Shaemas: The Light Feet of Goats 450
Palmer, John: Comedy 46
Parker, S. C.: Methods of Teaching in High Schools 307
Parker, Sir Gilbert: The Money Maker, 620; The World in the Crucible 357
Peperman, W. Leon: Who Built the Panama Canal? 47
Perris, G. H.: Campaign of 1914 in France and Belgium 523
Phillips, Stephen: Panama and Other Poems, 235; Armageddon 645
Porter, Laura Spencer: Genevieve 619
Power, Matthew A., S.J.: The Protomartyr of Scotland 284
Powys, John Cowper: Visions and Revisions. 19
Prince, L. Bradford: Spanish Mission Churches of New Mexico 595
Prummer, Dominic M., O.P.: Manuale Theologiæ Moralis 207
Putnam, George Palmer: In the Oregon Country 18
Quercy, Jean: Journal d'un curé de campagne pendant la guerre 379
Quick, Herbert: The Brown Mouse 524
Reilly, Joseph J.: James Russell Lowell as a Critic 103
Rinehart, Mary Roberts: "K" 475
Ritchie, Mrs. D. G.: The Two Sinners 525
Robertson, A. T.: A Grammar of the Greek New Testament 206
Ryan, Oswald: Municipal Freedom 306
Sarolea, Dr. Charles: The Anglo-German Problem 333
Saunders, Charles Francis and J. Smeaton Chase: The California Padres and Their Missions 158

PAGE

Schaff, David S.: John Huss: His Life and Teachings 370
Schwager, Rev. Frederick, S.V.D.: The Most Vital Mission Problem 428
Scollard, Clinton: The Vale of Shadows 450
Sharp, Dallas Lore: The Whole Year Round 131
Sharpless, Isaac: The American College 306
Shufeldt, R. W.: America's Greatest Problem: The Negro 258
Slater, Thos., S.J.: Questions of Moral Theology 474
Simonds, Frank H.: The Great War: The Second Phase 595
Small, Walter Herbert: Early New England Schools 310
Smith, F. Hopkinson: Felix O'Day 645
Smith, E. M.: The Investigation of Mind in Animals 452
Smith, Robinson: The Life of Cervantes 235
Sobieski, Count John: The Life of King John Sobieski 547
Stewart, Charles D.: Some Textual Difficulties in Shakespeare 282
Stewart, Elinor P.: Letters on an Elk Hunt. 620
Stevens, J. E.: Commercial Work and Training for Girls 476
Stewart, I. H.: Why Catholics Honor Mary. 549
Strahan, Kay Cleaver: Peggy Mary 619
Stickney, J. H.: Æsop's Fables 500
Stoner, Winifred Sackville: Natural Education 356
Thompson, R. Campbell: A Pilgrim's Song 20
Taylor, Winifred Louise: The Man Behind the Bars 235
Thurston, Herbert: The War and the Prophets 572
Thurston, Frederick: The Romances of Amosis-Ra 524
Tierney, Rev. H. B.: Collected Poems 132
Tissier, Mgr.: Consignes de Guerre 524
Tower, Charlemagne: Essays, Political and Historical 131
Toy, Crawford Howell: Introduction to the History of Religions 644
Trask, Katrina: The Mighty and the Lowly. 524
Tynan, Katherine: The Curse of Castle Eagle, 48; Men, Not Angels 132
Underhill, Evelyn: Ruysbroeck 356
Vaccari, Alberto, S.J.: Un Commento a Giobbe di Guilio di Eclana 642
Van Loon, Hendrik William: The Rise of the Dutch Kingdom 46
Vaughan, Bernard, S.J.: What of Today? 130
Verhaeven, Emile: Poems 259
Vonier, Dom Ansgar, O.S.B.: The Personality of Christ 404
Vose, Edward Neville: The Spell of Flanders 183
Walters, Hugh: The English Essays and Essayist 475
Walpole, Hugh: The Golden Scarecrow 645
Walsh, James J.: The Popes and Science 498
Wapelhorst, Innocent: Compendium Sacræ Liturgiæ 405
Ward, Mgr. B.: The Holy Gospel According to St. Luke 549
Waugh, Arthur: Reticence in Literature 643
Wells, H. A.: Bealby 160
Westcott, Frank N.: Hepsey Burke 475
White, Steward Edward: The Rediscovered Country 103
Wieger, L.: Chinese Characters 549
Wiggin, Kate Douglas: Penelope's Postscripts 476
Wilson, Alice: The Lutanist 644
Wister, Owen: The Pentecost of Calamity 645
Winter, William: Shakespeare on the Stage. 18
Wood, Eric Fisher: The Note-Book of an Attaché 498
Woodson, C. G.: The Education of the Negro Prior to 1861 258
Wooley, E. C.: Written English 548
Wynne, Arnold: The Growth of English Drama 184
Wynne, Rev. J. J., S.J.: The Mass 571

BOOKS

A. B. C. of Good Form 332
Abused Russia 429
Administration of Baptism, The 406
Ægypten 260
A Far Country 307
Alfred the Great 282
Æsop's Fables 500
Alice and a Family 285
America to Japan 260
America and the New World-State 130
American College, The 306
American Essays, The Oxford Book of 379
American Literature, 306; Readings from 331
American Navy, The 306
America's Greatest Problem: The Negro 258
Ancient East, The 331
Anglo-German Problem, The 333
Annuario Pontificio per l'Anno 1915 20
Anne of the Island 525
Antonio Rosmini 357
Arabian Nights' Entertainments, The 500

PAGE

Arms and the Race ... 548
Art of the Exposition, The ... 453
Arundel ... 48
Aunt Sarah and the War ... 308
Baird, Spencer Fullerton ... 404
Ballade, The ... 427
Barfussale ... 77
Bealby ... 160
Beautiful Ireland ... 77
Beginnings of the American People ... 451
Belgium ... 643
Belgians at Home, The ... 105
Benson, Robert Hugh; Memorials of ... 428
Betty-all-Alone ... 160
Bible, The Story of Our ... 620
Blake, William, Selections from the Symbolic Poems of ... 572
Book of Answered Prayers, A ... 184
Bramble-Bees and Others ... 183
Breath of Life, The ... 452
Bred of the Desert ... 309
Brown Mouse, A ... 524
Bunte Bilder ... 77
Butterfly Guide, The ... 572
By Right of Sword ... 330
California Padres and Their Missions, The ... 155
Call of the Open, The ... 450
Campaign of 1914 in France and Belgium ... 523
Canada Blackie, Story of ... 547
Cardinal Mercier: His Philosophical and Pastoral Works ... 184
Catechism of the Religious Life ... 21
Catholic as Citizen and Apostle, The, 185; Echoes of America, 185; Historical Review, 48; Reform in the Early 16th Century, The Movement Towards ... 522
Catholicism and Peace ... 185
Catholic's Ready Answer, The ... 284
Cervantes, The Life of ... 235
Chance, The Splendid ... 596
Chaucer, The College, 159; and His Poetry ... 159
Chesterton's "Poems" ... 208
Child's Communion and Prayer Book ... 185
Child's Life of Christ ... 644
Children, The: a Message to Priests, Teachers, Parents ... 476
Citrus Fruits ... 644
Chinese Characters ... 549
Christ of the Men of Art, The ... 258
Christian Unity, The Meaning of ... 523
Church, The, 370; History, Manual of 548; in Many Lands, The ... 309
Church's Opportunity in the Present Crisis ... 405
Closed Doors ... 645
Civilization and Culture ... 476
Cloistered Romance, A ... 158
Coit, Henry Augustus ... 643
College Life: Its Conditions and Problems ... 331
Comedy ... 46
Come Out to Play ... 309
Commento a Giobbe di Giulio di Eclana ... 642
Commentary on the Penitential Psalms ... 131
Commercial Work and Training for Girls ... 476
Compendium Sacræ Liturgiæ, 405; Theologiæ Moralis ... 546
Conduct of Life, The ... 405
Consignes de Guerre ... 260
Contrary Mary ... 104
Conventual Life, The ... 185
Curse of Adam, The, 259; of Castle Eagle, The ... 48
Dante, A Walk in Other Worlds with ... 548
Dante's Divine Comedy ... 182
Darwin and Darwinism ... 185
Daybreak ... 183
Dealer in Empire, A ... 105
Dedications and Patron Saints of English Churches ... 428
De Ethica Naturali ... 474
Der Loder ... 77
Die Exerzitien des Heiligen Ignatius ... 429
Die Leidenswacht ... 332
Die Monroedoktrin ... 260
Doodles ... 184
Dream of Scipio, The ... 76
Eagle of the Empire, The ... 183
Early Christian Church, The, 18; English Hero Tales, 500; New England Schools ... 310
Early Paradise, The ... 184
Eat and Grow Thin ... 131
Edgar Chirrup ... 308
Educating the Child at Home ... 356
Education of the Negro Prior to 1861 ... 258
Emmanuel ... 21
Eirinn, A Boy in ... 619
Elsbeth ... 619
Enemy, The ... 381
Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics ... 500
English Essays and Essayists, The ... 475
Epic, The ... 46
Epistles of St. Paul to the Corinthians, The ... 129
Essays, Political and Historical ... 131
Essentials of English Speech and Literature ... 405
Europe, Western the Making of ... 571
Expansion and Conflict ... 451
Eye Witness's Narrative of the War ... 285
Evolution of a Teacher, The ... 427
Fairyland ... 48
Falconer of God and Other Poems ... 20

PAGE

Famous Days and Deeds in Holland and Belgium ... 236
Fasting and Abstinence ... 357
Favorite Fairy Tales Retold ... 184
Felix O'Day ... 645
Felon's Track, The ... 426
Field Book of Western Wild Flowers ... 499
Fireside Melodies ... 357
Fits and Starts ... 236
Five Fronts ... 260
Florentine Cycle and Other Poems ... 237
Flower of the Field, The ... 185
Forest of Swords, The ... 208
Four Weeks in the Trenches ... 75
France in Danger ... 285
Francis, Father of Aberdeen ... 284
Frederick the Great, The Confessions of ... 19
Freelands, The ... 524
French in the Heart of America, The ... 74
Friar Preacher of Yesterday and Today, The ... 236
Friends and Apostles of the Sacred Heart ... 332
Frühlingsstürms ... 77
German Army in War, The ... 237
German War and Catholicism, The ... 594
Germany's Point of View ... 594
Genevieve ... 619
Getting a Wrong Start ... 160
Giant Tells, The ... 453
Ginevra ... 331
Girl of the Blue Ridge, A ... 208
God of Battles and Other Verses ... 208
Golden Sorrow, The ... 645
Golden Treats ... 160
Golden Legend, The ... 308
Golgotha ... 160
Gospel of Pain, The ... 185
Grammar of the Greek New Testament, A ... 206
Greek Spirit, The ... 332
Great War, Elements of the ... 523
Green Englishman and Other Stories of Canada, A ... 284
Gregorian Hymns for Benediction ... 429
Grocer Greatheart ... 183
Growth of English Drama, The ... 184
Guiding Star for Young Men ... 185
Guide in the Ways of Divine Love, A ... 549
Happy Pollypooly ... 76
Harbour, The ... 104
Heart of Uncle Terry, The ... 285
Henry Ryecroft, Private Papers of ... 547
Her Majesty the King ... 105
Herrick, Robert, The Poetical Works of ... 522
Hero of the War, A ... 406
High Priestess, The ... 596
Hillsboro People ... 104
Historical Introduction to Ethics, A ... 159
History ... 46
History of the Catholic Church from the Renaissance to the French Revolution ... 45
History of Education ... 17
History of Religions, Introduction to the ... 644
History of Travel in America, A ... 355
Homeric Scenes ... 48
Hopsey Burke ... 175
How to Follow the Mass ... 357
How I Became a Catholic ... 406
Hugh: Memoirs of a Brother ... 102
Ideal Catholic Readers, The ... 501
Il Santo Evangelo Illustrato ... 209
In a French Hospital: Notes of a Nurse ... 428
In der grossen Shicksalstunde ... 77
Indian Today, The ... 306
In God's Army: Commanders-in-Chief ... 476
In Hoc Vince ... 184
Interpretation of History, The ... 380
International Encyclopedia, The New ... 499
In the Land of the Head Hunters ... 21
In the Oregon Country ... 18
In Those Days ... 208
Introduction to the Science of Ethics ... 103
Investigation of Mind in Animals, The ... 452
Irish Nuns at Ypres, The ... 546
Italian Dictionary, An ... 380
Italian Renaissance ... 644
Jaffrey ... 285
Jail Journal of John Mitchel ... 426
James Russell Lowell as a Critic ... 103
Japanese Lyrics ... 208
Jean Baptiste ... 208
Jester, The ... 76
Jesus Christ, The Life of, in the Nez Percé Language ... 379
Joffre, The Life of Gen ... 236
John Huss: His Life and Teachings ... 370
Johnny Appleseed ... 160
Joseph Chamberlain, An Honest Biography ... 595
Josephus ... 21
Journal d'un curé de campagne pendant la guerre ... 379
Juliana Falconieri, St ... 357
"K" ... 475
Keeper of the Door, The ... 48
Lacordaire and Montalembert ... 357
Laird of Glentyre, The ... 619
Land of Delight, The ... 21
Landloper, The ... 453
Lay Apostolate, The ... 185
Les cloches des morts ... 184
Life of Our Lord in Meditations ... 283

PAGE

Light Feet of Goats, The ... 450
Like unto a Merchant ... 48
Limitations of Science, The ... 331
Little Blue Bird ... 184
Little Missionary ... 131
Little Miss Grouch ... 620
Little Brother Who Sits at Home ... 75
Lives of the Popes in the Middle Ages, Innocent III, 1198-1216 ... 306
Louisiana Purchase 1819-1841, The ... 283
Lovable Meddler, The ... 644
Love's Gradatory ... 476
Luther, Vol. IV ... 330
Luke, St., Gospel According to ... 549
Letters on a Elk Hunt ... 620
Lutanist, The ... 644
Mad Knight, The ... 184
Making the Most of One's Mind ... 19
Man Behind the Bars, The ... 235
Man Who Forgot, The ... 105
Manuale Theologiæ Moralis ... 209
Mary, The Mother of God ... 185
Man Who Rocked the Earth, The ... 208
Mary, Why Catholics Honor ... 549
Martin of Tours, St ... 357
Mass, The, 381, ... 571
Mazzuchelli, Memoirs of Father ... 378
Meditations for Layfolk ... 644
Memoirs of Zi Pre ... 21
Memorials of Robert Hugh Benson ... 428
Memories and Milestones ... 283
Men, Not Angels ... 132
Mental Prayer, The Practice of ... 570
Methods of Hearing Holy Mass ... 185
Methods of Teaching in High Schools ... 307
Michael O'Halloran ... 452
Millard Fillmore ... 20
Millionaire, The ... 357
Millstone ... 429
Milton, J. Bailey ... 572
Minnie's Bishop ... 596
Miralda ... 184
Mirror, The ... 21
Missal Gems for Children ... 185
Missions and Missionaries of California, The ... 619
Mighty and the Lowly, The ... 524
Modernist, The ... 596
Money Makers, The ... 620
Monumenta Historica Societatis Jesu ... 260
Most Vital Mission Problem, The ... 428
Municipal Freedom ... 306
Mütterlichkeit ... 260
My Life Out of Prison ... 260
Mystery of Faith, The ... 160
Nations of Europe, The ... 405
Natural Education ... 356
Naval Occasions ... 309
Navy and Sea Power, The ... 331
Need for Art in Life, The ... 104
Negro, The ... 258
New Cosmopolis, The ... 207
New Nation, The ... 451
New Poems ... 499
New World Religion, The ... 132
Nicholas Freydon, The Record of ... 381
Note-Book of an Attaché, The ... 498
Nurse's Story, The ... 524
Nutrition of a Household, The ... 357
Ogilvie, Ven. John, S.J., Life of ... 284
On the Papacy ... 184
Outdoor Sketching ... 357
Page, The Story of Julia ... 620
Panama and Other Poems ... 235
Parents' Guide, The ... 498
Parish Hymnal ... 429
Paris Waits: 1914 ... 75
Pax ... 236
Peggy Mary ... 620
Penelope's Postscripts ... 476
Pentecost of Calamity, The ... 645
Personality of Christ, The ... 404
Petrarch, Some Love Songs of ... 570
Phonetic Method of Hearing Confessions of the Slavic Peoples in Cases of Emergency ... 501 Philosophy and Belief ... 185
Pieces of the Game ... 309
Pierrot: Dog of Belgium ... 21
Pilgrim's Script, A ... 20
Pioneer Laymen of North America ... 102
Poet's Cabinet, A ... 332
Popes and Science, The ... 498
Practical Conduct of Play, The ... 452
Pragmatism and the Problem of the Idea ... 259
Prayers of the Gael ... 620
Prayer ... 620
Prayers for Peace ... 548
Prehistoric Man and His Story ... 183
Pre-Reformation Scholars in Scotland in the XVIth Century ... 282
Prescriptions ... 21
Priesthood and Sacrifices of Our Lord Jesus Christ ... 283
Primary School and Grammar Readers ... 501
Prophets, Priests and Kings ... 547
Protomartyr of Scotland, The ... 284
Pushing to the Front ... 406
Questions of Moral Theology ... 474
Rational Athletics for Boys ... 284

PAGE

Rediscovered Country, The ... 103
Red Laugh, The ... 309
Red Spy, The ... 260
Reflections of a Non-Combatant ... 285
Religious Education in the Family ... 453
Religious Orders of Women in the United States ... 619
Reticence in Literature ... 643
Riddle of the Sands, The ... 48
Rise of the Dutch Kingdom, The ... 46
Road Toward Peace, The ... 130
Roland, The Song of ... 47
Romances of Amosis-Ra, The ... 524
Ruggles of Red Gap ... 76
Russian Literature, An Outline of ... 331
Russian Realities ... 429
Ruysbroeck ... 356
Saints and Saintly Dominicans ... 21
Sanitation in Panama ... 619
Sanpriel ... 75
Satire ... 46
Scarlet Plague, The ... 208
Seal and Flag of the City of New York ... 501
Secret of an Empress, The ... 21
Secrets of the Hohenzollerns, The ... 405
Selected Letters ... 132
Sermon Matter ... 309
Service of the Sacred Heart, The ... 332
Seltsame Lent ... 77
Shakespeare on the Stage ... 18
Shall I Be a Daily Communicant? ... 308
Shall I Be a Priest? ... 185
Shoes of Happiness ... 450
Simple Mass and Communion Book, A ... 357
Sketches in Poland ... 451
Sinners, The Two ... 525
Sleepy Time Story Book ... 309
Smile of Mona Lisa, The ... 331
Sobieski, Life of King John ... 547
Socialism as the Sociological Ideal ... 105
Sœur Thérèse of Lisieux ... 76
Solitaries of the Sambuca ... 158
Some Children of St. Dominic ... 357
Some Textual Difficulties in Shakespeare ... 282
Somewhere in France ... 572
Song, The ... 357
Song of the Lark, The ... 645
Spain, In Sunny ... 619
Spanish Mission Churches of New Mexico ... 595
Spell of Flanders, The ... 183
Spell of Southern Shores, The ... 130
Spiritual Letters of Mgr. Benson ... 102
Stewardship of Faith, The ... 284
Still Jim ... 160
Stories of the Angels ... 453
Stories of Mary Our Heavenly Queen ... 453
Story of a Conversion, The ... 185
Stray Leaves or Traces of Travel ... 309
Sundown Slim ... 260
Sweet Doreen ... 285
Tabular Views of Universal History ... 333
Teeth, The Care of ... 453
Tennis as I Play It ... 427
Thankful's Inheritance ... 427
Thomas Addis Emmet and Robert Emmet ... 157
Thomas Davis, the Thinker and Teacher ... 426
Through a Dartmoor Window ... 643
Tolerance ... 184
Tourists' Maritime Provinces, The ... 260
Tractatus de Christi Ecclesia ... 307
Treasury of Catholic Song ... 429
Types of Teaching ... 307
Under Greek Skies ... 619
Under Which Flag? ... 160
Union and Democracy ... 451
United States, A History of the ... 47
University of Louvain, The ... 357
Untroubled Mind, The ... 357
Unveiling, The ... 332
Vale of Shadows, The ... 620
Valley Road, The ... 184
Vanishing Roads ... 522
Vaughn, The Works of Henry ... 75
Victory ... 184
Vida Popular San Vincente de Paul ... 19
Visions and Revisions ... 184
Vorwärts ... 499
Wales and the Wars of the Roses ... 284
Waiting ... 547
Wanderer, Love of the ... 522
War and the Prophets, The ... 285
War's New Weapons ... 596
Way of These Women, The ... 129
Westminster Version of the Sacred Scriptures. Vol. IV, Part 3, The Apocalypse of St. John ... 21
What Faith Really Means ... 75
What Ought I to Do? ... 474
What Should I Believe? ... 130
What of Today? ... 309
When I Was a Boy in Belgium ... 21
When a Man Comes to Himself ... 47
Who Built the Panama Canal? ... 104
Who Goes There? ... 131
Whole Year Round, The ... 237
Wild Knight, The ... 105
Will to Live, The ... 21
Wit and Wisdom of John Ayscough ... 132
Within the Cloister's Shadow ... 406
Woman Suffrage ... 547
Woman, The Widow ... 332
Women Under Polygamy ... 357
World in the Crucible, The ... 132
World of H. G. Wells, The ... 332
Writing an Advertisement ... 548
Written English ... 595
War, Soul of The, 594; The Great, 595; Lords, The ... 283
Yale Yesterdays ... 596
Young Man's Year, A ...

COMMUNICATIONS

PAGE

Absent ... 635
Absurdities about Mexico ... 122
Americanization Day ... 300
American Missionaries, Few ... 13
American Spelling ... 469
Anglican's Position, An ... 564
Anglican Terminology ... 153
Anglo-Catholics, Sincerity of ... 468
Architecture, of Catholic Institutions, 469; American-Catholic ... 492
Arkansas Not Iowa ... 517
Athletics versus Sport ... 635
Belloc on Wine ... 421
Ben Jonson as a Catholic ... 421
Birth Control: An Open Letter ... 200
"Bishop's" Calumny, A ... 419
Ben Jonson as a Catholic ... 468
Black Death and Equal Pay ... 92
Black List for Motion Pictures ... 421
Boys, What Shall We Do for the? ... 324
Burke, Edmund, 612; Was Burke's Wife a Catholic? ... 636
Capital Punishment in Germany ... 398
Catholic, Apologists, 229; Booking Bureau, 645; Booking Office, A, 565; Boy Scouts, 349, 397, 493; Public Schools, 634; Circulating Libraries, 445; Correspondence School, 150, 226; Press, The, 589, 612; Press, Defects of the, 516, 540; Dailies, A Chain of, 39; Daily, The, 65-66; Evening Schools, 373; Landmarks of San Francisco, 351; Lecture Courses, 150; Publications, Circulating, 125; Subjects, Free Lectures on ... 124
Catholics in the Y. M. C. A., 13, 41, 68, 69, 97, 120, 121, 151, 152, 153; and the Scriptures, 349; Uninstructed ... 150
"C. C." Answered ... 132
Censorship of Films ... 350
Church Music ... 420
Chaplin "Charlie" ... 517
Clubs for Catholic Young Men ... 396
Costly Educational Experiments ... 276
Criticism of Anglicans ... 395
Dangers in the Navy ... 420
Dante, 227 ... 397
Delinquents and Laundries ... 469
Dowson's Conversion ... 67
Educate Our Children, The Right to ... 200
English in Catholic Schools, 399, 445 ... 493
Established Religion in Germany ... 225
Federation's Deficiencies ... 399
Flowers and Funerals, 228, 252, 277, 301, 372, 373, 444 ... 467
For the Sake of Womanhood ... 276
Gothic Vestments, 13 ... 125
Gov. Ferguson and Fair Play ... 123
Governor Opposes Capital Punishment ... 121
Grace Not Information ... 124
Guilday, Dr., and Magna Charta ... 275
Hilaire Belloc Misrepresented ... 398
Holy Name Society, The ... 348
Journal of Opinion, A ... 299
Journalism, Practical Catholic ... 565
Judas and Salvation ... 69
K. of C. and Boys' Club ... 348
Lady Mackenzie's Contribution to Science ... 148
Large Families of the Poor ... 492
Liberty, What Is? ... 516
Ludicrous Anarchronism, A, 11 ... 37
Magna Charta, The Latin Interpretation of ... 300
Metamorphosed Russian, The ... 67
Middle Ages, Understanding the ... 201
Modern Friar and Prior M'Nabb, A ... 252
Moving-Pictures, Why no Protest? ... 492
Mrs. Nickleby and the Crozer Professor ... 277
Navy, Dangers in the ... 564
New Theater, The ... 252
Pankhurst, Mrs. in Paris ... 517
Papal Elections and the Veto ... 227
Paris Clubs for Young Men ... 373
Pope, Ignoring the ... 613
Purgatorial Hymn, A ... 613
Progress in Gotham ... 325
Prohibition, 66, 67, 149, 150, 176, 199, 226, 227; vs. Temperance, 12, 13, 39, 94, 95, 96, 97 ... 125
Protest, A (Anglican) ... 350
Protestantism of a Belgian, The ... 349
"Raffle for Souls," The ... 126
Reply to "An Anglican's Position" ... 636
Repplier Miss, and Hilaire Belloc ... 443
Riddle, A ... 492
San Francisco, Landmarks of ... 228
Saving the Boy ... 151
Schools in the Philippines, 150 ... 253
Shakespeare's Heroines, 253, 325, 399; Religion ... 325
Socratic Salvation ... 397
Some Problems of the "Defenders of Liberty" ... 176
South America's Catholicism ... 64
Time of Death, The, 37 ... 38
Unification of Catholic Clubs ... 276
Vaudeville, 93 ... 225
Votes for Women ... 468
Wasted Money ... 176
Woman's Place ... 541
Woman Suffrage, 444 ... 637
"Watson's" Tom, Papers ... 612
Ye of Little Faith ... 177
Young Man and the Navy, The ... 351
Y. M. C. A., A Call for Action ... 493

EDUCATION

Bondage of Liberty ... 358
Case Method in Law and Morals, The ... 382
Catholic Educational Association Convention, 333; Summer School, The, 185; Lectures Feasible, Are? 78; Students and Protestant Chapels ... 645
Competition and Cooperation ... 597
Disciple of McMurry, A ... 161
Educational Legislation ... 209
Efficiency of Catholic Schools (Subject of "Bells" ... 502
Government Educational Work in China, 406, 430
High Winds in Chicago ... 525
Irish Christian Brothers ... 528
Ibsen in the Class Room ... 453
Inflated Verbal Currency ... 22
In the Matter of Spelling ... 261
Introducing Mr. Henry Herring ... 310
Jeanne d'Arc Club, The ... 49
More Paganism in The Schools ... 549
Muckraking the Public Schools ... 133
Normal School Psychology ... 477
Religious Instruction and the Public School ... 621
School Children's Health, 106; Schoolgirl, The, In Old New England ... 573
University Extension Work in Massachusetts ... 237
Woman's Educational Exhibit, The ... 285
Vacation Bible Schools ... 528

ECONOMICS

Pan-American Financial Conference, The ... 407
Psychology of Social Rest, The ... 431
Unemployment ... 334
War and the Falling Birthrate ... 598

LITERATURE

"American Thought" ... 233
Beardsley, On Aubrey and Others ... 449
Belloc, Hilaire ... 377
Burke, Edmund ... 521
Children's Books ... 593
Chesterton, Mr. G. K. "Orthodoxy" ... 181
Dante's Six Hundred and Fiftieth Birthday ... 156
English Literature, A Curiosity of ... 403
Ernest Dowson ... 17
Fishers and Fish ... 548
How to Reach the Medieval Mind ... 129
Hobbes, John Oliver ... 569
Hello, Ernest ... 329
Hearn, Lafcadio ... 73
Maturin, Works of Father ... 257
Mexico's Poet of the Home ... 281
Neo-Celts, The ... 497
O'Reilly, John Boyle ... 425
Patmore, Coventry ... 473
Pessimism and Mr. Hardy ... 641
Poesy and Prohibition ... 305
"Quotes," Italics and Parentheses ... 101
Rabindranath Tagore ... 355
Rossetti, Dante Gabriel ... 617
Shakespeare's Heroines, 205; Shakespeare, Was He a Catholic ... 44

NOTE AND COMMENT

Academic Degrees, New ... 456
Academic Freedom ... 239
Adams and Jefferson on the Jesuits ... 312
Advertising Men as Preachers ... 312
"All the News That's Fit to Print" ... 264
American Seminarians for the Foreign Missions ... 287
An American Kikuyu ... 648
Angels of Mons ... 624
Annual Convention of Catholic Federation ... 383
Anti-Catholic Paper Loses in Suit ... 187

PAGE

Archbishop Quigley, A Tribute to the Late... 408
Australasia, Reception of First Apostolic Delegate to 24
Beginning of Christianity in Canada..... 360
Bigot in Office, A..... 456
Birth Control 212
"Bishop" Burt, A Protestant Rebuke for..... 188
"Bishop" Herford 408
Brosnahan, Father, Timothy, S.J., Death of.. 240
Caldey Convert, Brother Mardon A..... 575
Canadian Eucharistic Congress..... 136
Capital Punishment in Illinois..... 136
Catholic Circulating Libraries, 384; Clubs, 408; Colleges, Honors for, 51; Colleges Win in Oratorial Contest, 80, 187; Conventions in August, 407; Literature in Anti-Catholic Communities, 163; Parochial Schools, A Tribute to the, 108; Statistics in England and Wales, 335; Student Wins Oratorical Contest, 135; University's Silver Tribute, The, 51; Laymen's Guild, A, 360; and American Citizenship, 288; in Practical Social Work. 52
Chesterton's Imitators 600
China and Rome..... 576
Charity and Thanksgiving Day..... 456
Churchman and Rome, The..... 432
Clean Films for the "Movies"..... 312
College Students, Automobiles..... 312
Colton, Bishop, Dead..... 136
Coming Catholic Congresses..... 51
Conaty, Bishop, Dead..... 600
Confusing News About the Vatican..... 431
Copus, Rev. John E. S. J., Death of..... 264
Cost of Living, The..... 288
Dogma is not Theory..... 384
Dooley, Rev. William, S.J., Death of..... 360
Dumont, Rev. Dr., Death of..... 164
Earliest Mentioned Nurse, The..... 212
Ebro Observatory at Tortosa, The..... 264
Eddy, Mrs. A Monument to..... 366
Education for the Home..... 187
Empty Pews 552
Encouraging School Report, An..... 432
England's Catholic Soldiers..... 648
European War, Some Consequences of the... 188
Family Difficulties in Court..... 287
Farcical Censorship of Motion Pictures..... 408
France, The Best Citizens in..... 51
French and Belgian Priests, A Tribute to.... 456
Gavisk, Father, President of the National Charities Conference..... 187
German Jesuits in India..... 600
Gibbons, Cardinal, and the Suffragettes..... 336
Golden Jubilee of the Rev. Charles Coppens, S.J. 648
Health and Literature..... 600
High School Curriculum, The Overloaded.... 135
Honor System in Colleges, The..... 51
Improper Employment of Children..... 239
Jesuit of Fiction, The..... 264
Jesuits as the Living Church Sees Them..... 288
Josefinas 552

PAGE

Kikuyu Controversy Again..... 212
Langevin, Archbishop, Death of..... 288
Lasting Peace, The Way to a..... 384
Laws Not Enforced..... 187
League to Enforce Peace..... 552
Lessons in Decency..... 52
Lorenzelli, Cardinal, Dead..... 600
Maes, Bishop, Death of..... 164
Man in Relation to the State..... 288
Maria, Rev. Joseph, S.J., Death of..... 24
Masses on All Souls' Day..... 624
Martha, Sister, Death of..... 312
Maturin, Rev. Father: Last Sermon in America, 108; Drowns on the Lusitania, 136; Requiem for..... 240
Men Communicants, Too Few..... 212
Methodism's First Pope..... 108
Mexican Artist-Priest, A..... 359
Mexico, American Losses in 456
Mixed Marriages 336
Modern Press, The..... 336
Moral Education in Schools..... 456
Moral Nastiness, Discussion of..... 52
Mothers' Pension Law, The..... 80
Motives for Backsliding..... 432
Moultrie, Rev. A., Converted in England.... 888
"Movies" and Morals..... 432
Native Americans Striking Their Colors 408
Negligent Parents 211
Newman and Huxley 576
New York Board of Health Bulletin..... 648
New York Catholics and Secondary Education 108
Non-Catholics and Catholic Philosophy..... 312
Notable Mission Records..... 432
Objectionable Motion Picture Films..... 384
"Old Maid," An..... 51
Old Paganism Taking New Forms 168
Pacifism and Humbugs..... 336
Panama Exposition, Moral Conditions at..... 672
Pagan Styles for Women..... 126
Parental Obligations 264
Parochial School, The Fundamental Purpose of the, 52; and Society 239
"Pastor" Russell's Sermons..... 80
Persecution of Men of Science by Church.... 576
Phelan, Rev. David, Death of 624
Pilgrimages and Sacred Relics..... 188
Play, A Most Objectionable..... 155
Political Intolerance in Pennsylvania 624
Pope and Poland, The, 360; and Prisoners of War 552
Priests in the Italian Army 360
Priests of Paris, Zeal of the..... 164
Prison Discipline 599
Private Charities, Critics of..... 212
Protestant Ministers in Politics..... 240
Protestant Missionaries in the Philippines.... 552
Protestations of Loyalty Overdone..... 211
Public School Exercises in Churches..... 240
Purity Congress, The..... 432
Quigley, Archbishop, Death of 360

PAGE

Race Suicide 164
Rationalism of Union Theological Seminary.. 136
Responsibility for the War..... 383
Revelations at Annapolis..... 384
Saloon, The Decline of the..... 188
Scanlon, Bishop, Death of..... 164
School Problems Concerning Morals..... 24
Secularizing Christianity 239
Sewell, Rev. J. D. W., S.J., Dead at Madras. 24
Spectator and Papal Infallibility, The..... 163
Spelling, The Educational Value of..... 108
Spiritual Grasshoppers 336
Stage Fright 80
Stage Today, The..... 212
St. Joseph's Lithuanian Roman Catholic Association of Labor..... 648
Suffragist Cause, Progress of the..... 312
Strange Advice from a Former Priest..... 552
Statue of Joan of Arc for N. Y..... 552
Successful Catholic Orators..... 288
Syria, Thrifty Missionaries to..... 24
Twilight Sleep 360
Universality of Genius, The..... 384
Universal Reform Through Legislation..... 80
War a Benefit to Russia..... 80
Vannutelli, Cardinal 504
War and Missions 599
War Sympathies in the Schools..... 599
War, The Pity and Horrors of..... 188
War Topics 336
White Plague, The..... 336
Zanzibar Excommunicates Hereford..... 164

SOCIOLOGY

"A Bag of Stick Candy..... 79
All Work and No Money..... 107
Annual Conference of the St. Louis Catholic Charities 162
Capital Punishment 455
Catholic Boys' Protective League, The, 311; Federation Convention, 503; Women's League for Social and Civic Reform..... 286
Conscious Birth Restriction..... 210
Central Verein Convention..... 478
Convent Inspection 238
Faculty, A Neglected (Catholic Schools of Sociology) 526
Fatal Fondness for Food, The..... 262
Indian Problem, The..... 186
Industrial Commission, Margaret O'Connor and the..... 574
Molten Calves and Modern Prophets..... 550
Prisons and Prisoners: Construction vs. Destruction 382
Religious Order, A New..... 134
Prison of the Knave of Hearts, the..... 622
Recent Rulings on the Catholic Indian Schools, A 359
Sectarian Legislation in Massachusetts..... 23
Tannhauser and Radical Feminism..... 50

soul through the body, and Christianity has long since become "muscular." How, in such an age, can culture flourish—culture, which cares even more about the spirit than about the flesh? It was pointed out not long ago, in an Atlantic article, that many of our greatest minds have dwelt in bodies that the eugenists would have legislated out of existence. Many of the greatest saints found sainthood precisely in denying the power of the ailing flesh to restrict the soul. There is more in the great mystics than psychiatry will ever account for.

Well said! AMERICA, of course, has long been insisting in season and out, on these very truths. But it is gratifying to find them so forcibly expressed in a secular magazine like the Atlantic Monthly. Asceticism and mortification are in bad repute just now in many quarters. They are considered "irrational restraints on the due development of the individual." Suffering is reckoned an unmitigated evil, for its disciplinary worth is nil, and its supposed expiatory value a superstition. The age clamors for unrestrained freedom. "Self-realization" is the slogan of the day. The observance of the Ten Commandments becomes an insupportable burden to the person who maintains he "must strive to develop every capacity nature has given him." Men and women, as the cant phrase has it, "must live their own lives."

"Self-realization" indeed, threatens to become as tiresome a word as "service," "uplift" or "efficiency." Nowadays everybody, apparently, is striving to "realize himself," or more commonly "herself" as never before. Success in doing so is in certain cases considered highly praiseworthy, but in others quite the reverse. If a scientist loses his health seeking the solution of one of nature's mysteries, if an artist starves in a garret till he has achieved a masterpiece, if a young woman gives ten years of her life to rigorous training for the operatic stage, the self-realization they thus attain at the cost of sacrifice can never be admired enough. But should a man's eagerness for self-realization of the highest kind lead him to embrace a life of prayer and mortification, many consider him a medieval fanatic; or should a woman's passion for lofty self-realization make her leave the world and enter the cloister, her "selfish folly" is widely deplored. If a wealthy wife's desire for self-realization finally brings her into the divorce court, sympathetic apologists for her action will not be wanting. But should her humbler sister find ample self-realization in being the joyful mother of many children, the neo-Malthusians set up a wail of protest. Self-realization seems to be wholly admirable only when worldly honor, vast wealth or material comforts are its rewards. But when love for God's law or zeal for His glory are its motives, numerous moderns, strange to say, find self-realization quite contemptible.

LITERATURE

XI.—Agnes Repplier

TO take to ourselves the distinction of being the most faddish of all times might be to challenge the pretensions of some other age. Be that as it may, our world is certainly smothered in fads. Some of them are cut out of the whole cloth of foolishness, and some of them are garments of motley built up around a patch of common sense. "Sin is nothing but a mistake, and it proceeds from ignorance" is a quotation from a late book on morality. Crime is only an adenoid, and murderers and thieves need doctors instead of gaolers. Marriage, according to the best traditions of our kind, is out of date. Education was once work, because it was intended to prepare for life, which is work, but now, while it is still intended to prepare for life, education is play, and the child will take up the toil of life quite unfit for the struggle. All this would be alarming if it were merely sporadic, but what makes it desperate is that it is epidemic. Magazines, papers, books, and pamphlets in increasing numbers are carrying the infection. Writers who ought to have more sense, and writers whose lack of sense saves them from the blame which falls on their readers, are spreading the disease.

There are writers who have not been swept off their feet by the waters of absurdity. Through the dust, which is being thrown in their eyes so liberally, these writers see clearly and proclaim boldly the eternal truth of things. It is not every one who does see through this nonsense. Not every one, who does see through it, is candid and brave enough to expose the fraud. To do so does not assure one of a place among the classics, but it is certainly a long step in that direction. Agnes Repplier's strongest claim to literary distinction is probably her clear understanding of, and her fearless attack on fads, follies and fancies. To see life clearly and to see it whole and, more than this, to express it, as one sees it, is a gift of the great, and one to which in modesty she may not, but to which in justice she can lay claim.

Take an example. It is from a rather recent contribution of hers. It is an incisive criticism of the "Repeal of Reticence." It is not one-sided. It is liberal. It admits the modicum of truth in a movement which has gone mad. "Few of us would care to see the rising generation as uninstructed in natural laws as we were, as adrift amid the unintelligible or partly intelligible things of life. But surely the breaking of silence need not imply the opening of the flood-gates of speech."

At the same time the whimsies, the absurdities, the hysteria of sex-hygienists are flayed unmercifully. All through the flagellation, however, with the inborn instinct of common sense one can feel that the whip is in the hands of truth, and that the strokes are falling where they should, and not more heavily than they should and that if any flesh is torn away, it is the skin of falsehood.

> "What is this topic," he [Dr. Keyes] asks, "that all these little ones are questioning over, mulling over, fidgeting over, imagining over, worrying over? Ask your own memories." I do not ask my memory in vain for the answer. Dr. Keyes anticipates. A child's life is full, and everything that enters it is of supreme importance. I fidgeted over my hair which would not curl. I worried over my examples which never came out right. I mulled (though unacquainted with the word) over every piece of sewing put into my incapable fingers which would not be trained to hold a needle. I imagined I was stolen by brigands and became—by virtue of beauty and intelligence—spouse of a patriotic outlaw in a frontierless land. I asked artless questions which brought me into discredit with my teachers, as for example, who "massacred" St. Bartholomew? But vital facts, the great laws of propagation were matters of but casual concern, crowded out of my life, and out of my companions' lives (in a convent boarding school) by the more stirring happenings of every day.

The spirit of truth which evidences itself in this passage can be found in all that Agnes Repplier has written. Examine any of the growing number of volumes that bear her name, and you find the same clearness of insight, the same disregard for passing freaks and fancies, the same unmasking of pretense and falsehood, the same fearless contempt for anything but truth. This, more than anything else, is what makes Agnes Repplier delightful reading. This spirit of truth is the core of literature, and that is why we like it. But in the essays of Agnes Repplier there is more than the core of truth. There is the fullness of the fruit. She has told us somewhere that when she was a young girl she was let loose in an old library and allowed to browse at will "upon that fair and wholesome pasturage." As she herself has reminded us, Charles Lamb said, "Had I twenty girls they should be brought up exactly in this fashion," and if the results were always the same as in the case of Agnes Repplier it would certainly be the ideal literary training for young ladies. She browsed and she absorbed. Her essays simply teem with quotations. Her topics vary widely, but her supply of confirmation from other authors never fails. The citations come easily and fit aptly.

According to one reader, she quotes so freely that it is hard to know what is her own and what is another's. But this is an exaggeration. Her composition is not a mere mosaic of other people's thought and words. She speaks in her own person and her speech is altogether distinctive. There is grace and delicacy where these are in place, but mostly there is piquancy of attack which is saved from bitterness by a kindly humor. Some might call her virile, but it is likely that she would resent the epithet. She wants to be a woman. She even insists on being a woman who was trained in an old-fashioned convent school. She believes that a woman can be strong without being a man; that there are "valiant women." There are, and their womanliness is greater strength than any manishness which others may assume. This is an eternal truth which we like to call plain American common sense. We like Agnes Repplier for her American sense, as we like her for her American methods. Of course an American will not write as will an Englishman: not if what the American writes be literature. Literature is personal with the personality of nations as well as of individuals. Our American life runs on so fast that we have no time to pause in order to unravel the tangled skeins of devious sentences. American writers must be pellucidly clear. Agnes Repplier is. American life is tense, stirring, bustling. Our writers must beat time with our nerves. They must be brisk, racy, "snappy." Agnes Repplier is.

She is distinctly American. Some years ago a critic named her as one of the two foremost American essayists, the other being Hamilton Wright Mabie. To be keen in perceiving the truth and fearless in expressing it are among the best of our American traditions. Truth and fearlessness are qualities of sincerity, and sincerity is an essential of enduring literature. In the preface to "A Happy Half-Century," Miss Repplier says: "A hundred years ago many men and women were reckoned of importance, at whose claims their successors today smile scornfully." And the prime reason for a reversal of judgment on these men and women of a hundred years ago is their artificiality. Prophets and sons of prophets are rare in these skeptical days of ours, but it needs not the powers of the seer to foretell that one hundred years from now, whatever be the judgment passed on Agnes Repplier, her honor in letters will not be denied because of a lack of sincerity.

JOHN P. MCNICHOLS, S.J.

REVIEWS

The "Incendium Amoris." By RICHARD ROLLE, of Hampole. Edited by MARGARET DEANESLY. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $3.25.

The "Incendium Amoris" or "Flame of Love" by Richard Rolle, the fourteenth-century English mystic, is generally believed to be the last of his writings. There are in existence some twenty-six manuscript versions of the "Incendium," and the present edition, which forms volume twenty-six in the Historical Series, issued under the auspices of the University of Manchester, is collated from the manuscripts.

As a guide to the interior life and a discourse upon mystical contemplation the Latin text has a value in its relation to the store of ascetical literature; and, naturally, this is the first interest it would have for priests and religious. It is, however, hardly the purpose the editor appears to have in view, which would seem to be the study of the "Incendium" as a document of equal interest with the Middle-English writings of Richard Rolle. As a volume intended for students of literary texts, rather than as a pious treatise, it may be worth while to make some consideration of the introductory matter.

It would be interesting, for instance, to learn upon what grounds the editor of this volume, in her preface, asserts that a suspicion of heresy has been attached to Rolle's works. There is, of course, no disguising the fact that the Church has had frequent occasion to submit to a rigid censorship the writings of mystics, notably in the cases of Molinos, of Madame Guyon, and also of the Port Royalists. That this suspicion, if there were such, was attached to Richard Rolle on account of his so-called denunciation of scholastic teaching, and his advocacy of an original mode of life bound by no religious vows, is a position which will require some defense on the part of Miss Deanesly. That the soul of Rolle, drawn to the life of mystical contemplation, should have felt repelled by intellectual subtleties is perfectly feasible: that he was antagonistic to scholastic teaching is as absurd as saying that he was antagonistic to Catholic theology. After all, it must be remembered that the special gift of the Catholic mystic is a gift of Divine illumination, whereby the soul, by an immediate intuition and not by a logical process, attains to knowledge of the mysteries of God. And here at once is the privilege and the danger of the mystic's vocation.

As to whether Richard Rolle ever fell under suspicion on account of his "original mode of life, bound by no religious vows," there is this to be said: The difference between the ankret, or enclosed solitary, and the hermit, who was usually free from any vows and at liberty to dwell where he chose, was clearly understood and provided for in ecclesiastical legislation. Therefore, the fact that he was a hermit and somewhat unrestricted in his movements had nothing whatever to do with his being in regular standing. For the rest, the introduction to the volume contains an interesting account of the foundation of the Abbey of Syon, with the Latin text of the Supplication of Henry V for its foundation, and the Bull of Martin V confirming the same.

H. C. W.

The Story of Yone Noguchi. Told by Himself. Illustrated by YOSHIO MARKINO. Philadelphia: George W. Jacobs & Co. $1.50.

From the Shelf. By PAXTON HOLGAR. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50.

Incense and Iconoclasm. Studies in Literature. By CHARLES LEONARD MOORE. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

Lovers of literature who long for a respite from war books and problem novels will enjoy these three volumes of essays. Mr. Noguchi's twelve papers, which are for the most part biographical in character, are the story and the proof of how perfectly this Japanese has mastered the English tongue. Indeed his "works" number four volumes, and his verses with their Oriental aroma were nearly as much discussed some years ago as Tagore's are now. Very entertaining is the author's account of his eagerness to acquire our language and of the sacrifices the conquest cost him. The Japanese teacher of English, he tells us, was quite satisfactory to the boys of Tsuchima school until the day an American missionary called and tried in vain to make the instructor understand him. Coming to San Francisco in 1893, at the age of eighteen, the author began a variegated career as dish-washer, editor, and literary vagrant. He sat for four years at Joaquin Miller's feet, read English and American poets ravenously, published his verses, and ended by becoming the literary lion of New York and London. The latter city he liked, but his admiration for our American cities, particularly for Chicago, is quite restrained. There are interesting chapters on the religious and domestic life of the Japanese, and the volume ends with an affectionate tribute to his friend Charles Warren Stoddard, who used to remind Mr. Noguchi "of the Abbé Constantin in the novel of Halévy. (What a dear book that is!)" Mr. Markino furnishes the volume with some beautiful pictures in color.

The second book is a description of what Mr. Holgar saw and experienced "From the Shelf" he made for himself on a little-known island off the southern coast of Spain. Tired of London's turmoil, he leases for a year an abandoned monastery near San Telmo, and observes what innocent and joyful lives the Catholic natives of the island lead. The book would gain by compression, for the author proses considerably about trifles, and the chapter in which he takes great credit to himself for not running off with another man's wife could well be spared. But his attitude toward the islanders is intelligent and sympathetic as he describes their local customs and sketches the characters of the men and women he met.

The three dozen short literary essays in Mr. Moore's book appeared originally in the Chicago Dial and cover a wide range of subjects. He has keen literary discernment and gives his critical verdicts boldly. He well says of the New Englanders, for instance:

> They stood shoulder to shoulder and cried each other up. Like Molière's learned ladies, they decided that no one should have any wit but themselves and their friends. Scattered over our country, they took with them wherever they went the totems of their tribe, and set them up to be worshiped by the outer barbarians.

Essays like "The Hunger Motive in Fiction," "Originality in Literature," and "The Weather in Literature" show how well-read the author is, and the paper on Bryant is a good example of his constructive criticism. That Goethe "used his liberty nobly," however, and that "Christianity has an enormous mythology of spiritual and demoniac powers" are statements that certainly need to be qualified, and Mr. Moore will doubtless be glad to learn that Mass is not "performed," but offered, said, or celebrated. W. D.

Problems of Boyhood. A Course in Ethics for Boys of High-School Age. By FRANKLIN WINSLOW JOHNSON. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. $1.00.

The Religious Education of the Child. By ROBERT R. RUSK. New York: Longmans, Green and Co. $0.50.

The Wayward Child. A Study of the Causes of Crime. By HANNAH KENT SCHOFF. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Co. $1.00.

The first two volumes smell of the lamp; they read as if written by arm-chair philosophers. With the best of motives, no doubt, Mr. Johnson has laboriously constructed a system of ethics on the basis of religious indifferentism. Religion is largely a matter of custom, he thinks; one's belief "depends in great degree upon the religious belief of his parents"; but after all, "religion is fundamentally a personal matter, and as such is not concerned with matters of creed or form of worship, but is rather a matter of personal experience." Dr. Rusk, writing of education and religion, gives no assurance that he cares to assign a definite meaning to either term. "Religion is not instinctive," he asserts, but its psychological bases "are found in instincts which are elementary," the chief of which are fear, anger, self-abasement, self-assertion, subjective and elation. Dr. Rusk also quotes with approbation, one Dr. Starbuck who, after reading Wordsworth, Keats, and Kant's "Critique of Pure Reason," discovered that religion "is not identical with any Church." Decidedly, Messrs. Johnson and Rusk have digged us useless cisterns.

It is a pleasure to recommend Mrs. Schoff's study; sane, kindly, practical and Christian, it forms one of the best books ever written on the subject of juvenile delinquency. It is based upon a questionnaire to which 2,000 answers were received from inmates in fifteen prisons; but Mrs. Schoff has also given much time to a practical study of the question in the school, the juvenile court, and other preventive and remedial agencies. She finds that the starting point of the greater part of youthful waywardness is the careless, broken or immoral home, and while not undervaluing natural means in the prevention and cure of delinquency, Mrs. Schoff clearly recognizes that the true remedy can be found only in supernatural religion.

> To put into the hearts of those who have stumbled, a living belief in God whose laws are the only safe guide, and who is always ready to help those who look to Him, is to give the true compass for right living. Only those who live what they teach can touch the hearts of others, and with the Bread of Life they must give loving-kindness, sympathy and patience.

These lines give a glimpse into a world to which modern exponents of pagan sociology are utterly blind. God alone can save His wrecked images; and only they can go down into the depths of human depravity with safety to themselves and profit to others, whose labors are prompted by the love of God. P. L. B.

A History of Philosophy. By CLEMENT C. J. WEBB. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $0.50.

The Catholic reviewer of a book like this is naturally always interested in it from his own point of view. There are larger and more comprehensive histories of philosophy; this volume of a series that is "planned to form a comprehensive library of modern knowledge, for the general reader as well as the student," is compact and condensed. It tells a clear, objective story of the currents of thought from the Greek to the modern, and the tone of the telling is calm and dispassionate. Especially well written are the chapters on Plato and Kant. With regard to our own philosophy there are some reserves. It is not so much with what is said that one must quarrel, as with what is left unsaid. The less-informed man outside the Church in search of truth, and the loyal Catholic in search of facts honorable to his Church, on reading this presentation of the world's thought, might both well come to the conclusion that here at least Catholics have done little of distinction. The chapter on Scholasticism is entitled "The Minority of Modern Europe"; and the following age, that of Luther, Bacon, Bruno, Harvey, "The Coming of Age of Europe." The inference is obvious, though the premise be dubious. Francis Bacon receives seven pages; the earlier Roger Bacon exactly the same number of lines. The Angelic Doctor wins respectful treatment, so do Anselm and Scotus, but the general impression of the layman might well be that the whole movement was exclusively a question, on the one side, of logic, on the other, of theology, with silence on all those broad questions of metaphysics and psychology that he sees tormenting the minds of thinkers earlier and later. The absence of any distinctive history of this philosophy in the bibliography at the end corresponds to, and may explain, this lack in an otherwise orderly, interesting and clearly written book. J. W. P.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Three Dedications, War Poems, Love Poems, Religious Poems, Rhymes for the Times, Miscellaneous Poems and Ballades, are the captions under which Gilbert K. Chesterton arranges the contents of his new book of "Poems" (Lane, $1.25). There is a fine swing to "Lepanto," verses which describe how "Don John of Austria is going to the war." Of the other poems in the volume the religious ones are the best. The author loves to sing of the Christmas crib, as in the lines for instance:

A Child in a foul stable,
Where the beasts feed and foam;
Only where He was homeless
Are you and I at home;
We have hands that fashion and heads that know,
But our hearts we lost—how long ago!
In a place no chart nor ship can show
Under the sky's dome.

Other verses, such as those entitled "The New Freethinker" and "A Ballade of Suicide," smack of Chesterton, the whimsical paradoxer, and will amuse the countless admirers of his prose works.

"The Duty of a Public Official," the leading article in the Queen's Work for October, is from the pen of the Hon. David I. Walsh, Governor of Massachusetts, and Father James J. Daly, S. J., tells what warm friends, both within the Fold and without, Thomas à Kempis has made. Urging young Catholics to become familiar with the great mystic's book, he writes:

> The "Imitation" is one of those pious classics with which every intelligent Catholic is supposed to be on intimate terms. It imparts depth and tone to Catholic life in every state and condition. It does not help the Church and it does not help Catholics, that so many of them remain ignorant all their lives of the simplest and most fundamental rules of advanced spiritual life. Wherever a Catholic has been conspicuous in business or the learned professions, in anything whatever, be it only social prestige, and remained a staunch Catholic, you may be sure that he carried in his pocket, if not the "Imitation," like the late Lord Chief Justice of England, Charles Russell, at least some little devotional book like it.

There is also an account of Father Dempsey's famous hotel for workingmen, some new facts about the Y. M. C. A. and an interesting account of how Protestant vacation schools are conducted. As twenty per cent of the children attending them are Catholics, Father Garesché emphasizes the importance of our starting similar schools ourselves.

Here are four dramatic works: "A Rosary of Mystery Plays" consists of fifteen plays chosen out of the York cycle and translated from Middle English by Mrs. M. S. Mooney, who has spent many years in the study of this branch of our literary history. They represent the fifteen Bible scenes of the rosary, and apart from their devotional value, for they are instinct with the simple piety of the ages of Faith, have a distinct literary value, illustrating as they do the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, an important period in the development of the language. The book is addressed to the teaching Orders of the Church and to them it will appeal both for work in the classroom and on the stage. Its price is $0.75 and $0.40, and it is to be obtained from Mrs. M. S. Mooney, 618 Clinton Ave., Albany, N. Y. ——"Red Wine of Roussillon" (Houghton, $1.25), a tragedy in blank verse, has given William Linsey an opportunity to portray with a good deal of vividness a scene from the Middle Ages, whose romantic troubadour spirit he has caught with considerable success. The story begins and ends with murder and suicide, being the triumph of elemental passion over duty and right reason, all in the name of love; but in spite of its gruesome setting it is very beautiful in parts and throbs with passion throughout.——We are now "advancing" so swiftly that the text of plays "everybody goes to see" can be bought at bookstores. "The Thief" (Doubleday, $0.75), by Henry Bernstein, is unquestionably "strong," and has a good lesson for extravagant wives and doting husbands, but there are several scenes too "realistic" for Christian theatergoers to behold.——The text of "The Arrow-Maker" (Houghton, $0.75), a play with all its characters American Indians, has been revised by Mary Austin, the author. The drama was first produced in New York four years ago.

Last fall, Mr. Arthur Machen, an English journalist, wrote for an evening paper a bit of pure fiction describing how the phantom ranks of the British archers, who fought at Crécy and Agincourt, saved the day for England at Mons. Much to the author's amazement the story was forthwith accepted as sober fact by credulous materialists. Preceded by an introduction, which is the best part of the book, "The Bowman and Other Legends of the War" (Putnam, $0.75) has now been published. They all bring in the supernatural and have a Catholic atmosphere.——"Sir Christopher Leighton, or the Marquis de Vaudreuil's Story "(Herder, $1.00) by Mrs. Maria Longworth Storer is a controversial novel which tells how the atheistic Cosmo died a believer, how the propaganda of the Harvard eugenist petered out, how persistently Sir Christopher sought the hero's life, and how Harry and Mélanie were, nevertheless, happily married at last.——"Mary, a Romance of the West Country" (Herder, $0.75) by Louise M. Stacpoole Kenny is a love story for girls.

The fall numbers of the Catholic Historical Review and of the Records of the American Catholic Historical Society have appeared. The younger quarterly opens with a very interesting papers on "Lulworth Castle: Its History and Memories." The author, C. M. Antony, tells all about the consecration of our first American Bishop and publishes two newly discovered letters bearing on the subject. Paul J. Foik, C.S.C., the Librarian of Notre Dame University, contributes an article full of fresh and important information concerning "Pioneer Efforts in Catholic Journalism in the United States (1809-1840"); Georgina Pell Curtis tells about some "Early Conversions to the Catholic Church in America (1521-1830)"; Frederick J. Zwierlein writes on the "Catholic Beginnings in the Diocese of Rochester," and the Documents, Notes and Comments, and the excellently done Book Reviews are very readable.——The Philadelphia quarterly, now in its twenty-sixth year, begins with an illustrated account of the "American Catholic Historical Society," Father H. I. Henry writes about a curious "Philadelphia Choir Book of 1778," "Prince Gallitzin's First Visit to the Allegheny Mountains" is the story of a zealous missionary enterprise, Martin I. J. Griffin continues the "Life of Bishop Conwell," and "Father Peter Helbron's Greensburg, Pa., Register" is published. The Church in America is fortunate to have such good historical quarterlies as these two.

The following are recently published books for children: "Kisington Town" (Houghton, $1.25) was being besieged by Red Rex, but young Harold, armed only with a few volumes of diverting tales, made his way to the king's camp, and read him into sparing the city and making peace. Abbie Farwell Brown, the pacifistic author, has written the interesting stories that Harold told.—— In his amusing "Scissors Book" (Putnam, $1.00) William Ludlum has supplied little ones with numerous patterns for cut-out figures, and writes an appropriate verse for each model. It is a book which the smaller children are sure to find absorbingly interesting.——"The Puppet Princess, or the Heart That Squeaked" (Houghton, ($0.50) is an easily acted and arranged Christmas play which Augusta Stevenson has written for children.——"Nannette Goes to Visit Her Grandmother" (Houghton, $0.50) is Josephine Scribner Gate's story of the adventures a very remarkable doll had with "Periwinkle" and other amiable pets. The half-dozen colored pictures in the little book are delicious.——Another volume that will delight small children is Sarah Sanderson Vanderbilt's "Who's Who in the Land of Nod" (Houghton, $1.00). Little Sandy has explored that amazing country thoroughly, and for the benefit of other boys and girls has made a map of the region and describes all the well-known characters he met there. Old-fashioned parents who do not consider Mother Goose "unethical" can test with this book the children's knowledge of that nursery classic. Ruby Winckler's pictures are real illustrations.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Gabriel Beauchesne, Paris:
Le Livre de la Consolation. Par Dom Hebrard, O.S.B. 2 fr. 75; La Psychologie de la Conversion. Par le P. Th. Mainage, O.P. 4 fr.; Dieu: son Existence et sa Nature. Par P. Fr. R. Garrigou-Lagrange. 10 fr.; L'Intérêt de la France et l'Intégrité de l'Autriche-Hongrie, 2 fr. 50.

Benziger Bros., New York:
Meditations on The Passion of Our Lord. By the Rt. Rev. Joseph Oswald Smith, O.S.B., Abbot of Appleforth. $0.70; Summa Theologica of St. Thomas Aquinas. Part II (First Part). Literally Translated by Fathers of the English Dominican Province. Third Number (qq. xc-cxiv). $2.00.

The Bobbs-Merrill Co., Indianapolis:
God's Man. By George Bronson-Howard. $1.40.

Columbia University Press, New York:
Hellenic Civilization. Edited by G. W. Botsford and E. G. Sihler.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
Bernal Diaz del Castillo. Being Some Account of Him, Taken from His True History of the Conquest of New Spain. By R. B. Cunninghame Graham. $2.00; Recollections of an Irish Judge: Press, Bar and Parliament. By M. M. D. Bodkin, K.C. $3.00.

Doubleday, Page & Co., New York:
The Co-Citizens. By Cora Harris. $1.00; Jerusalem, a Novel. By Selma Lagerlof. Translated from the Swedish by Velma Swenston Howard. $1.35; The Riddle of the Night. By Thomas W. Hanshew. $1.25.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
Eve Dorre, The Story of Her Precarious Youth. By Emily Vielè Strother. $1.35; The Belgian Cook-Book. Edited by Mrs. Brian Luck. $1.00; The Loneliness of Christ. Studies in the Discipline of Life. By Robert Keable. $0.75; The Irish Abroad, a Record of the Achievements of Wanderers from Ireland. By Elliot O'Donnell. $2.50.

Gibson & Perin Co., Cincinnati:
The Black and White Book. Pictures and Rhymes by Charlotte Vimont Arnold. $0.50.

Laurence J. Gomme, New York:
Notes on Religion. By John Jay Chapman. $0.75; The Social Principle. By Horace Holley. $0.75.

Harper & Bros., New York:
Dreams and Dust. Poems by Don Marquis. $1.20.

B. Herder, St. Louis:
Sir Christopher Leighton, or the Marquis de Vaudreuil's Story. By Maria Longworth Storer. $1.00. Mary, A Romance of West County. By Louise M. Stacpoole Kenny. $0.75; The Lord My Light. By Joseph Rickaby, S.J. $2.00; The Little Imperfections. Translated from the French by Rev. Frederic P. Garesché, S.J. Second Edition. $0.60.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
Lotta Embury's Career. By Elia W. Peattie. $1.00; The Case of American Drama. By Thomas H. Dickinson. $1.50; Afternoons of April, a Book of Verse. By Grace Hazard Conkling; The Quiet Hour. Selected and Arranged by Fitz Roy Carrington. $0.75; The Greatest of Literary Problems, the Authorship of the Shakespeare Works. An Exposition of All Points at Issue from Their Inception to the Present Moment. By James Phinney Baxter. $5.00.

Imprimerie Du Messenger, Montreal:
Les Retraites Fermées. By Joseph Papin Archambault, S.J. $0.25.

P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York:
The Burden of Honor. By Christine Faber. $0.75.

The J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia:
The Little Iliad. By Maurice Hewlett. $1.35; Peg Along. By Dr. George L. Walton. $1.00.

The Open Court Publishing Co., Chicago:
A Budget of Parodoxes. Two Volumes. By Augustus de Morgan, F.R.A.S., C.P.S., Second Edition. Edited by David Eugene Smith. $3.50.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
War and Christianity from the Russian Point of View. By Vladimir Solovyof. With an Introduction by Stephen Graham. $1.50; The Bowmen and Other Legends of the War. By Arthur Machen. $0.75; The Aims and Defects of College Education. An Original Investigation by Foster Partridge Boswell, Ph.D. $0.80; Old Roads from the Heart of New York. By Sarah Comstock. $2.50.

Peter Reilly, Philadelphia:
Lessons in Scholastic Philosophy. By Michael W. Shallo, S.J.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
The One I Knew the Best of All. By Frances Hodgson Burnett. $1.25; Constantinople Old and New. By H. G. Dwight. $5.00.

The Frederick A. Stokes Co., New York:
Serbia, Her People, History and Aspirations. By Woislav M. Petrovitch. $1.50; The American Country Girl. By Martha Foote Crow. $1.50; Russian Fairy Tales, from the Skazki of Polevio. By R. Nisbet Bain. $2.50; Hero Tales and Legends of the Serbians. By Woislav M. Petrovitch. With a Preface by Chedo Miyatovitch. $3.00.

University of Pennsylvania Press, Philadelphia:
Sumerian Epic of Paradise, the Flood and the Fall of Man. By Stephen Langdon.

Yale University Press, New Haven, Conn.:
The Liberty of Citizenship. By Hon. Samuel W. McCall. $1.15; A Voice from the Crowd. By Geo. Wharton Pepper. $1.50.

EDUCATION

The True College Spirit

THE seeds of tomorrow's convictions and beliefs are being flung broadcast today in the lecture-halls and class-rooms of our colleges. The youths who, in a few years, will enjoy manhood's privileges and front its responsibilities, are now in the crucible of college life, in the chapel, the class-room, the social and literary club, on the cinder-path, the gridiron, the athletic field. If the principles of this future generation are to be correct and its mental and moral fiber hardened to the strains it must bear, the college spirit must be absolutely sound.

The college spirit is a fact in our educational life. Masters and pupils constantly reacting upon one another, are the main factors in its formation. It is the convergence of many a small and, as yet, dimly-outlined affluent into a larger and more clearly marked stream. It is the resultant of the college surroundings, of the traditions and ideals which dominate the college. It is the genius loci, the atmosphere pervading campus and class-rooms, the momentum and direction given to faculty and students, the lasting influence exerted upon their lives. That spirit should be as a breath of invigorating wind blown from some serene mountain crest or from the untainted sea, not a sickening breeze laden with miasmas from marsh or fen and weighing down body and soul with unhealthful languors.

THE SPURIOUS SPIRIT

A spurious college spirit lays an undue stress on the social, physical and material elements of college life. Though not indifferent to these, the genuine spirit yields the primacy to the spiritual and the intellectual, the soul and the intellect. "College spirit" does not always recall to the casual reader, the most pleasant images and associations. In the eyes of many, it has unfortunately been too often identified with the unseemly pranks of Freshmen and Sophomores, the rough-and-tumble hustling of the "gym-rush," and "cannon-rush," where limbs have been broken and lives lost. The boisterous parade and carousal after a victory on the diamond or the gridiron, the rowdyism culminating in window-breaking, "sign-swiping," and still grosser insults to law and decency, have sometimes been mistaken for the real college spirit and have brought it into disrepute. On this subject, Chancellor David Starr Jordan writes a few plain and pungent words:

> It does not enhance the reputation of one of our great universities that the papers are full of the hair-cutting scrapes of her freshmen and sophomores. It adds nothing to the glory of another institution of honored name that her sophomores break up the freshmen dance. . . . . It is not to the credit of any institution that . . . . . anonymous insults, inane or obscene, are circulated on its campus. Stealing ice cream is very much like ordinary stealing, and rowdyism in all its forms makes the development of honest college spirit hopeless.

Such abuses are gradually disappearing. Such a counterfeit article has never been to any appreciable extent introduced, much less tolerated in our Catholic colleges. In them, "college spirit" stands for better things.

THE GENUINE SPIRIT

The true college spirit, embodied in teachers imbued with the highest ideals, and kindling the same sacred fire in the pupils, must accomplish two definite results. It must implant in the mind and heart of the boy an infallible instinct for truth and virtue, and beget in him the chivalrous vow of a life-long practical loyalty to these ideals, actualized in pre-eminence of service. If on the coat of arms, which every young man may choose on graduation day, such ideals were writ as practical standards of conduct, what a power for good would they not become.

Addressing the Association of American Alumnæ at Radcliffe College, William James once said: "The best claim that a college education can possibly make on your respect, the best thing it can aspire to accomplish for you is this: That it should help you to know a good man when you see him." That is a fair standard, one perhaps not easily attained. For the good man is often unrecognized and ignored, while the flashy man, even though his principles be dangerous and his morals corrupt, frequently wins the plaudits of the crowd. But valuable as the faculty of discerning a good man may be, the instinct for the unerring principles of truth and virtue, the power of testing truly the current opinions of the day is even more valuable. The true college spirit is the flame of a generous enthusiasm for whatever is good and true, whatever is of fair repute, whatever is just and pure. So deeply should this ideal sink into the student's mind that on leaving his Alma Mater he would carry with him a sure and permanent test of the schools of thought, the standards of conduct and life he sees around him. Trained in no wavering system of philosophy, but in ethical principles as fixed and changeless as the very nature of man, and in the truths of Revelation, the young man imbued with the right college spirit can assay at its real worth the spurious currency of popular doctrines and fads. He will immediately recognize the genuine coin and reject the counterfeit.

Such a spirit breathing in a generation of ardent young souls is an incalculable power for good. For the battle is ever to the young. "Old men for counsel," says Bacon, "young men for action." In the struggles of life, the older and the wiser direct; the younger and sturdier must stand on the firing line.

EFFICIENT AND PRODUCTIVE LOYALTY

And so, the college spirit is incomplete if it does not give birth in the graduates of yesterday to an efficient and practical loyalty to ideals. The "efficiency expert" is prowling about today. Let him knock at the homes and offices and clubs of our college men, and while generously recognizing their good work, point out their shortcomings, their wasted powers and energies, rouse them from their indifference, summon them to wider religious, social, literary and educational activities. Surely, the college spirit of graduates from Catholic colleges is not sufficiently or adequately manifested in the bubbling enthusiasm of alumni celebrations, by the wearing of the college colors on a field-day, by facile eloquence and flow of wit at the alumni banquet, not even by generous contributions to the material upbuilding of the old college home. These manifestations of the college spirit are necessary, sound and praiseworthy, but there is a nobler sign of college spirit.

PRINCIPLES APPLIED TO LIFE

In a study of English and American schools in the New York Times, September 26, Mr. Clayton Sedgwick Cooper says that the English school boy is better equipped with facts; that the young American of the same type knows fewer facts, but can fit them better to the needs and requirements of modern life. This pressure on principles, on men, on policies and events, on religious, civic and social life is the highest manifestation of the genuine college spirit. If exerted by noble characters and sane thinkers it becomes a paramount factor in a nation's history. Englishmen, it is claimed, can tell almost at sight a Harrow, a Rugby or a Westminster boy. These carry their "brand" about them. They stand for something definite and tangible in English life. They are the center of distinct ideals and energies; they have left a family-stamped impress on the annals of the nation. The graduates of our colleges must not keep unused powers of heart and head that were developed to give us "Captains Courageous" wherever the battle between truth and error, light and darkness, God and the devil is waged. The call for the Catholic college man has sounded. He must not be deaf to the summons.

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

Another Fairy Tale

THE speaker on the platform triumphantly summarized her statements.

> Each of us can play her part in creating the tremendous force of public opinion in favor of woman's suffrage. The public opinion of a nation can always be molded by its women. The national morals and the standard of morality are firm or shifting just as the morals and standard of morality are firm or shifting among its women. Woman, by her strong but silent power, can bring to reality any reform she may wish. United, the women of a country are its strongest moral force. And all this mighty power we now direct to securing equal suffrage. Suffrage is only a matter of days.

There was a polite pattering of applause, and the speaker joined the ladies of her audience. Slowly and leisurely, the ladies rose to their feet, drew their wraps about them, gave their hats a localizing jerk, swung their bags in their left hands, and with an amiable chatter left the assembly room. Matrons all, there was not one among them but knew the truth of the speaker's tribute to their power. The morals of her home were the product of her making, and the morals of her home were ultimately a constituent atom of the morals of the Nation. Nothing could be tolerated in her home to which she did not give her sanction. In the dusk shadows beyond the light and warmth of the family gas logs, strange things might be done and said; but if done and said without the sanction of her imperial condescension, they were furtive, skulking things, banned from the society of the respectable. Men judged that right which she approved; feared as wrong what brought a frown to her brow. Public opinion was truly in her hands to make or remake as she chose.

Full of the consciousness of her power, Mrs. Ay entered her favorite bookseller's. The door-boy tripped in his hurry to admit her. The clerks in mass formation hastened to serve her. The bookkeepers, in their cages above, reached for new bill-heads. The manager, far back in his sanctum, smiled a distant though welcoming smile. Was she not their best and most frequent patron? Verily.

"Something fresh and clever to while away a leisurely morning."

The books leaped forth from the shelves to greet her, marshalling themselves in trim battalions, their golden letters shining like the insignia of a chief of staff.

"Here is something exceptionally bright and clever," said Clerk Number One, pulling forth from the ranks a dainty leather-bound vial of poison.

Mrs. Ay's gloved fingers skimmed the pages lightly, and then with a gesture of abhorrence, dropped the volume to the floor. Had you seen her look, you might have fancied she had handled a serpent. "It's vile!" she cried, drawing herself up indignantly and catching her skirts from the possibility of contact; "an insult to decent womanhood. And a woman has written it, too! How dare you offer me such a book? Be good enough to send me my balanced account. I shall go in future to a book-shop where respectable womanhood is not slapped in the face."

With that she withdrew; but that subtle power of woman's influence remained behind.

THE RESULT

Three clerks stumbled madly back to the manager; the manager tore patches of hair from his already scant thatching, and ordered the offending book removed from his shelves. Far off in the East, the directors of a publishing house received orders to send no more of a certain "best seller," and the publishers in panic shut the power off the presses, while one unblushing authoress gnawed her pen down to the point, and was forced to take in washing. For Mrs. Ay held public opinion in her grasp and Mrs. Ay had acted.

Ah, but does she always so?

MRS. BEE AND THE THEATER

Full of the consciousness of her power, Mrs. Bee decided to spend her afternoon at the matinée. Her dainty town car grazed the curb in front of the "Follies," and Mrs. Bee alighted. The man behind the brass bars sprained his muscles as he bowed his welcome; the head usher overlooked three men who held their tickets hopefully before his eyes, and scanned her bit of pasteboard. The matron in the dressing-room showed actual signs of vitality as she took Mrs Bee's hat, while behind the scenes, the stage manager told his company to play their hardest. For was not she their best and most frequent patron? Verily.

Through two acts Mrs. Bee sat, with dawning sunrise in her cheeks and gathering storm-clouds on her brow. And then in the midst of a dashing song with chorus effects, she gathered her belongings about her and tilting her chin to a perilous angle passed down the main aisle. The head usher saw her on his horizon, but fell like a blasted pine beneath the lightning of her glance. The matron's hopeful glance grew apprehensive as Mrs. Bee held out a silent hand for her hat. The man in the box-office was frozen tightly to the bars by a chance contact as she passed. It was the manager who overhauled her ere she reached her car.

"Madame does not care for the 'Follies' ?" he queried, with syrup in his mouth and ice gathering on his eyebrows.

Mrs. Bee's eyes looked down at him from her place among the clouds.

"It is a subject no woman cares to discuss," she said. "But I will say just this: Your play is a disgrace. It is a frank exploitation of womanhood in the interests of base passion. Its songs and jokes I could only interpret in the light of the smirking enjoyment of a leering clubman, two places from mine. I shall take care that no woman of my acquaintance sees her sex insulted as I have seen mine. My patronage of your theater is at an end."

With that she entered her car; but that subtle power of woman's influence remained behind.

For the manager rushed back to the stage director; the stage director telephoned madly for additional costumes; the comedians worked till the weary hours over new and unequivocal jests. Far in the East, a producing company registered tearfully one expensive failure in their books, while one unpromising author hesitated between carbolic acid and selling patent flatirons. For Mrs. Bee held public opinion in her grasp, and Mrs. Bee had acted.

Ah, but does she so always?

MRS. CEY AND THE MODISTE

Full of the consciousnes of her power, Mrs. Cey consulted her engagement book and noted a date with her modiste. The saleswomen dropped their air of ennui and thrust anxiously propping fingers into their coiffure, seamstresses back in the shop felt the electric thrill of her presence, and needles darted with new vigor. And Madame herself, from the cryptic recesses of her office sailed forth, all canvas flung to the breeze and welcome flags floating from every mast. For was not Mrs. Cey their best and most frequent patron? Verily.

"An evening gown, Madame. Something in the mode with a tang of Paris about it."

Madame waved her hand, and attendant sprites bore forth bolts and boxes, numerous but not weighty, to lay at the lady's feet. With deft fingers she held aloft a tiny web of translucent silk, a dash of creamy lace, a handful of brilliants and a pictured model.

"My lady's gown!" she cried with artistic ecstasy; "a triumph of skill; a breath of Paris and a dream of Worth!"

"That?" came the astonished query. "Is that a gown or a kerchief"?

"A gown, madame, quite of the latest mode."

Mrs. Cey rose from the entoiling mass of finery like Juno rising from a quarrelsome council of the gods.

"Madame," she said, "I see I must transfer my custom elsewhere. I am not flattered at the implication that I am a woman of the streets or a lineal descendant of Roman matrons whose garments did not veil but allure. Your fashions are an insult to my womanhood, a temptation to the men whom I must protect from themselves. Kindly mail me my account."

With that she sailed forth, spurning the earth beneath her wrathful heel; but that subtle power of woman's influence remained behind.

For Madame tore the pictured model into tiny shreds, countermanded her order for a new twin six and moved into a small uptown apartment; while a score of salesladies and seamstresses twirled idle thumbs or took to washing dishes in restaurants. Far off in Europe, a firm of designers sent out a panic call for St. Bernard dogs as an avalanche of indignant protests from frantic costumers the world over, slid down upon them.

For Mrs. Cey held public opinion in her grasp, and Mrs. Cey had acted.

Ah, but does she always so?

And so the strengthened consciousness of power directed for a moment from the cause of suffrage had banned a poisonous novel, stopped a licentious play and tabooed an immodest fashion. The mighty power for molding public opinion was turned from suffrage to a much neglected channel, the morals of the Nation.

Don't you wish, good reader, that 'twere always thus?

DANIEL A. LORD, S. J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Socialists are not opposed to religion; they merely delight in the publication of innocent pleasantries such as the present, culled from the Call for October 3, 1915:

> Religion, church religion, which caused and causes so much misfortune to humanity, in former centuries more, but enough even nowadays, is another obstacle and barrier to Socialism and Internationalism. Enough it is to mention that it would not be so very hard to get rid of the churches. In the Catholic land of France we witnessed a couple of times, during the great French Revolution, and then later again, the confiscation by the State of the property of the Church, the main source of power of the Church.

The insinuation that the same might be accomplished much more readily in our own Country is too plain to call for explanation. The battle against organized Christianity is.

covertly or openly, carried on persistently by the entire Socialist press.

On October 7. Georgetown College sustained a severe loss by the sudden death of the Reverend John Conway, for many years professor of philosophy in that venerable institution. Born in Scotland, he became a Jesuit early in life and after a brilliant course of studies in America, went to Europe for further training at the Gregorian University, Rome, and at Innsbruck, Austria. On his return to the United States he taught in Woodstock College, Maryland, going thence first to Holy Cross, Worcester, and then to Georgetown, where he spent many fruitful years. Georgetown men will remember him for his eloquence and keenness of intellect, while many of our Catholic educators throughout the country will recall with gratitude his labors in behalf of the Catholic Education Association.

A writer signing himself Benno Lewinson asks, in the New York Sun, why, since European educational ideas are so popular in our country, we do not likewise conform ourselves to that other Continental practice of making the parents of pupils in the secondary and high schools pay for the education given their children:

> It may be ungracious for a beneficiary of a free college education to raise that question, but is it not, after all, the fairest and simplest solution of our crying financial problem to insist that, at least under present conditions, free education be limited to the public primary and grammar schools?

The question is certainly pertinent.

It is interesting to note the latest development of the minimum wage propaganda. The following regulations are to be in force in Massachusetts after January 1, 1916, as announced by the Minimum Wage Commission of that State:

> The wages of women 18 years of age and over, who have been employed for at least one year in department stores in this State, must be not less than $8.50. Learners who have reached the age of 18 years shall receive not less than $7 a week. The minimum wage for girls of 17 shall be $6 a week, while for younger employees the minimum shall be $5.

The Commission is empowered to note and publish, in at least four newspapers in each county, the names of all employers disobeying the decree, with the statement of the minimum wage paid by such employers.

The World's Work for October endeavors to draw up the military balance sheet in Europe. We republish therefrom the table of losses sustained by the belligerents from August 1, 1914; to August 17, 1915. German casualty lists, it is noted, contain the names of all killed, wounded or missing. England is the only other nation that publishes casualty lists. In the other cases the estimates are "based on the known casualties suffered by particular organizations, numbers of dead counted after engagements, and numbers of wounded transported to the rear. None of these estimates can be exact, but they will be found in all probability to fit the actual numbers closely when these become known."

	Total Casualties	Killed or Permanently Incapacitated	Prisoners
Germany	2,100,000	420,000	150,000
Austria	1,750,000	350,000	300,000
Turkey	250,000	50,000	40,000
Russia	5,000,000	1,000,000	2,000,000
France	1,800,000	360,000	275,000
England	400,000	80,000	25,000
Italy	200,000	40,000	5,000
Servia	200,000	40,000	20,000
Belgium	150,000	30,000	30,000

Such is the holocaust the war is thought to have exacted in the course of little more than one year. According to the World's Work, Germany alone appears unimpaired in so far as personnel is concerned. Its number of killed, permanently incapacitated and imprisoned, who alone are to be deducted, amount to 570,000, while its normal annual contingent, i. e., men fit for service, is 600,000. "The estimates show that the losses in killed and prisoners, in proportion to the annual contingent of available males, fall most heavily on France, next on Russia, then on Austria." Russia's annual contingent is 1,735,221; that of France, 250,000; and that of Austria, 530,000.

It is impossible to form any adequate conception of the cost of the present war by merely counting the number of figures contained in the periodic war loans. They can only bewilder the mind. It is necessary to have recourse to illustration. This has been cleverly done by a series of comparisons. Thus cable dispatches affirm, probably with some exaggeration, that the war is daily costing Great Britain alone $25,000,000. At this rate the money expended in the erection of the world's highest building, in New York, $13,500,000, would enable England to engage in the war for about thirteen hours. The annual budget of New York City itself, amounting for the year 1914 to $190,495,551, would afford the possibility of continuing the conflict for a little over one week more, and the enormous cost of the entire subway in the same city, $330,000,000, would prolong the struggle for not quite another two weeks. If the thought of the nations oppressed by these mountainous debts is depressing, war loan heaped upon war loan, like Ossa piled upon Pelion, there is possibly likewise a hopeful view to be taken. May not "the high cost of warring" finally help most effectively to bring it to an end?

A notable anniversary celebration recently took place at the Mission House of the Fathers of the Divine Word, Techny, Ill. All who are cognizant of the labors of this Society have learned to appreciate the zeal which inspires its members. Never perhaps was there more need than now of a missionary congregation such as this. Just forty years ago, on the feast of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin, Father Arnold Janssen was moved by the grace of God to plant the tiny mustard seed which already has grown into a mighty tree, giving shelter to countless souls from among many nations. On September 8, 1875, urged by zeal for the conversion of the heathen to the Faith, he opened the first little mission seminary at Steyl, in Holland. God gave the increase. Houses of study are at present established by his Society in Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, and South and North America. Its candidates for the priesthood number 1,300; and for the missionary brotherhood about 250. There are 800 priests and about the same number of Brothers. The Society has missions in China, Japan, West Africa, Australia, the Philippine Islands, the Sunda Islands and in North and South America.

> The number of heathen baptized in the last forty years is over 300,000. 25,000 children are educated in the schools maintained by the Society in different parts of the world. 400,000 Catholics receive pastoral care by members of the Society, especially in South America.

The literary labor accomplished by the Society in the interest of the foreign missions has been very extensive. The Mission House at Techny has proved itself extraordinarily active in this field. Its last successful venture is the bright and interesting Little Missionary, intended to spread the missionary spirit among Catholic boys and girls. Eighty students have so far been enrolled in the classical course at Techny and sixteen at the Society's Sacred Heart Mission House, Girard, Pa. "The most Divine of all Divine things is to cooperate with God in the salvation of souls," is the truth the Society seeks to impress upon the Catholic world.

This is an Ameba, one of the Parasites found in Pyorrhea (Riggs Disease) Magnified 2500 Diameters.

Thousands Have Pyorrhea

(Riggs Disease)

and Don't Know It Till Their Teeth Have to be Pulled

Symptoms that may be Pyorrhea: Bleeding gums after brushing; loose teeth; receding, tender, inflamed or sore gums.

PYORRHEA may attack anyone, even children. It develops in your gums without ache, pain or warning.

Sozodont now contains Emetine, that new beneficent discovery, used by the science of dentistry in the treatment of Pyorrhea. Therefore Sozodont not only cleans, whitens, polishes, cools and freshens your teeth as it has done for 64 years, but Sozodont now Fights Pyorrhea.

Start your whole family on Sozodont today. Send 4c for a generous 10-day sample of Sozodont paste, powder or liquid (state which), and feel again that pure, vigorous, "arctic" sensation on your gums and teeth—which only Sozodont can give.

HALL & RUCKEL
216 Washington Street New York

SOZODONT

Paste, Powder or Liquid, 25c.

Each contains Emetine

ALTAR WINES

From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.

"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.

"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency

BARNSTON TEA CO.
6 Barclay Street New York

WILSON Rolling PARTITIONS

Make Church Rooms Fit the Occasion

Transform large auditorium into several separate small rooms and back into one large room in the simplest and most effectual way and as quickly as desired. Most economical and satisfactory utilization of floor space yet devised.

Fitted to New or Old Buildings

Over 30,000 in use in Churches, Schools and Public Buildings; very durable, easily operated, sound proof. Roll overhead or at side, with or without Blackboard surface. Send for "Partition Catalogue A"

SOMETHING FOR EVERY BUILDING
The J.G.WILSON CORPORATION, 8 W. 40th St., New York. · Also Venetian Blinds, Rolling Steel Shutters, Etc

THE VATICAN
ITS HISTORY .·. ITS TREASURES

A TRUE ARISTOCRAT FOR LIBRARIES OF CLASS

THE LETTERS & ARTS PUBLISHING CO., Inc.
One West 34th Street, New York

Companion to Catholic Lady

Catholic lady wishes to be companion to Catholic lady. Highest references. Address Box 283, Mayville, New York.

FOR SALE, A FIRST CLASS VIOLIN

Made by W. E. Hill & Sons, London. Its workmanship is carried out with great delicacy and its melodious tones and flow of notes will ever be a pride to the owner. The decorated bow is gold-finished and is in every respect equal to the instrument.
Price: Violin $200.00; bow $75.00; Complete $275.00.
Address Advertising Department, REVISTA CATHOLICA, Las Vegas, New Mexico.

Let your new Church Organ have the benefit of Esteycraft —the highest type of skill and experience in organ building.

Plans and Specifications on request.

Estey Organ Company
Brattleboro Vermont

HIGGINS'

Drawing Inks Eternal Writing Ink
Engrossing Ink Taurine Mucilage
Photo Mounter Paste Liquid Paste
Drawing Board Paste Office Paste
Vegetable Glue, Etc.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives

FOR SCHOOL, HOME AND BUSINESS USE

Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the Higgins' Inks and Adhesives. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.
271 Ninth St., Brooklyn, N. Y.
Branches - Chicago - London

Copyright Joseph Sibbel Studio

IV STATION

This set is modeled especially for Chapels, the size is 13 by 21 inches and the figures are 10 inches high, Will send photo on request,

JOSEPH SIBBEL STUDIO
(Established 1881)
214 East 26th Street, New York City

Religious Sculpture in marble, stone, bronze and composition.

To Teachers

Are you looking for a Text-Book of the highest efficiency that will prove an important adjunct in class life?

A rapidly increasing number of our Colleges and Schools, all over the country, are using AMERICA as supplementary reading in connection with their various courses.

One large college used last year more than ONE HUNDRED COPIES EACH WEEK.

Its carefully-written pages and well-developed thought, the breadth of its articles, the timeliness of its editorials, and the clear-cut division of the Review, render it a valuable asset in forming the pupils' minds upon the great questions of the day. To the Professor of Ethics, Oratory, Political Economy, Sociology, Pedagogy, Literature, Composition, History, Apologetics and kindred branches it affords an excellent store of illustration.

Precisely because AMERICA gives an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life, is the reason why we want the NATIONAL CATHOLIC WEEKLY in the hands of every Catholic student in the Universities, Colleges and High Schools of the country, as a means to clarify and extend the teaching of the classroom. To aid in this work we have made.

A Special Educational Rate

Applicable only to Catholic Teachers and Catholic Students in Catholic Schools

Send at once for the circular that will explain in detail the comprehensive viewpoint and importance to both teacher and student of this most attractive and advantageous program.

Let us hear from you to-day so that no further issue of the National Catholic Weekly Review may be lost to your class. Begin immediately so that besides instructing them through the pages of AMERICA you may introduce them to the most universally quoted Catholic paper in the English Language and have the reflex benefits of its use in the School felt in the Home.

Hundreds of Teachers and thousands of Pupils are being helped and inspired by its pages, which give a weekly record of Catholic achievement and a defence of Catholic doctrine built up by skilful hands in every region of the globe; an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life; removing traditional prejudice, refuting erroneous news and correcting misstatements about Catholic beliefs and practices.

Write for details.

CIRCULATION BUREAU

The America Press

59 East 83d Street

New York, N. Y.

ANY 3 FOR $1.00

ALL 6 FOR $1.50

You can't neglect this opportunity to secure a most attractive group of volumes combining pleasure, profit and instruction.

SOCIALISM

A volume of ten excellent essays by foremost Catholic writers. All written in a concise and popular style.
280 Pages Price 50 cents

LORETTO

Annals of the pioneer Congregation of American Sisters of Charity.
A Book of Historical Interest.
By ANNA C. MINOGUE
300 Pages 21 Illustrations
Price 50 cents

THE NAMES OF GOD

and Meditative Summaries of the Divine Perfection
By the
Ven. LEONARD LESSIUS, S.J.
Translated by T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.
248 pages, large type, with portrait
Price 50 cents

LIFE AND LETTERS OF

HENRY VAN RENSSELAER

Priest of the Society of Jesus
By EDWARD P. SPILLANE, S.J.
An illustrated volume of 350 pages
Price 75 cents

ISAAC JOGUES

DISCOVERER OF LAKE GEORGE
By T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.
55 Pages 9 Illustrations
Price 25 cents

LIFE OF

Venerable Philippine Duchesne

Founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, and one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.
Price 25 cents POSTAGE EXTRA

THE AMERICA PRESS,
59 East 83d Street, New York

FOR TEN CENTS

These three important pamphlets sent to any address

HOLY COMMUNION FOR CHILDREN

THE END JUSTIFIES THE MEANS

THE CATHOLIC WORKING GIRL

ALL THREE FOR TEN CENTS

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street NEW YORK

FOUR SPLENDID VOLUMES

Dealing with American History

For $6.00 Postage Extra

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold

Pioneer Laymen of North America

Telling the fascinating story of the adventurous Cartier, Menendez, Champlain, De La Tour, Maisonneuve, Le Moyne and Radisson.

One of the most picturesque and fascinating periods in American history, that of the exploits of the French in Canada is the foundation of the first volume "Pioneer Laymen of North America."—New York Sun.

Father Campbell has done a noted service to history and to the Church.—The Monitor.

The volume abounds in variety.—Tablet (Brooklyn).

Father Campbell has given to the public one of the most valuable books of his prolific career.—Catholic Columbian.

It is both historic and romantic.—Catholic Universe.

Father Campbell is to be congratulated for his timely work.—Tidings.

300 Pages. 16 Illustrations. Price $1.75. Postage extra.

Among the Iroquois

Volume I

An Interesting Story of the Missionaries among the Iroquois.

Father Campbell's book is one of permanent interest and value.—Evening Post (New York.)

Interesting to Protestants and Catholics alike for its historical value.—Star (Atlanta.)

333 Pages. 27 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

Among the Hurons

Volume II

Tells the Heroic Story of De Brebeuf and His Associates.

It is a story of which the Church and the Order may well feel proud.—Sun (New York.)

480 Pages. 24 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

Among the Algonquins

Volume III

The Ethnic Group that figured more extensively in Our History than any other Indian Family.

The noble history of those old French priests is excellently told by their modern confrère, and it is a history with which every intelligent American Catholic should become familiar.—Catholic Historical Review.

336 Pages. 22 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street
New York

Catholic Reader's Guide

Introduction to Catholic Reading.

A Classified, Suggestive List of Select Catholic Publications

By J. HAVENS RICHARDS, S.J.

This list suggests the best works available in the surprisingly large store of Catholic literature. It is of special use to spiritual directors, teachers, parents, and librarians in encouraging those under their charge to develop a taste for profitable reading.

Ten Cents a Copy, Postage Extra

THE AMERICA PRESS
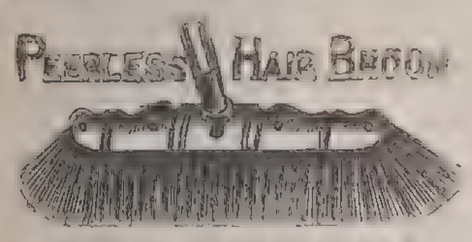
59 East 83d Street
New York

The Coward Shoe
"REG. U. S. PAT. OFF."

It Pays to be Foot-wise

A great deal of your personal efficiency depends upon your health and peace of mind. The condition of your feet has much to do with this.



Why not wear Coward Shoes? They put your feet on a good working basis and help to make life worth living.

For Men, Women and Children

Sold Nowhere Else

James S. Coward
264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(Near Warren Street)
Mail Orders Filled Send for Catalog

Everything in Brushes

E. J. KELLY
127 Reade St., New York, N. Y.

Reverend Superiors of Charitable and Educational Institutions can SAVE MONEY on purchases of Groceries, Teas, Coffees, Canned Goods and Laundry Supplies by dealing with

MARTIN C. DYER
College, Convent, Institution and Hospital Representative of
AUSTIN, NICHOLS & CO., Inc.
New York Sales Office, 100 Hudson St.
Cor. Franklin and Leonard Sts., New York, N. Y.

THIS FENCE CAN'T BE CLIMBED

KEEPS mischievous boys out. Prevents deliberate stealing. Fully protects out of way parts of your property.

Wire so close mesh keeps even small chickens and animals either in or out.

Enduring, moderate in cost. Send for catalog and prices.

ENTERPRISE IRON WORKS
2450 Yandes Street, Indianapolis, Ind.

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3.50 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.
437 Fifth Avenue
New York

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

For Non-Contagious Medical Cases

St. Mary's Hill

For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequalled musical quality.
89 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal. Memorials.

The Catholic School

Religious Instruction and the Public School
Three Masses on All Souls'

The opinion, formally stated, of Mr. William D. Guthrie, one of the foremost constitutional lawyers of the day, on the Catholic School is given in the October 8 issue of the CATHOLIC MIND. Followed by Father Blakely's discussion of the absence of religious instruction from the public school, it makes a forceful defense of the Catholic position on the education question. The Pope's decree in regard to the new privilege priests have of saying three Masses on All Souls' Day, with the prayers to be said at each Mass, is also to be found in this number of the CATHOLIC MIND.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

5 Cents Each
40 Cents a Dozen

Published at a nominal price, on the eighth and twenty-second of the month, the CATHOLIC MIND pamphlets supply to the militant Catholic the most effective weapons with which to meet the threatening issues of the day. There are several important articles on some current question in each number. In handy form these tracts for the times can be kept for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

5 Cents Each
40 Cents a Dozen

Since June, 1914, 200,000 Copies of the CATHOLIC MIND have been circulated. We want you to help us to double that number before another year passes.

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

10. Plain Words of Socialism. C. S. Devas, M.A.
18. Mr. Birrell's University Bill
19. Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. Wilfrid Ward

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.

1910

4, 5, 6, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Halley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children.
18. The XXI Eucharistic Congress. Edward Spillane, S.J.
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. Joseph Husslein, S.J.
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. Henry J. Swift, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific. II, III. Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M. Bishop of Christ Church
17. The People's Popa. M. Kenny, S.J.
24. Father Algué's Barocyclonometer. New York Tribune, Dec., 1912

1913

5. Capital Punishment. Rev. John J. Ford, S.J.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. A. de P.
24. First Encyclical of Benedict XV.

1915

1. The Catholic Press. E. Hull, S.J.
2. The "Menace" and the Mails. Paul Bakewell
3. The Ethics of War. Edward Masterson, S.J.
4. Sixty Historical "Dont's." James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.
5. The Jesuit Myth. Robert Swickerath, S.J.
6. Fifty "Dont's" of Science. James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.
   Catholics in the Y. M. C. A. Nelson Hume
7. Catholic Sociology. Richard H. Tierney, S.J.
   Newman's Alleged "Scurrility." Paul Bakewell
8. Was Shakespere a Catholic? James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.
9. The Church and the Mexican Revolution. By a Mexican Lawyer
10. Dante's 650th Birthday. James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D., Litt.D.
    How to Reach the Medieval Mind. Vincent McNabb, O.P.
11. Magna Charta's Centenary. P. Guilday, Ph.D.
12. The Church and the Sex Problem. Richard H. Tierney, S.J.
13. The War's Lesson. Rt. Rev. Thomas O'Dwyer, D.D.
14. Catholic Schools for Catholic Youth. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
15. Temperance Against Prohibition. Henry Maurice
16. The Papacy. His Eminence Cardinal Mercier
17. The Church and the Immigrant. Rt. Rev. Francis C. Kelley, D.D.
18. The Contemporary Drama. James J. Daly, S.J.

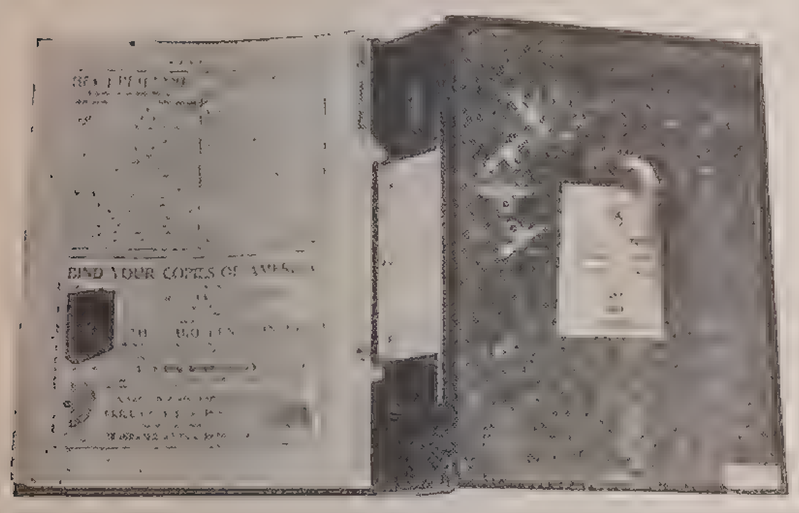
Special Rates: Pamphlets for 1908-1911, inclusive, $1.00 per hundred; for 1912-14, inclusive, $2.00 per hundred; for 1915, $3.00 per hundred.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.



Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

A Valuable Addition To Your Library

Bind Your Copies of
AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
In Book Form
For Future Reference

"As Easy as Filing Papers"

The "Big Ben" Binder

is handsome and durable—opens flat to any page. No trouble to insert copies—only two pen knife slits in the back of AMERICA—drop the tiepins over the binding rods—one motion locks it.

It is the Ideal Binder

Made up in Red Art Cloth, with AMERICA stamped in real gold on the back and cover.

Send in Your Order Today
Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83rd Street, New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one "Big Ben" Binder.

Name .....

Street .....

City .....

State .....

What College for Me?

An Important Question and a Help to the Answer.

"A Graduate's Confession"

Read this Leaflet and make your choice

A Priest writes us: "I imagine many of our Catholic colleges would find the leaflet an excellent advertisement. The personal element in the article strikes me as especially happy. It serves to bring the matter home more forcibly."

20 Cents a Dozen
$1.00 per Hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street
New York

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS

This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc., with serges, merinos, draps d'été, linens, etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM AND STRAUS

420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

Sarony
PHOTOGRAPHER
For 49 years patronized by the Clergy, who receive a special discount.
364 Fifth Ave. (Near 34th St.)
NEW YORK

THE FRANK MEANY CO.
PRINTERS
Inc.

Magazines Catalogues
Periodicals Booklets
Programmes

216-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

3,000 PASTORS

have OUR SUNDAY VISITOR distributed either at the church door, or through the school, or through the officers of Catholic societies.

We send bundles of OUR SUNDAY VISITOR to every corner of the United States, to Porto Rico, the Panama Zone, to the Philippines, India, to England, Ireland, Australia and South Africa.

Ours is the POPULAR National Weekly. A Penny Paper

It is not a newspaper, and therefore does not trespass on the field of the Diocesan weeklies. Its aim is to instruct in a popular way, to undo the influence of anti-Catholic propaganda, and to hold up the Catholic Church favorably to the non-Catholic.

OUR SUNDAY VISITOR readers become enthusiastic Catholics: they are made at the very low cost of 50 cents a year

SUBSCRIPTIONS POSTPAID

Single Subscriptions 50 cents the year; bundle orders 68 cents per 100

OUR SUNDAY VISITOR
Huntington, Indiana

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

VERY REV. S. W. FAY, S.T.D.
Rector.

ACADEMY OF OUR LADY

Ninety-fifth and Throop Streets
Longwood, CHICAGO, ILL.

A pure and lofty conception of life, high sense of duty, a noble type of Christian womanhood, refinement, and thorough scholarship, music and artistic culture, physical vigor and health, are the standards set for

YOUR DAUGHTER
AT THE
ACADEMY OF OUR LADY

Full range of Scientific, Classical, Literary and Historical Studies.

Catalogue sent on application.

SEVENTY YEARS

St. Mary's College and Academy

For Young Women and Girls

MONROE, MICHIGAN

A Home School distinguished for its refining influence

CONDUCTED BY THE Sisters-Servants of the Immaculate Heart

Extensive Parks and Walks for Outdoor Life

COLLEGE—Empowered to grant Degrees and State Teachers' Certificates.

ACADEMY—A High School of recognized standard.

PREPARATORY—Foundation for Literary, Commercial and Vocational Departments.

Exceptional advantages in Music, Art, Elocution and Domestic Science. Certificates granted.

Separate Departments for little girls.

For prospectus, write to MOTHER SUPERIOR
West Elm Avenue

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E. St., N. W

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

Carlton Academy

UPPER SCHOOL for older boys gives thorough preparation for all colleges. Individual attention. Commercial Courses. Athletic Sports. Resident Chaplain.

LOWER SCHOOL for younger boys, with Housemother to give personal care.

SUMMIT New Jersey — Charles H. Schultz. A.M., Headmaster.

Academy of Saint Joseph
IN-THE-PINES
Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in Separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR.

ACADEMY OF MOUNT ST. URSULA

Bedford Park, New York City

An incorporated school for resident and day pupils. Full elementary course. Four-year academic course preparatory to College and Training School for Teachers. For particulars address THE MOTHER SUPERIOR.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY

Adjoining Bronx Park, New York
Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city
Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses
St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law	140 Nassau St.
School of Medicine	Fordham.
School of Pharmacy	Fordham.

Write for catalogue

Rev. JOSEPH A. MULRY S.J., Pres.

St. Joseph's College and Academy
EMMITSBURG, MARYLAND

Courses: College, Commercial, Academic, Preparatory

Course in Pedagogy open to Senior and Junior College Students

Exceptional advantages in Music, Art, Domestic Science

Founded 1809. . . FREE CATALOGUE

College of Mount St. Mary

Situated on the Watchung Mountain
PLAINFIELD, NEW JERSEY

Conducted by the Sisters of Mercy. Unusual Opportunity for Young Women to Secure a College Education. New Buildings, Modern Equipment, an Efficient Faculty.

Classical Course leading to the A. B. degree. Other Courses with a Major in Music, Fine Arts, Domestic Science and Art, and Education leading to a degree. Graduates who have pursued the courses in Education may secure New Jersey and other State Teachers' Licenses without examination.

HIGH SCHOOL DEPARTMENT

Classical, Modern Language and Commercial Courses are approved by the New Jersey State Board of Education.

PRIMARY DEPARTMENT

A high-class Graded School for Boys and Girls between the ages of five and twelve years.

The College of Mount St. Mary and its allied schools provide opportunities for a complete education without change of institutions.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers
LARGEST CATHOLIC COLLEGE IN AMERICA

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue . . . . . Prefect of Studies.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson, 40 minutes from New York City.

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

IMMACULATA SEMINARY

MOUNT MARIAN, WASHINGTON, D, C.

High-class school for young women and girls. Situated in the Suburbs.

Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Abundant out-door exercise in beautiful suburban grounds; individual attention to character training; happy home life; thorough scholarship.

SPECIAL TWO-YEAR COURSE of COLLEGE work for high school graduates.

FULL PREPARATORY and ELECTIVE courses.

MUSIC, ART, EXPRESSION and domestic science.

All the advantages of the National Capital and sightseeing, with experienced chaperones.

For Illustrated Year Book Address

SISTER SECRETARY, DEP'T. F.

Seton Hill Schools

St. Joseph Academy for Girls

GREENSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA

On main line P. R. R., 30 miles from Pittsburgh
Elementary and High School Courses. University affiliation.
Two years' advanced Course for High School Graduates.
Conservatories of Music and Art.
Domestic Science. Gymnasium. Field Sports.
Address Department E

St. Mary's Annex for Small Boys

Notre Dame of Maryland

COLLEGE FOR WOMEN

Chartered in 1864. Charles Street Ave., near Baltimore, Md.

Conducted by the School Sisters of Notre Dame, a society devoted exclusively to educational work. Teachers specialists in every department. Lecturers of national reputation. Courses Regular and Elective. Exceptional opportunities for the study of Music and Art. Spacious buildings. Located in a beautifully wooded park of sixty-five acres.

Notre Dame Preparatory School for Girls. Academic and College Preparatory Classes. Firm discipline. Physical training. Individual supervision of manners, methods of study, habits of life, outdoor exercise—tennis, croquet, basket ball, rowing, etc.

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, and the University of Kentucky

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

Mt. St. Joseph's College

IRVINGTON, BALTIMORE, MD.

Courses in Classics, Sciences and Commerce, under able professors. Special facilities for Pre-Medical Students. Certificates Recognized.

Splendid health location. Spacious buildings. Extensive campus. Gymnasium. Outdoor swimming pool. Physical as well as mental training.

For Catalogue and particulars, address:

BROTHER DIRECTOR

Mount de Sales

Academy of the Visitation

CATONSVILLE (NEAR BALTIMORE) MARYLAND

Ideal School for Young Ladies

Classic, Literary and Scientific Courses. French and German receive special attention. Departments of Music, Art and Elocution. Magnificent situation.

Ask for Illustrated Catalogue

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts, Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

ST. FRANCIS XAVIER

COLLEGE and ACADEMY

Sisters of Mercy

4928 XAVIER PARK, CHICAGO, ILL.

The first Catholic College for women in Chicago—chartered 1912. Freshman class only in September, 1915.

Write for Prospectus

SAINT MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

For Women . . . College and Academy . . . . For Girls

Affiliated to the Catholic University

Departments of Arts and Sciences—Four-Year Course leading to degrees A.B and B.S.
Department of Household Economics—Courses leading to the degree B.S. Elective courses offered to all college students.
Conservatory of Music—Teachers' and Artists' Certificate Courses.
School of Expression—Teachers' Certificate Courses. Various elective courses open to all students.
School of Art—Drawing, water color, oil, keramics. Certificates issued.
Academy—Full Four-Year High School Course and Grammar Department.
75th Year. A School of Four Generations.
Students from twenty-five States. Twelve modern buildings. New College Hall, Gymnasium, Natatorium, etc. Abundant out-door exercise. 40-acre golf course. Bulletins and illustrated booklets will be sent upon request.

Address Sister Secretary, Box 70, SAINT MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

These Altar Appointments of Solid Polished Brass were made by The Gorham Company for the Paulist Novitiate, of Washington, D. C. The Gorham Company, Fifth Avenue and Thirty-Sixth Street. Makers of Church Furnishings in Gold, Silver and Bronze, of Artistic and Ecclesiastical Excellence.

We Have A Position

for a Catholic man or woman in every city and town in the United States and Canada to act as our subscription representative. Experience is not necessary, and earnings depend on the amount of time you devote

Write for Details

CIRCULATION DEPT.

Now Is The Time

The America Press
59 EAST 83D STREET
NEW YORK

Real Mattress Protection

Bed linen alone—no matter how often changed—is insufficient to protect a mattress from the excretions of the body.

Absolute cleanliness demands that a properly made pad be used between the sheet and mattress; this should be absorbent and easily washable.

These and other methods are combined in

Excelsior Quilted Mattress Pads

MATTRESS PROTECTOR REG. U.S. PAT. OFF. EXCELSIOR TRADE MARK WASHABLE

None genuine without Trade Mark

Excelsior protectors are made from heavy bleached muslin padded with dainty snow-white wadding. Wash easily and dry light, fluffy, and as springy and sanitary as new.

Sold by all high-class department stores. Look for this trade mark sewed on every pad.

EXCELSIOR QUILTING COMPANY
15 Laight Street New York, N. Y.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIV, No. 2
WHOLE No. 341

OCTOBER 23, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, Oct. 12, p. m.-Oct. 19, a. m. — The Invasion of Serbia — The Balkans. France: Planning the Loan. Germany: Inviting American Business Men—Trade League for South America. Great Britain: Criticizing the Cabinet — Conscription. Ireland: The New Budget—A Plea for Peace. Mexico: More Comment on Carranza—Yucatan's Misery. 25-28

TOPICS OF INTEREST

III–Political Equality— The Recognition of Carranza -Jesus and Legal Crime—Are Catholics Narrow?—XL–The Young Man and Illustrating 29-35

COMMUNICATIONS

Fort Lauderdale, not Florida—The Defects of the Catholic Press—The Sincerity of Anglicans —Change the Name.....35-37

EDITORIALS

Reflections on Mexico—A Much-Abused Proverb —What Flag in Florida?—"Specializing"—The Hyphen and the Knights of Columbus—The Shame of the Metropolis.....38-41

LITERATURE

Animalism in Literature.

REVIEWS: Thomas Davis—Wild Sports of the West—Legends of Saints and Sinners—Humors of Irish Life — Irish Orators and Oratory — The Book of Irish Poetry—The Path to Rome—The Real Argentine—Some New Sources for the Life of Blessed Agnes of Bohemia.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The Catholic Mind—The Month for October—"Eltham House"—"God's Man" — Calendars and Almanacs for 1916 — "The Co-Citizens"—"The Riddle of the Night" —"Jerusalem"—"De la Connaissance de l'Ame" —"What Shall I Be?"—"Robert Hugh Benson, an Appreciation"—"What Shall We Read to the Children?"—"The National Debt that Protestants Owe to Their Brethren of the Roman Catholic Church".....41-44

EDUCATION

Mother Goose and the New York School Board. 45, 46

ECONOMICS

The Economic Fetish.....46, 47

NOTE AND COMMENT

Preparedness and Cold Cash—Death of Father Pompilio Diaz — Progress of the Y. M. C. A. — The Outlook and Woman Suffrage — Economic Progress of the American Negro—St. Jerome and Education—Catholic Evening Schools—A Cold Admirer of the Public Schools.....47, 48

CHRONICLE

The War.—On none of the battle fronts has any one thing of much consequence been accomplished. The gains and losses which have been announced have in no way affected the general situation. In Artois and Champagne the Germans have been making desperate attempts to recapture the trenches they recently lost, but nowhere have they been able to accomplish anything of importance. Two slight successes are recorded by them, one in the vicinity of Vermelles, and the other east of Auberive, but in neither case has any real impression been made on the British and French lines. In the Trentino and along the Isonzo matters stand where they were last week. In the Dardanelles the deadlock still continues. The Austrians and Russians have been active in Galicia with varying success, the line swinging backward and forward along the Strypa west of Tarnopol. In Poland the Russians are more than holding their own, and have prevented any further advance on Dvinsk, for their counter-attacks have offset any advantages gained by the attacks of the Germans.

Bulletin, Oct. 12, p. m.-Oct. 19, a. m.

Serbia's efforts to hold back the Austro-German and the Bulgarian invasions have shown more strength than was expected, for the Serbians have fought stubbornly on the north and have not, as was expected, retired without fighting to the interior. The Austro-Germans, however, have made progress and having advanced some thirty miles south from Semendria, have taken Bosevac. From the west they have moved less rapidly, and are still near the Drina. On the eastern frontier, the Bulgarians, according to reports, have got across the entire Serbian boundary, have crossed the Nish-Danube railroad at a number of places, have captured Zaitcar some thirty-five miles to the northeast of Nish, and are near Uranja, which is situated about fifty miles to the south of Nish. This last place would give the Bulgarians possession of the Nish-Salonica railroad at an important point. Further south, however, the French, together with some British and Serbian troops, have invaded the southwestern corner of Bulgaria and captured Strumnitza, thus blocking the Bulgarian attack on the lower portion of the Nish-Salonica railroad. They have also landed at Enos, probably to attack Dedeagatch.

The Invasion of Serbia

Great Britain and France have declared war on Bulgaria, and Serbia and Bulgaria have declared war on each other. The Russian Foreign Office has declared Russia to be in a state of war with Bulgaria, but has not yet sent official notification of the fact to Sofia. Greece has announced that her treaty with Serbia does not bind her to enter hostilities, and the Premier has stated that his policy is to keep his country out of the war. Rumania is reported to have said that she would eventually enter the struggle on the side of the Allies, but the only official pronouncement to which she committed herself is that she judges that the time has not yet come to depart from neutrality. Italy is still deliberating as to the course she will take, but her decision is the more complicated as she cannot aid Serbia, as she seemingly would like to do, without clashing with Germany with whom she is still at peace. France, like Great Britain, continues to land troops at Salonica, but at present she is distracted with internal difficulties, precipitated by the resignation of M. Théophile Delcasse, the Minister of Foreign Affairs. The French censor has forbidden the publication of the reason for this resignation, although it is known to have been handed to the Government after the return of Delcasse from a conference with Sir Edward Grey in London. England is exercised over the failure of British diplomacy in the Balkans, and a discussion in Parliament has given rise to rumors that at present seem to point to the abandonment of the campaign in the Dardanelles. The Ministry has refused to confirm or deny the report, but the opinion is growing general that British troops are to be transferred either in whole or in part from Gallipoli to Serbia. The British Admiralty has declared a blockade of the Bulgarian coast of the Ægean Sea, and it is believed that Dedeagatch, Bulgaria's Ægean port, will soon be attacked. The Turks are moving troops to the defense of Bulgaria's Black Sea ports.

The Balkans

France.—The war is emphasizing the extraordinary financial resourcefulness of the French people. Although the British Government has already floated two war loans and the German three,

Planning the Loan

France is just contemplating her first, and to meet the increasing cost of the war the Finance Commission of the Senate proposes to make an appeal for a popular loan at a long term. For the past three months the national expenditure of France for war and other purposes was in excess of one billion, five hundred million francs, a little more than half the present British rate of expenditure. This sum it is thought will be increased during the next period of three months, and will hardly fall short of two billion francs. The war costs will absorb 73 per cent; public debt 7 per cent; pensions 11 per cent; civil grants 1 per cent; while the remaining 8 per cent will be required for administrative purposes. The loan will probably be a large one, as the credits now open or asked for total thirty billion francs. Although one of the richest industrial sections has been occupied by the enemy for a year, the country at large is carrying its huge debt with ease, and it is thought that the French people will be ready and able to underwrite any loan that may be called for.

Germany.—German business men are actively preparing for the days of peace. They desire in particular to establish close relations with both North and South America. As regards the United States American business men are eagerly invited by the American Association of Commerce and Trade at Berlin to visit Germany in view of the "assured reopening of commercial relations" and in order to do away with the distorted impressions that have been created by the war literature of the day. American visitors, "business men and intellectuals," are afforded every opportunity by the American Association of Commerce and Trade in Berlin to meet representative Germans and obtain an inside knowledge of the actual conditions, in the interests of "business and a better understanding." To "correct false impressions," an answer is given to the accusation of the Wall Street Journal that the country is being flooded with an unknown volume of paper currency issued by private banks. "Since the outbreak of the war and up to July 1, 1915," says the Weekly Report of the above Association, "paper currency aggregating 314 million dollars has been issued. In the meantime, more than one-half of this amount has been withdrawn, so that at the present time 176 million dollars of paper currency is in circulation." This currency refers to the special notes on the loan banks "covered by various kind of collateral." Treasury notes are covered by the gold holdings of the Reichsbank, which now are more than 600 million dollars.

Inviting American Business Men

The activity of German manufacturers and exporters is shown likewise in the provisions being made for extending export possibilities. An important step in this direction is the recent establishment of the German Trade League for South America. At the head of the League is Dr. Bernhard Dernburg, the former Colonial Secretary. In his speech at the first meeting of the new association he called attention to the great dividends earned by the South American investments, and the valuable orders and contracts they assure. He pointed to the advantages of Germany, but feared that if the war should last very long the recapturing of lost export territory would not be easy. A solution of the difficulty would be found in South American investment:

Trade League for South America

> South America, practically without coal or iron ore, will remain tributary to industrial countries indefinitely, and for this reason a more extensive investment of German capital in South America will not only pay, but will also accelerate recapturing eventually lost export territory. Of importance is not only the strengthening of our economic influence, but also the gaining of a certain spiritual influence. No doubt, Germany's energy and pluck is remarkable, but Latin and Anglo-Saxon people do not like to be made conscious of this fact, or have it "rubbed in."

He therefore counseled that the less presumption is asserted the more friends German merchants would win for themselves. As a foreign trade territory South America will be of special value to Germany, he added, "because we do not know how relations to our enemies of today will shape themselves after the war, and for this reason we must eventually look for compensation."

Great Britain.—Two questions continue to agitate English public opinion: will the coalition Cabinet last, and will conscription come? Writing in the Observer,

Criticizing the Cabinet

Mr. J. L. Garvin, an authority in political affairs, says plainly that the country is giving the Cabinet another but a last chance. "If the war does not go on better the nation will insist on a fundamental change in the composition and temper of the Cabinet." If defeat comes, it will not come from the enemy, he thinks, but because of "the feebleness, inertia, procrastination, irresolution, dissensions and paltering of the Government as now constituted." But with this indictment drawn, Mr Garvin adds:

The British temperament, with its incorrigible habit of lulling itself by sanguine speculations as long as it is allowed to do so, is braced by nothing so much as by the cold douche of adversity. It is an immense moral and practical gain that things have come to the worst for us. The Germans by dissipating our last illusions have done us a saving service. When things are at the worst they begin to mend.

It is also Mr. Garvin's opinion that the Balkans "will be either the grave of German ambitions or the grave of British hopes." If Great Britain fails there, he believes that the best to be hoped for is "a patched-up settlement, an armed nightmare, a sham peace, and a German onslaught on Great Britain alone a few years later."

Conscription

Lord Northcliffe, who directs the policy of the Times and the Daily Mail, has plainly spoken his conviction that conscription will be found necessary before the close of the year. "As with you in the Civil War," he writes to the New York Sun, "we shall, in my judgment, be obliged to adopt compulsory service, and that before the end of the war." Although the voluntary system has enrolled more than two millions of recruits, Lord Northcliffe thinks that it gives the skulker an undue advantage, which will ultimately react injuriously upon the country at large, over the patriotic citizen. As to the Cabinet itself, it is reported that nine members favor and twelve oppose conscription, with Lord Kitchener committed to neither view. Lord Derby's recruiting scheme is regarded as the last resort of the voluntary plan, and in case it is not found satisfactory, it is reported that Lord Derby will himself advocate compulsory service.

Ireland.—As a rule the Irish papers admit the fairness of the new budget as a whole but regret that special treatment was not accorded to Ireland on account of her poverty. The main provisions of the budget tell heavily against the country, the poorer incomes bearing an especial burden. Thus the increase on £200 a year is 150 per cent. Irish interests will suffer most from indirect taxation, according to New Ireland. The consumption of tea is seventeen per cent higher in Ireland than in Great Britain, and the tax has been increased fifty per cent. Ireland consumes one-ninth of the sugar consumed in Great Britain; tobacco represents a considerable proportion of the Irish annual expenditure, and in the poorer districts of the West taxes on these will be met by people who rarely or never eat meat. The abolition of the halfpenny post will hit small industries severely: the Dublin halfpenny postage, for instance, is estimated at £500 a week. Ireland is especially desirous of escaping the fifty per cent tax on war profits. New Ireland is insistent on urging its case on the Irish Party, claiming that special treatment for Ireland is a vital question affecting the whole development of the country in the next generation, since as things stand at present, the efforts of past generations to raise Irish commerce are endangered. Unfortunately, figures are not available for an estimate of the amount that will be added yearly to the treasury by taxes in Ireland; the amount to be added from Great Britain and Ireland is estimated at £44,400,000. Speaking at the Ossory Diocesan Synod the Protestant Bishop, Dr. Bernard, made a plea for peace between the Nationalists and Ulsterites, appealing to his countrymen

The New Budget; A Plea for Peace

Of a different creed and of opposite political opinions to accept the friendship we have so consistently offered them, to allow this great war, as to which their opinions and ours are the same, and our action will also be the same, to swallow up all the small issues in the domestic government of Ireland which now divide us; that as our soldiers are going to fight, to shed their blood, and to die at each other's side, in the same army, against the same enemy, and for the same high purpose, their union in the field may lead to a union in their home, and that their blood may be the seal that will bring all Ireland together in one nation, and in liberties equal and common to all.

Almost at the time he was speaking a minister preaching at an "Ulster Day" celebration declared the Ulsterites were now where they were three years ago when the Covenant was made "to stand by one another in defending for ourselves and our children our cherished position of equal citizenship in the United Kingdom, and in using all means which may be found necessary to defeat the present conspiracy to set up a Home Rule Parliament in Ireland." The Belfast Newsletter is emphatic in protesting that the Covenant will be carried out. The war, it claims, cannot remove or modify Ulster's hostility to Home Rule. The fact that Protestants and Catholics are fighting side by side matters nothing as far as the government of Ireland is concerned. Last week, in a letter to the Ulster Unionists' Council, Carson also declared that the Covenant would be carried out.

Mexico.—During the week the comment of the press on the recognition of Carranza has been outspoken and vigorous. The New York Evening Sun says:

More Comment on Carranza

Venustiano Carranza, who it appears is to be recognized at an early date as Dictator of Mexico, has shown during the last two years or so, the period of his chieftaincy over a revolutionary faction, a jealous hostility toward the United States and an angry contempt for its Government. He has made no concealment of his feelings even while making the fullest use of the facilities for building up his power which President Wilson has furnished to him.

This same Carranza has made, during this same period of shifting dictatorship over various parts of his country, most perfect demonstration of his unfitness to rule. The system of misgovernment over which he presides has been marked by tyranny, cruelty and plunder in a degree which not even the bandit Villa or the brigand Zapata and their wild bands have been able to surpass. To what extent the atrocities of the Carranzista régime are due to the evil instincts of the man himself it is useless to inquire. So far as he is not directly responsible for them they are due to his hopeless incompetence which, coupled with his inflated ambition and his egregious vanity, render him the catspaw of miscreants of coarser grain.

Apropos of the same subject the New York Sun of October 11 remarks:

If the reason for President Wilson's recognition of Venustiano Carranza and his party as the de facto Government of Mexico be sought within the boundaries of that republic, it will not be found. The military situation of the Carranzista forces does not justify it. The political circumstances of its leader give it no support. The personal qualities of Carranza, the record of his dealings with his followers, the history of his transactions with the United States, all combine to demonstrate the foolhardiness, the desperation, of a course that would entrust to him the rehabilitation of the disrupted nation. Where, then, is the factor that has induced President Wilson to adopt a policy that can be made successful only by the might of this country, and imposed on an unwilling people only through our physical intervention in a foreign quarrel? . . .

Nor should the triumph of Carranza be underestimated, however short may be his period for enjoying its fruits. From the beginning he has refused to concede, to compromise, to give way. If he was to be used to meet the exigencies of our domestic politics, he would have his price. That price is now offered to him. In every stipulation in the contract Carranza lays down the terms. Take the portentous matter of religious toleration:

"The Carranza Government has given guarantees that hereafter all religious persons will receive full protection in Mexico in the exercise or teaching of their beliefs, providing they have not participated and will not participate in the politics of Mexico."

Some assurance on this subject was essential to Mr. Wilson; the Catholics in this country have not been silent while their fellows in the Church were persecuted by the Carranza junto. Hence the "guarantees," but their exceptions illuminate their real worth:

"As a matter of fact it is considered [in Washington] that the assurance given by Carranza will not open the way for the return to Mexico of clergy exiled from that country by him, as it has been charged by the Constitutionalists that the clergy expelled were so treated because they sought to meddle in Mexican politics."

Moreover, the guarantees do not extend to "religious persons," that is, to priests and nuns, who may be accused in the future of participating in Mexican politics, and the decision as to what constitutes participation rests with the Carranzista politicians. Here is religious freedom of a novel complexion. The political "amnesty" granted by Carranza is of the same nature: pardon for those whom he decides to spare, the firing squad for those whom he fears or upon whom he would be revenged. . . .

On October 16 the same paper declares editorially:

A private letter in the Sun yesterday contained an uncensored and fearless and what we believe to be a true account of conditions in that part of Mexico which Carranza by military force now controls. The exhibit is appalling.

It is preposterous that any American Administration should dream of recognizing such a Government or of inducing other American republics to recognize Carranza. . . .

The New York Times of October 11 has this to say:

. . . . It would be foolish to forget, as the Administration will not be permitted to forget, that this action, the proposed recognition, is in direct violation of the plan originally formed by Mr. Lansing and his Latin-American conferees. That plan was to invite all the faction leaders to join in a peace conference and agree upon a program of pacification. It was understood that any faction leader disregarding the invitation or rejecting it would be ignored in future proceedings. But the one faction leader who rejected the invitation is now to have formal recognition and the others are to be ignored. This seeming inconsistency needs no excuse if the action is justifiable. It is better to be inconsistent than wrong. It is possible, however, to be both. . . .

All the information obtainable from Mexico clearly indicates that Carranza's Government is not stable; that it is not acknowledged by all Mexicans, or nearly all; that it has no sure means of administering justice; that it is not "equipped with the machinery for the administration of internal policy," and that it is, on the contrary, depending upon this very recognition to enable it to overcome strong opposition and to dismay its opponents, some of whom are as staunchly patriotic and as strongly pledged to the establishment of a constitutional Government as Carranza or any of his adherents.

The Cincinnati Commercial Tribune of October 11 speaks as follows:

Still watching and waiting for the impossible to happen in Mexico. Still watching and waiting for the bandits, who were allowed to arm and equip themselves through the raising of the embargo on arms, to reform and pacify the country by looting and murdering. Still watching and waiting through 1915, as in 1913-1914, while Americans in Mexico and in Texas are captured, robbed and murdered by the followers of the men the Democratic Administration aided to power and men that now the Democratic Administration knows full well are unfit to be trusted with either money, property or power. . . .

These citations are typical, but despite public opinion, Carranza enjoys the favor of recognition as ruler of Mexico. Meantime almost at the very hour Carranza was proclaiming that he would give civil and religious freedom his followers were devastating Mexico. This account of their work, though by no means complete, is authentic.

Yucatan's Misery

On September 24 some 500 Carranzistas assembled in the club of the Obrero Mundial under the leadership of Diego Rendón, Carlos Castro, and others. From the club the rowdies marched to the square of the cathedral, where they listened to a harangue by Rendón, who urged them to carry off the wonderful crucifix from the cathedral and burn it in the square. The crowd burst open the doors of the church and began a savage and a sacrilegious work. Valuable articles were stolen, pictures were torn, statues broken, and the great carved crucifix revered of the people was covered with oil and ignited. It did not burn, and was then dashed against the pavement till an arm was broken off; a splendid shrine was destroyed; the archives of the cathedral were rifled and all the historical documents were burned. Other churches were treated in a similar way, as was the residence of the pastor of the cathedral. The police looked on with seeming indifference; after the work of destruction was finished, an armed force dispersed the crowd; Rendón and a few others were arrested, but were soon set free. Today the two colleges conducted by Sisters were to have resumed classes, but yesterday the Sisters were ordered to give over their buildings to the State, despite the fact that the colleges had public authorization. The Sisters were obliged to work all night to get ready for their departure on the morrow. Next week AMERICA will contain an account of the "civil freedom" of Yucatan.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

III—Political Equality

HAVING seen human society under its basic divisions of domestic, civil, commercial and social life, with religion as the rightful norm for action within these four spheres, we are in a position to understand clearly the ramifications of the demand for political equality, as it affects the body social in all its activities. Yet political equality must find, if it may, its peculiar justification within the civil sphere, as that is where the franchise is exercised. However glibly and persistently votes are demanded for women, as a natural, a human right, without regard to sex, it is certain that the best minds which have bent to the task are agreed that the franchise, within the scheme of whatsoever form of government, is a privilege, not a natural right.

Those who habitually leave out of reckoning God's order as to things human, are thereby led into much confusion, much superficial reasoning, and much hot indignation at the supposedly arbitrary exclusion of women from politics. If it be assumed without argument in proof, that fitness, expediency, is the determining principle in awarding the franchise, it is but rational to insist that first questions shall be settled first, so as to establish a solid basis upon which secondary issues may securely rest. The first question is this: What is the unit of society? Is it the individual or the family? Surely for the understanding of the structure of human society, this question must be answered, and answered rightly, before any profit can come from the discussion of the fitness of men and women for participation in political life, be the form of the State autocratic, plutocratic or democratic.

Those who look no further back than the nebular mist for the beginning of mankind, readily assume that the individual is the unit of the race, and looking forward, they see the time when all forms of government will reach a climax in pure democracy, the touchstone of which is personal independence, with the significance of sex denied. "Just as many false ideas prevail as to woman's true position in the home as to her status elsewhere. Womanhood is the great fact in her life; wifehood and motherhood are but incidental relations. Governments legislate for men; we do not have one code for bachelors, another for husbands and fathers; neither have the social relations of women any significance in their demands for civil and political rights." ("History of Woman Suffrage").

At the core of this error lies a spiritual aspiration. In nature there is no order within which men and women are equal. They are, in all their basic relationships, complementary one to the other. In some departments of human activity men are, by virtue of their original design, necessitated to play first part, while in other departments women are destined to play first part. But God has an order in which men and women are independent of sex. In the kingdom of heaven the individual is the unit, nor is there marrying or giving in marriage. This spiritual aspiration is not content to wait for its fruition in the beatitude of the future world, but clamors for recognition within the jurisdiction of Cæsar. And it is in this misdirected passion that is to be found the fountain-spring of the demand on the part of women for political, economic and sex independence.

The proposition that the family is the unit of the body politic is capable of immediate intellectual demonstration. For clearly that is the unity of society on which society naturally and ultimately depends for preservation and perpetuation. For these, society does not depend on the woman alone, nor on the man alone but on the man and woman, "twain made one" for the procreation and education of children. Here we have the family, with the man as head. This ground of right reason is plainly suggested by the Bible account of the creation of our first parents and by Noah's preservation of the pairs, rational and irrational, to reinhabit the earth. If it were permitted to view the family mystically, it would be seen that sex-force is but the positive and negative current uniting, that by secondary creation the earth may be peopled.

No doubt it is profitless to urge the reasons that lie behind the traditional view that the family alone is per se the unit of membership in the State. This view has no favor with those who are bent on setting up a new unit of membership. It does seem, however, worth while to point out the superficial reasoning of those who are putting up a strenuous campaign for woman suffrage. Some time since, in the course of a running debate in one of Boston's dailies, Miss Alice Stone Blackwell, replying to the writer's insistence, that, as the family is a moral body, the father as the head is the one qualified by nature to represent it politically, gave off a fling that was supposed to settle the case. She attempted to ridicule the claim that the man by his natural qualifications as head of the family may consistently represent his family as a political unit. "If," argued Miss Blackwell, "the man is at the head of the family, some families have half-a-dozen heads."

In the first place, that five sons, all old enough to vote, sit at the family board with the father, does not alter the fact that one family is at the table. A flippant evasion does not change the organic life of the human race, nor the basic structure of civil society. Secondly, those five sons are potential heads of families naturally destined for that office. This is not true of woman: on the contrary, nature destines her for an entirely different office, one quite incompatible with political equality. Moreover it is well to remember that it is not the individual family that endures from generation to generation, thus preserving the commonwealth; the succession of families preserves society, each actual family pre-supposing a potential family, each actual head presupposing a potential head, a man. Consequently capable governments legislate not for men as such, but for men as heads of families.

Besides, existing laws that relate to women are negative proofs in point. The presumption in law is general that "acts done by the wife in the immediate presence of her husband are done by her under coercion from him." The radical programs that demand the exemption of the husband from the liability to support his wife and children and by such demands aim at the destruction of the family, are practical proof that the family is, under the law, habitually recognized as the unit of civil society.

The National President of the Woman Suffrage Association, the Reverend Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, is more brilliant and yet more evasive. After beating the tom-toms for a week before a rally at Faneuil Hall, to secure an opponent in debate, her challenge was accepted at the meeting. The conditions laid down were a marvel of feminine ingenuity. The negative would have fifteen minutes, no more. Besides, the negative must open. The time given was used to show that the propaganda for votes for women was in reality an attack upon the family as the unit of civil society. Good progress was evidently being made, for Miss Shaw was overheard to say: "Stop that woman; she'll win half our audience." So, by the clock opposite the platform, even the fifteen minutes were cut short. Miss Shaw took one hour and three-quarters for her defense, which, by all rules of debate, should have been the affirmative. Imitating the oratory of her opponent with a mimicry which was brilliant and cleverly staged to throw the audience off the scent, the Reverend Doctor won an excited applause from half the house. "My opponent insists that the man is the head of the family, but everybody knows that the baby is the head of the family."

The men who stand for woman suffrage seem afflicted with a like disregard for intellectual virility. Once during a debate in an attempt to break the strength of the conclusion that man was not only in law but in logic the necessary political head of the family, a gentleman of national reputation, said: "There are two heads to my family." In rebuttal, the retort came back: "Indeed! but the family with two heads is a logical monstrosity as a cat with two heads is a physical monstrosity." We may grant that the male half of the two-headed family meant to be just. But how just and how gracious the response to a toast by a President of a great industrial plant: "At home I am Vice-President." How beautiful, when the home and society are under the government of women, and the family and the State are under the control of men! But the order arising from such conditions will soon vanish, if political equality be granted women; and confusion worse confounded will take the place of the peace which we now enjoy.

MARTHA MOORE AVERY.

The Recognition of Carranza

TWO reasons have been advanced for the recognition of Carranza; one is his fitness, the other is his alleged control of the greater part of the Republic. The time may come when rulers may be selected according to fitness, but that time is not yet. Many truly good men would make bad kings and presidents, and history records some periods of prosperity and progress under rulers who were not all one might desire. Our modern machinery of government renders the head of a nation neither so important nor so powerful as he is likely to consider himself. Therefore legitimate succession to office must be based on some other claim. To make it a question of territorial control would be at variance with past policies and establish a dangerous precedent in a country as prolific in intrigue as Mexico.

The principal argument urged against the recognition of Carranza, and with equal force against all rival candidates and against the policy of the United States in Mexico, is universal insincerity. The United States recognized the Madero Government, and so also did Villa and Carranza. Carranza is not the constitutional successor to Madero. His recognition will not make him so, but will only prolong the struggle and ultimately bring the United States face to face with the embarrassing situation of having recognized two presidents in Mexico.

Both Carranza and Villa have proclaimed themselves avengers of the death of Madero and their ultimate object the establishment of a government which will carry out the reforms he promised. When Carranza entered Mexico City, after the flight of Huerta, he found the remnants of the Government to which he had pledged allegiance ready and waiting for him. With amazing celerity its members came out of hiding, assembled in due form and cheerfully announced: "Here we are; what are you going to do with us?" The answer to that question will answer every charge of insincerity against any factional leader in Mexico and against the policy of the United States, and until it is answered neither the recognition of Carranza nor any other course will avail to bring permanent peace.

The Constitution of Mexico provides for the cohesion of a ruling body through any crisis likely to arise. When the United States withheld recognition from Huerta, on the ground that he was not the legally constituted successor to Madero, the obvious thing would have been to ascertain the identity of the next legitimate candidate for martyrdom and use its good offices to have him installed until an election could be held. The fact that Huerta held Mexico City was no obstacle. The Capital of the Republic has been more or less migratory and different cities have served at different times. If Villa and Carranza are sincere they would have declared allegiance to the man so installed and united in putting down rebels and bandits. Had it been necessary for the United States to send troops to aid in restoring order, it would have been a friendly act and in conformity with the most commendable features of the Monroe Doctrine. That there were obstacles to such a course is admitted, but they were not to be taken seriously by a Government capable of quelling the Panama Revolution in three days, and of showing similar resourcefulness on other occasions. To the failure of the United States to act with promptness and discretion at that crisis is due all that followed, and its action now will determine whether or not there is to be peace and order and a permanent Government in Mexico, or a continuation of anarchy.

The appalling things that are happening along the border have brought affairs to a point where subterfuge and ambiguous language will no longer avail, and people who are solicitous for the honor of the United States and the welfare of a helpless and long-suffering people are moved to strong, plain language. The truth is the situation in Mexico was created and continues to exist by the grace of the United States of America, and is comparable to nothing except a bull-fight, with Mexicans playing all rôles from bull to matador, the United States occupying the two-dollar seats, with the rest of the world stationed on the other side of the arena with the sun in its eyes.

About eight years ago, without apparent excuse or provocation, periodicals and newspapers in this country began a systematic and vicious attack on the Diaz Government. I have in my possession, turned over to me by order of the late General Porfirio Diaz, voluminous documents which the authors tried in vain to get before the public. They are in the form of letters, petitions and protests, from all parts of Mexico and signed for the most part by foreigners of many nationalities, by social clubs and commercial organizations. They are addressed to publicity organs or Government officials. They protest against such an attack on a friendly nation, and call attention to the harm likely to result with people of an inflammable temperament. They admit the existence of ignorance and other deplorable conditions, but maintain that reforms must of necessity come slowly in a country where the population is so widely scattered and transportation difficult. Through all there is a note of warning that unless the movement is checked great loss and danger will result to foreigners. Strong efforts were made to get these warnings and appeals before the American people, but everywhere the way was blocked. Diaz went away into exile, the results of thirty great years of empire building were swept away, and now those who were loudest in shouts of "Down with the tyrant!" are crying: "Oh, for a strong hand like that of Diaz to restore order in Mexico!"

There are those who maintain that what is happening in Mexico is not our business. On the contrary nothing is more our business, whether considered from the standpoint of self-interest, patriotism or Christianity. The star of empire is rising over Panama, and the country between will be the land of promise for the man looking for a new chance. Everything that retards its pacification and creates prejudice against Americans is the business of all, but of none so much as that of the man needing a new chance. To all such the recognition of a president in Mexico at this time is of equal importance, perhaps greater, than the election of the next President of the United States.

If the Monroe Doctrine means anything it means obligation as well as opportunity, responsibility as well as authority, and that responsibility is greater toward the Mexican people than toward Americans in Mexico. The latter voluntarily abandoned the security of their own country in search of advantages they considered worth the risk. The Mexicans whose destinies we assume to arbitrate had nothing to say about it. Up to date we have exercised our trusteeship only in walling the nation up against outsiders and turning it over to the unrestricted activities of concession-hunters and politicians.

Eternal Justice decrees that actions shall be followed by penalties. Until now we Americans have lived in security, and the voices of playing children are still heard in the land. But over Mexico there is a great silence, the silence of slain men and dumbly starving women, and the voice of that silence is: "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again." E. C. HENDRIX.

Jesus and Legal Crime

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Did Jesus ever transgress any Jewish or Roman law, active or obsolete, for which transgression His death might be legally justified? Was it contrary to Jewish law to set oneself up as a prophet? How do we explain the wild fury which the rabble directed against Christ?

Boston. A. L. B.

THE question thus proposed is much discussed at the present day on account of the statement made by the Jews that Jesus was condemned to death for a legal crime. Its three parts may be briefly answered as follows: (1) The general impression produced by the attentive and unbiased reading of the Gospels is undoubtedly that Jesus was an upright and law-abiding citizen. The only authentic records of Christ's public life prove Him to have been a sincere and earnest teacher of the ways of God. His mission, as He distinctly proclaimed, was to bring to its perfection the Law. Moreover he positively declined to act as an arbiter or judge in secular matters, thus evincing His care to abstain from invading the office of constituted authorities. He bade the lepers whom He healed comply with the law requiring that they should present themselves to the priest; and on a signal occasion, He expressly enjoined submission to the lawful authority of both Scribes and Pharisees, His own mortal enemies. Devoid of personal ambition, He did not countenance the worldly expectations of the grateful and enthusiastic multitudes that followed Him and wished to make Him king. Evidently, too, He did not choose His leading disciples, the Twelve, for any political or warlike fitness on their part; and His training of them manifestly aimed at imparting to them such dispositions as could not give umbrage to the public authorities. It is not likely then that one so pictured should have actually transgressed any important law or statute the violation of which might legally justify His condemnation to death.

Jesus indeed associated and ate with publicans and sinners. He infringed rules and customs observed even by the Essenes. He scandalized the Shammaites by healing on the Sabbath. He roused the opposition of the Pharisees by His frequent disapproval of their interpretations of the laws and of the conclusions they drew from them. He displeased the Zealots by advocating peace and admonishing them to submit to the payment of the tribute to Cæsar. But, as is justly remarked by the Jewish historian, H. Graetz (Hist. of the Jews, vol. ii, p. 162), "these various objections to the mode of life and the tenets of Jesus afforded no ground for any legal accusation against Him." Again, according to the same Jewish authority (loc. cit., p. 163), Jesus' declaration of His power to destroy the Temple and to rebuild it in three days, even "if really uttered by Him, could not have been made a cause of complaint." There remains the accusation that he called Himself the Son of God: such appellation, as the Jews confidently declare, was a blasphemy and therefore a legal crime worthy of death. It is indeed true that Jesus called Himself the Son of God, in the literal sense of the expression. But these words which on Christ's lips were the reverent expression of truth, were not blasphemous before the law. According to the Law (Leviticus xxiv, 10-16), it is direct blasphemy, the cursing or reviling of the Name of the God of Israel, Jehovah, which is punishable by death; and according to Jewish jurisprudence, "as long as the Jewish courts exercised criminal jurisdiction, the death penalty was inflicted only upon the blasphemer who used the Ineffable Name" (D. W. Amram, "Blasphemy," in The Jewish Encylcl., vol. iii. p. 237). Besides, a straightforward interpretation, such as was that of the ancient Jewish commentators, of Ps. ii, 7: "Thou art my Son, this day I have begotten Thee," shows that the Messias, as Jesus proved Himself to be by His unquestionable miracles, could proclaim Himself the Son of God, without incurring the charge of even indirect or constructive blasphemy. Finally, Ps. cx (Vlg. cix), usually rendered: "The Lord said to my Lord: sit Thou at my right hand, etc.," bears out the position which Christ urged upon His adversaries (Cf. Mt. xxii, 41-46; Mk. xii, 35-37; Lk. 20, 41-44), that the Messias was to be infinitely more than the Son of David, to wit: the very Son of God. Most rightly then did Jesus, the true Messias, declare Himself the Son of God in the literal sense of the expression.

Guiltless of death before the Jewish Law, Christ was also guiltless before the Roman law. The seditious meaning sometimes put upon one or two of His expressions, particularly in Luke xxii, 36, manifestly contradicts His words and deeds, which were always opposed to armed resistance (Cf. Mt. xxvi, 52). Pontius Pilate never gave credence to the charge made against Jesus that He sought to stir up the Jewish people against Rome; the charge was most untrue, as was also that of dissuading them from paying the tribute to Cæsar. Had Jesus proclaimed Himself the Messianic King of the Jews in the sense which His accusers urged against Him, He would have indeed contravened the Roman law so as to incur a just condemnation to death; but such was not the case, as Jesus Himself expressly declared to Pilate (Cf. John xviii, 36), and the Roman procurator proclaimed Him innocent of this and of any legal crime worthy of death.

(2) The second part of the question proposed, bears on the right of Christ to be considered as a true prophet. It manifestly implies that if Jesus did not speak in the name of Jehovah, or if He spoke or acted so as to promote defection from Jehovah, He was but a false prophet, and as such, guilty of death in virtue of the Deuteronomic Law (Cf. Deuter, xiii, 1-5 [Heb. ii-vi], xviii, 20-22). The following is our brief reply: There is no doubt that according to the Jewish Law, just referred to, a false prophet incurred the penalty of death. But there is also no doubt that according to the only authentic records of His life, Jesus never "spoke in the name of other gods," never spoke or acted so as to promote defection from the love and service of Jehovah, the true God of Israel, so that He cannot justly be regarded as falling under the condemnation decreed by the Deuteronomic Law against the false prophet.

Like the true prophets of old, like John the Baptist, His prophetical forerunner, Jesus waited to begin His ministry, until the Voice of Heaven bade Him to do so. Far from speaking "in the name of other gods," He invariably silenced the evil spirits that proclaimed Him the holy One of God; He deeply resented the imputation of a league with Beelzebub, the prince of demons, and explicitly referred to God His teaching and His whole life, which was spent in doing good to men and communing with God in prayer. As well stated by H. Graetz (Hist. of the Jews, vol ii, p. 155): "He insisted upon the unity of God. . . . To the question once put to Him by an expounder of the Law: 'What is the essence of Judaism?' He replied: 'Hear, O Israel, our God is One,' and 'Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. These are the chief commandments.'" He solemnly declared that the Law was to be fulfilled to its very iota or tittle. On every occasion, He did all in His power, like the true prophets of old, to bring back sinners to God, to correct wrong-doing, either in high or in low places; He ever affirmed that His power of working miracles was from God, and beholding what He did, the multitudes marveled and glorified God. In fact, the wonder is not that One so manifestly bent on promoting the love and service of God, should have been considered as a true prophet by the witnesses of His life, but should have ever been suspected of being a false prophet punishable by death according to the Deuteronomic Law.

(3) As regards the last part of the question we are dealing with, authors generally acknowledge that they have not full data to account for "the wild fury of the rabble directed against Christ" before the tribunal of Pilate. They remind us, however, of the natural fickleness of crowds of every nation and clime toward their hero of yesterday, but now deprived of what outwardly received their admiration and allegiance. They also think that those who clamored for Christ's death, were most likely, not so much the Galilean multitudes that accompanied Jesus triumphantly on Palm Sunday, as denizens of Jerusalem already divided about His right to be considered a good man (Cf. John vii, 12), and joined by Zealots who would vociferously prefer a rebel like Barabbas to Jesus, the constant advocate of submission to Rome. They chiefly point to the fact that, according to the Evangelical records, the chief priests and elders exerted their influence upon the multitudes against Jesus (Cf. Mt. xxvii, 20; Mk. xv, 11); and if, as we may easily suppose, such deadly enemies of Christ spread among those multitudes the report that He had been convicted of uttering threatening words against the Temple of God, their sudden fury can be as easily understood as in the case of St. Paul at a somewhat later date (Cf. Acts xxi, 27-31, 36).

In view therefore of the foregoing remarks, the answer to the question proposed, is naturally that the verdict of the ages proclaiming the innocence of Jesus from any legal crime which would justify His condemnation to death, stands firm and unassailable: Securus judicat orbis terrarum.

Dunwoodie Seminary, N. Y. Francis E. Gigot.

Are Catholics Narrow?

CATHOLICS are continually complaining of the religious bigotry from which, as they say, they suffer in the press, in society, and in business of every variety; and Protestants, too complain of the bigotry of Catholics. Nay more, Catholics themselves are heard complaining of the bigotry of their coreligionists. It is not uncommon, for instance, to hear them remark of this or that Catholic paper: "I can't read it; it's too horribly narrow."

In a certain sense the profession of the Catholic religion with its set and well-defined dogmas is bound to seem like bigotry to the believers in private interpretation with their polite and respectful deference for one another's views. It is true: a Catholic has no love for distinctively non-Catholic views or beliefs. Insomuch as they are non-Catholic they are the denial or negation of revealed truth. It is large-minded in the Protestant to take part in Catholic worship, or to say to his Catholic friend: "Your religion is as good as mine, and the best thing for you;" but a Catholic could not return the compliment without infidelity. And though this may seem narrow and bigoted to the non-Catholic, it is not really so. Bigotry is unreasonable, but the Catholic claim is based upon reason of the most solid sort.

There is, however, another form of narrowness or bigotry of which the non-Catholic, and the fellow-Catholic, may rightly complain in Catholics and that is disrespectful language in Catholic apologetics. Just as we distinguish in general between the sinner, knowing or unknowing, and his sin, so in common Christian charity we should distinguish between the Protestant, to be particular, and the Protestant religion. Let the honest Catholic question his own experience. What effect does it have upon him to hear himself called "Papist," "idolater," "priest-ridden," or other such names of opprobrium and scorn. Not conversion certainly of mind or heart, but only indignation and resentment. Similarly what can a Catholic hope to gain by copying towards non-Catholics the scornful methods of the Menace and Call? No Knights of Arthur's noblest spoke in "scorn." Catholics indeed should be noble or not at all, in the difficult work of spreading God's Kingdom upon earth, but to revile Protestants, for instance, with the unsanctity of Luther or Calvin is only to wound where you mean to cure.

There is, of course, one class of adversaries who are not entitled to respectful consideration; they have forfeited it by their own abusive attitude toward the most sacred convictions of Catholics. It is one thing to deny the Divine omniscience of Christ, it is another, for a magazine writer to proclaim her denial under such a caption as: "Jesus: a Small Town Man." But even while such persons have no cause for complaint if you treat them to their own medicine of scorn, still it is questionable whether doing so in the pages of the Catholic newspapers accomplish any good. It is depressing to the regular Catholic subscriber, and the offender, at whom the sarcasm is aimed, pays no attention to it, if he reads it at all. Save in so far as the publishers of such offensive matter need to be rebuked and intimidated, the contempt of silence is a much more effective answer to the calumny. There is another answer too, of which we shall speak immediately which also has greater effectiveness.

It is toward the other class of well-meaning, if misguided, that we must show courtesy and kindness. Show deference to him as being sincere, though you have no defense for his opinions as being false. "Off with his head," was one woman's way with those who tried her patience, but it serves no good purpose for us to lose patience with a man because he represents a Protestant point of view. It is a form of bigotry that is intolerant of opposite persons, as well as opposite opinions, that refuses credit for sincerity to a man of another belief. A man who consistently with his doctrine of faith, as being one, holds steadfastly to the Catholic religion, that he believes to be true, without assailing gratuitously the good faith of another, commands the respect of all thinking men.

How then are we going to conduct our argument with the non-Catholic? The right method is very well illustrated in a recent book by Edward Ingram Watkin, B.A., entitled "Some Thoughts on Catholic Apologetics: a Plea for Interpretation." (Herder.) After showing hopeful signs among the educated in the world around about us of a return to the true Faith, such signs, for instance, as "the reaction from nineteenth century Materialism in the direction of a spiritual conception of the universe, and a religious interpretation of life," "the wide-spread feeling that the much-abused monks and saints of old possessed a secret which we, for all our worldly wisdom, have lost," he goes on to explain the need, in the face of these hopeful signs of interpreting the Catholic Faith to the modern world:

> Did but the unbeliever realize aught of the true character of our Faith, of its bearing on modern problems, of the infinite depth of meaning concealed under those apparently external and even childish doctrines, of its applicability to all the needs of the human soul, as well to the soul of the twentieth century as of the first century man, he must needs reverence and study it, and likely enough would be converted to it. This cannot, however, be unless the Catholic will also realize that these unbelievers are often very earnest and sincere men, who, without being conscious of it, agree in much with the teaching of the Faith, and are ever ready to welcome the truth, if they can but find it. He must explain in terms comprehensible to the average modern man the significance of his dogmas, of his theological terms. He must be able to show what relation his Faith bears to modern thought, where it agrees with the results of modern thinkers, and where it corrects them, and in order to do this he must himself possess a sympathetic understanding of those thinkers and of modern thought in general. He must penetrate to the real significance of much that on the surface is simply anti-Christian and immoral. He will then come to see that, in so far as this teaching, whose falsity and evil is to us so obvious, has really been influential, it has owed this influence to the truth and goodness that it contains, and that it is often one-sided and partial, rather than simply false. . . . He will, moreover, be able to show how that error and inadequacy necessarily arose from the lack of due completion owing to ignorance of other truths. In this way the apologist will at once interpret and defend the Faith. He will defend it by showing how the deepest truth attained and preached by non-Catholics is but a small portion of a vast and complete whole. In making clear the partial agreement he will explain to non-Catholics the significance of the truths, that have been so deeply, if so imperfectly, apprehended by their own teachers. Thus will he interpret the Faith. Such interpretation is itself the best defense.

In conclusion the writer shows that the trend of modern thought is toward some form of Pantheism and that Catholic apologetics will best meet this particular tendency by explaining Catholic mysticism, and especially the true sense in which God is present in his creation.

This is the field of modern apologetics. It is a method of approaching the non-Catholic mind, not by a violent denunciation of his error, but by an interpretation of the truth to him, based upon his own admissions. Pope Pius X denounced Modernism as the "synthesis of all heresies;" in a certain sense the Catholic Church herself is the synthesis of all heresies, that is to say, she contains all that is true in heresy, stripped of the falsehood, as part of the whole body of the truth. It is by explaining the whole as well as the part that you can best protect the Catholic mind against the insidious half-truths of Protestantism, and establish with the non-Catholic a common ground of argument upon which both can stand, thus differing from two passionate antagonists who shout each other down across seas of difference. It means not only tearing down falsehood, but building up the structure of truth, a process ten times more difficult. The field extends, as Mr. Watkin indicates, to the press, the pulpit, the platform, the novel, the stage, the opera. The first requisite in this interpreter-apologist must be a sheer honesty of mind that will no more overstate than understate the truth, and in the second place sympathy and consideration for the other man, to say nothing of patience and great good will. "A heart of steel toward self, a heart of flesh toward others, and a heart of love toward God."

WILLIAM T. TALLON, S.J.

XL—The Young Man and Illustrating

DURING thirty-five years' work at illustrating, remarks of this kind were often made to the writer: "I have a boy who is no good at school, but he is very handy with a pencil. He is always copying comic pictures out of the papers. In fact, he is a born artist and I want your help in getting some place where he can learn the business. I don't care whether he earns anything provided he gets a start." This tells the beginning of a tragedy to one who has witnessed the struggles and failures, heart-breaks and suicides that follow the "art life," as it is termed in the metropolis. Here only applied art will be considered. The fine arts, painting, sculpture, architecture and decoration, at their best, are another story.

First, let it be impressed upon the reader that "born artists," from the parents' viewpoint, are common. All children delight in scrawling lines on paper in an endeavor to picture animals first and then the human figure. It is their instinct for mimicry that shows itself in this form. To be able to copy a picture is an ordinary trait in children. To make an original drawing indicates talent that occurs but seldom. A child will learn a nursery rhyme readily, showing he can copy, or mimic, but to compose a nursery rhyme is a work of genius. This fondness for drawing in children should be turned to good use in the schools along with the essentials of education. We must make our living with our hands and, beside the incidental education of the eye and the brain, there is no more delicate muscular training for the hand and fingers than the proper guidance of the pencil in designing. Beyond this, instruction in the principles of design, composition and color cultivate an appreciation of the beautiful, which has its beneficient influence all through life, no matter what work one engages in. Should there be true art fire in a youth it will burst into flame later, whether he goes through an art school or not. This fire will burn the longer when sustained by an art training.

If after school-days a boy has demonstrated to those whose judgment is competent that he has exceptional talent in drawing, then the question of developing it further may be considered, provided there is sufficient means available to support the student during at least four years in an art school, and during variable periods after school before the work becomes remunerative. Manual skill and means will not avail much, unless the student possesses that most important of all requisites, brains. Manual dexterity without brains is the reason why the art schools of the country are turning out yearly thousands of students that never "arrive" anywhere. Correspondence schools are the worst sinners in this respect, for the brainless are their victims. While mentioning art schools it may be well to warn parents not to send a child to a coeducational art school. Coeducation is dangerous at all times, but positively wrong in an art school.

There is a growing demand for young men with trained art talent, those who possess imagination, invention, correct judgment in composition and color combination, and who can produce original ideas in the branch of applied art that they take up, for the applications of art in the industries are becoming more numerous as the country prospers. There are architecture, mechanical drawing, the planning of all manner of construction work, furniture and automobile designing, art in advertising, book, newspaper and magazine illustrating, designing book plates, book covers, retouching of photographs and preparing catalogues of merchandise, not to mention all the applications of photography to the printing press. For the Catholic young man, therefore, with exceptional artistic genius, combined with strong character, perseverance and, above all, initiative, there are opportunities, but for those with only ordinary talent, weak character and dull intellect disappointment is certain.

As for the illustrator's salary, the ordinary wages for a good commercial artist is about $35.00 a week. Those with the brains to produce new ideas, originate designs, etc., can command $100.00 weekly. The men with exceptional genius are usually too independent to submit to weekly employment, they aspire to a studio where they can work without restraint or compulsion. Among these are the book and magazine illustrators, cover designers and advertising illustrators. As their living expenses increase, however, in the same ratio as their income they are usually no better off than those on a regular salary and without responsibility. When after years of labor one secures the approval of the public, and of art managers who buy drawings, as has Gibson in illustration, Lyendecker in cover designing, or M. Power O'Malley in humorous subjects, then one can command his own prices.

Newspaper illustrating is now confined chiefly to the reproduction of photographs and for this the writer must confess primary responsibility. All that is left for the artist is the cartoon and what are termed "comics," though they are usually disfigurements. A cartoonist should have the brains of an editorial writer and exceptional skill as a draughtsman. Such a man commands a good salary. Those who "perpetrate" the comics should be fined instead of paid. This lowering of the standard of caricature in the newspapers can be traced to one man. This proprietor unfortunately owns a string of papers and he encourages draughtsmen whose only qualification is their ability to distort the human features and figure. The public unthinkingly accepts without protest these demoralizing pictures and the rival papers follow blindly. The fact is that many of the makers of these so-called comics should not be permitted to draw at all, for the deformities they produce are destroying respect in the minds of the young and of the foreigner for beautiful ideals. For obvious reasons we Catholics should discourage these iconoclasts by every means in our power. STEPHEN H. HORGAN.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

Fort Lauderdale, not Florida

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a recent issue of AMERICA there appeared an editorial in which the action of the Fort Lauderdale bigots was condemned. Those self-styled "patriots" violated every principle of justice and true Americanism when they deprived Miss Murphy of her position as public school teacher because she is a Catholic, and at the same time made an attempt to protestantize the public school system. The readers of your editorial may come to the conclusion that Florida as a whole is a State where bitter bigotry is rife. This conclusion would not be correct and would at the same time be positively injurious to the State.

It is with pleasure that we state that Lauderdale is not Florida, and that the bigots of that unimportant little burg are not representative of the citizenship of the Land of Flowers. Practically every paper in the State, with the exception of one or two Jacksonville dailies, condemned Lauderdale's action, and I believe that you could not find one fair-minded man in Florida who would think of upholding the publicly-voiced, ignorant prejudice of the Lauderdale patriots. Very many of the staunchest opponents of bigotry in Florida are non-Catholics, and your readers may be glad to know that the Fort Lauderdale incident is unique, and throughout the State is spoken of as "Fort Lauderdale's Shame." No man can condemn too scathingly the un-American and contemptible conduct of the Menace-fed school trustees and the mob assembled in public gathering in Lauderdale, but it would not be fair to Florida to regard the whole State as approving of or making its own the shame of the bigots of the county seat of Broward County. The Lauderdale meeting was reported by Bert Thompson, a Protestant member of the Miami Herald staff, and in the same connection no man could have done more splendid work in the cause of justice than Mr. Stoneman, the Protestant editor of the Miami Herald.

St. Augustine, Fla. ✠ M. J. CURLEY,
Bishop of St. Augustine.

The Defects of the Catholic Press

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The few mild remarks which you allowed me to contribute to AMERICA in a recent issue seem to have roused many of our editors to wrath, and yet not one of them has come forward with an adequate defense of the Catholic Press as it exists today. In fact one and all tacitly admit that my "strictures" apply to—the other fellow's paper, and they confirm that ancient tag: "When you have a bad case, abuse the plaintiff's attorney." They certainly have done it with a vengeance and my old gray head has had to bow beneath the blast of invective. I am, however, still undaunted and return to the charge. This lack of defense proves to me that there is mighty little to defend and when I find no less an authority than Father John Burke of the Catholic World, repeating, in more direct tones, my own complaints, I consider the case proved. He avers that of recent years there has been an improvement in the Catholic press. I agree with him. If there has been any movement at all, then improvement was inevitable. I do not agree that the Catholic Press Association is an infallible sign of spring; the idea is excellent but as for the execution, well, we are discussing the press not the Press Association. It is something to have got beneath the hide of self-complacency and to have sown a true seed of doubt in the editorial mind that perhaps all is not perfect. It is something to have obtained from some Catholic editors an admission that they consider their readers so illiterate and unintelligent that they feel compelled to "write down" to them. If this were true, what a terrible indictment of our parochial schools! It is also something to have discovered that most of our Catholic editors don't know the difference between "good journalism" and "highbrow journalism."

Although I have not the length of service of that outspoken and courageous editor, the lamented Father Phelan, yet I am going to assume an old man's privilege and offer two pieces of advice to my friends on the Catholic press: (1). Give your readers your best. Don't assume that everyone who buys a Catholic journal is a "rough neck" to whom you must write down. Don't assume that the whole Catholic community is ignorant. That is a mistake and an impertinence. Get the best writers your paper's purse can afford, let your own articles show that they represent the highest that is in you. After a while you will begin to realize that the people don't want "highbrow stuff" but they do want, and will instantaneously respond to "good stuff." This brings me to my second piece of advice. (2). Don't be dull. The most terrible charge that can be brought against most of our papers is that they are dull, dry and dreary. A paper dull is a paper damned. If you can't be interesting, get out, you need neither be learned nor witty, but you must be interesting. "Good stuff" is interesting stuff. This may sound very platitudinous but after all is said and done the best editor is he who can judge good material when he sees it and can be interesting when he writes.

Most of my critics have taken me to task for what they are pleased to term the "harshness of my tone." Do they forever expect to receive nothing but complimentary pap? The trouble with the whole Catholic community, to say nothing of the press, is that we are too fond of scratching one another's backs and telling one another that we are "the finest ever." We are a pretty good lot it is true, but it would become us more if we talked about it less. This trait, when it comes to the Catholic press, is a danger. Our papers must be shaken up, they need a mental cathartic to rouse them from the drowsy dullness in which they are now sunk, and I hope some one will come along soon and administer it. In conclusion I owe my old friend in Brooklyn an apology. His Latinity was not corrected by a suffragette but by a brother priest. I beg his pardon for the error.

New York. N. Y. E.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have read with considerable interest the articles on the Catholic Press in three of the latest issues of AMERICA. N. Y. E. is a pessimist, Father Irwin an optimist, and Father Burke the discerning critic, though I do not agree with his conclusion that the "quantity" of our Catholic papers "has diluted quality." First of all, 200 papers is no quantity for 16,000,000 Catholics, and, secondly, according to Dr. Ryan, "quality presupposes quantity." However, I am not taking issue with Father Burke's article nor exception to Father Irwin's optimism. I want to register an emphatic protest against N. Y. E.'s unwarranted diatribe on the Catholic press, in which he attributes all the defects of the same to the editors, whom he classifies as follows: "A seminarian with a 'spoilt' vocation; a barber turned printer; a 'medico' without patients, or a busy priest with a large parish; amiable amateurs, and to this class most but, thank God, not all our clerical editors belong, or they are failures in the art of journalism. No one can deny it." As an ex-seminarian, not an editor, though one who has had some experience on a Catholic daily, I do deny it, and wish to take exception to this particular New York editor's conceit. The burden of his argument is that our Catholic editors are not "trained men," and "with the best will in the world they will fail in journalism, Catholic or secular." The famous ex-seminarian, John Gilmary Shea, though known mainly as an historian, was a successful journalist in both the Catholic and the secular field. And pray, how many of our successful secular journalists of today and yesterday were "journalists in the technical sense of the word" as N. Y. E. would have us understand it?

There is no reason why a conscientious ex-seminarian, even one with a "spoilt" vocation, should not be a successful Catholic journalist, provided he has the necessary journalistic ability. With his Catholic college education, his seminary course of philosophy, and usually one or more years of theology, the ex-seminarian has an advantage over the average Catholic layman, from the standpoint of Catholic education as a requisite to Catholic journalism, and even over the "busy priest" editor, as he can devote all his time to his profession. True, a number of ex-seminarians, who sought the haven of the Catholic press, have proved distinct disappointments to editors and publishers, but it was owing mainly to the fact that they were passing through the critical state of adjusting themselves to the world and were not given the proper encouragement, or they had gone once more into the wrong field of endeavor. But will N. Y. E. please tell me how many of our alleged defective Catholic weeklies are managed and edited by ex-seminarians? So much for his fling at the ex-seminarians. Our "clerical amateurs" ought to be well able to defend themselves; the "barber turned printer" may yet know how to give this "hoary" gentleman a "trim," and the "medico without patients" will, I trust, prove to be enough of a surgeon to perform the necessary cerebral operation for this "Perfect Fool." Regarding his charges that the Catholic press is "ill-edited, illiterate and un-American," I would simply say that our Catholic press compares favorably with the average secular press, "that prodigious weed of the literary garden," as a reviewer put it, some years ago, in the Catholic World. That there are defects in our Catholic press, and many improvements needed, no one will dispute, but to put the blame on the editors alone is ridiculous. They are generally overworked and underpaid, and more than charitable in the services rendered.

In my opinion, the defects of our Catholic press are also attributable to the following causes: (1) Apathy and insufficient support on the part of the Catholic laity and Catholic societies. Ask priests taking up the census with a view to statistics how many families they find with Catholic papers, and you will be surprised at the considerable number that have not subscribed for even one Catholic paper. In how many clubrooms of our Catholic societies do you find any Catholic periodical literature at all? The percentage is small. And how many Catholics have you ever observed reading Catholic papers in trains, street cars, and other public places? You would think we had no Catholic press at all, if you judged by public interest, and I have made my observations in Columbus, Milwaukee, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, Chicago, and elsewhere. (2) Not enough cooperation on the part of our clergy, or, as Father Irwin puts it in his paper: "The clergy as a body have not utilized their talents sufficiently in taking up the pen." Despite their many duties they are in a better position to write occasional contributions than the ordinary layman. (3) Lack of initiative, of business enterprise, of business courtesy, and other business principles on the part of our Catholic publishers and editors.

Before closing I would like to call attention to the one constructive idea of N. Y. E, of "dividing the country up into ten or twelve sections, each capable of supporting in the financial sense a well-edited paper," as being in embryo the best plan of "how to improve the Catholic Press." But why stop at the weekly press, which shall ever be weakly as a newspaper as long as it has to depend for its news upon the secular press. If we could once get our ten or twelve Catholic centers organized in such an endeavor, we should have no trouble in going a step farther and establishing a chain or syndicate of Catholic dailies.

Monroe, Wis. HENRY C. STEINER.

The Sincerity of Anglicans

To the Editor of AMERICA:

My original letter was written entirely without controversial intent, and solely as a plea to Roman Catholics to avoid ridicule of Catholic practices among Anglicans and to acknowledge the sincerity of their efforts for the Catholic Faith wherever these are found. Condemn us for our errors, surely, but at least give us credit for so much of the truth as we do accept and practise; that is all I have asked. However, as other writers propound to me queries in an effort to break down my position, I can only answer them according to my lights, though I am perfectly sure that no arguments by themselves can produce either a worth-while Roman, or a worth-while Anglican, Catholic.

(1). First, then, must I repeat that I do not regard sincerity as a criterion of truth? I certainly do not feel it incumbent on me to question the sincerity of converts to Rome, like Manning, Newman, and the rest. I only ask the same of you in judging us, or converts to us from Rome or from the Protestant world. You may be right or wrong, so may we; but each of us sincerely feels that he is right, and sincerity is the only possible criterion by which we may judge the acts of others.

(2). Certainly Christ founded One Church, not a three-branched one, and for ten centuries that One Trunk grew, undivided. The "branching" process of this One Trunk began, let us say, to take E. J. F's date, in 1054, and we have no longer one undivided trunk, nor yet a "second branch," for there had never been any before, but a two-branched Tree; finally, along about 1538, not "within recent years," we have a second "branching" process and a three-branched Tree.

(3). I did not say that England never "cut itself off from Rome," but "from the Catholic Church." To identify Rome and the Catholic Church is, of course, to beg the entire question at issue, "a common fallacy well known to every logician." As to doctrine, I can only repeat that, the above being the case, "the 'true doctrine' of the Anglican Church" must be "that of the Catholic Church, whatever individual heretics may say, and however numerous" or exalted in ecclesiastical rank "they may be." I do not excuse the authorities of the Anglican Church for permitting its heretical dignitaries to exercise their functions within its fold, but I am loyal to that Church because I have a sincere conviction of its true Catholic character.

(4). I do not say that one who secedes from us to Rome commits formal sin, but that for us who believe in the Catholicity of the Anglican Church to secede would be formal and mortal sin. For one who rejects this Catholic claim of ours, secession may well be a duty; but it none the less "grieves the hearts of those left behind" to see what they regard as the sacred gifts of God repudiated.

As to Mr. Rusk's questions: (5). Certainly, sentiment is not "a valid reason for remaining true to any form of religion." Only the other part of the statement which he quotes from me is such a valid reason, as I thought was made plain by the form of the sentence. The loss of sentimental associations is no light thing, but every convert from one form of religion to another willingly sacrifices them to his conviction of truth.

(6). The entire Catholic Church, of course, accepts and, when not negligent of its trust, uses seven sacraments. I, as a Catholic, do so also. The Anglican portion of the Church has never officially "repudiated" any of them; what makes many people think she has is her statement that only two of these were ordained of Christ as "generally," i.e., in the older and literal sense of that term, universally "necessary to salvation." True, the doctrine of our official catechism is incomplete, but to omit does not imply repudiation.

Cleveland. JARED S. MOORE.

Change the Name

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I should like to second the suggestion of your Atlantic City correspondent, Mr. Joseph A. McNamee, to the effect that we call our parochial schools hereafter "Catholic Public Schools" or "Catholic Free Schools." Either of these designations would be more in keeping with the American school spirit than the present name. Parochial school sounds somewhat narrow and suggests England, whereas "Catholic Public School" or "Catholic Free School" has more of the free universal Catholic ring to it. Our schools exist throughout the land. They are comprehensive in their teaching. Not merely Catholic faith and morals are inculcated in them, but everything that makes for the best practical citizenship of the United States. Let us therefore designate them hereafter by the name of Catholic Public Schools or Catholic Free Schools.

New York. T. J. DILLON.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. McNamee's letter of some two weeks ago raises an old, old issue that I fear, will never be settled. However, since the question has come up again, may I say that those who are opposed to our parochial schools would not be won over by a mere change of name? Their opposition is founded on prejudice, not on reason. They feel that our schools are inferior; they do not think so. Some of this feeling will probably wear away in time; a great deal of it, however, will always remain, no matter how we name the schools.

Washington, D. C. G. A. WEEMS.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

Reflections on Mexico

WE have been told by an American high in official position, that the present is no time for playing politics. This is true. If government is to be taken seriously, there is never a time for playing politics, and as our American referred to the Mexican question his statement is doubly true. The question is lifted far above the grimy pit of politics. It rests in the sphere of humanity. Humanity, common humanity; nothing more.

We have shuddered at the revolting tales that have come from many parts of Europe. Of the deviltry set loose by Carranza and his following; of the unspeakable cruelty to venerable priests and consecrated virgins; of the wholesale debauching of Mexican womanhood; of these things we have been permitted to hear nothing. Only within the last few weeks has the American press which boasts its liberty to speak the truth without fear and without favor, been allowed to present a faint picture of the hell that has been let loose on Mexico during the last eighteen months.

Now we know something, a little at least, of what that hell has meant. We have heard the pitiful stories of broken-hearted mothers whose daughters have been ravished before their very eyes and in the public streets, by officers of the Carranzista mobs, miscalled armies. A little, but only a little, has been said in our free press of the horrors which men and women who have spent their whole lives in the service of God and their fellows, have been forced to undergo. Of churches polluted in a fashion which only the most degraded of savages could conceive; of orphanages, schools, colleges wantonly destroyed; of a reign of pillage and despotism under the banner of liberty and equality; of these things we have at last been permitted to know something.

And on the heels of this new knowledge comes the news that the villain responsible for these horrors, is to be recognized as the one man capable above all others of restoring peace, happiness, civilization, to Mexico. This man degraded in the eyes of all decent citizens of whatever nationality, this man from whose vile hands the blood and the shame of outraged womanhood can never be washed, is now free to proceed on his diabolical course, strengthened by the official recognition of other nations.

All will now be well. And why? Because a liar has promised henceforth to tell the truth, a murderer that he will no longer imbrue his hands with the blood of women and children, a wanton destroyer that he will forever devote his toiling days and sleepless nights to the peaceful upbuilding of his unhappy country. And the pledge, the guarantee, that these things will be done? Nothing, nothing whatever, beyond the word of a villain.

A Much-Abused Proverb

LAMB once wrote to a friend: "I poke out a monthly crudity for Colburn in his magazine, which I call Popular Fallacies, and periodically crush a proverb or two, setting my folly against the wisdom of nations." It would indicate unlimited conceit in any man to brush aside cavalierly what has come to be received as the sublimated wisdom of centuries. Still it must not be forgotten that proverbs like flowers may sometimes run to seed. Like an opiated Malay, they often run amuck, with fatal consequences. Ask why our stage is being so shamelessly perverted, why our "best sellers" are often but a thinly-disguised defense of sin, why our magazines and papers are unblushing in their illustrations, and you will be suavely told that the people want all this, that they are hungrily clamoring for it and insist on getting it. Then we have hurled at our poor medieval, reactionary heads the magic reminder that the voice of the people is the voice of God. Here, we are assured, is an argument of overwhelming force, which must dispose forever of the appeal for decent reticence and restraint. We must hear the voice of God, and nowhere are the echoes of that voice more distinctly perceptible than in the demands of the people.

What, then, is to be said about this accepted proverb? Must it be discarded as an empty delusion? No, the proverb is all right; it is the application that is wrong. Bichloride of mercury has its uses, and sometimes may be very serviceable, but it would not be advisable to take it with our coffee in the morning. Proverbs, like everything else outside of God, have their limitations. When the people of Israel clamorously called for the leeks and garlic of Egypt, their voice was certainly not that of God. Neither were the rancorous shouts of those who thirsted for the blood of Christ. In the first centuries of Christianity, the Roman people were insatiable in their greed for panem et circenses. Was this the voice of God?

To say that God revokes His Commandments simply because men would have them revoked is a blasphemous attempt to stultify His wisdom and His sanctity. Heaven's law is immutable. It is not meant to be the plaything of novelists or dramatists, or artists or journalists, or anyone else; nor have the people any power to dispense from the Decalogue, either in their individual or their collective capacity. To belaud a writer because of what is flippantly styled his frank and fearless disregard of conventional morality implies either a denial of the very existence of a Divine law or a deliberate and flagrant violation of the obligation which that law imposes. It is un-Christian, or rather anti-Christian, to regard morality as something merely conventional. We are confronted with a question that demands a decisive answer. Are we going to accept this pagan theory of morality, so indulgent and soothing to rebellious appetites or the doctrine of a revealed code of morals given by God? Frankly expressed, it means a choice between paganism and Christianity.

What Flag in Florida?

A GENTLEMAN named E. E. Ropes, an inhabitant of Deland, Florida, pens a serious objection to an editorial which recently appeared in AMERICA under the caption, "Florida; An Incident." "I can understand that you want to deprive American citizens of their right to select teachers for their children," postcards this critic, "but I do not see clearly why you should publish that fact to the world."

Besides the point of the editorial in question, there are a great many other things which Mr. Ropes does not see clearly. He does not see clearly that before the law all citizens of all faiths and of no faith at all are equal. He does not see clearly that to exact a religious test as a condition of holding public office is a direct violation of the Constitution of the United States. He does not see clearly that the public schools are not Protestant, but public institutions. He does not see clearly that he is living in the twentieth century, and in a country in which, with the possible exception of his own neighborhood, religious freedom is a reality to which Americans have been long accustomed. In fact, to judge from his correspondence, the eyes of Mr. Ropes are curtained by the darkness of an ignorance which he no doubt would term "medieval."

No one is disposed to quarrel with the right of the public authorities to select proper persons to hold public office as teachers in the public schools. The procedure, however, criticised by AMERICA, and to which every citizen who is an American in reality as well as in name must take exception, is the undenied and undeniable fact that a thoroughly qualified young woman was excluded from holding a public office on the sole ground that she was a Catholic. Is the intellect of Mr. E. E. Ropes equal to this obvious distinction? The good name of Florida has not gained in luster by this shameful proceeding, and the public press is hastening to assure the country that this recent example of petty and un-American bigotry does not represent the spirit of the people of Florida. AMERICA accepts this protestation in good faith, but when a candidate for governor can, without hindrance, base his campaign on a calumnious appeal to anti-Catholic bigotry, and when a prominent newspaper can warn Catholics to silence under threat of a lynching-bee, the inhabitants of the other States of the Union have reason to ask what flag is floating over Florida.

"Specializing"

SO vast has grown the store of the world's learning and so wide the field of man's activities that nowadays no one can hope to master thoroughly more than a small portion of the erudition, research and information with which scholars, scientists and publicists have filled our libraries. But those who have, for instance, made their own the contents of Professor Puffendorff's nine volumes on the Greek particle prin, are able to pass an examination in M. Percé's exhaustive work on the nocturnal habits and dietary predilections of the Megaderma Gigas, or can quote from memory John Hopkins' alarming statistics about the 1857 apple crop, are inclined to regard with scornful pity men and women who give their lives to the study and practice of asceticism.

How unreasonable and inconsistent is this attitude of mind Mr. Edward I. Watkin admirably shows in his recent work on "Catholic Apologists." "When every department of knowledge and art is specialized," he asks, "why should any man wonder that the Church has her specialists of the spiritual life?" Continuing, he wisely observes:

> Unless a few, preeminently gifted for a particular art or branch of science devoted their lives to that art or branch of science to the sacrifice of all else, however attractive, that interfered with their life's work, no progress could have been made in art or science, and the vast majority, able to do a little in such art or science, would suffer for want of expert guidance. We all need religion and the spiritual life. Only a few can give up their lives to these things, but these few are essential if any true spirituality is to sanctify the lives and secular pursuits of the many.

Could anything be more reasonable than the foregoing assertions? Classical, scientific or economic learning is not an essential part of life for all men, but religion and a certain amount of spirituality is absolutely essential. Heaven is filled with saints who never glowed over the varied functions of the particle prin, who died in utter ignorance of the giant bat's vespertinal preferences, and who departed this life long before the apple famine of 1857. But countless multitudes of the men and women who are listening now to the "unexpressive nuptial song," would not have had that happiness, unless the Church were always rearing sons and daughters who successfully "specialized" in asceticism and prayer.

The Hyphen and the Knights of Columbus

COMMENTING on Colonel Roosevelt's address to the Knights of Columbus, on Columbus Day, the New York Evening Post, with the pettish superciliousness into which it often lapses when it speaks of Catholic affairs indulged itself in the following statement:

> Col. Roosevelt's vehement denunciation of the hyphenated American takes on significance from the fact that his speech was delivered before an audience presumably made up of hyphenated citizens, the Knights of Columbus being the most representative of Irish-American organizations.

This of course is exceedingly smart; it has the ring of "mama's boy" about it, but like most issues of a snobbish precocity its sting is softened by its inaccuracy, a product no doubt of prejudice, rather than of ignorance. In the first place the society known as the "Knights of Columbus" is not an Irish-American organization at all, unless indeed Canadians, Filipinos, Mexicans, Cubans and Panamanians are Irish-Americans. Even if the organization were confined within the limits of the United States, the Post's assertion would still be false. On its American registry there are names that suggest most varied ancestry. Irish names are there, so too are English, German, French, Belgian and Hungarian names, but the men who bear the names are for the most part American by birth, while every one of them is too American in spirit to invent a hyphen for the sake of casting a slur at an individual or a society. The Post solemnly opines that the audience which listened to Mr. Roosevelt was "presumably made up of hyphenated citizens." Really, with a rising inflection! But after all, true Americans are in no danger: the presumptions of a prejudiced scribe are inocuous, even when they are ignorant. And any Irish-Americans who happened to be present at the celebration may take comfort from the fact that despite the presumption of the Post, a fellow-citizen who was twice President of the United States, eulogized their kind by stating that some of the best Americans he had ever known were men with Irish names. For the rest, the offensive editorial is clear gain, if for no other reason than that it shows forth the spirit of a paper which at a time when public opinion is exercised over patriotism, does not hesitate to apply a name associated in the mind of the rabble and of one scribe at least with disloyalty to the Flag, to a body of honorable citizens who deserve well of the State. After all "yellow" journalism is of various kinds, but all these kinds are contemptible.

The Shame of the Metropolis

LAST week there was staged in New York a theatrical exhibition which will reap a liberal harvest for hell before the season closes. According to the New York Tribune, "it is a show in which the word 'woman' is never uttered without a grimace, a smirk, a wink, or a leer." "Stripped womanhood" is the comment of the New York Sun. Further quotations are unnecessary and would be unprintable. The dramatic critics unanimously agree upon the unparalleled salaciousness of this infamous exhibition, but write their condemnation in terms that are a lure for the lustful. This is the precise effect intended by the press agent.

With the degenerates who seek to stir their jaded animalism at this house of sin, we are not concerned. The evil wrought by these indecent productions lies deeper. Unless respect for womanhood prevails in every grade of society, duty, chivalry, honor, with whatever ideals of lofty thought and courteous bearing men may now cherish, will be replaced by the law of the jungle. Reverence for woman, whose purity is of supreme importance to the race, is founded on the truth that she is made in the image of God. The chivalry which grew up under the influence of the Catholic Church invested her with a robe of glory, and made her in Shakespeare's phrase, "a thing ensky'd and sainted." Without this reverence civilized life is impossible. But this modern exhibition exploits her as an animal, makes her a thing of public shame, a being scarcely cleaner than the unhappy outcast of the midnight streets. And New York looks on with applause. "It is a play," writes the Globe, "first in its appeal to the affections of New York theatergoers," who form at the box-office an unclean mob like that which prowled about the gates of the stranger in Gabaa, and wrought the desecration of womanhood.

No appeal can be made either to the common decency of the men who staged this infamy or of the men and women who support it, for they have none. Nor is there any legal remedy at hand. Public opinion will neither countenance the enforcement of city ordinances now feebly existing, nor permit the adoption of new measures calculated to check these public incitements to immorality. Vice must be served. To this degraded level has public morality fallen in New York. Nor will the evil be confined to the metropolis, for from New York the active campaign for the public degradation of womanhood spreads to the theaters of the country.

The only effective remedy lies in the formation of a morally healthful public opinion. Primarily, this is the work of the Church, and it has occupied her zeal since the day when from the Pincian Hill Peter looked down upon the frightful immorality that was ancient Rome. Nor will the efforts, if properly directed, of the secular societies be without value. It is quite possible that the Society for Social and Sanitary Prophylaxis, the American Social Hygiene Association, the Committee of Fourteen and similar organizations which have anxiously noted the ominous modern preoccupation with eroticism, would better attain their purpose by abandoning the ever-recurring problem of the city streets to focus attention on the immorality of the New York stage. Their efforts will have the support of all loyal Catholics. In making this pledge, it is sad to note that certain Catholics seeking social and political preeminence, signalized their apostasy from Catholic principles of morality by their presence, heralded in the press, on the opening night of this civic scandal. It must needs be that scandal come, but woe to that man through whom it comes, particularly if he calls himself a Catholic. It were better that he had never been born.

LITERATURE

Animalism in Literature

SOME weeks ago a certain radical weekly expressed displeasure over some remarks about Ibsen which I made in these columns. The writer, who signed himself "P. L.", disagreed with my views on what was proper reading for girls and with my criticism that in Ibsen's plays there was a strong infusion of animalism. P. L's observations have, it seems to me, a general interest in disclosing some of the moral and intellectual qualities characteristic of those who boast of being advanced thinkers.

P. L. begins his article by citing with approval the admirable example of a certain Mr. Bertram Russell, a lecturer in a girl's college, who asked the members of his class at what age they would have their daughters read "Madame Bovary." This French novel may be described as a peculiarly nasty study of sensual psychology, written with elaborate and painstaking art. It is interesting to learn that in at least one non-Catholic college for girls such a book is held up by a teaching member of the faculty as a classic which every girl must read some time. The only debatable point about it is when she should read it, in the grammar school, the high school, or the college. But read it she must.

There is still another revelation in P. L's article. He expresses mild wonder that Tolstoy, Anatole France, Nietzsche, Strindberg and D'Annunzio are not read in Catholic school-rooms. This must mean that they are commonly read in non-Catholic schools, at least according to P. L. I hope he is mistaken. The authors named take up their position boldly and uncompromisingly in defiance of all recognized law. All of them display their moral perversion by exhibiting the same fascination for animal sensations that Ruskin's fly does for "the brown spots on the road." There are whole pages in any one of these authors which no journal or magazine in the city of New York would dare print.

Cicero, for instance, would never have recommended such books to his daughter. Indeed, we cannot recall off-hand any pagan of antiquity who would dream of advocating such literature, in the education of a girl, unless haply the girl were a slave-girl destined for the service of Astarte. We doubt very much whether there were ever an ancient pagan so confused in his moral judgments as many a modern pagan who writes popular novels and smart articles for the magazines. This is the penalty for sinning against light. What kind of books would these modern pagans recommend to girls being deliberately trained to dishonorable womanhood?

The argument with which the modern pagan supports his shameless views is that innocence, to be a virtue, must be a state of perfection arrived at consciously through a knowledge of life, and not a negative thing resulting from ignorance. The mind must welcome and harbor all sorts of impurities before the soul can prove its own purity! The chambers of the brain must be packed with filth and then be swept out again before they can be called clean! Those guardians of the soul's high welfare, instinctive modesty, sensitiveness to sinful approaches, and reverence for spiritual ideals, must be swept aside and crushed by an entering horde of base and hideous specters before the will can assert itself on the plane of virtue!

That the soul may be innocent and yet strong, virtuous and yet guarded jealously against foul intrusions, delicately white and beautiful without entering into parleys with slimy experiences, is still, thank God, a concrete fact in life, however it may transcend the reason of a modern pagan. I shall not mention names like Agnes or Cecilia or Teresa or Elizabeth of Hungary; they may have little weight with "advanced thinkers." But surely I may be allowed to point to Eugénie de Guérin. She belongs to literature. Sainte-Beuve and Matthew Arnold both bear testimony to her genius: and the latter of the two great critics calls her "one of the rarest and most beautiful of souls." What was the attitude of this intellectual and gifted woman toward the kind of books which the modern pagan recommends to girls? We quote the following passages from her Journal: "These geniuses have blots that shock a woman's eye. I detest to meet with what I do not choose to see, and this makes me close many a book."

> The devil tempted me just now in a little closet where I stumbled upon some romances. Read a word or two, said I to myself, let's look at this, look at that; but the titles were very displeasing to me. There were "Love Letters of a Nun," "The General Confession of a Rake," and other histories of that character. Fie upon the very idea of my reading such trash! I am no longer tempted now, and am only going to remove those books from the closet, or rather to throw them into the fire.
>
> Began to read "Delphine," which is, people say, an interesting romance. But romances do not interest me much. . . . I cannot take pleasure in the play of unregulated passion. Of all novelists I like only Scott. His manner puts him apart from others, and above them. He is a man of genius, and perhaps the most complete, and always pure. You may open him at random without the eye being startled by one corrupting word. Love, with Scott, is a cord of snow-white silk, to bind his drama together. It does not seem to be so with "Delphine." The little I saw of it boded ill, and I find a very false trick in it. . . . Madame de Staël incessantly does the wrong and preaches the right. How I hate these women who, with greedy passions, talk to you all the while from a pulpit!

P. L. thinks I am very unjust in my accusation that Ibsen is preoccupied with the animal in man. Indeed my view seems to him so unwarranted by the facts that he seriously doubts whether I have ever read a play of Ibsen's. It is too much to expect that P. L's views and mine can coincide on what constitutes animalism in literature. Moreover, it is manifestly impossible on moral grounds to appeal to the public for a decision with citations of chapter and verse. Fortunately, P. L. in the very act of defending Ibsen from the charge of animalism gives his own case away in a manner most convenient to me, and instructive to the reader. P. L. does not admit my charge of animalism: any other but that. "Better reasons for thinking Ibsen unfit reading for Catholic girls, reasons which do not depend upon absurd statements, can be found in the writings of Ibsen's admirers." Then P. L. goes on to quote Bernard Shaw, who says that Ibsen is both "a man who declares that it is wrong to do something which no one has seen any harm in," and also "a man who declares that it is right to do something hitherto regarded as infamous." P. L. very obligingly lends me more thunder from Ibsen's greatest German critic who calls Ibsen "a Lucifer," "a dethroner of the Divinity," "a beautiful, sad, strong angel who wishes to be a counter-Creator."

P. L. admits that Ibsen is opposed to all accepted moral laws, but denies that he is animalistic. I should feel helpless to meet a situation like this speaking in my own character; for P. L. and I employ different languages and different modes of thought; but doubtless he respects and understands the late George Meredith. P. L. has very likely read "Beauchamp's Career." He will recall easily the remarkable character of Doctor Shrapnel in that story. It is unnecessary to point out that Meredith has drawn the character of Dr. Shrapnel with love and sympathy. I do not think I shall offend literary critics if I ascribe the opinions of Dr. Shrapnel to Meredith himself. What does the Doctor say in his famous letter to young Beauchamp?

> Society is our one tangible game, our one roofing and flooring in a world of most uncertain structures built on morasses. Toward the laws that support it, men hopeful of progress give their adhesion. If it is martyrdom, what then? Let the martyrdom be. Contumacy is animalism. And attend to me, the truer the love the readier for sacrifice! A thousand times yes. Rebellion against society and advocacy of humanity run counter. Tell me society is the whited sepulcher, that it is blotched, hideous, hollow; and I say add not another disfigurement to it; add to the purification of it. And you, if you answer, what can only one? I say that it is the animal's answer. . . . Society is the protection of the weaker, therefore a shield of women who are our temples of civilization to be kept sacred: and he that loves a woman will assuredly esteem and pity her sex and not drag her down for another example of their frailty.

This impressive warning was issued to Beauchamp at a time when he was under temptation and opposed, like Ibsen, Strindberg, Shaw and the others, to the received notions about marriage. "He was for demanding that society should take a new position in morality, considerably broader and adapted to very special cases." Meredith calls it animalism, and it is animalism, the very heart and core of animalism, from which all the grosser forms of animalism, like questionable episodes and suggestions and dallyings with the indecencies, are the surface indications. And this animalism is rampant in Ibsen. It is a misfortune not to be able to see it.

P. L. tells us that "what most of Ibsen's men and women ask of love is that it shall be not so much a physical satisfaction as an ideal relation, that it shall include loyalty, an affection that endures, sympathy of mind with mind." If Ibsen's men and women asked for this before they married we should not find fault with them. But almost invariably they wake up to a poignant need of this love after they have bound themselves by marriage vows, and they take their sudden wakening as a valid excuse for violating deliberately made pledges. It is the commonest of temptations to endeavor to evade the pressure of an actual obligation by questioning the justness of the law, or by parading the violation of the law as an exceptional exigency, a personal necessity, an individual and concrete act of virtue. The arguments for such an evasion, be they never so eloquent, are always drawn from the animal side of man. Nora Helmer feels that the laws are all wrong; and so she cannot in conscience live any longer with her husband. The discovery succeeds a dislike for him, suddenly conceived. She abandons him and her children. And at the end of the play we feel that she is going where she can eat macaroons in peace, and will meet someone as devoted as Dr. Rank, but less physically repulsive, who will make love "not so much a physical satisfaction as an ideal relation," which "will include loyalty, an affection that endures, sympathy of mind with mind," in other words one who will make married life more comfortable and less of a demand on the spirit of sacrifice and the virtues of fidelity and fortitude. Is it not very natural to regard such an attitude as leaning more toward the animal than toward the spirit? JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

REVIEWS

Library of Irish Literature: Thomas Davis. By T. W. ROLLESTON, M.A.; Wild Sports of the West. By W. H. MAXWELL; Legends of Saints and Sinners. By DOUGLAS HYDE, LL.D.; Humors of Irish Life. By CHARLES L. GRAVES, M.A.; Irish Orators and Oratory. By T. M. KETTLE; The Book of Irish Poetry. By ALFRED PERCEVAL GRAVES, M.A. New York: The Frederick A. Stokes Co. $1.00 each.

Messrs. Alfred Perceval Graves, William Magennis and Douglas Hyde are the editors-in-chief and the sponsors of this new "Library of Irish Literature." Into the first volume Mr. Rolleston has garnered almost everything that is of permanent value in the prose and poetry of a very popular Irish writer, though some may regret the omission of the essay on "Udalism and Feudalism." The sketch of "The Irish Parliament of James II" will convince the admirers of Davis that, in addition to eminent poetical gifts, he had the qualities of a genuine historian.

Tears and laughter ever mingle in the history of Ireland. So, after the elegies of Davis, we have Maxwell's "Wild Sports of the West," edited by the Earl of Dunraven. "Wild Sports," the work of an "Anglo-Irishman," is a crisp and breezy account of hunting, fishing, etc., in picturesque Connemara. Had the author better understood the soul of the people, he would have more delicately told the rather improbable legend of the Ursuline novice, Rose Roche.

The "Legends of Saints and Sinners," collected and translated from the Irish by Dr. Douglas Hyde, prove that the Celt is a born story-teller. Here wit and humor, pathos, crisp epigram, dramatic power and insight are heaped together in rich profusion. And if most at least of the stories are not true, "there is no water in the sea, and no River Shannon in Ireland." One legend, "St. Paul's Vision," which resembles the "Debate between the Body and the Soul," known as the "Visio Philiberti" and ascribed to Walter Mapes or to Grosseteste, Bishop of Lincoln, has a power of conception and phrase truly Dantesque. Mr. Hyde says that the spirit of banter in which St. Patrick, the Church, and, we add, St. Peter, are treated in certain legends just stops short of irreverence. Many Irish Catholic readers will feel that the jaunty and rollicking treatment of certain things and persons deeply reverenced by their countrymen has overstepped the limits. The stories, it is true, are from Irish sources, but are they always representative of Irish life and Irish views?

In the "Humors of Irish Life" there is much wit and fun, but a little too much coarse and boisterous joviality. The list of authors represented includes "George A. Birmingham," Padraic Colum, Lynn Doyle, etc., but Canon Sheehan's name is not found. Yet, while he exposed its faults and weaknesses, who has painted the real "humors" of Irish life better than the creator of "Daddy Dan"?

The genial Canon is, however, represented by one poem, "The Soul-Bell," in the "Book of Irish Poetry." There are many good anthologies of Irish verse, such as Miss Charlotte Brooke's "Irish Poetry" (1789), Mrs. Tynan Hinkson's "The Wild Hart," etc. The present anthology claims to illustrate the leading features of "Gaelic, Hiberno-English and Anglo-Irish verse." Classified under such heads as "Irish Nature Poetry," "Later Bardic War Poetry," "National Poetry," "Religious Poetry," etc., the poems are of more than ordinary excellence; many are extremely beautiful.

"Irish Orators and Oratory" brings the reader from the impassioned periods of Burke and the invectives of Grattan and Flood, to the calmer yet still powerful eloquence of Russell of Killowen and the leaders of the Irish Party. Some of the oratory may be a little old-fashioned, but everybody will admit that it is always manly and sincere: the voice of earnest men pleading for justice and right. J. C. R.

The Path to Rome. By H. BELLOC. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

It would be a real calamity if the dread of controversial works should keep any one from reading this most enjoyable book. For its title, be it said at once, is not a metaphorical one. While praying in a church a dozen years ago, Mr. Belloc was moved to take a vow to go a pilgrimage from Toul to Rome by the straightest road. "I will walk all the way and take advantage of no wheeled thing; I will sleep rough and cover thirty miles a day, and I will hear Mass every morning; and I will be present at High Mass in St. Peter's on the Feast of St. Peter and St. Paul." He set out forthwith, and this delightful volume is the account of the adventures he had, the districts he traversed, the reflections he made, the stories he heard and the songs he sung.

The author's four causes for "the pleasing sensation of order and accomplishment which attaches to a day one has opened by Mass" can be found in no ascetic writer; his conviction that:

> Catholic men that live upon wine
> Are deep in the water, and frank and fine;
> Wherever I travel I find it so.
> Benedicamus Domino.

may awake the wrath of Prohibitionists, but all right-minded readers will mourn with Mr. Belloc Europe's loss of that unity in religion which "makes people of utterly different races understand each other," for now they "are divided by the worst malignancies of nations and classes, and a man does not so much love his own nation as hate his neighbors."

When the pilgrim had covered on foot some 378 miles, however he broke his vow, though non sine Dis; and spent his last franc for a railway ticket to Milan, where supplies awaited him. As much of the country through which the author traveled and which he observed with a soldier's eye, is that we now read about daily in the war dispatches, the first American edition of "The Path to Rome" is very seasonable. Mr. Belloc has illustrated the book with his own pen-and-ink drawings. W. D.

The Real Argentine. By J. A. HAMMERTON. Illustrated. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.50.

The sub-title of this book describes it accurately: "Notes and Impressions of a Year in the Argentine and Uruguay." The author does not pretend to give us a history of these countries or a minute analysis of their constitutions. Neither does he marshal before us long rows of government statistics. He tells what he has seen and delivers a plain, unvarnished tale of his experiences, which are not very novel or exciting. He knows the language of the Argentine, and has tarried long enough among the people to get a fair knowledge of their ways and their ideals. The author spares his readers the silly tales and slanders, so common in books of this kind, against the Catholic Church, her practices and priesthood. But, for reasons not very definitely given, he does not profess much admiration for what he has seen of her work in South America. His point of view and his acquaintance with Spanish documents and State papers must surely be at fault when he writes: "The Spanish civilization in America was not in every way superior to the civilizations it destroyed and supplanted."

Mr. Hammerton is evidently disappointed in the Argentine. He recognizes the great future before the country, but has opened his eyes too wide to her shortcomings. He has words of praise for Buenos Ayres, for its comparative freedom from shameless and open vice, for the Argentine mother, for the strong and tender family affections, the temperance and abstemiousness of the people. But he finds fault with too many things. His impressions of Uruguay are more cheerful. He brings out clearly the different customs, character and ideals of Argentines and "Orientals," and is evidently more pleased with Montevideo than with her more pretentious rival across the river. Studied in the light of recent events in Mexico and Colombia, Mr. Hammerton's remarks on the Drago doctrine and the South-American distrust of the United States afford interesting and instructive reading.

J. C. R.

Some New Sources for the Life of Blessed Agnes of Bohemia. By WALTER W SETON. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $2.00.

Blessed Agnes of Bohemia is a figure but slightly known in Franciscan story. It is indeed a matter for some surprise that one, who for twenty years was a friend and correspondent of St. Clare and who was intimately associated with the latter in the long struggle with the Holy See for the confirmation of the Rule of St. Clare and the cherished privilege of poverty, should not be more familiar to students of hagiography. The reason has been perhaps the comparative scantiness and inaccessibility of the materials of her life-story. And hence the value of the work under review must be manifest. It is not meant to be a life of Blessed Agnes, but it does supply the materials in Latin and German for her future biographer. The book is issued by the British Society of Franciscan Studies and forms Vol. VII in their series.

Born in 1205 and dying in 1282 after forty-six years spent in religion as a Sister of St. Clare, Blessed Agnes was a contemporary of both St. Francis and of St. Clare. She came of a family not less saintly than noble. One of her ancestors in the royal line of Bohemia was Wenceslaus the Holy. And it may be of interest to observe that between 1205 and 1227 there lived four royal persons connected by bonds of blood and marriage, three of whom were destined to be raised to the altars of the Church, and the fourth, Blessed Agnes herself, to be beatified. St. Elizabeth of Hungary, wife of St. Louis, Landgrave of Thuringia, was the first cousin of Agnes. St. Hedwig was the sister of the mother of Andreas II, uncle of Blessed Agnes. The Emperor of Germany, Frederick II as well as the English King, Henry III, sought the hand of Agnes in marriage, but her resolve to enter the newly-founded Order of St. Clare could not be shaken. And it is as a Franciscan of the first generation and as one who took a leading part in keeping alive the spirit and ideals of the Founder during the half century that followed his death that she deserves most to be remembered and revered. In the present volume are included an excellent introduction, a fourteenth century Latin version and a fifteenth century German version of her life. These are followed by a fourteenth century German version of St. Clare's letters to Blessed Agnes, a valuable bibliography and historical notes. Mr. Seton's work is a monument of pains-taking research and keen discernment.

D. J. C.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

To those who have been reading with interest the articles and letters that have recently appeared in AMERICA regarding the merits and shortcomings of the Catholic press, the current number of the Catholic Mind should have a special appeal. The opening paper is the address on "The Educative Influence of the Catholic Press," which the Rev. Richard H. Tierney, S.J. delivered last August in Toledo at the fifth annual convention of the Catholic Press Association. In the second article Mr. Michael Williams tells how "A Catholic Writers' Syndicate" could be formed, and in the concluding paper of the number Mr. Laurie J. Blakely calls attention to "The Good Qualities of Our Catholic Press."

In the first article of The Month for October, Father Sidney Smith, while answering certain arguments advanced in the Westminster Gazette for August 28, studies that vexed question, "How to reconcile the Divine goodness with the Divine omnipotence." "French and English" by John Ayscough paints a fine bit of landscape, ennobled with the higher things of the soul and God. One sentence from Alfred Rahilly's "The Religious Philosophy of Kant," though not a complete summary of the article, is suggestive: "The distinction between theory and practice consecrated by Kant has initiated a widespread dualism in religion, philosophy and politics." Dorothea Birch describes the golden "Haloes" of the past, seen through the prism of memory. James Britten writes of "Anglicanism at the Front." His concluding sentence is worthy of consideration: "The faith of the Anglican soldier is nominally that of the Church of England: and 'what does the Church of England stand for'"? Father Thurston's signature to the timely article, "All Souls and Its Three Masses," is a guarantee of accuracy, originality of research and scholarship. Poems by H. E. G. Rope and Theodore Maynard, a "Tale of Crime"; by M. A. Courtois, "The Menace of the Slacker" by Father Keating, "Miscellanea," among them a few interesting pages on "An Advantage of Catholic Historians," "Reviews" and "Short Notices" round out the message of the magazine.

In "Eltham House" (Hearst's International Library Co., $1.35), Mrs. Humphrey Ward's latest novel, there is a very remarkable Jesuit novice who was eagerly received into the Society shortly after he had divorced his wife and become a "Roman." Though he stayed but a year "in Wales," during that period "he appeared to have shrunk in stature, in breadth of shoulder, in power of limb," and to have been transmogrified indeed into "a meaner and lesser man altogether." That surprised a little John's sometime wife, Carrie, who chanced to meet him one day he was out walking alone, for she had often heard that the "hard training" of the noviceship "was physically as good for a man as the training of an army recruit." The story, which is told with the author's usual literary skill, describes London's social and political life before the present war, and tells what happened to a young couple who tried to imitate the career of Lord and Lady Holland. They failed completely. Though the author essays to excuse with a perverted text from Holy Writ, her frail heroine's crimes, Carrie owns before she dies: "We did wrong; we broke a law which is there to defend men and women from themselves; there to save the State; and that City of God which is within the State."——A badly misnamed story entitled "God's Man," which is being widely advertised as "the most powerful novel of the year," because it tells "the truth about New York," threatens therefore to become a "best seller." But the unclean thing only deserves to be picked up with the tongs and thrown into the fire.

Calendars and almanacs for 1916 have begun to appear. The "Almanac of the Sacred Heart" (Apostleship of Prayer, 801 West 181st Street, New York, $0.12), has so many friends and admirers that it needs no recommendation beyond the simple announcement that this attractive annual is once more ready for distribution. In cover, illustrations, theoretical and practical explanation of the League and other practices of piety, in its stories and calendar, the "Almanac" is all that it has been in previous years and more.——"The Pope's Peace Offering Calendar" (Sully, Kleineich, 373 Fourth Avenue, New York, $0.60) is a tastefully-printed panel-book of fifty-two pages, on each of which is a quotation, bearing on peace, chosen from the Encyclicals and Decrees of the last four Popes. Only the greater saints and feasts are mentioned. The "Catholic Calendar" (Mt. Carmel Gild, 50 Franklin Street, Buffalo, N. Y., $0.60), the proceeds from the sale of which are to be used for the Gild's work, is also arranged in weekly panels containing lines from the writings of various authors, for the most part Catholic. "St. Michael's Almanac" and "St. Michael's Kalender" (Mission Press, Techny, Ill., $0.20) are English and German editions of the same illustrated almanac, and other German annuals are the "Mt. Angel St. Joseph's Kalender" (Mt. Angel, Oregon, $0.25), and the "Regensburger Marien Kalender" (Pustet, $0.20).——"The American Jewish Year Book" for the year "5676" has come from the Jewish Publication Society of Philadelphia, and has much to say about "Recent Jewish Progress in Palestine."——The nuns of St. Bride's Abbey, Milford Haven, S. Wales, have out a new catalog, accompanied by samples of Dame Catharine Weeks' pictures, the "midget prints," ten cents a dozen, being quite pretty and novel.

"The Co-Citizens," by Cora Harris ($1.00); "The Riddle of the Night," by Thomas W. Hanshen ($1.25), and "Jerusalem," by Selma Lagerlöf ($1.35), are three of the latest contributions of Doubleday, Page & Co. to the endless chain of fiction. In the first an impossible female politician turns peaceful Jordanstown upside down in her efforts to eliminate the "word male" from the local election laws. In the second an omniscient detective whirls the reader through a maze of the bewildering incidents thought necessary to unravel the motive and detect the perpetrator of a mysterious murder. In the third volume "the only woman winner of the Nobel Prize for Literature" tells a story of the peasants of Dalecarbia, the province of her adopted home in Sweden. "They were good Catholics once," we are informed; "now they are stalwart defenders of Lutheranism." The chapters of the novel, fashioned "with noble idealism, the wealth of imagination, the soulful style which characterize her works," bear ample testimony that Dalecarbia's religious conversion brought as its chief results for these unlucky peasants "heresy, revolt and division," spiritual unrest and material unhappiness.

The seventh edition of Father A. Gratry's "De la Connaissance de l'Ame" (Paris, Pierre Téque) will convince the new readers and the old admirers of the learned Oratorian of the spiritual beauty of his perceptions and the nobility of his views. The nature of the soul, its faculties, its immortality, its destiny are here studied in a keen, sure and masterful analysis enhanced by a winning charm and unction in the style. The book is not a series of rigid philosophical theses, but a chain of calm and solemn meditations on those great questions forever calling for the sound conclusions of reason and faith.——R. & T. Washburne, Ltd., of London, have issued, with the permission of the America Press and the author, Rev. Francis B. Cassilly, S.J., the first European edition of the latter's valuable vocational brochure, "What Shall I Be?" This edition with the four American editions completes the forty-fourth thousand, and almost equals the circulation of "Vocations," a booklet of similar character by the Rev. William Doyle, S.J., who has edited the new edition of "What Shall I Be?"

"Robert Hugh Benson, an Appreciation" (Herder, $0.90) is not the authorized biography of that gifted convert, for Father Martindale is engaged writing that, but it is a sympathetic tribute from a friend and admirer.——Clara W. Hunt, who is in charge of the children's department of the Brooklyn Public Library, has out a useful little book called "What Shall We Read to the Children? (Houghton, $1.00). She gives teachers and parents sensible suggestions regarding the choice of books for the little ones and about forming in older boys and girls a correct taste in reading.——Mr. Elihu S. Riley's "The National Debt that American Protestants Owe to Their Brethren of the Roman Catholic Church" (Published by the author, West St., Annapolis, Md., $0.30), is a pamphlet in which the non-Catholic author enumerates and proves the multitude of blessings which Americans owe to the Catholic Church. Looking at the subject in its general phase, he shows how the Catholic Church has been the bulwark of civilization and the mother of true liberty and offers interesting details regarding Lord Baltimore's early efforts to establish religious freedom in Maryland. One point which the author brings out well is the fact that all help received from foreign countries at the time of the Revolution came from Catholic nations. The pamphlet is a testimonial to Mr. Riley's fair-mindedness, and its perusal would amply repay Catholic and Protestant alike.

EDUCATION

Mother Goose and the New York School Board

THAT she lived in a shoe was the least of her cares. The Gooses had always been pioneers along unblazed trails; it was their privilege. When the founder of the family had fixed upon this strange object as the place of his abode, folk merely shook their heads, as idle folk will do in presence of the unusual, and with Mr. Pickwick had concluded to regard the choice as an eccentricity of genius. Years had come and gone, but with their passing the fortunes of the old race had waned. The sole surviving relic of this once proud family was a venerable dame who having buried her own, sought to warm the cockles of her chill and lonely heart by instructing the children of other people. Her fame as a preceptress grew. Soon she was singularly like a feathered mother with one chick too many; and to a being with the mentality of a Plymouth Rock, how very great a little can sometimes be! In short, if old accounts are to be credited, ultimately she had so many children she didn't know what to do!

EMERGENCY TREATMENT

One cannot but pity this poor old lady who no doubt had never seen the inside of a Normal School, and had never so much as even heard the magic names of Froebel and of Pestalozzi, as she struggles so bravely but so inefficiently, with her self-adopted brood. Failure was inevitable; it is one of the burdens which we have inherited with our nature, that while in the ideal order our desires may be the presentiments of our capabilities, we cannot in a world of actualities, mount to success even upon the longest ladder of good intentions. The textus receptus which still keeps the memory of this early school alive, tells us that like all who spurn professional training to rely on native genius, this venerable lady soon reached the limit of her resources. Her wits, never of the sharpest, had been dulled by corroding time. The quaint old schoolhouse creaked with apprehension, as swarms of light-hearted children raced from heel to toe and even dangled perilously from its frayed laces, or cut strange capers along the length of its silent tongue; while in the crisis, the distracted preceptress could devise no better corrective than a recourse to violence and a violence too, which involved a violation of the sanctity of the individual child. All the pupils, sad to relate, by a perversion of elemental justice and Montessorian canons, were soundly whipped and sent to bed; a procedure which settled the matter for the night, but obviously left the main perplexities of this tangled matter quite untouched.

CROWDED SCHOOLHOUSES

This ancient Goody by a trick of fate had been born out of due time. Had she been privileged to extend, like another Tithonus, her trembling years beyond their allotted span and to gaze upon the city of New York in the closing months of 1915, she would have found this hobbledehoy among the cities, beset by the same predicament which caused her so many unquiet moments in the days of yore. For New York too, has so many children that she doesn't know what to do with them. She wants to send all of them off to school, and each risen sun beholds, unless a fog rolls in, nearly a million of our youngest on a matutinal pilgrimage to P. S. No. 26 or No. 55, as the case may be. New York does not name her schools; the world's supply of great men is too restricted. But unhappily or happily, depending upon the School Board's point of view or Johnny's, some forty thousand children must be kept at home for certain periods of the day, because there is no room for them in the schoolhouse. The enemies of the School Board claim that for reasons of alleged but spurious economy, these pennyshavers are unwilling to erect buildings in proper number. The Board with its friends, few but faithful, replies that when the welfare of the children is in question, it spends the money of the people with a lordly liberality, but adds that not even the builders of the Pyramids or the Tower of Babel could put up buildings fast enough to accommodate the ever-increasing hordes of these small Huns who knock at the doors of the little red schoolhouse, persistently demanding an "education." Wherever the truth may lie in this contention, (and it is true that many a New York school building has been found too small on the very day of its opening) for many years a large number of children, necessarily enrolled on the part-time plan, have been given but one-half or three-fourths of the time usually devoted to scholastic work.

HELP FROM GARY

To relieve this congestion, New York, trained in the wisdom of ages, never once thought of whipping the children soundly and sending them all off to bed. Instead she looked to the West, and out on the edge of the Indiana literary belt, amid the sand and the soot of the steel-mill town of Gary, her eye decried an educator answering to the name of William Wirt. Rumor had at times busily wagged all her many tongues in elaboration of Mr. Wirt. Mr. Wirt was a successful Superintendent of Schools. As if this were not enough, it was hinted that he smiled scornfully at the laws of nature and had quietly reversed many a useful and time-honored pedagogical proverb. He could, so the troubled emissaries from New York were told, make two bodies occupy the same space at the same time. He believed that the rod should be spoiled, and the child spared. To cause two blades of grass to flourish where before but one had quickly withered, was to this Luther Burbank of the schools, a trifle that one might perfect before breakfast. A two by four "lot" in the rear of a Manhattan apartment-house, he could convert, the bolder whispered, into a rolling prairie; and with a quickness of the hand deceiving the celerity of the eye, could conjure a quart into a flask whose previous limit had been but a slender pint.

THE MAN OF DESTINY

These reported prodigies caused Mr. Wirt to assume in the calculations of the School Board, the welcome visage of the Man of Destiny. Their siren tones lured Mr. Wirt from the dunes of northern Indiana to the wilder civilization of the metropolis. He was assured that after a residence of but six short months, he would be permitted to return to Gary, taking with him in token of New York's grateful appreciation, the golden gift of ten thousand dollars. But with the heather of Manhattan under his feet, he would be asked to imagine himself in Rhodes; in the City of Scorn and Doubt, he would be requested to show how two schoolboys might be housed in a space designed for one, and by a reversal of the trick, to demonstrate the circumstances under which a pint of coin for teachers' salaries might suffice for the quarts, hitherto dipped with such prodigality from the Pactolus stream of the city's revenues.

A brave man is this Mr. William Wirt, none braver; of this there can be small doubt. He accepted the invitation so pressingly tendered. It involved a sacrifice. He left his Indiana homestead on the sunkissed southern marge of Lake Michigan, where one is nightly lulled to sleep by the gentle swish of the waves that ever and anon fills the hollows of silence, as the fiery roar of the blast-furnace sinks into a reluctant and momentary rest. Reliquit omnia servare Manhattam.

He came into a strange land of buses and of subways, of maltreated vowels and cacophonous diphthongs, to work in patience against the bitter criticisms of the usual opponents who fear the passing of anything that is old, even if it is worthless, and to bear up against the not less retarding adulation of unintelligent partisans who had proclaimed that, like Aladdin, he could put up palaces over night merely by rubbing the lamp of his intellect.

HAS HE FAILED?

That Mr. Wirt has labored faithfully at his exceedingly difficult task is quite plain even to those who are disposed to deny all merit to his theories. Unfortunately, however, it seems almost equally clear that New York after requesting Mr. Wirt to demonstrate the value of his system to the city, has not seen fit to supply him with the materials and the special equipment altogether necessary if the system is to be fairly tested. Controversy on non-essential points, has clouded the issue; personal antagonism has been allowed to enter, it is said, into a question which can be settled only by fair experiment. This fact, if fact it be, may explain why after six months of trial, professional opinion is so divided as to the possibility of reorganizing the schools of a large city on the Gary Plan.

Mr. Wirt's own opinion of his methods will be discussed in a subsequent paper. Here it will be enough to note that despite the pilgrimage of the city fathers to Indiana the old question of overcrowding is quite as acute as ever. In October, 1915, Manhattan still has so many school children that she doesn't know what to do. She needs another shoe, perhaps a number of them; or, if Mr. Wirt has diagnosed the trouble rightly, she needs shoes built on an entirely different last.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

ECONOMICS

The Economic Fetish

"WE are told of a method of city-planning devised by the Australians for their new capital. Heretofore cities have "just happened," or were at best only partially the result of a great civic design. According to the new method they will arise from the waste like the magic vision of an Eastern tale, though probably by slower degrees and with greater effort. They will combine into one the most approved ideals of beauty; utility, economy, sanitation and whatever may be suggested by the most modern developments of science and art. By adopting in advance the design of an entire city as it comes from the master mind of some great architect its promoters hope to realize the city beautiful in all its perfection while eliminating at the same time, as far as possible, all future changes and needless expenses.

In this connection a wise reflection is made by the Chicago Herald. It turns upon the definition of what most intimately constitutes a city. Should the architect's vision be ever so perfect and stone be cemented to stone as the planner designed, should experience justify the prudence of his forethought and neither science nor art outrun his wisdom for long years to come, yet there would still remain, undetermined and undeterminable, the most important part of that city. The ideals of the men and women who inhabit it constitute the city proper, not stone and brick and mortar. "Better a thousand times that a city should begin with a fixed ideal of civic righteousness, a spirit of fine cooperation, than with even the perfection of design. But this idea and spirit are a growth and not a sudden creation. They are the city that is always building or unbuilding."

THE MODERN SOCIAL GOSPEL

There is a truth expressed here which cannot be insisted upon too much at the present moment. We readily welcome any method that can give to us the most ideal future city which modern science can construct. We do not undervalue material progress or the influence of purely material environment. We gladly admit the immense aid that can be given even to the preservation of the spiritual order, the prevention of vice and the safeguarding of virtue, by means which in themselves do not transcend the merely physical and economic sphere. But the great delusion of our age is to seek in purely material causes the entire reason for both the vices and the virtues of society. The modern gospel is summed up in the preachment of fair wages and adequate housing, with all their attendant comforts and pleasures. Beyond this men can be left to the free and unhampered expression of their own selves. There is no original sin inherited by the children of Adam, and no sin in fact except poverty or the purely economic causes of poverty. Remove these and heaven has already come. This is the kingdom, they tell us, which Christ preached. To promote its coming is religion in its highest perfection. To speak of other-worldliness before the possibilities of this earth have been realized by the new economic progress or the coming social revolution is folly and irreligion.

A POPULAR DELUSION

Such is not merely the error of the now disrupted Socialistic factions, but its acceptance reaches far beyond their circles. It is the fallacy of the rationalistic schoolroom as of the popular platform. It runs through our modern sociology and can be found threading through the glowing periods and elegantly turned sentences of many a Sunday's discourse in non-Catholic churches. It is, of course, the necessary conclusion of materialistic reasoning in as far as this can admit of no causes outside the physical order. Its lofty language and rosy phraseology about moral uprightness, spiritual ideals and religious instincts, are ultimately reducible to only two conceptions: matter and motion. Its very references to a Divinity, couched in the most unctuous phrase and throbbing with apparent emotion, are nothing but the purest Materialism. But its appeals are none the less deceptive, and at times purposely so, in order to attract to itself the more religious elements among the public and to simulate a standard of morality that might seemingly be confused with Christianity. It does not even stop short at the blasphemous effrontery of proclaiming itself the only primitive and unadulterated doctrine given to the world by Christ.

THE GRAIN OF TRUTH

Socialists maintain that in rejecting their theory of economic determinism, which was conceived by Marx as the last expression of economic materialism, we are setting ourselves in contradiction to all history and the current evidence of our day. Other Materialists are no less positive of the certainty of their own kindred views. Like all errors, the modern fallacy which sees in matter alone the determining factor of human life and makes of economic conditions the turning point of every action or institution vitally influencing human conditions, is not without its grain of truth. That religion and all religious institutions, including the Church, are begotten of economic conditions and change with them, as economic determinism teaches, is utterly false and the Catholic Church is its living contradiction. That purely human institutions have on the other hand often been greatly affected by the economic conditions of the times we can just as readily admit. That excessive poverty, like excessive riches, is in general likely to be detrimental to spiritual progress is no less evident. Of all these facts the Catholic Church has taken full account. She does not therefore deny the influence of economic conditions, as Socialists claim, but neither does she exaggerate and extend it beyond its proper sphere. Economic conditions can be the occasion of sin, but the free will of man alone can be the final determining factor. It is as wrong to deny this freedom of the will and seek the universal explanation of human actions in environment and economic conditions, as to overlook entirely the latter.

OTHERWORLDLINESS AND ECONOMICS

In all things the Church has ever observed the golden mean. She has been accused of idolatry because, after the example of her Divine Master, she has never forgotten the physical, bodily element in man. Today she is accused of a dangerous otherworldliness because she likewise acknowledges the spiritual element and teaches that above all things man possesses a human soul which must be saved at any cost and any sacrifice. "See to man's bodily welfare," she tells her faithful. "House him as becomes a child of God, clothe and feed him in his need, for you are doing it all unto Christ and for love of Him. Defraud not the laborer of his hire, for that which by fraud hath been kept back from him crieth unto heaven." She neglects neither charity nor justice as regards the things of this life. But, like Christ, she does all this only that men may be able the more perfectly to know, love and serve God, which are the ends for which they were created and for which alone all earthly things are placed at their command.

The Church admits that economic conditions may be helpful or injurious to the preservation of morality, but she knows that the evils of society must be remedied above all things by spiritual means and religious renewal. Socialism and materialism of every kind have set the world awry. They have created a topsy-turvydom which is bewildering the minds of men. They would expel all vice by economics and then let virtue flourish of its own account. There is no need of creeds and preaching and of sacraments or ministration of the Church. Economics will suffice and social service is religion in its perfection. All else is a dangerous distraction.

THE IDEAL CITY

Far different, however, is the truth of the matter. Social regeneration can come only from within. It must begin with the reformation of the heart of man, made to accord with the will of God. Without this, environment and economics are of no avail. Together with this, they may be a secondary aid of the greatest importance. Correct social ideals themselves, from which a new and regenerated order of society can spring forth, must be the outgrowth of religion, and can endure only as long as religion itself is vital and effective within a nation. Let us design and build, not in the spirit of pride, but in the spirit of social helpfulness, the most perfect modern city, and introduce therein the most ideal economic conditions, taking account of the rights of all classes and of every individual; but let us remember that religion must be its soul to quicken it into a true and healthy social life, to unite all its citizens into the one enduring brotherhood which is founded on the Fatherhood of God. Virtue will not come through economics, as the modern world teaches, true economics must be the fruit of virtue and Christian principles. If we seek the one thing necessary, God's love and His service, all else will flow from it, both social health and civic righteousness. But unless He keeps the city, they labor in vain that build it. It can but share the fate of Babylon and Nineveh.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Attention is called to the fact that the United States has at last ceased to be only "a billion-dollar country." At a single bound we have achieved the feat of adding another quarter of a billion to the estimate for expenditures to be submitted to Congress. The enormous increase is to be accounted for almost entirely, we are told, by the additional hundreds of millions to be expended on our army and navy. "Thus," says an Eastern paper, "the warm rhetoric of preparedness is being translated into terms of cold cash."

There recently died at Bilbao one of Spain's most accomplished scholars, Father Pompilio Diaz, a member of the Congregation of The Pious Schools. He was the founder of the "Calasancian Review" and was one of the chief workers in the Spanish translation of the Summa of St. Thomas. Father Diaz was widely known as a linguist and in difficult cases acted as official interpreter of the Spanish State Department. A philologist of original views he had long studied that baffling linguistic puzzle, the origin and relations of the Basque language. Unlike von der Gabelentz who saw an affinity between Basque and the Berber dialects, and Finck who recognized in it a descendant of the ancient Iberian, Father Diaz asserted the grammatical relationship of the Basque and the Turkish. The death of this pious and scholarly man is a distinct loss to Spanish letters.

The progress made by the Young Men's Christian Association in the United States and Canada is truly marvelous. There are now 2,575 branch associations, with some 700,000 members, owning property valued at $1,000,000,000, and employing in their local, county, State, international and foreign work more than 4,000 secretaries. As evidence of further activity, it is announced that the Chicago association has plans laid "for the erection of twenty new association buildings in the next ten years, creating major positions for more than 100 secretaries additional to its present staff; while the Detroit association, numbering 7,000 members, "contemplates the erection of a group of new buildings that will more than double membership capacity and the force of secretaries." The Christian Advocate, which furnishes these facts, speaks in glowing terms of this Christian work, like unto a minister's, giving opportunity for the teaching of the Bible, for personal evangelism, for "the discovery, development and leading of young men and boys for and in Christian work for their fellows."

The Outlook proposes two reasons why men should know what women in general think of woman suffrage before extending the vote to them, since there is question not only of conferring a privilege but likewise of imposing a duty. The two reasons are:

> 1. Because, if women have a right to vote on any question, they surely have a right to vote on the question whether they will assume an added duty and responsibility to the duties and responsibilities which they are already carrying.
> 2. Because, if they are hostile or indifferent, the extension of the suffrage demanded by the few, but necessarily extended to the many, would be dangerous to the community. We have too many indifferent voters.

There are considerations, much more fundamental, which must determine the rejection or acceptance of woman suffrage; but these two are not to be overlooked. As to the practical working of woman suffrage the Outlook believes that, after impartial investigation, it can entirely subscribe to the judgment of ex-Ambassador Bryce, that "such changes as there have been, for good or evil, are less marked than their advocates or opponents expected." This appears to refer purely to the political aspect of the question.

The economic progress made by the American negro during the last fifteen years is shown in a report recently presented at the sixteenth annual convention of the National Negro Business League. The 20,000 negro business enterprises which existed in 1900 have increased to 45,000. Particularly remarkable is the amount of farm property acquired by them. The value of their lands and buildings alone has risen from $69,600,000 to $273,500,000. This does not include their stock or farm implements. It is evident that Catholics cannot ignore the spiritual interests of these people. Besides other missionaries, the Josephite Fathers are especially devoting themselves to this work. We learn from their organ, The Josephite, published at San Antonio, Texas, that there is at present a Priests' League whose members contribute $5.00 annually to this mission labor; a Sisters' League, composed of religious communities, making the same yearly offering, and a League of the Laity, whose members pay the modest sum of twenty-five cents a year. It is highly desirable that the number of these benefactors should steadily increase. The plan of the Director-General, Mgr. John E. Burke, is to raise a $100,000 Annual Fund, to be given to the Southern Bishops for the establishment and maintenance of schools and churches for the colored people. It is to be carried on by yearly contributions of one dollar each.

The novelty of certain methods intended to make learning a pure delight, despite the old adage about its "bloody entrance," is so constantly taken for granted that we are prone to forget that whatever is good in these practices is likely to have been in use long ago in Christian education. In this connection the Canadian Messenger quotes the advice given by St. Jerome to the Roman matron Læta for the education of Paula:

> Let her have an alphabet of little letters made of box or ivory, the names of all which she must know, that she may play with them and that learning be made a diversion. When a little older, let her form each letter in wax with her finger, guided by another's hand; then let her be invited by prizes and presents, suited to her age, to join syllables together, and to write the names of the patriarchs down from Adam. Let her have companions to learn with her, that she may be spurred on by emulation and by hearing their praises. She is not to be scolded or brow-beaten, if slower, but to be encouraged that she may rejoice to surpass, not envying their progress, but rejoicing at it, and admiring it whilst she reproaches her own backwardness. Great care is to be taken that she conceive no aversion for study lest the bitterness remain in riper years.

There is more wisdom in these few words than in many volumes of modern pedagogic literature. Yet the Saint has another lesson of even greater importance to inculcate which the latter ignores, but which contains the entire reason for our Catholic schools:

> Let her be brought up as Samuel was in the temple, and the Baptist in the desert, in utter ignorance of vanity and vice. Let her never hear bad words, nor learn profane songs, but as soon as she can speak let her learn some part of the Psalms. Let no one speak to her but such as are strangers to the maxims of the world.

Here we see how immeasurably the lesson of the Saint surpasses that of our modern pedagogues. If our Catholic schools cannot fully realize this ideal, they at least approach to it as closely as possible. Such other-worldliness will the more perfectly fit our children for their duties in this life, which are not minimized but emphasized by religious training.

There was a time when Catholic young men and women, who found after a few years struggle with life that their school days had passed without much fruit, and had left them seriously handicapped, looked in vain for Catholic evening schools in which they might make up their deficiencies. In many cities Catholic colleges offered courses in philosophy or other advanced studies; but these, though very useful in their way, appealed, as a rule, only to the fairly well educated and did not at all meet the needs of those who found themselves ineligible to lucrative positions on account of their lack of general education. As a consequence, many young people had to turn to the public night schools and to the classes given after working hours, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. If the Church did not at once supply what was wanted, it was not because she was not alive to the situation or because she was not in sympathy with the aspirations of her children to overcome their shortcomings. The reason was that she already found her ordinary day schools too great a drain on her resources to attempt anything else. The need, however, has been constantly kept in mind, and in many places efforts have been made to meet it. To instance but a few evening schools, Loyola College, Baltimore; Young Men's Catholic Association, Boston; St. Peter's College, Jersey City; St. Francis' Xavier's College, New York and St. Joseph's College, Philadelphia, now offer evening classes that for variety and efficiency leave little to be desired. These schools, as far as possible, have been put under the auspices of laymen. Boston's Catholic evening school, is identified with the Young Men's Catholic Association; Philadelphia's with the Catholic Alumni Society, and New York's with the Laymen's League. That the classes have been successful is attested by the surprisingly large attendance they have had, the number of pupils rising in some cases to more than a thousand. Classes are conducted in almost any subject for which there is a sufficient demand, but the staple courses are philosophy, pedagogy, languages, law, mathematics, book-keeping, stenography, typewriting and accounting. What has been said of these large evening schools is true also to a certain extent of others that are conducted on a more modest scale. It is not too much to hope, therefore, that a general movement has now been launched which will interest priests and laymen. Such a movement would take the ground from certain complaints which, if not altogether fair, have nevertheless some foundation in fact.

Katherine Fullerton Gerould seems to be a rather cold admirer of our public schools, for in the October Atlantic Monthly she delivers her opinion of them in this wise:

> Each class that comes into college has read fewer and fewer of what are called the classics of English literature. An astounding number of boys and girls have read nothing worth reading except the books that are in the entrance requirements. An increasing proportion of the sons and daughters of the prosperous are positively illiterate at college age. They cannot spell, they cannot express themselves grammatically; and they are inclined to think that it does not matter. General laxity, and the adoption of educational fads which play havoc with real education, are largely responsible. In the less fortunate classes, the fact seems to be that the public schools are so swamped by foreigners that all the teachers can manage to do is to teach the pupils a little workable English. Needless to say, the profession of the public-school teacher has become less and less tempting to people who are really fit for it. . . . . Modern languages rank Latin and Greek in our schools and colleges; practical and "vocational" training is displacing the rudiments of learning in all of our public and many of our private institutions for the teaching of the young; the books admitted to the lists of "literature" include many that never have been and never will be literature. . . . . Standards of beauty and truth are no longer rigidly held up. In philosophy we have produced pragmatism; in art we have produced futurism—and what not since then?—in literature we have produced the pathologic and the economic novel, and no poetry worth speaking of. The "grand style" has gone out; and the classics are back numbers. Our children do not even speak good English; and no one minds. They cannot be bored with poetry at all. And why should they, when their fathers and mothers are reading "Laddie" and "The Sick-a-Bed Lady," and their clergymen are preaching about "The Inside of the Cup"?

If a Catholic wrote in that fashion about the public schools a hundred zealous ministers would rush to their defense. But the author, it will be observed, does not touch upon the chief defect of the system. The defect which has made Catholic schools rise by hundreds throughout the land, viz., the exclusion of God and religion.

Longmans' New Books

Life of George Washington. The Father of modern Democracy.

By the Very Rev. JAMES O'BOYLE, B.A., P.P., V.F. With Portrait. Crown 8vo. $1.00 net.

"The work is well written, with a due sense of perspective and proportion and in an altogether appreciative and sympathetic vein."—Ave Maria.

The Novels of the Late CANON SHEEHAN

New and Uniform Edition at a Reduced Price. Crown 8vo. Ea. $1.00 net.

THE BLINDNESS OF DR. GRAY; or The Final Law. A Novel of Clerical life.

GLENANAAR. A Story of Irish life.

LISHEEN; or The Test of the Spirits. A Novel.

LUKE DELMEGE. A Novel.

MIRIAM LUCAS.

THE QUEEN'S FILLET.

Longmans, Green, & Co.
Fourth Ave. and 30th St., New York

Sacred Heart Sanitarium
For Non-Contagious Medical Cases
St. Mary's Hill
For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequalled musical quality.
89 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal. Memorials.

Sarony
PHOTOGRAPHER
For 49 years patronized by the Clergy, who receive a special discount.
364 Fifth Ave. (Near 34th St.)
NEW YORK

Memorial Stained Glass Windows
Designed and Executed by Mayer & Co., of Munich
New York Office - 178 Madison Avenue

Letter 13 to
Rosary Sellers

Little things lead to big sometimes. Your dealing in rosaries may bring nothing or Catholic trade, the best trade there is if you treat it right.

The rosary trade is wastefully done, the more so for being small. It is scattered and small, because prices are high, absurdly high; the money is wasted.

The remedy is: Better goods within reach of all, and economy in distributing them. The Vatti is nice and well-made, and supplied direct in the most economical way, the one economical way; $2 up; no risk to anybody.

Whatever money we take we return if the buyer wants it. That's good business. We want nobody's money who wants it back; we want his goodwill and we get it; he can't help it.

VATTI ROSARY CO., 106 Fulton Street, New York.

FOR SALE, A FIRST CLASS VIOLIN

Made by W. E. Hill & Sons, London. Its workmanship is carried out with great delicacy and its melodious tones and flow of notes will ever be a pride to the owner. The decorated bow is gold-finished and is in every respect equal to the instrument.
Price: Violin $200.00; bow $75.00; Complete $275.00.
Address Advertising Department, REVISTA CATHOLICA, Las Vegas, New Mexico.

Everything in Brushes

E. J. KELLY
127 Reade St., New York, N. Y.

Let your new Church Organ have the benefit of Esteycraft—the highest type of skill and experience in organ building.

Plans and Specifications on request.

Estey Organ Company
Brattleboro Vermont

This is an Ameba, one of the Parasites found in Pyorrhea (Riggs Disease) Magnified 2500 Diameters.

Thousands Have Pyorrhea
(Riggs Disease)

and Don't Know It Till Their Teeth Have to be Pulled

Symptoms that may be Pyorrhea: Bleeding gums after brushing; loose teeth; receding, tender, inflamed or sore gums.

PYORRHEA may attack anyone, even children. It develops in your gums without ache, pain or warning.

Sozodont now contains Emetine, that new beneficent discovery, used by the science of dentistry in the treatment of Pyorrhea. Therefore Sozodont not only cleans, whitens, polishes, cools and freshens your teeth as it has done for 64 years, but Sozodont now Fights Pyorrhea.

Start your whole family on Sozodont today. Send 4c for a generous 10-day sample of Sozodont paste, powder or liquid (state which), and feel again that pure, vigorous, "arctic" sensation on your gums and teeth—which only Sozodont can give.

HALL & RUCKEL
216 Washington Street New York

SOZODONT

Paste, Powder or Liquid, 25c.

Each contains Emetine

ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

Reverend Superiors of Charitable and Educational Institutions
can SAVE MONEY on purchases of Groceries, Teas, Coffees, Canned Goods and Laundry Supplies by dealing with

MARTIN C. DYER
College, Convent, Institution and Hospital Representative of
AUSTIN, NICHOLS & CO., Inc.
New York Sales Office, 100 Hudson St.
Cor. Franklin and Leonard Sts., New York, N. Y.

To Teachers

Are you looking for a Text-Book of the highest efficiency that will prove an important adjunct in class life?

A rapidly increasing number of our Colleges and Schools, all over the country, are using AMERICA as supplementary reading in connection with their various courses.

One large college used last year more than ONE HUNDRED COPIES EACH WEEK.

Its carefully-written pages and well-developed thought, the breadth of its articles, the timeliness of its editorials, and the clear-cut division of the Review, render it a valuable asset in forming the pupils' minds upon the great questions of the day. To the Professor of Ethics, Oratory, Political Economy, Sociology, Pedagogy, Literature, Composition, History, Apologetics and kindred branches it affords an excellent store of illustration.

Precisely because AMERICA gives an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life, is the reason why we want the NATIONAL CATHOLIC WEEKLY in the hands of every Catholic student in the Universities, Colleges and High Schools of the country, as a means to clarify and extend the teaching of the classroom. To aid in this work we have made.

A Special Educational Rate

Applicable only to Catholic Teachers and Catholic Students in Catholic Schools

Send at once for the circular that will explain in detail the comprehensive viewpoint and importance to both teacher and student of this most attractive and advantageous program.

Let us hear from you to-day so that no further issue of the National Catholic Weekly Review may be lost to your class. Begin immediately so that besides instructing them through the pages of AMERICA you may introduce them to the most universally quoted Catholic paper in the English Language and have the reflex benefits of its use in the School felt in the Home.

Hundreds of Teachers and thousands of Pupils are being helped and inspired by its pages, which give a weekly record of Catholic achievement and a defence of Catholic doctrine built up by skilful hands in every region of the globe; an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life; removing traditional prejudice, refuting erroneous news and correcting misstatements about Catholic beliefs and practices.

Write for details.

CIRCULATION BUREAU

The America Press

59 East 83d Street

New York, N. Y.

ANY 3 FOR $1.00
ALL 6 FOR $1.50

You can't neglect this opportunity to secure a most attractive group of volumes combining pleasure, profit and instruction.

SOCIALISM

A volume of ten excellent essays by foremost Catholic writers. All written in a concise and popular style.
280 Pages Price 50 cents

LORETTO

Annals of the pioneer Congregation of American Sisters of Charity.
A Book of Historical Interest.
By ANNA C. MINOGUE
300 Pages 21 Illustrations
Price 50 cents

THE NAMES OF GOD

and Meditative Summaries of the Divine Perfection
By the
Ven. LEONARD LESSIUS, S.J.
Translated by T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.
248 pages, large type, with portrait
Price 50 cents

LIFE AND LETTERS OF

HENRY VAN RENSSELAER

Priest of the Society of Jesus
By EDWARD P. SPILLANE, S.J.
An illustrated volume of 350 pages
Price 75 cents

ISAAC JOGUES

DISCOVERER OF LAKE GEORGE
By T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.
55 Pages 9 Illustrations
Price 25 cents

LIFE OF

Venerable Philippine Duchesne

Founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, and one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.
Price 25 cents POSTAGE EXTRA

THE AMERICA PRESS,
59 East 83d Street, New York

FOR TEN CENTS

These three important pamphlets sent to any address

HOLY COMMUNION FOR CHILDREN

THE END JUSTIFIES THE MEANS

THE CATHOLIC WORKING GIRL

ALL THREE FOR TEN CENTS

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street NEW YORK

FOUR SPLENDID VOLUMES

Dealing with American History

For $6.00 Postage Extra

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold

Pioneer Laymen of North America

Telling the fascinating story of the adventurous Cartier, Menendez, Champlain, De La Tour, Maisonneuve, Le Moyne and Radisson.

One of the most picturesque and fascinating periods in American history, that of the exploits of the French in Canada is the foundation of the first volume "Pioneer Laymen of North America."—New York Sun.

Father Campbell has done a noted service to history and to the Church.—The Monitor.

The volume abounds in variety.—Tablet (Brooklyn).

Father Campbell has given to the public one of the most valuable books of his prolific career.—Catholic Columbian.

It is both historic and romantic.—Catholic Universe.

Father Campbell is to be congratulated for his timely work.—Tidings.

300 Pages. 16 Illustrations. Price $1.75. Postage extra.

Among the Iroquois

Volume I

An Interesting Story of the Missionaries among the Iroquois.

Father Campbell's book is one of permanent interest and value.—Evening Post (New York.)

Interesting to Protestants and Catholics alike for its historical value.—Star (Atlanta.)

333 Pages. 27 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

Among the Hurons

Volume II

Tells the Heroic Story of De Brebeuf and His Associates.

It is a story of which the Church and the Order may well feel proud.—Sun (New York.)

480 Pages. 24 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

Among the Algonquins

Volume III

The Ethnic Group that figured more extensively in Our History than any other Indian Family.

The noble history of those old French priests is excellently told by their modern confrère, and it is a history with which every intelligent American Catholic should become familiar.—Catholic Historical Review.

336 Pages. 22 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street
New York

Copyright Joseph Sibbel Studio

IV STATION

This set is modeled especially for Chapels, the size is 13 by 21 inches and the figures are 10 inches high, Will send photo on request,

JOSEPH SIBBEL STUDIO

(Established 1881)

214 East 26th Street, New York City

Religious Sculpture in marble, stone, bronze and composition.

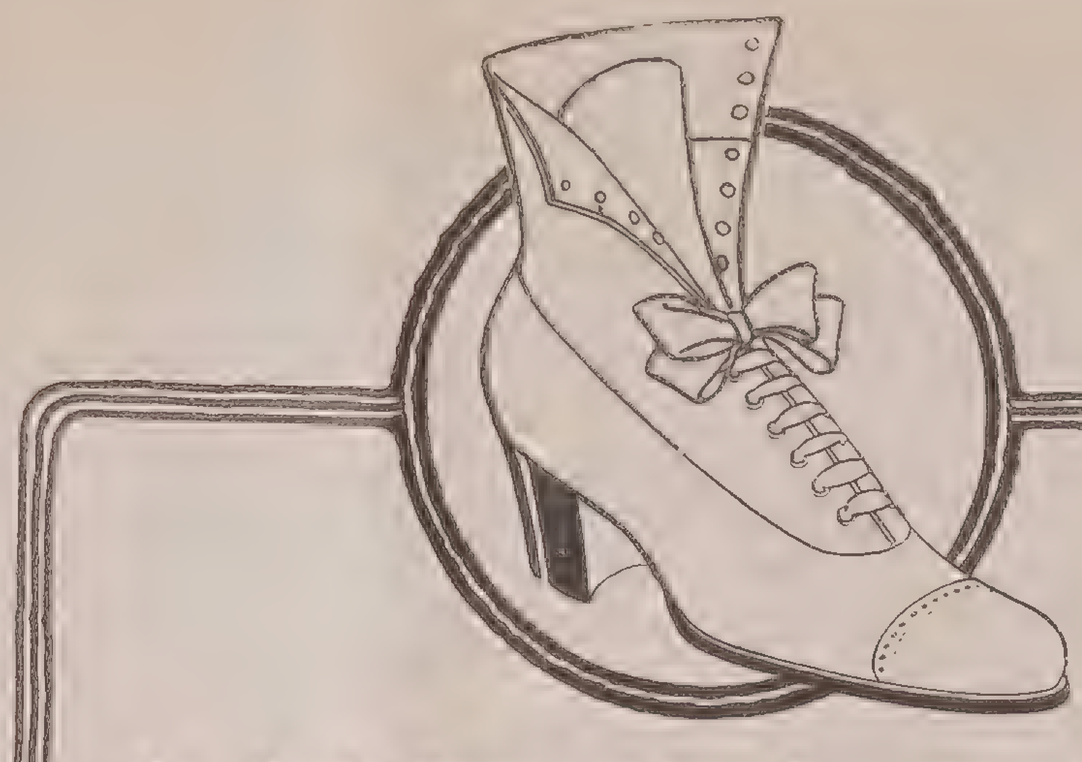
HIGGINS'

Drawing Inks Eternal Writing Ink
Engrossing Ink Taurine Mucilage
Photo Mounter Paste Liquid Paste
Drawing Board Paste Office Paste
Vegetable Glue, Etc.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives

FOR SCHOOL, HOME AND BUSINESS USE

Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the Higgins' Inks and Adhesives. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.



At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.
271 Ninth St., Brooklyn, N. Y.
Branches - Chicago - London

THE FRANK MEANY CO. PRINTERS Inc.

Magazines Catalogues
Periodicals Booklets
Programmes

216-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

An Arch Supporting Shoe for Women

This member of the Coward Shoe Family is known as the "Anterior" or transverse arch-supporting shoe, and is designed to relieve all strain on the muscles of the foot—placing the foot evenly on the ground—supporting the arch in its natural position.

There are many woman suffering from this arch trouble which this shoe is made to relieve. Are you one of them?

Let us examine your feet.

The Coward Shoe
"REG. U. S. PAT. OFF"

Sold Nowhere Else

James S. Coward
264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
Mail Orders Filled (Near Warren Street) Send for Catalog

What College for Me?

An Important Question and a Help to the Answer.

"A Graduate's Confession"

Read this Leaflet and make your choice

A Priest writes us: "I imagine many of our Catholic colleges would find the leaflet an excellent advertisement. The personal element in the article strikes me as especially happy. It serves to bring the matter home more forcibly."

20 Cents a Dozen
$1.00 per Hundred

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street
New York

Catholic Reader's Guide

Introduction to Catholic Reading.

A Classified, Suggestive List of Select Catholic Publications

By J. HAVENS RICHARDS, S.J.

This list suggests the best works available in the surprisingly large store of Catholic literature. It is of special use to spiritual directors, teachers, parents, and librarians in encouraging those under their charge to develop a taste for profitable reading.

Ten Cents a Copy, Postage Extra

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street
New York

The Educative Influence of the Catholic Press

A Catholic Writers' Syndicate

Good Qualities of Our Catholic Press

Father Tierney's idea of what a Catholic paper should be he outlined in an address delivered last Summer at Toledo. It is published in this number of the CATHOLIC MIND. Mr. Michael Williams, a journalist of wide experience, offers excellent suggestions regarding the formation of a syndicate for securing Catholic writers' best work, and Mr. Laurie J. Blakely points out the too readily overlooked merits of our Catholic papers.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

5 Cents Each
40 Cents a Dozen

Published at a nominal price, on the eighth and twenty-second of the month, the CATHOLIC MIND pamphlets supply to the militant Catholic the most effective weapons with which to meet the threatening issues of the day. There are several important articles on some current question in each number. In handy form these tracts for the times can be kept for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

5 Cents Each
40 Cents a Dozen

Since June, 1914, 200,000 Copies of the Catholic Mind have been circulated. We want you to help us to double that number before another year passes.

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

10. Plain Words of Socialism. C. S. Devas, M.A.
18. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
19. Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. Wilfrid Ward

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.

1910

4, 5, 6, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Halley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children
18. The XXI Eucharistic Congress. Edward Spillane, S.J.
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. Joseph Husslein, S.J.
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. Henry J. Swift, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific. II, III. Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M. Bishop of Christ Church
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
24. Father Algué's Barocyclonometer. New York Tribune, Dec. 1912

1913

5. Capital Punishment. Rev. John J. Ford, S.J.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. A. de F.
24. First Encyclical of Benedict XV.

1915

1. The Catholic Press. E. Hull, S.J.
2. The "Menace" and the Mails. Paul Bakewell
3. The Ethics of War. Edward Masterson, S.J.
4. Sixty Historical "Don'ts." James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.
5. The Jesuit Myth. Robert Swickerath, S.J.
6. Fifty "Don'ts" of Science. James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.
Catholics in the Y. M. C. A. Nelson Hume
7. Catholic Sociology. Richard H. Tierney, S.J.
Newman's Alleged "Scurrility" Paul Bakewell
8. Was Shakespeare a Catholic? James J. Walsh, M. D., Ph.D.
9. The Church and the Mexican Revolution. By a Mexican Lawyer
10. Dante's 650th Birthday. James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D., Litt.D.
How to Reach the Medieval Mind. Vincent McNabb, O.P.
11. Magna Charta's Centenary. P. Guilday, Ph. D.
12. The Church and the Sex Problem. Richard H. Tierney, S.J.
13. The War's Lesson. Rt. Rev. Thomas O'Dwyer, D.D.
14. Catholic Schools for Catholic Youth. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
15. Temperance Against Prohibition. Henry Maurice
16. The Papacy. His Eminence Cardinal Mercier
17. The Church and the Immigrant. Rt. Rev. Francis C. Kelley, D.D.
18. The Contemporary Drama. James J. Daly, S.J.
19. The Catholic School. William D. Guthrie

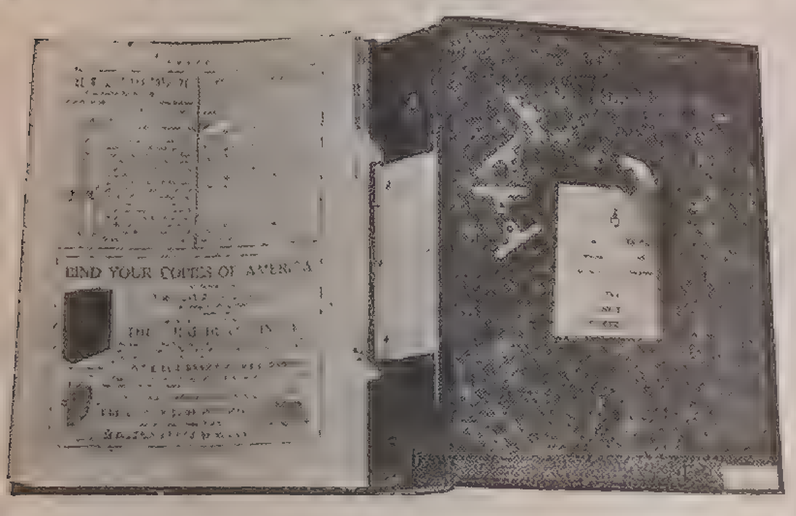
Special Rates: Pamphlets for 1908-1911, inclusive, $1.00 per hundred; for 1912-14, inclusive, $2.00 per hundred; for 1915, $3.00 per hundred.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to The Catholic Mind.



Name.....Street.....

City.....State.....

A Valuable Addition To Your Library

Bind Your Copies of
AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
In Book Form
For Future Reference

"As Easy as Filing Papers"

The "Big Ben" Binder

is handsome and durable—opens flat to any page. No trouble to insert copies—only two pen knife slits in the back of AMERICA—drop the tiepins over the binding rods—one motion locks it.

It is the Ideal Binder

Made up in Red Art Cloth, with AMERICA stamped in real gold on the back and cover.

Send in Your Order Today
Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83rd Street, New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one "Big Ben" Binder.

Name .....

Street .....

City .....

State .....

5% First Mortgage Notes

Catholic Church Property in Chicago

Executed and signed by the Catholic Bishop of Chicago, Very Reverend M. J. Fitzsimmons, Administrator

These Notes are a direct obligation of the Catholic Bishop of Chicago, a Corporation Sole, created by a special act of the Legislature of Illinois, and legal title to all the property covered by these Mortgage Notes is vested in this Corporation. These Notes are secured by First Mortgage on certain and specified pieces of property. They are further secured by all the church property of the Archdiocese of Chicago. Principal and interest are absolutely secured and the Notes will be converted into cash at their face value by us at any time you may wish to realize upon them. A safe, sound, and stable convertible investment.

In Denominations of $500 and $1000

Maturing in one to ten years

Maturing interest coupons and principal Notes may be deposited in your own bank for collection or forwarded direct to us. Just as secure—just as safe and in every essential detail just as desirable as placing your money in the best managed savings bank in the United States.

Not Affected by War Conditions.

These Notes constitute an investment that can not in any way be weakened in value by periods of business depression, war conditions abroad or other causes that have lessened the market value of most industrial and railroad bonds and securities of other description.

Redeemable at Face Value

These Notes will be redeemed by us at their face value if you wish to convert the Notes into cash. We will charge only a small sum for redeeming them.

Any Banker in Chicago can inform you of the character of these Notes and will also acquaint you with our standing.

The Security Increases Each Year

The value of the Catholic Church property in the Chicago Archdiocese has kept step with the vigorous growth of new parishes. The real estate covered by these Notes is located in some of the choicest sections of the city of Chicago and is increasing in value. Though a certain number of the Notes are payable annually, none of the security is to be released until all Notes shall have been paid. In this way the security behind this investment becomes relatively greater each year. Send to-day for full information, details, etc. We will be pleased to submit a full description of the Notes. Send the coupon.

Ask any Chicago banker if he considers these Notes a safe and very desirable investment.

CREMIN & O'CONNOR

Reaper Block, Dept. 7402
CHICAGO, ILL.

Coupon

CREMIN & O'CONNOR,
105 N. Clark St., Dept. 7402, Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen: Please send me full information, details, etc., concerning these First Mortgage Notes,

Name.....

Address.....

3,000 PASTORS

have OUR SUNDAY VISITOR distributed either at the church door, or through the school, or through the officers of Catholic societies.

We send bundles of OUR SUNDAY VISITOR to every corner of the United States, to Porto Rico, the Panama Zone, to the Philippines, India, to England, Ireland, Australia and South Africa.

Ours is the POPULAR National Weekly. A Penny Paper

It is not a newspaper, and therefore does not trespass on the field of the Diocesan weeklies. Its aim is to instruct in a popular way, to undo the influence of anti-Catholic propaganda, and to hold up the Catholic Church favorably to the non-Catholic.

OUR SUNDAY VISITOR readers become enthusiastic Catholics; they are made at the very low cost of 50 cents a year

SUBSCRIPTIONS POSTPAID

Single Subscriptions 50 cents the year; bundle orders 68 cents per 100

OUR SUNDAY VISITOR
Huntington, Indiana

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

VERY REV. S. W. FAY, S.T.D.
Rector.

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky
Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, and the University of Kentucky
Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.
Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E. St., N. W

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

ACADEMY OF OUR LADY

Ninety-fifth and Throop Streets
Longwood, CHICAGO, ILL.

A pure and lofty conception of life, high sense of duty, a noble type of Christian womanhood, refinement, and thorough scholarship, music and artistic culture, physical vigor and health, are the standards set for

YOUR DAUGHTER
AT THE
ACADEMY OF OUR LADY

Full range of Scientific, Classical, Literary and Historical Studies.

Catalogue sent on application.

Academy of Saint Joseph
IN-THE-PINES
Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in Separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental musi

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

ACADEMY OF MOUNT ST. URSULA
Bedford Park, New York City

An incorporated school for resident and day pupils. Full elementary course. Four-year academic course preparatory to College and Training School for Teachers. For particulars address THE MOTHER SUPERIOR.

St. Joseph's College and Academy
EMMITSBURG, MARYLAND

Courses College, Commercial, Academic, Preparatory

Course in Pedagogy open to Senior and Junior College Students

Exceptional advantages in Music, Art, Domestic Science

Founded 1809. . . FREE CATALOGUE

Send your boy to
MT. WASHINGTON SEMINARY
Mt. Washington, Maryland

COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR BOYS
6 TO 13 YEARS
For catalogue apply to DIRECTRESS

An Opportunity for Schools and Colleges

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE WORCESTER MASS.
Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers
LARGEST CATHOLIC COLLEGE IN AMERICA

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue . . . . . Prefect of Studies.

FORDHAM UNIVERSITY
Adjoining Bronx Park, New York
Healthfulness of the country with the advantages of the city
Conducted by the JESUIT FATHERS

Classical and Scientific Courses
St. John's Hall for Younger Boys

School of Law	140 Nassau St.
School of Medicine	Fordham.
School of Pharmacy	Fordham.

Write for catalogue
Rev. JOSEPH A. MULRY S.J., Pres.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson, 40 minutes from New York City.

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

IMMACULATA SEMINARY

MOUNT MARIAN, WASHINGTON, D. C.

High-class school for young women and girls. Situated in the Suburbs.

Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Abundant out-door exercise in beautiful suburban grounds; individual attention to character training; happy home life; thorough scholarship.

SPECIAL TWO-YEAR COURSE of COLLEGE work for high school graduates.

FULL PREPARATORY and ELECTIVE courses.

MUSIC, ART, EXPRESSION and domestic science.

All the advantages of the National Capital and sightseeing, with experienced chaperones.

For Illustrated Year Book Address

SISTER SECRETARY, DEP'T. F.

MT. ST. AGNES HIGH SCHOOL

Mt. Washington, Maryland

Day and Resident Students

High School Course of Four Years

Grammar and Primary Departments

Music, Art and Domestic Science

For Information Apply to the Directress.

Mt. St. Joseph's College

IRVINGTON, BALTIMORE, MD.

Courses in Classics, Sciences and Commerce, under able professors. Special facilities for Pre-Medical Students. Certificates Recognized.

Splendid health location. Spacious buildings. Extensive campus. Gymnasium. Outdoor swimming pool. Physical as well as mental training.

For Catalogue and particulars, address:

BROTHER DIRECTOR

ST. FRANCIS XAVIER

COLLEGE and ACADEMY

Sisters of Mercy

4928 XAVIER PARK, CHICAGO, ILL.

The first Catholic College for women in Chicago—chartered 1912. Freshman class only in September, 1915.

Write for Prospectus

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill — Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue — Philadelphia, Pa.

Seton Hill Schools

St. Joseph Academy for Girls

GREENSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA

On main line P. R. R., 30 miles from Pittsburgh
Elementary and High School Courses. University affiliation.
Two years' advanced Course for High School Graduates.
Conservatories of Music and Art.
Domestic Science. Gymnasium. Field Sports.
Address Department E

St. Mary's Annex for Small Boys

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent

On Hudson

CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B. A. and B. S.

COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT

ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON

CITY OF NEW YORK

Mount de Sales

Academy of the Visitation

CATONSVILLE (NEAR BALTIMORE) MARYLAND

Ideal School for Young Ladies

Classic, Literary and Scientific Courses. French and German receive special attention. Departments of Music, Art and Elocution. Magnificent situation.

Ask for Illustrated Catalogue

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts, Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

SAINT MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

For Women . . . College and Academy . . . . For Girls

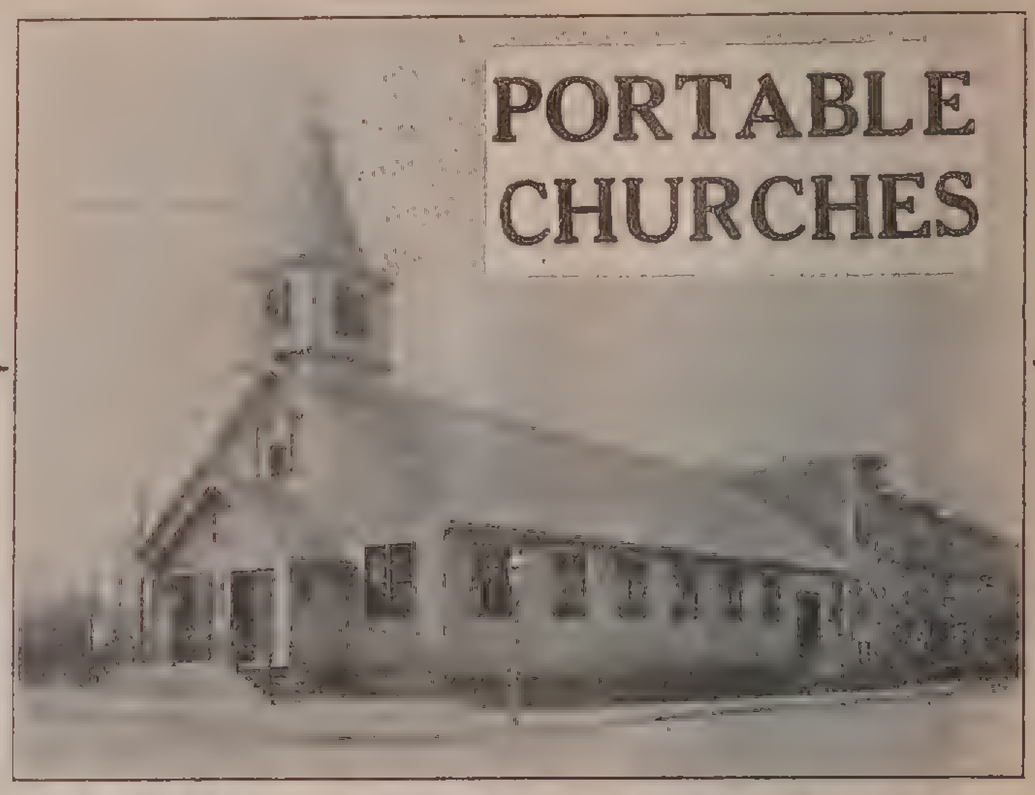
Affiliated to the Catholic University

Departments of Arts and Sciences—Four-Year Course leading to degrees A.B. and B.S.
Department of Household Economics—Courses leading to the degree B.S. Elective courses offered to all college students.
Conservatory of Music—Teachers' and Artists' Certificate Courses.
School of Expression—Teachers' Certificate Courses. Various elective courses open to all students.
School of Art—Drawing, water color, oil, keramics. Certificates issued.
Academy—Full Four-Year High School Course and Grammar Department.
75th Year. A School of Four Generations.
Students from twenty-five States. Twelve modern buildings. New College Hall, Gymnasium, Natatorium, etc. Abundant out-door exercise. 40-acre golf course. Bulletins and illustrated booklets will be sent upon request.

Address Sister Secretary, Box 70, SAINT MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

ROYAL

BAKING POWDER



Absolutely Pure

Made from

Grape Cream of Tartar

NO ALUM

PORTABLE CHURCHES

Ducker Standard Sectional Churches, Schools and Hospitals

PREPARED FOR IMMEDIATE ERECTION

The fact that there have been nearly one hundred of our churches erected speaks for itself.

Among the many commendations, one clergyman says: "Skilled mechanics have thoroughly inspected the building and declare the workmanship of an exceptionally high order. Within and without it is certainly a cosy church building."

Another says: "It is highly satisfactory in every respect. Notwithstanding the fact that it is a portable structure, it impresses all with its very pleasing church-like and permanent effect."

We have the same expressions of commendation regarding our schools and hospitals.

Write for particulars.

Ducker Company, 277 Broadway, New York

Telephone 2980 Worth

Real Mattress Protection

Bed linen alone—no matter how often changed—is insufficient to protect a mattress from the excretions of the body.

Absolute cleanliness demands that a properly made pad be used between the sheet and mattress; this should be absorbent and easily washable.

These and other methods are combined in

Excelsior Quilted Mattress Pads

None genuine without Trade Mark

Excelsior protectors are made from heavy bleached muslin padded with dainty snow-white wadding. Wash easily and dry light, fluffy, and as springy and sanitary as new.

Sold by all high-class department stores. Look for this trade mark sewed on every pad.

EXCELSIOR QUILTING COMPANY

15 Laight Street New York, N. Y.

We Have A Position

for a Catholic man or woman in every city and town in the United States and Canada to act as our subscription representative. Experience is not necessary, and earnings depend on the amount of time you devote

Write for Details

CIRCULATION DEPT.

Now Is The Time

The America Press

59 EAST 83D STREET

NEW YORK

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIV, No. 3
WHOLE No. 342

OCTOBER 30, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, Oct. 19, p. m.-Oct. 26, a. m.—Deadlock on Many Fronts—Serbia and the Austro-Germans — Serbia and the Bulgarians—Greece Still a Problem. Armenia: The Massacres. Germany: Meeting the Emergency—Five Hundred Years of Rule. Great Britain: England's Aid to the Allies—The King's Proclamation. Ireland: Conscription; Enlistment; Taxes. Mexico: The Week's News; Yucatan's Freedom 49-52

TOPICS OF INTEREST
Music and Religion—A Significant Symbol—IV—Economic Equality—The New Philosophy of Dispair—Aux Morts 53-60

COMMUNICATIONS
Competitive Athletics—The Sincerity of Anglicans—The Woman Suffrage Issue.....60, 61

EDITORIALS
Mrs. Partington and the New Malthusian—Andrew Jackson Shipman—The Evolution of the Moral Law—"Up, Up We Go!"—The Ballot and the People—Extinguishing the Lights.....62-64

LITERATURE
XII—Father Wasmann.

REVIEWS: The Life of Bernal Diaz del Castillo—Constantinople Old and New — The Life and Visions of St. Hildegarde—A Book of English Martyrs—My Life—The Heart of a Man—The Red Circle—A New Logic—History of Christian Missions.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: "The Haitian Revolution, 1791-1804, or Side Lights on the French Revolution" — "The Quiet Hour" — "The Happy Phrase"—"Eve Dorre"—"The Research Magnificent" — "Outlines of Sociology" — "Gates of Utterance"—"A First-Year Course in General Science"—"The Rise of Classical English Criticism."

BOOKS RECEIVED: 65-68

EDUCATION
What is the Gary School Plan?.....69, 70

SOCIOLOGY
Can He Afford to Marry?.....70, 71

NOTE AND COMMENT
St. Mary's Day Nursery—Compensation for Industrial Accidents—War's Havoc—A Socio-Economic Union—Statistics of Mortality—Diamond Jubilee of the Sisters of Providence—Father "Tim" Dempsey's Philanthropy — Teaching the Bible in Public High Schools — Holy Name Rallies 71, 72

CHRONICLE

The War.—On the western battle-front there has been no abatement in the artillery fire which has been almost continuous throughout Belgium and France. In addition there have been a number of infantry engagements, with especially violent attacks and counter attacks in both Artois and Champagne, but neither side has gained any real advantage. In the Trentino and before Goritz the Italians have renewed the offensive, but in neither case have they had any success beyond the fact that they have thus prevented the transfer of Austrian troops to the Serbian campaign. From Gallipoli there is nothing to report. The Allies have made no progress at all, and are reported to be mainly on the defensive. On the eastern front no important developments have modified the general situation. The Germans are pressing hard on the outworks of Dvinsk, but have shifted their main attacks from Dvinsk to Riga. So far, however, they have not made notable headway. Elsewhere on the long line from Dvinsk the offensive has been taken by the Russians. The Austro-German forces have held their own except at Baronovitch, along the Pripet and the Styr, and at Czernovitch, which is again reported to be in Russian hands.

Bulletin, Oct. 19, p. m.-Oct. 26, a. m.

Deadlock on Many Fronts

Serbia's enemies are closing in on her from all sides. On the west the Austro-Germans have crossed the Drina at Visegrad. On the north they are near Shabatz, and have occupied Obrenovac. On both sides of the Morava they have pushed forward, in spite of vigorous resistance, and according to Serbia, at the cost of 60,000 men, to the south of Palanka and Petrovac. Their extreme left wing is south of the Danube at Sib. From the north therefore the Austro-German invasion though slow has made progress.

Serbia and the Austro-Germans

The Bulgarians are active at many points on the eastern frontier of Serbia. Close to the juncture of the Rumanian, Bulgarian and Serbian boundaries they have taken Negotin, and from this point are striving, though they are still some thirty miles distant, to join forces with the Austro-German left wing. At Zaitcar, the capture of which now appears to have been falsely reported, they have reached the right bank of the Timok River, and further south they are endeavoring to capture Knjajevac. At both places the Serbians claim to have checked their progress. Still further south the Bulgarians assert that they have possession of Pirot, but fighting is reported to be taking place both to the northeast and southeast of the town. According to their own reports, which, however, are denied by Serbia, they have also taken Vlasatine. Further south the progress of the Bulgarians has been more rapid and is more important. They have taken, lost and retaken Uranja. This point gives them control of the direct railroad line from Salonica to Nish. Further south they are in possession of Kumanovo, which is near the same railroad and a little to the northeast of Uskub. What is more important for their attack on Serbia is the taking of Kuprili, which followed soon after the evacuation of Istib by the Serbians, and the capture of Uskub, which fell only after a severe battle. With the capture of Kuprili and Uskub the Bulgarians have gained control of the indirect railroad from Salonica to Nish, but further south have suffered defeat at hand of the British and French troops, which are reported to be stretched along a line from Robova to Krivolak. The whole situation in Serbia is hard to understand owing to the contradictory reports given out by the opposing countries: the movements of the armies recently landed and still landing at Salonica are especially difficult to determine. During the week the British, French, Italian, and Russian fleets have been bombarding the Ægean coast of Bulgaria at many points, both Italy and Russia having declared war on Bulgaria.

Serbia and the Bulgarians

Greece Still a Problem

From unofficial dispatches it would seem that the Allies have been making further efforts to induce Greece to enter the war on their side, or at least to give pledges that she will not enter it on the side of the Central Powers. Great Britain is said to have offered her the Island of Cyprus, a report which seems to have good foundation, and Italy is said to have offered her Rhodes, although this is still doubted; but Greece has not been won over by either offer. Her action is causing the Allies a great deal of anxiety. Developments in the Balkans and the deadlock at the Dardanelles have been the occasion of another crisis in the British Cabinet, which, however, has resulted up to the present in only one resignation, that of Sir Edward Carson.

Armenia.—Allowing for all exaggeration, it seems clear that a most appalling condition of affairs exists in unfortunate Armenia. Rome, quoting the memorandum of the Armenian Committee from the Journal des Balkans, says:

The Massacres

> Till this moment it was thought that the Turkish Government desired to send the Armenians out of some districts of Cilicia and was using forcible means to that end. Now facts show beyond a doubt that the Government has expelled all the Armenian population not only from Cilicia, transporting them to the desert of Haleb, but from all Turkey. . . . The exiles have been driven, on a march lasting two months, to the desert which is to serve them for a cemetery. Bodies line the road and float down the Euphrates. A miserable remnant have arrived at their destination, where there is nothing for them to await but death.

The Tiflis press describes the scenes that took place at Sassoon, where all who did not flee into the mountains were slaughtered. There has been a great influx of Armenian, Chaldean and other refugees into Urumiah and the Caucasian provinces. Some 160,000 refugees have passed through Igdir and Etchmiadzin; these poor creatures starving and ravaged by disease, are dying at the rate of 100 a day. At Elenvoka and Ahti there are 9,000 refugees. The facts concerning the massacre of Trebizond, though vouched for by the Italian Consul who was there at the time, seem incredible. The unfortunate Christians were put on sailing vessels and cast into the Black Sea. It is estimated that nearly 10,000 perished this way. Unfortunately the slaughter appears to have been planned carefully, and a perusal of the accounts brings to mind the savage maxim of Abdul Hamid that "the way to get rid of the Armenian question is to get rid of the Armenians." Viscount Bryce, speaking in the House of Commons, declared:

> The procedure was exceedi... matic. The whole population of a town was cle... Men were thrown into prison; the rest of the me... women and children were marched out of the tow... they had got some little distance they were separ... men being taken to places where the soldiers dis... m by shooting or bayoneting. The women and ... older men were sent off under convoy of the l... soldiers to their distant destination, which wa... one of the unhealthy districts, but more freq... ere district which extends to the east of Aleppo... sion of the Euphrates. They were driven b... s day after day; many fell by the way and ma... ager. No provision was given them by the ... ment, and they were robbed of everything they ... in many cases the women were stripped nak... along in that condition. Many women wer... ew away their children, being unable to carry ... The caravan's route was marked by a line ... comparatively few seem to have arrived at t...
>
> The memorandum of the ... committee closes with two detailed lists, one ... who have disappeared, been deported, as ... converted to Islamism; this first list numb... uls; the other of prelates killed, imprison... his numbers seventeen. Rome is authori... ment that the Holy Father has been most a... of the sufferers, and has made most urg... ions for them to the Sublime Porte, thr... ci, Apostolic Delegate at Constantinople.

Germany.—On October ... cent of the total subscription to the t... war loan was due in cash. The sum actu... iat date was no less th... per cent, or in round f... ,000 marks ($2,067,2... is evident therefore that there is no l... money in Germany, whether for industria... ental purposes. The freight traffic in the ... the country is thought to have reached its ... es. The Allgemeine Rundschau writes:

Meeting the Emergency

> The best good will and the ... calculation of taxes could not have brought a ... billion-dollar loan success if the German people ... sufficient money to lay up savings in spite of ... ices. Our entire economic life has rapidly adapt... the war conditions and attained under them a ge... sperity. They who sought to starve us out have ta... wise manipulation of food products, and they whc ... to overpower us helped us to attain to absolut... purely national economics.
>
> The review concludes that ... possibilit... ing foreign goods has turned ... the country, and that the ec... has now been demonstrated ... influence during the coming ... tariff and commerce policie... real popularity of the ... not only by the enor... the rapid payment ...

legal time, it is ... likewise find the ... ments, since they ... money thus paid ... tion within the ...

For on the one ... rich and efficient ... people now under... falling upon the ... trade and commer...

While the def... reckoned with ... their sum will ...

Five Hundred Years of Ro... of the Hohenzo... burg. By ... secular festiv... the city wit... eulogized th... many's prese... ever before ... were people...

Great Brit... in the war?" ... A. L. Fisher ...

England's ... to the Al...

has been ask... Fisher admi... been underes... mistakes "wh... she has ren... fight for the ... is cumulativ... was wanted ... fighting men, ... 1915, over two ... forces of the Crow... med up: the Britis... from the ...

hat consequent taxation will repared to meet all require- foreign obligations and the continue in a healthy circula-ow that Germany is much more d believed, and on the other the than before that the few marks can easily be paid if the entire nd earnings are high.

mages caused by the war are ich review, it is claimed that ssive for Germany.

October 21 Berlin celebrated costume the five hundredth sary of the establishment in the March of Branden- of Emperor William no ce beyond the adornment of unting. The papers warmly n rule as the cause of Ger- It is remarked that hardly rse of the five hundred years perfectly united as at present.

has the British Empire done let recently published, Mr. H. the Bryce Commission, Vice- llor of Sheffield University, e author of several historical answers this question which d as well as in America. Mr. ngth of the German Army had thinks that England's initial he balance against the service rendering the Allied cause." low with the enemy, time will se the strength of the Empire as it became clear that what ndred thousand but a million awoke, and by the spring of ecruits had been added to the work of the Navy is thus sum- y has swept the German flag for its assistance, the German ful than that of France, would st towns at will, intercepted the war zone. Large forces afety from India, Canada, Aus- to Europe, and considerable , Egypt and the Dardan- ed munitions of war and pro- Great Britain from ... and at the same time ... the enemy ... n ...

the beginning of the war, the general commerce of the British Empire and of France is now carried on almost as freely as in time of peace. Five Austrian, six Turkish and forty German war-ships have been destroyed. Exclusive of eighteen vessels captured near the Suez Canal Zone, sixty-nine German vessels detained in British ports abroad and twenty-six seized in British ports, 116 German traders have either been captured at sea or sunk. As a result of these activities, there is now no German over-seas commerce, except such as is carried on within the confines of the Baltic. Mr. Fisher cannot write a similar story of success for the Army, but says that the reenforcements which England is daily sending to the Continent will soon turn the tide of battle.

No change has taken place in the methods of enlistment. On October 22, the King issued a Proclamation urging voluntary recruiting.

The King's Proclamation

The end is not in sight. More men, and yet more, are wanted to keep my armies in the field, and through them to secure victory and enduring peace. In ancient days the darkest moment has ever produced in men of our race the sternest resolve. I ask you men of all classes to come forward voluntarily and take your share in these fights. In freely responding to my appeal you will be giving your support to our brothers who for long months have nobly upheld Britain's past traditions and the glory of her arms.

While recruiting has been greatly stimulated by this appeal and by the news of the execution of Miss Cavell, the English nurse shot by the Germans for aiding their enemies, it is thought by some that the King's Proclamation is the last act of the Government before conscription.

Ireland.—Conscription is discussed with vigor in Ireland. Mr. Joseph Devlin speaking in Tyrone last week was strong in condemnation of it, declaring that it is the greatest danger that can befall a community. Not only would it "break up industries, destroy commerce, dislocate normal conditions and impoverish the nation," but it would "destroy the free and unfettered will of the people, and take away their individual judgment." The voluntary system, he declared, is sufficient for the needs of the war, but the methods of recruiting must be improved. Ireland has already done her share and more than her share and will not "be bullied by the rhetorical conscriptionists in Nationalist villages nor driven by the organized conspiracy of Tory reactionaries." The Leader is anxious to know how many members of the Irish Y. M. C. A. have enlisted. The Waterford section of the Association held its annual general meeting lately. At the close of the meeting there were 291 members, not ... annual subscribers, the number ... seven came to twenty-seven, one in ... a fine increase. It is men who are ... from the present membership ... The Leader ...

Conscription; Enlistment; Taxes;

remarks that here is a case of all cry and no wool. The taxes are still a source of discontent. New Ireland is insistent on a special financial policy for Ireland. Dublin, it believes, will be relieved from excessive charge on "war profits" and "there may be concessions for articles like tea and sugar where the larger consumption per head in Ireland would lead to a wholly excessive toll upon the Irish consumers." But even granted this, the taxes will be a crushing blow to the country and remedial measures are urged to save the nation from disaster. So far New Ireland. The Leader commenting on the same subject, says: "If we had only a fair share of national grit and backbone in Ireland we would be a country that could not be cheated, ignored nor despised."

The Week's News; Yucatan's Freedom

Mexico.—During the week the mysterious border riots eventuated in the death of some United States soldiers and the wounding of others. As on the border so too in Mexico itself fighting still continues. Villa, Zapata, and the Arieta brothers of Durango are in the field and peace seems far off. Economic conditions have not improved. Despite glowing accounts to the contrary, people are starving even in Mexico City. In the capital, common charcoal is selling at twenty dollars a sack; corn at two dollars and a half a kilogram, i. e., two and one-fifth pounds. A private letter received in New York from Mexico City, October 5, states that people are afraid to venture on the streets. Evidently executions are to proceed merrily; according to dispatches two other prominent Huertistas were put to death a few days since; one was José Lopez Portillo, ex-Minister of Foreign Relations under Huerta. Some details of Granados' execution have come to hand. He had taken refuge in the Japanese Legation, but when General Pablo Gonzales declared an amnesty for all Carranza's political opponents, Granados came into the open and was immediately seized and put to death. On October 20 Carranza gave an interview to newspaper men, during which he expressed a desire to be recognized not as Provisional President but as "First Chief." Such an arrangement would help him to evade the law forbidding provisional presidents to stand for election to the Presidency. His most significant utterance was that all the Catholics he has punished "have been punished because they took part in politics." This takes on an aspect of grimness in view of the fact that many of the Catholics "punished" were Sisters and cloistered nuns. At any rate it is well to note that in Mexico Catholicism is a bar to the exercise of the privilege of citizenship. And this kind of freedom won recognition for the First Chief! Meantime, as was expected and predicted, Carranza has announced that no constitutional government is to be looked for in Mexico for a year at least. Until such time as general elections are called, there will be a preconstitutional period, a reign of men, of one man, not of law as is the custom in most civilized communities. Recognition was given this military despotism by our Government in the following letter:

Washington, D. C., Oct. 19, 1915.

Eliseo Arrendondo, Esq.

My dear Mr. Arredondo—It is my pleasure to inform you that the President of the United States takes this opportunity of extending recognition to the de facto Government of Mexico of which General Venustiano Carranza is the Chief Executive. The Government of the United States will be pleased to receive formally in Washington a diplomatic representative of the de facto Government as soon as it shall please General Carranza to designate and appoint such representative, and, reciprocally, the Government of the United States will accredit to the de facto Government a diplomatic representative as soon as the President has had opportunity to designate such representative. I should appreciate it if you could find it possible to communicate this information to General Carranza at your earliest convenience. Very sincerely yours,

ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State.

This was followed by an embargo on arms and munitions of war. The practical effect of this is to enable Carranza to obtain from the United States all the arms and munitions of war he desires; however, their importation through Chihuahua, Sonora, and Lower California is forbidden, for fear, it would appear, that the war supplies might fall into the hands of Carranza's enemies. Violation of the embargo carries with it a fine of $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both these penalties. In the course of the Proclamation the President said:

I have found that there exist in Mexico conditions of domestic violence promoted by the use of arms or munitions of war procured from the United States. I hereby admonish all citizens of the United States and every person to abstain from every violation of the joint resolution of Congress, and I hereby warn them that all violations will be rigorously prosecuted.

Further, our Government has given Carranza permission to transport 5,000 soldiers from Laredo, Texas, through United States territory, to Agua Prieta, to attack Villa. During all this time the once peaceful Yucatan is enjoying the blessing of the Carranzista régime. There is a military governor imposed at the point of the sword, a man ineligible by law for the office of governor by election. He is supreme master of life and property, has ordered the infliction of the death penalty without process of law, has confiscated property, has laid hands on presses and papers, using them for personal aggrandizement, has abolished the freedom of education, permitted by the State, confiscating schools in large numbers, and, as noted in AMERICA last week, has put an end to religious liberty. This military chief is supreme master, he settles political and religious problems according to his whim and fancy, with supreme contempt for justice. Legal cases definitely decided long since, have been reviewed by soldiers, and perfectly legal contracts have been declared null and void. Next week's chronicle will contain further information on these points.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Music and Religion

WHEN men begin to ignore Divine Revelation they eagerly seek to trace to a purely natural source the golden stream of religion which, gushing out of the distant past, has rippled down through the ages. Classical Lucretius was satisfied that it flowed from fear. Comte, with mind of very modern mould, regarded it as the issue of idolatry. Herbert Spencer fantastically discovered its rise in ancestorism. Frazer prosaically saw no reason to doubt that it sprang from Totemism. Kant, and his latter-day progeny of Modernists, believed it to be the outcome of the inner sense. A few months ago, Mr. Theodore Schroeder aroused conservative thinkers with the unique theory that it was the product of sexuality. And now G. P. Putnam's Sons, publishers, offer us a book with a view of mystical religion, which is, in some respects, the oddest of its kind. The late Dr. R. Heber Newton is the author of the tome: "The Mysticism of Music," its subject; its contents, two essays.

Music, to Dr. Newton, is the noblest medium of expression of truth, beauty, and achievement. Ours is not only the age of science, he observes, but also of music. While science has brought forth truths which have struck and shattered parts of "the theology of the priests and doctors," it may itself find a destroyer, Dr. Newton more mildly says "a corrective," in the truths which it is the mission of music to fling out. Music has a theology which re-echoes that of the mystics. This theology is not narrow or dogmatic. "You will never extricate the Thirty-nine Articles or the Westminster Confession from Beethoven," he characteristically tells us. But, prithee, do not be discouraged; you may find in music "the poetic philosophy which is at the core of the Nicene Creed." Music, you understand, can produce only the spirit, not the letter. Liszt was a Roman Catholic; but what Protestant would dwell on the fact or even dream of doing so? Music is of soul, not of sect. That is why, incarcerated for long in canticle, oratorio, and Mass, it at length broke bonds and mingled in the life of the world outside cathedral walls. But it still arouses the same sentiments which it wakened within the chancel; it still expresses the message of religion. The opera, it seems to Dr. Newton, grows mystic enough to charge the soul with awe.

One gathers from all this that music is indeed a missionary, teaching melodiously outside the Church what the clergy stentoriously preach within; but teaching in spirit, not in letter.

Music, the Doctor declares, is both an art and a science. With Wagner, he believes that Beethoven's music, for instance, is very philosophical. It explains the world as effectively as could a pedagogue to an intelligent pupil.

By no means does the Doctor stop here, though one might be justified in supposing that here the limit were indeed attained. But the reader must needs pause, if Dr. Newton will not, in order to secure mental breath and control. And when these are regained, the mind is apt to be angrily suspicious that it has run far for a flattering nothing masquerading as a bright something.

The Doctor's premise that music is the highest symbol of truth, beauty, and achievement seems a rather small and uncertain foundation for his pretentious tower of thought. Music is just as much the medium of error, unloveliness, and despair as of sparkling virtues and feats. The Doctor seems to forget the ingeniously sensuous and salacious strains of Bizet, for example which bring shame to the ear and a blush to the cheek, revealing, as they do, the shameless heart of an abandoned cigarette-girl. Wagner does not appear to impress him with a realization that this mighty musical genius can almost immorally depress us; there is but little hope and lofty inspiration in the tragic measures of "Tristan and Isolde." If music were necessarily a symbol of goodness, truth and beauty, it could never be an expression of their opposites. The Doctor's mistake would seem to be this: that he holds the noble and the sublime to be, in a way, the result of music, whereas music is really rather a result of them. It is an expression, more than a cause, and this is why it may be used to symbolize the most carnal vice as well as the most spiritual virtue. While one is reading the Doctor's charming pair of essays, shining with the grandeur of his conception of the meaning of music, a skeptical smile absolutely refuses to stop puckering the corner of the mouth. For the mind, in these days of science, will not ignore facts, though they might sometimes be pleasant enough to forget. They can certainly disfigure the complexion of a beautiful theory. If musicians were all Liszts or Chopins, music would undoubtedly be an inexhaustible source of inspiration to some. But Beethovens have, in our time, degenerated into Irving Berlins; fugues have become syncopations; sonatas, trots.

Milady of means, in her box at the Metropolitan, lifts her libretto against carmined lips with jeweled lily fingers and, while the wonderful Miserere throbs through the hushed darkness and pricks the shining eyes of the Italians in the gallery with hot tears, languidly stifles a yawn. An hour or two later, perchance, she cuddles with crass familiarity to some male dancer in some garish place de danse and surrenders herself ecstatically to motions worthy of a bacchante, while the latest releases from Tin-pan Alley are vigorously "ragged" by a perspiring orchestra. If she, of culture and refinement, is so much a victim to the spell of a variety of music which would make Verdi wail, what can be expected from her unequally educated but equally flighty sisters? The sensuous strains of modern music are even now sweeping a wave of carnality over the world which, dare we mention or face the fact? is bearing on its crest no little profit to physicians. In view of this, it would be as sensible to consider melody the secret of deviltry as of religion. What might serve also as an explanation of religion's opposite would surely be a rather poor explanation of religion itself.

Incidentally it may be remarked that music does not necessarily cease to be music when it becomes immoral. Indeed some of the most vicious compositions of musical celebrities are the most brilliantly conceived and written. And one must concede a certain coarse cleverness even to the selections which Remick and Shapiro are turning out as fast as the five-and ten-cent stores can dispose of them.

Dr. Newton, however, must, of course, have in mind only music which is as coldly chaste as snow; but how much of it is? Surely not enough to make a religion. And even if there were, there would not be people enough to appreciate it. The music with a message means much only to those who know or can feel much. They are not legion. Mendelssohn's "Spring Song" and Rubenstein's "Melody in F" are almost the only masterpieces that cause soul-emotion in all classes; and they alas! have been worked overtime. It would take a profound scholar or sentimentalist to discover anything like "the spirit which is at the core of the Nicene Creed" in a twitter, a ripple, or a thunder of notes. And, even if anyone should actually find it, how could he be certain that his imagination had not put it there.

The Doctor is undeniably right in his implicit belief that the heart, to which music appeals, should, as well as the head, share in the quest for religious truth; that it is capable of helping the mind; and that the excesses of science may find their corrective in religion. But he is wrong in making music a thing of religion, for it is only an aid to it. He regards it as an expression of self-consciousness; this fact, coupled with his conviction that music is an expression of mystical religion, proclaims him to be either a Pantheist like Spinoza, or a Subjectivist like Loisy. He would evidently have some serious differences to settle with psychology and natural theology.

Music is assuredly the expression of feeling, but so are, largely, the other arts. Yet no one would be so quixotic as to believe that all the hands that painted ethereal Madonnas, or all the lips from which dropped celestial pearls of eloquence, were moved and inspired by heaven. Why does Dr. Newton seem to think that the masters of harmony were? Genius is wonderful, transcendent, suggestive of Divinity by comparison with mediocrity, but not Divine. The Doctor allows his enthusiasm to spirit away his prudence when, in his second essay, he says that, "If we should feel constrained to close our Bibles and wander from the Church, we should still find theology in music." He stretches his elastic imagination until it snaps, when he declares that " 'Holy Music' " gives us, not only the theistic idea of the world, but "the distinctly Christian idea"; offering as the reason for this belief the fact that "modern music is the child of Christianity," since its birth-place was the Church, its cradle the altar, and its first cry a Mass. This last, with allowance for rhetorical color, may be true; but it is far from true that the great truths of Christianity have been crystallized into notes, bars, and clefs. Only a poet or a potential poet could conceive of it. Christ, though neither a lutist nor a harpist, taught men exceedingly well by word and act. It would be rash to the point of blasphemy to put a page of plain-chant or a sheet of Handel on a par with the voice and the life of the Man-God.

The Church has always used music for purposes of devotion, not of instruction. The lips of an apostle are worth more to religion than the fingers of all the masters; and this perhaps explains why the Church has chosen the simplest of music, instead of the most complex, for her song. She can teach religion without using music. Dr. Newton advances more than can be proved in asserting that music can teach religion without her. If sufficiently solemn, sweet or sublime, it might move men's spirits; but to what? Only to a vague longing for the truths which the Church can alone authoritatively offer.

EDWARD F. MURPHY, M.A.

A Significant Symbol

SOME half dozen years ago or more, a group of philanthropic millionaires in New York City, bent on uplifting the intellectual tastes of our people, resolved to erect and to endow partially at least, a theater that would correspond in some way to the government subsidized theaters of the great foreign capitals. Before the outbreak of the "Great War" most European governments were accustomed to provide money to make good the deficit in certain theaters, which were obliged as a consequence of this aid, to stage classical plays and thus afford educational opportunities to the people. It had been said over and over again that we could not hope to improve the theatrical taste of our people in this country until we accomplished something of the same kind here.

Almost inevitably the theater-managers, whose one idea was to make money, put on the stage plays with the widest and most popular appeal. As the popular audience is not particularly famous for good taste this question of supplying theatrical entertainment of a kind that would return the most money almost necessarily led to decadence. If there was to be any genuine hope of improvement in taste, the opportunity to see and hear better plays had to be provided. It was realized that a theatrical enterprise providing such opportunities could scarcely be expected to pay at first, but it was felt that after a time it would almost surely do so. In the meantime the men who had become interested in the project of helping popular education through the theater would have the deserved satisfaction of knowing that they were doing a real good.

The principle was probably a very good one. The result I think every New Yorker knows. Let us recall some of the details for the benefit of those readers of America who are outside of New York City.

The New Theater, as it was called, the Century Theater, as it was afterwards named, came into existence. A large ground area, including a whole block front, facing Central Park, was bought, and one of the handsomest theaters in the world was built there. Some said it was too large. Unfortunately the acoustics were not of the best, but that difficulty was remedied to a great extent. The first year fashionable people were interested in the new institution and the wealthier classes, following the fashion, made it a point to go regularly to the New Theater. It was understood that only the best modern plays and selections from the classic English and other national dramas would be given, agreeably interspersed with operatic scenes from the lighter classic composers.

For the first year all seemed to go well, though I believe there was a deficit. The second year fashion abandoned the New Theater to a great extent and then it was left to work out its own destiny. The consequence was that fewer and fewer people went to it. The second year's deficit was alarming and the third year, as far as I can recall, dismayed even the millionaire promoters who found themselves with a white elephant on their hands. Since then the Century Theater has had popular opera, spectacles of various kinds, ballet dancing and all sorts of "shows," but without very much success. This year, however, success seems to have come to it. That success is interesting to study. When I went to see a performance the other evening it seemed to me that this change at the New Theater is symbolic of what is happening in New York life at the present time. I am going to ask your readers whether they agree with me or not.

The latest show at this handsomest theater in the world is called "Town Topics," magni nominis umbra! It is a show of gowns and of ungowned women. Every ten minutes or so during the performance troops of young women come on the stage exhibiting some new way of taking off as much clothes as possible. It is true that they dance and sing, but the dancing is rather conventional and consists mainly in acrobatic high kicking, and as for the singing, I think nearly everybody will agree that the less said about it the better. The choruses might pass, but the principals!—some of them have voice and some of them have not. All of them, however, receive about the same attention from the audience and their ability really does not seem to make much difference.

There is not a single thing in the three hours' performance that by any chance would or could possibly make anyone think. It is absolutely an appeal to sense. No money has been spared in costumes, or in scenery. There is frequent change of costly costumes. Some of the scenery including a great whirling stage is most elaborate and must have been extremely expensive. There are a number of alleged witticisms, but most of these are so old and the rest of them so depend for their humor on slang that they are rather difficult to understand. Besides the principal part of the program is taken up with imitations of other vaudeville performances.

As one of the elaborate features there is a comic baseball game with women as the members of one of the clubs: the jokes are threadbare, the action coarse. The pièce de résistance is the opportunity afforded scantily dressed young women to disperse themselves through the audience. One of the screaming bits of humor consists in cuffing a man while he counts to twenty-five in order to keep his temper down and then finally, when the man who is plaguing him is small enough, he thrashes his tormentor thoroughly, after having counted out the required number. I think that particular action must have been old in Noah's time, and I do not know how it ever passed the "Board of Censors" on the Ark. A "dress exhibit," relieved by such banalities as these is making a success at the Century Theater, built with the dream of uplifting popular dramatic taste! Even on a rainy night a large audience turned out to be entertained and amused by this expensive combination of senseless but sensual trivialities.

This is the fate of a well-directed attempt to provide high-class intellectual dramatic entertainment for the people of New York City. We are deservedly proud of our metropolis of the western world. We see to it that all our growing young folk learn to read and write, and we provide liberally for much more than a common school education, for there are free high schools and a free college and State scholarships. I think it probable that considerably more than half the people in the audience at the Century Theater the other night had received at least some high-school education and many of them doubtless had completed it. All of them had been taught something about Shakespeare, and most of them had been given a reasonably good introduction to literature and made as far as possible to appreciate some of its beauty and significance. When it comes to a choice of a play, however, they do not care to see literature or dramatics. They only want to go to a "show."

Are the Century Theater and its fate then a significant symbol or not, of the failure of our education? I am quite free to confess that I am not quite sure just what this mad following after trivialities means. I am not sure that I can quite understand why people should be willing to pay good prices for mere occupation of their senses and unwilling to pay for what would occupy their minds. It does seem, however, that as symbolism is fashionable just now, we should not miss the hint of symbolism in this little history of the vicissitudes of the finest theater on this continent and one of the finest in the world.

We are just beginning the winter theatrical season now. Probably nothing is more illuminative of conditions than this conversion of our best theater into what is frankly advertised as a typical European music hall, with all that the term connotes. Well, what are we going to do about it? Will conditions have to become much worse before they get any better? Is it not time for all those who are interested in human nature at its best to cooperate for the public good?

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D.

IV—Economic Equality

THE hand of rebellion has set down a list of woman's rights, in direct opposition to those found in Holy Writ. Consequently the conflict between those who would maintain the family as the unit of civil society and those who insist upon the economic independence of the sexes is as straight as up is from down. The rational human vision, unaided, cuts the issue at right angles, thus separating right reason above from the mental darkness below, of those notions which find man's origin to be mere up-climbing from brute nature. Above, in the light of reason, an ascent to the mountain top may be made to faith in God's word, because it is God's word, here to find in its fulness the genesis of woman's true rights.

Yet the issue waxes hot. Many indeed are, as best they may, modeling their conjugal lives after the perfect family, Joseph, Mary, Jesus. Others are running hither and yon in utter confusion. Still others are stumbling after blind leaders who are victims of a spurious propaganda. But in all charity there are those, a multitude, who scornfully reject the glorious rights of men and women as partakers in God's likeness. They deny that by God's will parents become partners in His power of creation, thus establishing the family as the primordial government on earth. They deny that human rights whether fundamental or consequent on a free act which induces a permanent state such as marriage, carry with them submission to God's authority. So it is that the demand for economic equality must be seen at no lesser height nor depth if one would understand its subtle assault upon the moral order.

No other foundation for economic equality can be found save only the assumption that man is a mere evolution from the brute. According to this theory the "tool-using animal" denies any authority save progress for the mass-man, over the product of his hands. For the "tool-using animal" there is neither wife whom he must love as his own flesh, nor children whom he is bound to support. The "tool-using animal" demands freedom! not within the scope of man's rational nature but outside the well-established order of Christian civilization.

Plainly, the way to avoid the responsibilities which hitherto have vexed the "tool-using animal" of both sexes is to set woman free. Turn her loose upon the world with her natural "trade of motherhood" and let the State nurses train the future citizens. Perhaps, woman's "natural trade" offsets the natural handicap men have in fitness for the economic race. At any rate, the chimera of economic equality rests upon the equal liability of men and women to work within the sphere of commerce. Thus indeed is economic equality the ground of sex independence. The tool-user, man or woman, may answer yes to the question: Shall I not do as I like with my own? But right reason answers, no. For the sex integrity of the family must be preserved, the man's wage must be a family wage.

In the early days the economic aspects of the suffrage propaganda were aristocratic; but since its progress upon more democratic grounds, its inner purport is not so deeply hidden. Not that the old war cry, "taxation without representation is tyranny," has lost its prestige, for strangely enough, it is echoed by shop girls and school teachers in persuading their mates of the alleged justice of the cause. Stranger yet, is it, that it applies as truly to wage-workers as to the propertied class of women, for the simple reason that tax-paying is neither the basis of the franchise nor of governmental representation. Men vote who pay no taxes; while all the men of the party defeated at the polls are without representation, even as to policy. It so falls out that the Wilson administration does not represent even a majority of those voting in the last national election. Evidently some of the leaders have at last seen the absurdity of their shibboleth, as it disappears from their appeals for votes for women.

Whichever way the argument shifts, political power was wanted and is wanted to secure equal rights; and the question is more and more insistent: shall the family maintain its state as the economic unit of civilization, or shall the individual be reckoned the unit within the sphere of production for exchange?

It is deeply significant that by their first move to secure economic equality the suffragists made an assault upon the family wage, the wage of men. At the National Labor Union Convention (1868) it was proved that Miss Susan B. Anthony had encouraged girls to serve as strike-breakers at a lower wage in order to learn the printing trade. Miss Anthony stoutly defended her policy as the means by which girls could fit themselves to work side by side with men on equal terms.

There is no need to set forth the progress toward "equal pay" for work which has been made since that time, though it should be said that when men insist on doing work best suited to girls, equal pay for equal output should be exacted. It is also necessary to point out that trade union efforts and a better public opinion crystallized into law by men, not votes by women, are improving industrial conditions and advancing the wages of working girls.

Economic equality is urged as the cure for prostitution. But the recent investigation of the National Civic Federation corrects the view that low wages is the cause of trade in lust, while common sense is convinced that wantonness is its cause and chastity its cure, and that religion promotes the purity of women.

At the conclusion of a debate, "Does the wife support the husband or the husband support the wife," between the most brilliant woman of New England's pantheistic school of thought, Mrs. Charlotte Perkins Stetson Gilman, and the president of the National Suffrage Association, the chairman said the debate might be called a "friendly suit." Yes, truly, as both are agreed in demanding the economic emancipation of women and neither maintains that the family is the unit of civil society, economic or otherwise.

Certainly there can be no objection to girls working in those industries suited to their natural and attained capacities; for the brevity of their wage-earning life generally tides them over the time from school to marriage. The objection falls upon married women entering gainful occupations. If all women were to achieve political, economic and sex independence, then indeed, the ideal of the Feminist would come true. There would be public kitchens and State nurseries but no homes, for home is where wife and mother is; if she be not in the house there is no home for husband and children.

It is the irony of fate that although the trade unions have been and are the one powerful agent in maintaining the man's wage as the family wage, they have been enabled to do so only by insisting that women members of the craft shall receive equal pay with men. A special piece of legislation by the Cigarmakers' Union of Boston is worthy of wide publicity. An influx of Belgian craftsmen with their cigar-making wives so crowded the labor market that a law was passed, even with the aid of a very large contingent who declare for woman's rights, excluding married women from union membership whose husbands are not invalids.

Is it not admirable that under the stress of actual experience false philosophies give place to right practices? The suffragists cry for freedom without regard to right relations. But freedom consists in doing what we "ought to wish to do" and under the moral law we ought to wish to protect the wage of men as a family wage, not to break it down to the status of the individual wage. Freedom is within the moral order, rebellion is outside of it, there is no ought in the speech of the materialist philosopher.

Perhaps the strongest indictment against suffragists from an economic standpoint is their proposal to set up the individual in place of the family as the economic unit of society. This would break down the man's wage as the family wage, thus striking at the very foundation of civil society.

Martha Moore Avery.

The New Philosophy of Despair

"THE vitality of the Church" is the title of an article in the Educational Review by George Hodges, Dean of the Episcopal Theological Seminary at Cambridge, Massachusetts. It is meant as an answer to certain articles which recently have obtained considerable notoriety by announcing to the world, with solemn assurance, the failure of organized Christianity. Mr. Hodges singles out for his direct opponents, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Schoonmaker and Professor Carver. The attitude of the various writers deserves consideration as representing different typical phases of "modern religious thought."

Mr. Lewis, a former Congregational minister, astonished the "intellectuals" of his church by resigning the pastorate of the King's Weigh House Church at Clapham, and announcing that he could not reconcile his desire to be a "man of God" with his position in the Congregationalist community. The subject of his article, published in the Atlantic Monthly, was "The Failure of the Church." His tenets are those of Modernism. Religion, he holds, is in a constant state of evolution. At its present stage those who have the spirit of Christ have to a large extent worked themselves free of dogmas and formularies. Christianity evolved out of Judaism, and out of Christianity there now evolves a "Beyond Christianity." He himself, in common with the Modernists, has reached this latest and most enlightened position. The extent of this enlightenment we may best judge from the fact that he has discovered the germ of the failure of the Church to consist in its exclusion of paganism.

The view taken by Mr. Lewis is hopeful, however, compared with that presented to us in the Century by Mr. Schoonmaker. The former sees the possibility of the continued existence of "the Church" for thousands of years to come, though it will then, he tells us, either be entirely fossilized or no longer recognizable even in name. Mr. Schoonmaker has other visions of her. His ears have been deafened by the roar of cannon in the great world war, and he has marked the shattered statues on the walls of Reims Cathedral; but he has waited in vain for a cry of horror to arise proclaiming that the house of God has been attacked. There comes instead an outburst of wrath from enlightened lands, as the smoke clears away from before his vision, telling him that "a work of art" has suffered. The Church therefore is dead. The stately shrine of devotion is regarded as only an architectural marvel, a relic of departed glory. The Christian temple has taken its place with Karnak and the Parthenon. Such is his message of despair. But still a third witness remains.

"What Ails the Church?" asks Professor Carver in the Harvard Theological Review. There was a time, he says, when it still preached a clear and definite gospel of salvation, "with damnation as the unattractive, though varyingly emphasized alternative; now it is not considered quite polite in the best religious circles to mention damnation, and since there is nothing very definite to be saved from, salvation has lost its meaning." He sees therefore "the Church," or as he should say, the churches, helplessly drifting with the current or "running around in a circle looking for some 'cause' to espouse, or something vaguely called 'social service' to perform." He too has his own substitute, his own "Beyond Christianity," which he calls the "Workbench Philosophy."

For the intelligent Catholic there can be no difficulty in dispelling the illusions of this latest philosophy of despair. It is simple for him to prove, in answer to Mr. Lewis and the Modernistic school, that Christ sustains and will sustain until the end of time the one and only Church which He founded, as He foretold that He would remain with her and send His Spirit to abide with her forever. While the churches have constantly changed, the Church is ever the same, because truth and the Spirit of Truth are immutable. For this reason too she is adapted to every age, as her unceasing vitality shows. She may make use of new methods suited to different periods, but cannot alter her doctrines. She may advance into fuller light certain truths always possessed by her, but she cannot change them or invent new truths. Her mission is to preach until the end of time the doctrine committed to her, sure of the promise of Christ that He will be with her "even to the consummation of the world" (Matt. xxviii, 20). It is still easier for the Catholic to convince Mr. Schoonmaker, even were it against his will, that the Catholic Church at least is not dead, that she alone is now as ever a vital, energizing force throughout the entire earth. No other argument would be needed than to point to the thousands in every land who, in the strength of their invincible Faith, leave all the world holds dear to dedicate their lives to God, and to the service of their neighbor for love of God. Nor has she, in answer to Professor Carver, ever flinched from preaching in all its fulness the Gospel committed to her, proclaiming without attenuation the reality of those eternal fires prepared for the devil and his angels and awaiting the reprobate. "Depart from me, you cursed, into everlasting fire," are the words of Christ. She knows that judicial sentences are not couched in figurative language and that Christ meant all that He so plainly said, and so many times repeated.

There is no difficulty indeed on the part of the Catholic; but what has Mr. Hodges to answer to the modern philosophy of despair? Under the name of "the Church" he includes, like the other writers, all the many mutually contradictory churches that in any way still cling to the name of Christianity. This, to begin with, is worse than confusion. The Church of Christ is the Church that teaches His doctrine, and that doctrine cannot be self-contradictory, or Christ would contradict Himself. To prove the vitality of the Church, as he sets out to do, he must therefore prove that there is one, undivided Church, holding the one, undivided doctrine of Christ, and that this Church has come down without any change of doctrine from the days of the Apostles. But to prove this is at once to disprove Protestantism altogether. Let us then listen to the defense of Mr. Hodges against the new gospel of despair. His answer, though wrongly expressed and wrongly applied, is taken from the armory of the one true Church. He writes:

> The battle line of the Church is as long as the equator and there is always failure somewhere: somewhere by reason of local weakness, or of bad generalship, or of the occupation of untenable positions, or of the rash advance of a few beyond the main division, there is defeat, and some observers declare that the war is over, and that the beaten Church must now surrender and disband. But such observers have been making such declarations since the year one.

The chapters of Church history that seem the most depressing are really, he says, the most encouraging:

> They show that the Church possesses an invincible vitality. What peril has it not met, what might of adversaries, what treachery of false friends? Into what wrong roads has it not been misled, down what steep precipices has it not fallen! And yet, after all, undaunted, strengthened rather than disabled by hard experience, the Church has come on, slowly mastering the life of man.

This indeed would be the unanswerable argument the Catholic can offer, did the writer exclude his false supposition of weakness and error on the part of the Church herself. Such a false supposition denies the promise of Christ that the gates of hell shall never prevail against her, not even for a moment, much less for centuries, as Protestantism must hold. It denies His promise of the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, whom He was to send that the Church might be guarded from every slightest approach of error, as became His spiritual Spouse, that He might present Himself "a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish." (Eph. v, 27).

The battle line of the Church, indeed, as Mr. Hodges says, is as long as the equator, her armies may be defeated in places, her generals themselves may prove unworthy, her soldiers may fall in numbers or surrender to the foe at times in almost entire companies; but she herself can never fail or yield ever so little to the errors of the age, "misled into wrong roads," for she holds the promise of Christ. Her discipline may be adapted to the changing ages, the truth possessed by her from the beginning may be made more evident and even declared of faith to preserve her children more surely from error; but her doctrine remains one and the same, as the doctrine of Christ. His Spirit of truth abiding within her cannot change. For this Church let Mr. Hodges plead, the one, undivided, apostolic, Catholic Church, and he will be able to prove convincingly her true vitality which cannot be possessed by the sects separated from her, divided among themselves as error ever must be, changing within themselves and ever uncertain of their tenets because adrift from the Rock whereon Christ built His Church.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

"Aux Morts"

PÈRE LACHAISE CEMETERY is a hopeless spot. The dead are sown in its soil thick as seed in wheat-fields. The hope of the Resurrection was its spirit from those days of plague in which it was given over by the Jesuit confessor of Louis XIV to be a place of rest for the dead, until these latter times when much of Paris has bitterly left the Lord its God. Two notable structures have risen in late years above the wilderness of its tombs, a crematory and Bartholomé's monument Aux Morts, the former the idol of the "Fool who hath said in heart there is no God," the latter the coldest piece of marble in the world.

It was my inclement fortune to be shown, in the crematory, the furnace-pan withdrawn from the retort, and containing the residue of the last human firing. The attendant rummaged his hand among the whitened bones and gathering up a quantity offered me the gruesome amusement of holding some specimens in my hand. My "No, thank you," meant nothing to the cheerful Gaul; squeamishness is not his vice. But the familiarity shocked me, notwithstanding that it might be a tender attention to distribute samples of crematory by-products to possible customers.

One could weep for those who rest in the shadow of Aux Morts. It is a splendid pile, and genius was behind the hand that hewed the forlorn humanity from its blocks, though the result can hardly be called art; since art is truth and this is slander. The cry that it utters: "O God, there is no hope" freezes the soul; that, or its more terrifying lamentation, "There is no God because there is no hope." The frightful monument points to itself in answer to St. Paul's exclamation, "O death, where is thy victory! O death, where is thy sting!" The procession of the human race, from the new-born babe prone across its parents' loins, to the maiden and the sinewy youth, on to haggard age, drags its leaden feet into the open mouth of the hopeless tomb. Poor, staggering humanity which it sets unashamed before the eye! No joy ever touched it; none ever shall. There is no cross, no crown; no palm of victory, no white robe before the Lamb; no crux, spes unica, no lux perpetua for those who cling to Aux Morts in Père Lachaise. It is the fiercest piece of marble ever fashioned into life.

Two ways open before the soul upon seeing this savage work—Christ the Redeemer, and Despair the Monster. Every figure, every attitude, every line of it is a devilish invitation to eternal nothingness. The door of its tomb is the gate of hell, drawing all humanity into it by the inevitable suction of despair, laggingly, soddenly, brutishly. It is by sheer recoil that the Redeemer stands forth before it. The soul must spring back from the petrifying spectacle and cry out in anguish: "If this be thy God, O France, how beautiful is Emmanuel." Despair written in stone turns the heart to ashes or to God.

There are altars in Père Lachaise and a desolate chapel. Wherever violets grow faith and hope cannot be altogether dead. But despair is the atmosphere of the place, and broods over it like a cloud generated from its central monuments.

The graves of England are holy places. Reverence hovers over them, and peace entwines itself among the ivy-covered stones in the solemn country churchyards. Here too, though, a dull shadow falls over the great national monuments to the dead. They lack the unction of faith. They symbolize success; not life everlasting. Oftentimes they are boastful of the doctrine of this world. Sometimes they are ludicrous in their worldliness. Who, for example, could look upon the effigy of Wellington, stretched out in the upper berth of his monument in St. Paul's, with his nostrils so close to the canopy that the foul air cannot possibly be dodged, and restrain his laughter?

And then poor Queen Elizabeth, sleeping her marble sleep in Westminster Abbey, just across the way from her headless victim, Mary of Scots, who could find it in his heart to think on her unshriven soul, stained with the blood of Campion, after looking upon this repulsive figure staring, unseeing, at the splendid ceiling of Henry VII's chapel? I wonder if a prayer for the heavy soul of this unhappy monarch ever has been inspired by this haughty sarcophagus.

And so of multitudes of other English monuments. These piles of bronze and stone are interesting merely as furniture, and as marking the fact that certain personalities lived, influenced their age, and passed away. They make no suggestion of immortality, no inspiration to prayer, not the least acknowledgment of a Creator. And the same is true of practically all the other monuments in St. Paul's and Westminster, though many of them have a more decided artistic value than Wellington's or Queen Elizabeth's. They are all speechless in so far as the things of the spirit are concerned.

It is pleasant to turn from Père Lachaise, where the gloom of life is cast into eternity, and from Westminster and St. Paul's, where the passing glory of this world is blazoned, to the Campo Santo of Genoa, or San Miniato at Florence, or San Lorenzo at Rome, where death springs on the carven wings of hope to glorious immortality. There is no despair here, no admiration of success. Faith is abroad in the warm sunshine, tears are wiped away, healing is in the wings of the wind, the Shepherd is in His fold. How sweetly the dead rest here among the ilex trees, encompassed by happy thoughts of resurrection. Here is life, not death; corruptibility springing to incorruptible harvest. All about are symbolical re-enactments of the scene at dawn in Joseph of Arimathea's garden. Here are angels in Carrara garments, standing by many sepulchers, saying to those who come in sorrow: "Be not affrighted. The soul you seek is not here; it is risen; it has gone before you into Heaven."

Atheism, materialism, and faith in God are unmistakably signified by these three types of monument to the dead, and though in the Italian cemeteries worldliness jostles faith, and indifferent taste tags the heels of art, still the dominating spirit is of peace and tranquil hope, which is lamentably lacking in London and Paris.

But in Ireland, holy Ireland, there one might wish to rest. What matters Celtic cross or sod of turf above the pulseless heart, sweet laburnum or hawthorn bush at the quiet feet, while the open hearts of the living are everlasting shrines of prayer before the tabernacle of the Lord. No monuments were ever more fitting than the modest tablets in the venerable Dublin pro-cathedral. The church is neither fashionable nor impressive. It is decidedly dingy and grimy; just such a refuge as Peter, the fisherman, or John, "the voice of one crying in the desert," might have searched out for refreshment by the Master. The faith of Ireland can never fail while such hiding places for the Son of Man are left her.

It was a joy one Sunday morning to find my way into this blessed house of prayer. At early Mass the sittings seemed to be free in all parts of the church, and it was my luck to drop into one in the nave well forward toward the sanctuary. Upon kneeling, my eyes rested on a neat brass tablet, set in the table of the pew, and inscribed with the words:

Pray for the Soul of——who died——R. I. P.

The name happened to be that of a scholar whose work had given me pleasure. I was now before his monument, kneeling on the spot where he had knelt, a guest in his place, hearing his voice ask the comfort of a prayer, and there ready for the healing was the "water flowing from the right side of the Temple." Where, unless on the very altar of sacrifice, could there be a more splendid monument than this? No sad processions of bitter humanity entering into eternal shade, no tawdry ribbons or flowers, not even the hopeful wings of stone angels, could come between my vision of this Irish soul and his plea for the charity of remembrance. He and I; he and whoever preceded or succeeded me in this spot, were alone before God, if only during the flash of a thought. And this is the supreme office of a Catholic monument that it causes me and the soul whom it commemorates to walk together, if only for a moment, before the face of God. The mausoleum or grave-stone that does not tend to effect this companionship, that does not show forth the doctrine of the Communion of Saints, is an everlasting failure as a Christian monument, though it outface heaven in splendor of carving and outdo man in aptness of epitaph. On the contrary, the simplest memorial that draws out a prayer for the dead to the exclusion of admiration of art, or disgust at vulgarity, or mirth at the swish of wealth over grave-stones, is the holiest expression of love, and for my part the memorials in Dublin pro-cathedral, for these simple tablets are in many pews, accomplish this end more effectively than any monuments I have seen outside the tombs of the Saints. It is just another instance of the sure spiritual instinct of the Irish people.

In our own good country a vast amount of pains and means is frittered away on amazing tomb-stones. It is a rare Catholic cemetery with us that does not harbor, in one corner or another, a miscellaneous collection of madly unsteady wooden or cast-iron crosses and pathetic specimens of sculpture, pointing in every uncanny direction except heavenward. The shakiest cross may be a sublime evidence of affection for a departed soul, and the gaudiest mausoleum may not be altogether futile: right intention is almost boundless in its charity. But let every claim of love and holy thought be granted, and there still remains a bewildering mass of bad taste, grotesqueness and extravagance in the memorials set up in our cemeteries. It is true that the "rule of reason" is difficult of application to grave-stones. Small men simply must have big monuments if their memory is to survive. Big men, dead or alive, do not need advertising. The small and the big, however, when dead, are alike beggars, who need every scrap of prayer that can be wheedled out of devout souls. "In that tremendous day" no man is great.

What a blessed thing it would be for the dead and the living if we would follow the example set us by our Dublin brothers, and make the pews of our churches monuments to those whom we "have loved long since, and lost awhile"! Kneeling where they knelt, praying where they prayed, weeping it may be where they wept, how would the memory of them fade or grow cold with the passing of the years; how would we escape the sweet entanglements of the Communion of Saints, and more than all, how would we estimate the joy in that "land of pain and unspeechful expectation." We have taken many tender customs from across the sea; none is more worthy to be transplanted than this gracious manner of remembering the dead.

M. J. RIORDAN.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

Competitive Athletics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Dr. James J. Walsh's letter commenting on my position in regard to competitive athletics, adds nothing new to what he has already told us. He talks only on over-indulgence, and his statements are very general and radical. He tells us: "My objection to competitive athletics is that they are not sport and are pursued at a great expense of time and effort." It is plain that the Doctor merely asserts that which he ought to prove. He should change the sentence to read: "I object to competitive athletics when they are pursued at a great expense of time and effort, because then they cease to be sport." The Doctor also says that "subsidiary reasons for competitive athletics which require excuses, are that they help morality and mental efficiency." He surely cannot be serious. Athletics are simply physical exercises from which a man can derive health, pleasure and relaxation. I should certainly like to see the man who takes up athletics for the good of his soul, or to improve his mind. Again, the Doctor says: "It is not self-denial that athletics teach, but pride of bodily strength." The answer is that athletics are not intended to teach self-denial; they are to be taken just as we take our meals, without over-indulgence. Nor is pride of bodily strength a very reprehensible thing, if not over-indulged. A man must take good care of himself in order to retain his bodily health; over-indulgence in food, drink, etc., will soon sap it. Dr. Walsh tells us that "a healthy mind in a healthy body is the ideal state of man." To this I cannot agree. The commission of sin supposes a healthy mind. A diseased mind affects free agency. A deformed idiot is in a better state than a man with a diseased soul. And then the Doctor says: "The morality of the training period is only too often followed by excess when training is broken." Here he has put the cart before the horse; he should have said: "The immoral living of a certain kind of young men is interrupted during the training period." Competitive athletics are not intended to teach morality, yet the Doctor admits that they are an incentive sufficiently strong to make immoral young men control themselves until they quit competing.

In the article in question, I emphasized the fact that I was concerned entirely with amateur athletics. Dr. Walsh was pretty hard pushed when he compared the healthful enjoyment derived from watching our amateur athletes, young men who take up out-door sports during their spare hours just for the love of it, to the debasing influence of a brutal exhibition between two professional heavyweights. I wonder if Dr. Walsh noticed, when he was on the various teams at Fordham, whether there were ladies among the spectators; and if there were, did the Doctor quiet his conscience with the thought that the ladies were either being "bored to death," or were taking their enjoyment of his performance in homeopathic doses? Over-attention to athletics and lowered scholarship standards are not in the relation of cause and effect. College faculties, to make their institutions attractive, have encouraged athletics to such an extent that they strongly influence a young man in his choice of a college. Furthermore, to remove all possible objections in regard to studies, the faculties have established "elective courses," etc.

By the way, if Mr. Reilly, whose letter appears in your issue of October 16, will refer to his English dictionary he will find that "athletics" has other meanings besides "contests for prizes." "Athletics" is generally understood to mean physical exercises. And competitive athletics are usually spoken of as "outside competition," meaning that the athletes compete against representatives of other colleges and clubs. Mr. Reilly has missed the point argued in the last two or three papers which AMERICA published on this subject. Further down in the Doctor's letter he tells us that the "German universities have had practically no competitive athletics," and moreover, that "German efficiency, physical and mental, has rightly become much more than an expressive phrase since the begining of the war." In the first place, the Kaiser's armies are not made up entirely of university men. In the second place, nearly all the young men, including students in schools and colleges, are members of clubs called Turnvereins, and they compete against one another in the most arduous tests requiring great skill, strength and perfect physical condition. In the third place, the Kaiser sent to America for Dr. A. C. Kraenzlein to prepare the German athletes for the Olympic Games which were to have been held at Berlin in 1916. Dr. Kraenzlein competed for Pennsylvania University, and is the holder of a number of world's records, and of Olympic records. He was a wonderful hurdler, jumper and sprinter. His return home to America in April, 1914, just before the war, was the cause of great astonishment. Finally, Dr. Walsh has been sadly misinformed in respect of competition in Ireland. Many Irish athletes were champions not only in Ireland, but won American championships also.

New York. ROBERT E. SHORTALL.

The Sincerity of Anglicans

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In his last communication Mr. Jared Moore made clear one ambiguous sentence in his letter of September 18, by declaring that sentiment is not a valid reason for remaining true to any form of religion. So far, so good. Now to the second point, the discussion about the Sacraments. Mr. Moore accepts seven Sacraments: he is a Catholic, differing from us only by the fact that he does not acknowledge the sovereignty of the Bishop of Rome; he is, moreover, one of those who are fighting for the Catholic Faith against Protestantism (AMERICA, July 17). Hence it follows that he accepts the seven Sacraments as believed by Catholics and rejected by Protestants. In fact he explicitly states that he accepts the Real Presence of Christ in the Blessed Sacrament. In his last letter Mr. Moore says:

> The Anglican portion of the Church has never officially repudiated any of them: what makes many people think she has is her statement that only two of these were ordained of Christ as "generally" i. e., in the older and literal sense of that term universally, "necessary to salvation."

The issue is now very clear indeed. Here it is: Mr. Moore declares that the Anglican portion of the Church did not officially repudiate any of the Sacraments as understood by Catholics. I declare that it did. Firstly it rejected the Real Presence. The Thirty-nine Articles constitute an official document: and in Article XXVIII we read:

> Transubstantiation, (or the change of the substance of bread and wine), cannot be proved by Holy Writ: but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a Sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions. The Body of Christ is given, taken and eaten in the Supper, only after an heavenly and spiritual manner. And the means, whereby the Body of Christ is perceived and eaten in the Supper is Faith.

This is a flat, official repudiation of the Holy Eucharist as accepted by Catholics, Mr. Moore included. Moreover other Sacraments are also officially repudiated in the sense in which they are accepted by Mr. Moore. Article XXV reads:

> Those five commonly called sacraments, that is to say, Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony and Extreme Unction, are not to be counted for sacraments of the Gospel being such as have grown partly of the corrupt following of the Apostles, partly are states of life allowed in the Scriptures, but yet have not like nature of sacraments with Baptism and the Lord's Supper, for that they have not any visible sign or ceremony ordained of God. (Italics inserted).

More than that, Harold Browne, Norrisian Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge and Canon of Exeter, in his Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles declares explicitly: (p. 588) "Extreme Unction we neither esteem to be a sacrament nor an ordinance of the Church at all." (Italics inserted). Plain words those. Again the second book of Homilies proclaims: "As for the number of them, if they should be considered according to the exact meaning of a sacrament, namely, for the visible signs, whereinto is annexed the promise of free forgiveness of sins, there be but two: namely, Baptism and the Supper of the Lord." This is enough. The Thirty-nine Articles therefore contain an official repudiation of certain Sacraments as accepted by Mr. Moore; and the repudiation is sustained in the Book of Homilies and elsewhere.

New York. GEORGE RUSK.

The Woman Suffrage Issue

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"Why is it," asks your correspondent, Mary E. Rodgers, in AMERICA of September 25, "that the Catholic press is not supporting woman suffrage?" "It is a moral issue," she pleads, "with all the forces of evil arrayed against us." If the suffrage issue be, indeed, in its nature a contest of right against wrong, of the moral against the immoral, readers of the Catholic press may well wonder at the failure of that press to array itself against "all the forces of evil." If such be the issue, Catholics ought to regret that other priests have not followed the example of the one mentioned by your correspondent who used a church basement as a suffrage meeting hall. But possibly there are not a few who, for reasons not clearly evil, sympathize with the conclusions of his Eminence, the Cardinal Archbishop of Baltimore, concerning what has been "somewhat inaptly termed the franchise of voting."

Regarding the proposal for woman suffrage in the light of expediency, many voters will deplore the grave danger of ills more serious than the sure increase in expenses of elections and the increase of the office-holding class. For will not there result from the adoption of the proposal an increase in power and influence to the Feminists, to the Socialists and to every one of the brood of latter-day faddists who have made fast their hold upon the suffrage movement? Certainly, the preachers of social perversion and revolution who join with your correspondent in demanding votes for women do not join with her, or with your correspondent, Sara McPike, in the invocation of St. Catharine. Will Christian women, such as your correspondents, be in a majority among the women who will take care to register and vote? Will the good women turn upon the comrades with whom they are now consorting, and oppose effectively the enfranchised propagandists of social revolution? Should the necessity be created for a duty so irksome? And should no respect be shown for the protests of the anti-suffragists, whose organization comprises none of those dangerous elements so conspicuous in the suffrage organization? Should the indifference of so many women in the community be forgotten, the women who will not leave their homes to vote, until forced to the polls?

Apprehensive respecting the anger of suffragist workers, mindful of electoral votes in woman-suffrage States, and forgetful of the possibility that anti-suffragists may cherish grudges, a few aspirants to high office will, perhaps, be hampered in exercising an independent judgment. But mindful of the social dangers ahead, many voters will hesitate to incur the responsibility of "shooting Niagara" by adding the female sex to our electorate. On an issue so momentous many will decline to respond "yes," to this demand for what some women erroneously assert to be their right. Are not those women also to be listened to, who correctly think that the proposal will impose a duty rather than rectify a wrong; who ask that the exemption which they now enjoy shall not be taken from them, and that they shall not be forced into the ranks of voters, and into "the moral pest-houses of politics"?

Sands Point, N. Y. CHARLES W. SLOANE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It seems to me that a large number of suffragists miss the drift of the argument of those opposed to them. As I understand it, anti-suffragists are stressing these points: first, the ballot is not a right but a privilege which, when given, entails a grave responsibility for which women are unfitted by nature; second, the mere casting of the vote by women is neither here nor there: what matters is the radical movement which centers round the demand for the ballot and has given rise to doctrines subversive of morals and religion.

New York. A. L. M.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

Mrs. Partington and the Neo-Malthusian

"I DO not believe that it is a good thing to encourage matrimony by lowering taxation," said a New York University professor some days ago, before a legislative committee. And then as if in pity for the slow-moving wits of legislators, he added: "On the contrary, I would discourage matrimony by making the married man pay a higher tax."

Nothing is without use in this utilitarian world, and the chief function of many a university professor seems to be to make the judicious grieve, and to furnish copy for the yellow journals. The professor later volunteered an explanation to a representative of one of these sheets.

> A man worth nothing at all, he elucidated, pays fifty cents for a marriage license. Very well. He is then free to marry. When children come, he has nothing on which to support them. The result is seen in our asylums and poor houses. Too many children are allowed to be born. I believe the great war is the result of the rejection of Malthusianism. A man should not be allowed to marry until he can convince some central authority that he can support a family.

What authority, one may ask, and according to what standard? Will the examination be restricted to the prospective benedict's rating in Bradstreet? Or will it include a scrutiny of his ethical and theological creeds, if any, with an inquiry into his moral character? These are important points; more important, possibly, than the question of finance. Many a Midas, the top of the crême de la crême of fashionable society worships Circe with porcine eyes. Is this besnouted gentleman to receive a plenary blessing from the "central authority," while the man who believes that a dinner of herbs with love is better than a feast, falls under the ban?

The professor's reasoning is clear, but it suffers from a dread disease which the old logicians used to call an undistributed middle. Because some men are improvident, it follows that most men are, and therefore like the country yokel, the professor cries out that "there ought to be a law agin' it." Very probably the professor regards Divine Providence as the survival of a myth, but wiser men than he have thought that the infinite Being who created the world is quite capable of bringing it and all creatures to their appointed end without the aid of men who seek to frustrate the law of nature.

The professor's value to society at large would be more noticeable had he been endowed with a trace of the saving sense of humor. Mrs. Partington, sweeping back the rolling sea with her unaided broom has been rightly considered a "figure o' fun." Yet in comparison with the New York professor who gravely suggests improvements on the designs of God, this worthy dame must needs appear a very pattern of rare good sense.

Andrew Jackson Shipman

A FEW days ago the grave closed over the body of Andrew Jackson Shipman, a scholarly gentleman distinguished for unflinching devotion to the highest ideals. A Virginian by birth, the blood of patriots was in his veins. But not on that account did he win distinction. Given his character and attainments distinction was inevitable, even though birth had been lowly. He moved among men, quiet and unobtrusive, yet radiating an influence which was unmistakable. Unlike so many others of our day he sought neither wealth nor notoriety. His character was his chief treasure and he kept it immaculate, free alike from the grime of the pit of cheap politics and the servility that is the effect of truckling. His gifts of heart were very great, his gifts of mind just as great. His knowledge of law was extensive and accurate, his command of languages little short of marvelous. He was schooled in the literature of many nations and had the distinction of being one of the very few native Americans learned in the Slavic languages. This knowledge was not a mere empty accomplishment, it was an instrument for far-reaching service in a good cause. To Mr. Shipman is due in great measure the present hopeful spiritual condition of the Catholics of Eastern rites, who are living in such large numbers in this country. He made them known to their fellows in the Faith, pleaded their cause and exposed the proselyting propaganda carried on amongst them by fraud too contemptible for mention. This labor, done as all his other work, quietly, fearlessly and without desire for personal aggrandizement, has borne fruit a hundred-fold, and the Eastern people for whom he labored have won a gratifying recognition from ecclesiastical authority. They showed their gratitude, bishop, priests and lay-folk, by assembling at their benefactor's funeral to pay a last tribute of respect, and as, during the absolution according to the Ruthenian rite, their chant rose and fell in weird, measured cadences, many present appreciated one reason why Andrew Shipman's loss to the Church is great and difficult to repair.

A good man has passed away, a great man is dead, but there is consolation in the thought that he has gone home with arms filled with sheaves garnered in the Master's field, an ideal layman, zealous, educated, cultured, a credit to the Church, and to Georgetown, his old university, which years ago sent him forth on the rugged path which has at last terminated in never-ending glory.

The Evolution of the Moral Law

PHILOSOPHERS of independent thought are apt to be rudely shaken in their theories by the wayward march of human perversity. A recent example may be quoted in point. With a curious optimism, possible only in an editorial sanctum, the following sentence was penned: "We forget that mankind can no more return to its ancient immoralities than its culture can return to its ancient barbarism." This brave saying had scarcely been committed to the press, before another man descanting on a filthy play, wrote the following illuminating, though unconscious commentary on it: "If a Turk could be suddenly set down in the theater during the middle of the performance he would undoubtedly think that he is in the heaven predicted by the prophet," and this, as the dramatic critic opines, even though the Turk does not understand the dialogue which is far worse than the spectacle. Evidently then mankind, if not in its entirety, at least in considerable part, is capable of a very marked "return to its ancient immoralities," if indeed his return is not rather in the nature of a progression towards a baseness that even pagans rejected. Aristophanes is one of the foremost exponents of the "ancient immoralities," and yet he would have blushed for the coarseness of his successor, although no one would accuse him of squeamishness. The Attic comedy had reticences and reserves, whereas the modern stage apparently has none.

The fact of this moral retrogression, as well as its underlying cause, have been pointed out by one of our conservative magazines, though with entire approval, as follows:

> It is apparently accepted that those moral laws have been evolved by the evolution of civilization, so that many moral evils which our forefathers endured are now intolerable to us and we tolerate freedom that our forefathers would have thundered against.

Poor evolution! What crimes are laid at its door. It is bad enough to make it responsible for giving man a repulsive and hideous ancestry in the ape. Must it now be charged with the destruction of the very foundation of morality? The modern sponsor of evolution would probably repudiate such a responsibility. Neither he nor any other sensible man builds the moral law on the shifting sand of the changing conditions of human life.

The moral law depends for its essence on unchanging relations between creature and Creator. Its application may vary with varying circumstances, the law itself is the immutable expression of the Divine insistence on the preservation of order, the essential order that exists of necessity on earth, and to which obedience is demanded by God, and that too under a frightful sanction, wherever free will comes into play. Given God and man, even in the speculative order, the moral law at once springs into existence, composed of a two-fold element: God's knowledge of what is right, and His will that that right be fulfilled. The moral law therefore is, in its essence, as free from evolution as God himself. Its human herald, the individual conscience, has proclaimed it, the same in substance, to every man from Adam to each one of our generation. So it will be to the end: every man's reason must testify to moral obligation, every man's will must feel bound to its fulfilment. The "evolution of civilization" may eventuate in a clearer perception of law and a greater readiness to submit to it, but from the beginning the law itself was fixed for all.

"Up, Up We Go!"

A FEW months ago the Socialist daily Call announced that it must discontinue publication unless pledges amounting to several hundred dollars a week were assured to it by its subscribers within a certain period, in order to cover its weekly deficits. The date set for the conclusion of the campaign arrived, and the necessary pledges had all been given. The payments are being made promptly, for the Call continues to appear as serenely as ever, denouncing capitalism, the Church and the doctrines of Christianity in one medley of reprobation. Hardly had this appeal been answered when a new campaign was launched; the history of the Call, it may be said, is made up of skilfully managed appeals to the pocketbooks of its friends. The billion dollar loan afforded an occasion for the next adventure. If capitalists, the paper argued, could give a billion dollars for the support of a capitalist war in the interest of capitalist commerce, could not the workers give at least a paltry ten thousand for the victory of their own cause, identical, we are assured, with the victory of Socialism? The capitalist loan was split in two; but not so the Socialist demands. "Up, Up We Go!" is the enthusiastic announcement telling the comrades that more than half the fund has already been subscribed, mostly in hundred dollar checks. "Circulation is going up, the demand for the Call booster meetings is increasing daily, everybody is talking, eating and sleeping Call." The object of the fund itself is to perfect the machinery of the subscription-bringing agencies, "to hook on to the paper a new ninety-horse-power circulation engine."

We have often wondered, in watching these periodic hoistings of the signal flags of distress, varied by bursts of enthusiasm for the "big drive" which is ever coming but never here, what effects similar methods would have upon our Catholic readers. It is true that the Socialist graveyard is filled with the tombstones of dead journalistic ventures, yet it is likewise true that a vast sum of money has been supplied constantly, freely and without any returns, for the founding and preservation of these organs of a long-exploded materialistic philosophy. We believe that we have compassed a great object when we have induced Catholics to promote the cause of our press by urging others to subscribe. Socialist journals likewise insist upon this, but they do not hesitate to make far greater demands on their party members, calling for donations, initial subscriptions for prospective readers, and general distribution of Socialist papers, pamphlets and books. "Victory through the press!" is their watchword. The results do not always meet their expectations, for Socialists too are human, but the efforts are often well repaid.

Catholics can readily plead that they are already giving freely for Church and school and charity, while the Socialist, free from this burden, can turn money into his party funds and press campaign. This is doubtless true, but it is likewise true that we are still far from realizing the need of a well-supported and enthusiastically promoted Catholic press. When this idea has once been well grasped we may hope that Catholics, too, in addition to their other sacrifices, will not hesitate to give all due consideration to this apostolate, so earnestly urged upon them by the Holy See.

The Ballot and the People

THE ballot is an instrument of government for good or for ill according to the person who casts it. If the voters are intelligent and upright, more concerned with principles than with parties, the government will be good, if on the other hand, the voters are ignorant or vicious, the government will be either weak or evil. Although this is true under all forms of governments supported by votes, yet it is especially true in a liberal democracy where legislative, executive and judicial power falls to the lot of so many citizens. In fact, a democracy is neither better nor worse than its voters: it is an expression of their ideals; they think and act through it. It is founded on their intellects and wills, not on this or that intellect or will, but on the intellects and wills of all the citizens. They participate in its virtue, share in its crime; its glory is their glory; its shame is their shame. For this reason there rests upon the voter the responsibility of using the ballot with the greatest singleness of purpose. He will never do this unless he bears in mind that principles are above parties and individuals. A party is valuable only in so far as it stands for good principles, accentuates them and give them a momentum beyond the power of isolated individuals to bestow. What is true of a party, is likewise true of a man aspiring to high office. Principles come first, parties and individuals second. Voters are only too apt to forget this; they reverse the order, attach themselves to parties and to men and remain true to them for good or ill, forgetting meantime that they are responsible for any act whereby they may ignore justice or some other fundamental virtue necessary for good government. This is no mere political problem, it pertains primarily, fundamentally, if you will, to pure ethics and hence is all the more deserving of careful consideration. Many of the evils which afflict us will be solved, not by an increase of voters, but rather by an increase of responsible voters.

Extinguishing the Lights

"WE have extinguished the lights of heaven!" cried out M. Viviani some ten years since in the House of Deputies. The apostate raised his voice in mockery and derision. Registering their edicts of persecution as the law of the land, he and his cohorts foolishly believed that they had destroyed the Church in France.

A decade passes, and the enemies of France encompass her on every hand. From the ends of the earth her exiled sons and daughters troop back to the Republic that had declared them unfit to live within her boundaries. The billows of persecution had passed over their heads and they were well-nigh submerged. But many waters could not extinguish their love for their native land. They came not to be served but to serve. On the field of death, in the trenches, in the hospitals and the asylums, wherever a good deed is to be done, an errand of danger to be undertaken, a troubled soul to be comforted in its passage to God; there you will find the exiled priest and the proscribed nun.

And at Paris a great parliamentary battle is raging. M. Viviani leads the struggle for a vote of confidence in the Government. The confusion is great. "To suppress the disorder of the Opposition," reads a cablegram, "the lights were extinguished." Is this a foreshadowing of the end? Who can tell? But this is certain: God is not mocked, by men or by nations.

LITERATURE

XII—Father Wasmann

IN the early days of Darwinism there is no doubt that it was exceedingly difficult for the ordinary man of religious views to adapt himself to the new ideas, then appearing to be so well proved, so fully accepted, so unlikely to be upset. And as a matter of fact, many men did lose their hold upon religion, some of them at least, like Romanes, with bitter regret that it should be so. The first real attempt to deal with the relative positions, as regards this matter, of religion and science was Mivart's work, "The Genesis of Species." This now almost-forgotten book emanated from a man of scientific reputation, who was at that time in full health and vigor and a devout Catholic, and it contained powerful criticism of some of the points made by Darwin, a criticism which time has shown to be just. But the book contained, and from our point of view this was its most important section, a discussion of the real relation of transformist theories to Catholic teaching, and this part of the work was also of permanent interest and value.

But things have changed a great deal since that work was published in 1871, and much scientific water has run under the bridges of Cambridge since its celebrated son emitted his views. Natural Selection is no longer held to be the key to unlock all biological riddles, and just as the discovery of radium shattered many physical theories, Mendel's Laws have shaken belief in numerous respected scientific doctrines. In fact the President of the British Association did not hesitate to declare in his address last year in Melbourne that, "We go to Darwin for his incomparable collection of facts. We would fain emulate his scholarship, his width and his power of exposition, but to us he speaks no more with philosophical authority. We read his scheme of evolution as we would those of Lucretius or Lamarck, delighting in their simplicity and their courage."

How are things changed? Many a man, metaphorically speaking, went to the scientific stake for less than that in the palmy Victorian times. But now in "Modern Biology and the Theory of Evolution," and in "The Berlin Discussion of the Problem of Evolution," Father Wasmann's famous works, the intelligent Catholic will find a storehouse of facts and arguments of the utmost value in enabling him to estimate at their proper worth many of today's theories regarding the question with which we are now concerned.

Father Wasmann is a priest of the Society of Jesus and illiberal antagonists have done their best to discount the value of his work on that account. One of them in fact made the heavy Teutonic joke that "S.J." meant Wasmann the scientist and Wasmann the Jesuit, a dual personality in which the scientist was often eclipsed by the Jesuit. The wag in question, doubtless a Ph.D., might as well have been told that in his case "Wag the philosopher" was eclipsed by "Wag the Darwinian." Whatever his enemies may have to say about him no one has ever suggested that Father Wasmann is not a really distinguished man of science and a person who has won that position by hard, original, scientific work.

He has devoted his life to the study of ants, termites and their guests, subjects in which he is now recognized to be the first authority in the world. Moreover, as further evidence of his scientific ability, he has founded a school of workers, among whom may be mentioned Father Asmuth, S.J., who was biological teacher at St. Francis Xavier's College in India when the war broke out, and Father Frank, another Jesuit, who is the author of a work on "The Theory of Evolution."

In writing about Father Wasmann, then, we are not dealing with the ordinary text-book compiler, but with a man who really knows from independent investigation the subject about which he treats. He is a man to whose opinions due weight must be given even by those most opposed to the Catholic Church. His books indeed are the works of a scholar, but they are not meant for none but scholars to read. Quite the contrary. The books of Father Wasmann, especially the one first named above, are in no way beyond the comprehension of any intelligent and ordinarily well-educated person. They are not books which appeal only to specialists, but they are works which should find a place in the libraries of all who desire to keep themselves au courant with modern thought.

Regarding the author's second book, as it is the report of a very celebrated discussion in Berlin, where he enacted, with admitted success, the part of Athanasius contra mundum, it is necessarily rather scrappy or "staccato." But it contains a great number of very interesting points and will well repay perusal, but that reading should be postponed until the larger work, "Modern Biology," has been mastered. In these books Father Wasmann takes up something like the position assumed by Mivart, the position commonly adopted by Catholic and indeed, one may say, by Christian men of science. He knows that there can be no real conflict between science and religion since both have had the same Originator. Consequently, when conflict there appears to be, we have only to wait to learn either that the conflict is imaginary and not real or that the theory which caused it is itself incorrect either completely or partially.

Thus in the case of the views known as Darwinian, some of them at least were either unknown to, or even denied by, their eponymous author. Going down to bed-rock in this matter, the kernel of Darwinism is transformism or the theory that different living things of different species have had a common origin, or origins, in the past. This was a view most certainly discussed by early Church writers, held, according to some, by St. Augustine himself and, in any case, unquestionably dealt with by him and by other writers like Aquinas and Suarez. Hence it was not a novel view when Darwin wrote about it, though his works first brought it to the notice of "the man in the street." In the sense of St. Augustine, Father Wasmann finds no difficulty with this theory, though he expresses his firm belief in polyphyletic rather than in monophyletic evolution. This is, of course, from a scientific point of view, for from a dogmatic aspect there is no more difficulty with one view than with the other. Perhaps it should here be explained that this terminology relates to the breathing of life into one primary form or several, as for example that there may have been a common ancestor for animals which was not the ancestor for plants, and so on, a matter of intense scientific interest and one in which Father Wasmann finds himself supported by other distinguished men of science. He holds that there is no portion of the transformist theory which can be looked upon as proved, if indeed we can safely apply so strong a word to any part of it, which is not fully covered by statements in the writings of the Fathers, and in those of others whose names will be found in "Modern Biology." He maintains, moreover, that they afford sufficient support for any developments which are in future likely to be accepted as certain by science.

Such in brief outline is the essence of Father Wasmann's message. For the details readers must be referred to the books mentioned. Let them first read the text-book for they will then be in a position to understand the arguments brought against Father Wasmann by the non-Catholic men of science in the Berlin discussion and to estimate the force of the author's replies.

BERTRAM C. A. WINDLE, F.R.S.

REVIEWS

The Life of Bernal Diaz del Castillo. By R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.00.

One of the leading figures in the conquest of Mexico looks out of the pages of this book and tells the story of the conquest as only an eye-witness can. For Bernal Diaz was with Cortez from the day the great Spaniard sailed from Cuba to win New Spain for Charles V. Though he loved Cortez as few soldiers in the world have loved their general, his judgment was not blinded by his love and he could score his leader's faults. The original manuscript which Graham makes live in English was kept at Guatemala first by the family of Diaz and then by the municipality of the place. Graham claims to be more interested in the writer than in his document, and he paints the old conqueror who had "a foot both in the camps of literature and arms" as sincere, steadfast and ardent in his Faith. After the fashion of his fellows, Diaz thought himself the instrument of God. The conquerors thought they were God's instruments, and Cunninghame Graham very shrewdly asks, who is there today in England or France or any other land that dares criticize them for that? "For we who think ourselves the instruments of progress and of light have fallen into their sins, not having their excuse." Cunninghame Graham has a trenchant pen, speaks out fearlessly and never lets an occasion pass to make a thrust at the cock-sure Anglo-Saxon critic who, like Prescott, blames the Latin's faults, forgetting the fact that his own race in the name, not of God, but of civilization, has been guilty of the same. He is eminently fair in balancing the good and bad in men and the events that come before him. It is regrettable that he fails to appreciate the sense of the supernatural that gripped the souls of the hardy old Conquistadores, fanatical though it sometimes was. His humorous touches are delightful, while his cynicism leads him to say things that were better left unsaid. G. C. T.

Constantinople Old and New. By H. G. DWIGHT. Illustrated. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $5.00.

The author of this handsome book, the son of a Protestant missionary working in the Levant, has used well his opportunities for studying that wonderful old city, which so many princes and peoples, up to this day, have striven to take or keep. In the volume's sixteen chapters, most of which appeared in Scribner's and the Atlantic, he gives a vast deal of information in a pleasant, chatty way about Stamboul's past and present glories and beauties, and vividly describes what he saw of the 1908 Revolution, the city's capture and the Balkan War. In many entertaining pages Mr. Dwight tells of the life led by the Christian and Mohammedan inhabitants of Constantinople, but he seems to paint a far too flattering portrait of the modern Turk. It seems that he is not "unspeakable" at all, Gladstone to the contrary notwithstanding, but simple, well-mannered and sober, and has besides a most engaging fondness for "water and flowers and green meadows and spreading trees." In enumerating his turbaned friend's virtues, however, Mr. Dwight neglects to mention the Turk's passion for massacring and outraging Christian Armenians, but the omission may be explained by the fact that the author finds "much in Mohammedanism to admire." He learnedly observes that in Constantinople Mass is "performed." The volume is fully illustrated with photographs. W. D.

The Life and Visions of St. Hildegarde. By FRANCESCA MARIA STEELE. Preface by the Very Rev. VINCENT MCNABB, O.P. St. Louis: B. Herder. $1.35.

A Book of English Martyrs. By E. M. WILMOT-BUXTON, F.R.Hist.S. Illustrated by M. MEREDITH WILLIAMS. St. Louis: B. Herder. $1.10.

The first of these books tells the story of the remarkable woman whose admiration for her contemporary, Frederick Barbarosa, was reciprocated by his own high estimation of her powers; who corresponded with Pope Adrian IV, Henry II of England, Philip, Count of Flanders, and bishops and archbishops without number, and who foretold the persecutions of the Protestant Reformation. Part II of the book gives examples of the Saint's visions, which are in forceful contrast to the mysticism, veiled in spiritism, of our own age. Part I, the author's own, while evincing a careful study of the subject, is somewhat desultory reading, and lacking in the enthusiasm which such a subject should well inspire. Prior McNabb writes an erudite preface.

The second volume is a simple narrative, suited to children's understanding, of the thrilling times when English Catholics suffered for the Faith in the troubled days of the sixteenth century, when Tyburn tree was a concrete fact, and when ardent love hurled the defiance, "Come rack! Come rope!" Martyrs, lay and cleric, are here commemorated. The Carthusians, Houghton, Lawrence, Webster; the Jesuits, Campion, Sherwin, Southwell; the secular priests,, Hart, Lacey, Ingleby; the Countess of Salisbury, mother of Cardinal Pole; the Chancellor of England, Blessed Thomas More; Philip, Earl of Arundel, and Margaret Clitherow, harborer of priests. Their stories are told whenever possible, in the words of records of the time. The illustrations, seven in number, are well done, and bear out the text. C. L. B.

My Life. By RICHARD WAGNER. Authorized Translation from the German. Two Volumes. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $3.50.

The circumstantial, and presumably accurate, account of his life, left as a legacy to posterity by Richard Wagner, has called forth considerable comment. It is of interest as a detailed description of the conception, development and completion of his many and varied works, remarkable for their poetical and dramatic qualities aside from their originality as musical compositions. But since no attempt at condensation is made, to read the endless minutiæ of his theatrical ventures given in the two large volumes calls for no slight enthusiasm on the part of a reviewer.

Wagner's life doubtless offers a striking example of dogged perseverance and of a buoyancy of temperament which nothing could ever entirely subdue; but it can hardly be considered inspiring, still less ennobling. Great as his genius was in many regards, he was notably lacking in sound and strong moral principles. This fact is perhaps nowhere more evident than in his relations with the anarchist leader and terrorist, Bakunin. Wagner perfectly comprehended the nature of this man's doctrines: "the annihilation of all civilization was the goal upon which his heart was set." His life-work was to kindle the fire which he hoped would transform the whole of Europe into "a vast rubbish heap." In spite of a mild theoretical abhorrence for such teachings, Wagner showed himself ready to give practical support to this man, to lounge in his company among his radical admirers and to drink in eagerly any word of approval from his lips, little as Bakunin concerned himself about music or art. Wagner's final participation in the "May Insurrection," which was to have such a decided influence upon the after course of his life for many years to come, was not due to any very deep sentiments upon the subject. In spite of his rejection of authority he was willing to apologize to the authorities when their patronage was again desired, as he did on more than one occasion. An estimate of some of his vagaries may be had from the fact that the death of his two dogs seems to have stirred him as deeply as the most tragic events in his life. The death of "Fips" is thus described by him:

> Towards eleven o'clock at night he seemed to have fallen asleep under Minna's bed, but when I drew him out he was dead. The effect of this melancholy event upon Minna [Wagner's first wife] and myself was never expressed in words. In our childless life together the influence of domestic pets had been very important. The sudden death of this lively and lovable animal acted as the final rift in a union which had long become impossible.

With the thought of God held in abeyance and religion forming no link of union between himself and his wife, it was natural that he should seek to fill the emptiness of his life with such unworthy substitutes. From a professional point of view there was a frequent alternation of successes and failures in his productions, personally directed by him, while even at the height of his popularity the criticism of the press remained almost invariably hostile and often most bitterly so. There were in fine, many admirable traits in him as a man, much fairness and natural goodness, but from a Christian point of view "My Life" is not an inspiration. J. H.

The Heart of a Man. By RICHARD AUMERLE MAHER. New York: Benziger Bros. $1.35

The Red Circle. By GERARD A. REYNOLDS. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $0.75.

"The Heart of a Man" throbs with the ceaseless struggle that goes on only too often between capital and labor. A strike is on and Jim Lloyd is the champion of a starving people, struggling against fearful odds for the very right to live. Is it any wonder that for a time at least he loses his confidence in his priests and his religion and even God Himself? Socialism won him to its ranks with scarcely an effort. We are given a very vivid picture of his struggles and his final victory over his oppressors and over the darker passions of his own soul. Suffering and disgrace and unjust imprisonment and his brother's tragic death purify him. He realizes in time that the Church is the truest friend the workingman has and as for the good Dean, how can he ever thank him for the staunch loyalty he showed the poor people in their most trying moments of suffering? The story is inspiring and almost always interesting. It never lags except perhaps when the Reverend Fathers indulge in rather learned discussions of economic conditions.

"The Red Circle" is a book that reads in many parts like a veritable Acta Martyrum. It tells of sacrifice and martyrdom in the days of the Boxer uprising in China. Père Gratien was a simple, old-fashioned priest with none of the graces that commend the Reverend Mr. Henderson, M. D., an Anglican minister, to the heathen. They were good friends, however, even if the more enlightened Englishman never saw exactly why the good Father insisted on wearing a pigtail and doing other equally absurd things. Yet when the secret brotherhood of the Red Circle began its bloody attack on the Christian community, Père Gratien gave his life for his flock, while Mr. Henderson and his family fled for shelter, merely because, in that awful hour, his religion proved powerless to help him. The Belgian priest's martyrdom sowed the seeds of faith in the soul of Edith Kirby, the attractive fiancée of the English captain, while even Mr. Henderson was sincere enough to give over the cure of souls and take to caring for the physical ills of the heathen. E. D. S.

A New Logic. By Charles Mercier, M.D. Chicago: The Open Court Publishing Co. $3.00.

Dr. Mercier is a clever writer and here and there one meets a passage in the book which is really good. But the bulk of the volume is based upon a false psychology, a misconception of the function of traditional logic, and a misinterpretation of standard works on logic. The great object the author had in view in writing it is, as he tells us in the preface, "not merely to demolish the system of traditional logic, but to substitute for it a new logic, that shall supply the defects and correct the errors of the old." To begin with, Dr. Mercier rejects the scholastic division of proposition into subject, copula and predicate, and substitutes a division of his own, viz.: subject, ratio and object-term. "A predicate," he says, "is no more a predicate after its copula is torn away, than a man is a man after he has been beheaded. The so-called predicate predicates nothing." True, no predicate predicates; it is the intellect that does the predicating, and that which is predicated is a predicate only so far and so long as it is predicated. Again: "Logic denies that we can express in propositions any relation whatever, but those of attribution and class-inclusion." Logic says just the opposite. It maintains that any relation whatever can become the predicate of a proposition. It is false to say that "the logic of the schools failed to appreciate that all knowledge is founded on experience," or that "the whole aim of immediate inference is to discover in how many ways a thing may be said." The volume is attractively printed, but its failure to provide the reader with an index is apt to hamper him seriously in his effort to master the author's teaching. J. J. T.

History of Christian Missions. By Charles H. Robinson, D.D. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

The author of this book is an official of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. It is not surprising, then, that he magnifies the work of that organization, praises the labors of other missionary societies of the Episcopal Church, English and American, speaks kindly of every Protestant enterprise, and disparages as far as he can the missions of the Catholic Church. He is proud of the increase of Protestant converts, and proves to his own satisfaction that in the course of half a century or so they will exceed considerably those of the Catholic missions. This remains to be seen. In the meantime we may remark, what strikes us most forcibly in reading this book, that the development of Protestant missions is in the inverse ratio of their belief in Christ. The first Protestant missionaries had very definite ideas regarding the person and office of Our Divine Lord. In their own way they tried to preach Christ Crucified, man's only hope of redemption. They were not sent by the only authority that could do so, and their work was practically barren. Now all Protestants are acquiring very loose ideas regarding Jesus Christ. Nevertheless, in proportion as they depart from Christian faith, their missions are apparently more and more successful. The question then arises for them: whose work are they really doing? Dr. Robinson uses invariably the letters "R. C." when speaking of our missionaries and their work. Were we to make a similar practice with regard to the letters "P. E." what indignant letters we should receive. However, on this point we are not so thin-skinned as others. We notice that he gives the Methodist Episcopal denomination the same insidious distinction, using the initials, "A. M. E. C." which for him expresses the "American Methodist Episcopal Church." (sic.) We suspect the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, will take it amiss to be designated by means of letters that in this country signify the "African Methodist Episcopal Church," and will not be inclined to promote the circulation of a book that touches them in so tender a spot. H. W.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"The Haitian Revolution, 1791-1804, or Side Lights on the French Revolution" (Crowell, $1.25), by T. G. Steward, is an interesting and illuminating account of the great events which led to the establishing of the "Black Republic" in Haiti. It is a book well worth the attention of those who are inclined to believe that the negro is a hopelessly inferior being. For the author gives a dispassionate account of the negro's fight for liberty. The faults and virtues of these "ex-slaves," together with actions and deeds of their oppressors are put before the reader, and we are left to draw our own conclusions. The style on the whole is clear and forcible, but at times the connection and smoothness of the narrative is marred by the author's habit of abruptly shifting from one scene to another or from one character to another. The book contains fourteen pictures of the great heroes of Haiti.

"The Quiet Hour" (Houghton, $0.75) is the title of the excellent little anthology Mr. FitzRoy Carrington has arranged for mothers and lovers of children. Under the captions, Cradle Songs, Infancy, Childhood, Night, Sleep, Charms and Dirges are gathered some seventy-five poems with the little ones as their theme, by Shakespeare, Blake, Stevenson, Wordsworth, Tynan, Patmore and four-score other poets. A pretty gift book for young mothers.——An anthology of quite another kind is Edwin Hamlin Carr's "The Happy Phrase" (Putnam, $1.00), which is described as "a handbook of expression for the enrichment of conversation, writing and public speaking." A large number of pages are given to "Phrases for Clergymen and Religious Workers"; there is a rare collection of "bromides" for use in conversation, and many varied turns of language are suggested that will help writers and speakers to avoid using the same terms repeatedly.

Youth always has its charm, even when it is placid and secure, but when it is "precarious," as is the case with "Eve Dorre" (Dutton, $1.35), it is quite irresistible. This pretty little story, which one would judge Emily Veilé Strother has drawn from life, is simple, interesting and wholesome, although the wayward child takes a sarcastic fling at her convent school aspirations. Mercifully the author has spared us the divorce which Eve herself for a time feared, and one feels satisfied that the sequel to the tale was orthodox, and that they lived happily ever after. ——Mr. Wells in his "The Research Magnificent" (Macmillan, $1.50) has not been so kind. Apparently he has no intention whatever of entertaining us. He writes only for our instruction. He is working out a thought in his own mind, and thinks out loud that we may follow him. Aside from the frank discussion of topics and impulses that better taste and clearer moral notions would have left alone, the book is not easy reading. No one will deny that the novel is learned and clever, but it represents a state of mind that has no possibility within the Church. The hero is so hopelessly at sea as to what constitutes "the aristocracy of life," and his wandering through the world in search of a solution, when the problem might have been solved by any schoolgirl who knows her catechism, is so utterly without profit, that clearly, Mr. Wells has not contributed much to the philosophy of life. His detailed description of the three obstacles, fear, desire and jealousy, that stood in the way of the hero's even discovering his ideal, takes the reader no further than the elements of an asceticism which has been from the time of Christ the common property of those who have faith. "The Research Magnificent" is only another instance of painful groping in a land that has long been unmistakably charted for all those who having eyes have seen.

While it must be confessed that the authors of "Outlines of Sociology" (Macmillan) have made a consistent effort to avoid the controversial spirit, they have not met with such success as would warrant the book being recommended to Catholics for the study of sociology. Thoroughly imbued with the principles of evolution, they could not write a book that would be satisfactory either in its conclusions or its premises. Religion and morality, that are based on custom, have too shaky a foundation to exercise much influence, particularly in the solution of those problems with which sociology essays to grapple. Messrs. Blackmar and Gillin, the authors, have collected many interesting and useful facts, and their observations and suggestions are often of considerable value; but their initial point of view is so much awry that it is an unsafe book for Catholic students.

The "Gates of Utterance" (Sherman, French, $0.80) is a little book of poems from the pen of Gladys Cromwell. The general appearance of the little volume is attractive and suggestive of an amount of imaginative if somewhat eccentric fancy on the part of the writer. There is a strange, rather weird, assortment of subjects, many of them, apparently, incapable of awakening to ecstasy the living lyre. Such, for instance, are "The Bat," "To the Crowd," "The Audience," "Progression." Some of the verse rhymes are unpleasantly forced. An instance of this is found in the poem, "The Riders":

> You canter wide awake,
> Your mare is real; my steed
> Imaginary. Need
> You then suspect me? Take
> The cloud rack by my side!

Some thoughts in the sentences are strangely obscure, though others are suggestive of poetic merit.

Clara A. Pease's "A First-Year Course in General Science" (Merrill) is a text-book that necessarily has the faults of its kind as the author professedly aims to teach many things superficially and nothing thoroughly. A recent critic of our high schools complains that today the children are given a "snap-shot" of knowledge, but no "time exposures." The book in question is a typical instance of snapshots at science. Indeed, it is scarcely a text-book at all though it could well be called a handbook of scientific knowledge. With the single exception of the amount of information given, the educational benefits enumerated in the preface would be more advantageously obtained by a thorough and elementary course in any one branch of science. The book has good qualities, however, for the matter is well-chosen and up-to-date. Considerable attention is paid to English and something is left for the pupils to do. The sections on reproduction had best been omitted.

In "The Rise of Classical English Criticism" (Tulane University Press), James Routh, Ph.D., the author, reduces to various heads the critical sayings of English writers, prior to Dryden, principally Elizabethan. The technical nature of the matter makes the book valuable only for special students, and will not appeal to the general reader. The author approaches the subject in a logical way, defining what he understands by the science and history of criticism, and then advancing the theories and practices of our earlier critics, under different captions, viz.: the Rule of Law, the Purposes of Literary Art, Types of Literature, Materials for Literature, Style, concluding with a chapter on Verse Technique. In this way, while echoing Saintsbury, Gregory Smith, Ker and Spingarn, he pushes on a step in ordering the necessarily vague masses of material. An index would improve the book for the purposes intended.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
What Shall We Read the Children? By Clara W. Hunt. $1.00; The Water-Babies, a Fairy Tale for a Land Baby. By Charles Kingsley. With Illustrations by W. Heath Robinson. $2.00; The Normans in European History. By Charles Homer Haskins. $2.00; The Fortunes of Garin. By Mary Johnston. $1.40; Why I Believe in Poverty. By Edward Bok. $0.50; Aristocracy and Justice. Shelburne Essays (Ninth Series). By Paul Elmer More. $1.25; A Hilltop on the Marne. Being Letters Written June 3-September 8, 1914. By Mildred Aldrich. $1.25.

The Macmillan Co., New York:
Christopher Columbus. "True Stories of Great Americans Series." By Mildred Stapley. $0.50; The Kingdom of the Winding Road. By Cornelia Meigs. $1.25; The Criminal Imbecile. By Henry Herbert Goddard. $1.50.

The Frederick A. Stokes Co., New York:
Making Money. By Owen Johnson. $1.35.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
Know Your Own Mind, a Little Book of Practical Psychology. By William Glover. $0.60; Memories of a Publisher. By George Haven Putnam, Litt.D. $2.00.

The Ave Maria Press, Notre Dame:
White Eagle. By Mary T. Waggaman. $0.75.

J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia:
The Drama of Three Hundred and Sixty-five Days, Scenes in the Great War. By Hall Caine. $1.00; Heart's Content. By Ralph Henry Barbour. $1.50.

The George H. Doran Co., New York:
National Floodmarks: Week by Week Observations on American Life as Seen by Collier's. Edited by Mark Sullivan. $1.50.

The United States Catholic Historical Society, New York:
Historical Records and Studies. Volume VIII. Edited by Charles George Herbermann, LL.D.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
The Grand Duchess Benedicta. By A. E. Burns. $1.00; What May I Hope? By George Trumbull Ladd, LL.D. $1.50.

P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York:
The Goddess of Ghosts. By C. C. Martindale, S.J. $1.00.

The Century Co., New York:
Escape and Other Essays. By Arthur Christopher Benson. $1.50.

William P. Linehan, Melbourne:
Talks about Poets and Poetry. By Rev. J. J. Malone. Two shillings

B. Herder, St. Louis:
Meditations for Layfolk. By Bede Jarrett, O.P. $1.10; For Greater Things: The Story of Saint Stanislaus Kostka. By William T. Kane, S.J. With a Preface by James J. Daly, S.J. $0.50; Spiritual Journal of Lucie Christine (1870-1908). Edited by the Rev. A. Poulain, S.J.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
Left Tackle Thayer. By Ralph Henry Barbour. $1.25; The Nowaday Girls in the Adirondacks. By Gertrude Calvert Hall. $1.00; The Wishing Fairies. By Madge A. Bigham. $0.75; Six Little Ducklings. By Katharine Pyle. $1.00.

American Book Co., New York:
Silesian Folk Tales (The Book of Rubezahl). By James Lee, M.D., and James T. Carey, A.M. $0.60.

EDUCATION

What is the Gary School Plan?

THE true inwardness, the Ding an sich, of the Gary Plan is more of a mystery to the man in the street than the age of Ann. Not that the subject has been kept under a bushel; far from it. Turn and turn about, it has been anathematized and canonized by those worthy clergymen who meet the modern time-spirit with texts culled carefully from Strindberg, Whitman or Tagore, or from any source but the Bible. It has also engaged, to a certain extent, the attention of the ordinary taxpayer. Many a suspicious citizen, apprehending an increased assessment, has been lured from the joys of an evening by the cheery fireside or the clanking radiator, to listen to a discussion of the matter at a Neighborhood Meeting convened, sometimes and unfortunately, by a pedagogue with an axe to grind.

PRESS COMMENT

Nor has the press been silent. In a marvelously obfuscated editorial, the Chicago Tribune has expressed the opinion that since the Gary Plan cannot be worse than anything which has come to pass under the régime of Mrs. Ella Flagg Young and may easily be better, it ought to be given a trial in Chicago. New York has been favored with the spectacle of Mr. Hearst in the unaccustomed rôle of an educational mentor, and the Globe, in the hottest of the fight for fresh fish for Manhattan, has found time to write encomiums of Mr. Wirt, the sage of Gary. Even the Evening Post has heard of the plan, and keeping to a customary editorial groove, has patronizingly indicated to a puzzled public, those features which do not puzzle at all. As if this were not fame enough, the Gary Plan has found its way into the Sunday supplement where, on occasion, it has fought for space with the pictured antics of the Dingbat Family.

UNWARRANTED CRITICISM

Yet for all this publicity, the praise and blame that have been heaped upon Mr. Wirt indicate how imperfectly the Gary Plan is understood. It was a wise philosopher who first taught that much depends on one's point of view; nor would he have disowned the corollary that more depends upon having a point of view that is not pure prejudice. The Gary Plan does not propose to lessen the time now given to the fundamental subjects of primary education, yet there are zealots who piteously implore Mr. Wirt to find at least a little corner in his stony heart for the three R's of fiction. Others, casting a blighting eye on the tender garden-plots which brighten the environments of some Gary schools, inquire in quinine-like accents why Mr. Wirt does not throw off the mask, and forthwith convert the little red schoolhouse into a little red barn. And discipline? One need but listen to those rigid Catos, the stern upholders of formal, unadulterated discipline, to be convinced that in the Gary Plan

> . . . . liberty plucks justice by the nose;
> The baby beats the nurse, and quite athwart
> Goes all decorum.

Some of this discord may be stilled by recourse to the original source of the Gary Plan. Mr. Wirt may not be an unprejudiced witness to the value of the system, but he should at least know what it is, and what it is not.

THE FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLE

Mr. Wirt calls the Plan "the study-work-play school." He admits that there was never a school which did not attempt to include these elements in its program; but the features to which he draws attention are the proportion of time allotted to work and play in the Gary Plan, and the enlarged facilities for the exercise of these activities. By long experience Mr. Wirt had become convinced that all or nearly all the desirable and hitherto neglected factors of child-training might be systematized and administered by the public school. In his own words, he thought it possible "to socialize education"; that is, to put at the ready disposal of the school authorities whatever aid might be afforded by the parents, either singly or grouped in associations; by the churches and the many religious, philanthropic and social societies; by the public playgrounds, parks, gardens, art galleries and libraries; and by the mercantile and industrial resources of the city. It cannot be said too strongly that Mr. Wirt has no theories that are altogether new, no principles that are not pedagogical commonplaces. He differs, however, from many school directors, in his interpretation of the theories, and in his application of certain principles which are held in common. Mr. Wirt's distinctive contribution to educational science is found in his synthetic treatment of hitherto unrelated community forces of educational efficiency. The Gary Plan cannot be rightly evaluated if it is regarded as a "course of studies;" a term which Mr. Wirt has steadily repudiated. It is a method of unifying educational forces and it does not lose this distinctive character by the fact that it requires a special and somewhat unusual school equipment.

APPLYING THE PRINCIPLE

How this fundamental principle is put into effect is explained by Mr. Wirt. "If the Sunday School," he said in substance in one of many New York addresses, "can occupy some of the child's time to better advantage than can the public school, I do not see how the child does not gain by being turned over to the Sunday School teacher, outside the school and with permission of the parents. If the public library can really benefit the child by its books, maps, reading lists and direction, I am in favor of sending the child from the school to the library for this period. If the city's playgrounds, museums, welfare workers, have a message of benefit for the child that the school has not, why not let the child listen to it? I do not see why the school should not recognize that a girl taking music lessons at home under a skilled teacher, or learning from her mother, to sew, wash dishes, or cook, is not receiving a valuable training which cannot be imparted at the school. In other words, I do not see why the school should attempt the impossible monopoly of the child's time. I want to use every valuable factor in the community to help in educating every child."

THE COMMUNITY AND THE SCHOOL

Mr. Wirt again touches upon this application of the Gary principle in his report of January 19, 1915, to the President of the New York Board of Education:

> I believe that gardens, work shops, drawing and music studios are good things for children to have. I believe that museums, art galleries, and libraries are good things for children to use systematically and regularly. In my judgment, opportunities for religious instruction, private teachers of music, and assisting in desirable home work are good things for children. So also are cooperative classes between the academic school and the industrial activities of the school business department, and between the school and industrial activities outside the school. . . . Anything that gives the child a chance to use what the school is trying to teach him, anything that creates a need for a mastery of the things the school is trying to teach, should be made a help to the teaching process. . . . In place of telling the child to work hard on his arithmetic and language now because he will need them ten years later . . . the child has a chance to apply what he has learned of arithmetic and language in the real life departments of the school every day. The community life of the school and the community life of the neighborhood automatically create real needs for mastering the academic subjects of the school.

Mr. Wirt's declaration will be, has been, met by the claim that such a program gives insufficient recognition to the fundamental subjects of primary education. The objection has no foundation in fact. The Gary Plan devotes as much, if not more, time to these subjects as is given in the ordinary curriculum, and in addition, proposes to stress their importance by immediate application to tangible facts in the child's experience. The other activities suggested by Mr. Wirt, are made possible by added daily periods, for the typical Gary school is in session for six or seven hours.

A SECONDARY EFFECT

Further misconception of the Gary Plan is inevitable if it is regarded merely as a somewhat complicated time-table, primarily designed to relieve the congestion of certain New York public schools. The method by which Mr. Wirt increases the capacity of a given school, is of great value, but it does not belong to the essence of the system. In actual operation, however, the Gary Plan discards the old idea of a seat for every pupil and substitutes the principle of two alternate classes for every classroom. The application of this principle requires the facilities peculiar to the Gary schools. "The double use of the class room," writes Mr. W. G. Willcox, "calls for an auditorium, work shop and playground capacity about equal to the class room capacity. While half the pupils are occupied in the class rooms, one-sixth will be occupied on the playground, one-sixth in the work-shops, and the remaining one-sixth in the auditorium. In a New York school building, for example, which now accommodates fifty classes of forty pupils each, or a total of 2,000 pupils, perhaps ten of the class rooms would be altered into shops, and some additional space provided for playgrounds, with the result that each of the remaining forty class rooms could be used for two alternate classes, thus increasing the capacity of the school from 2,000 to 3,200."

CLAIMS OF THE GARY PLAN

The following points will probably sum up what the Gary Plan professes to do and offer. No present comment will be attempted. Time has not as yet allowed a complete test of the plan and professional opinion is still divided as to its value.

(1) The Gary Plan makes use of all the educational factors in the community. (2) In schools built according to the Gary ideal, there are twice as many classes as class rooms. This is made possible by providing ample opportunities for manual work in the shops, for a constant, as opposed to an intermittent, use of the gymnasium, auditorium and shops, for organized, healthful play, for library and museum periods, and, if desired, for religious instruction. (3) To introduce these activities, it provides for a longer school day. (4) It includes prevocational work. (5) The teaching of science, begun as early as the third grade, is given greater prominence throughout the course. (6) It endeavors to make the school attractive by a varied, carefully-planned arrangement of study, work and play. (7) It does not require the teacher to conduct classes in many varied topics, e.g., history, music, hygiene, mathematics, language and drawing, but allows him to specialize in subjects which he is best fitted to teach. (8) It provides an academic course superior to that which is now given, by coordinating these subjects with practical life. (9) It occupies profitably the time which many city children are forced to spend in surroundings which are a physical and moral menace.

A GREAT IDEAL

No attempt has been made in this brief exposition to answer the thousand and one objections which have been urged against the Gary school. "How much will it cost? Will it require more or fewer teachers, or will the present staff suffice? How can cooperation be made permanent? Will it work in a school as well as on paper?" The last is the only question of any pertinence, and only a fair trial can give a fair answer. Let that trial be given before the system is condemned. The value of a principle, to adopt the philosophy of the immortal Bunsby, is found in its bearing upon actual conditions; and it would be a pity if the public interest is allowed to shift from the plan itself to a barren controversy over matters of incidental detail. There is something fascinating in Mr. Wirt's proposal to engage every valuable factor in the life of the community, in the processes of the education of the child. If it is an ideal, it is an ideal well worth working for.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

Can He Afford to Marry?

SOME time ago a young Catholic gentleman was asked why he did not marry. He was drawing a very good salary and seemed altogether an eligible candidate. His reply, however, was simply that he could not afford to marry. Some time later I had occasion to mention this incident and was told that the same thing had been said by other prosperous Catholic men. Indeed, this attitude seems to have become rather typical of well-to-do young Catholics as a class.

Now, of course the high cost of marriage has become proverbial, in fact, a venerable joke, and I am well aware that there are young men who cannot afford to marry. But the curious thing is, that these are the very fellows who make the venture. They do very often find their life a struggle, but somehow or other they manage to get along and live happily. Hence the complaint of their more prosperous brothers would at first seem a trifle insincere.

EXPENSE ACCOUNTS

The complaint, we are told, is not without good foundation. How can a young man even if prosperous, or rather especially if prosperous, do otherwise than balk at marriage? Think of the extravagance of the young ladies of his own social plane. Can he summon up courage to keep company with a girl, his social equal, when he learns the size of her expense account? Hardly. The first test applied to him is, "Does he own an auto?" Strong sterling manhood is stringently required of him, but this is only a minor qualification. He must make frequent and tasteful gifts of expensive confectionery and flowers. He must entertain regally at theater and restaurant, and country club. He must show a record of consistent social brilliancy. Lastly, alas for the bank account! he must dress irreproachably. These, let us not forget, are the prerequisites of the courtship. What then shall the demands of marriage be?

That this state of affairs exists must, I think, be admitted. True, many Catholic girls are superior to such folly. But many others are quite as exacting with their suitors as are young ladies outside our Faith. And even when the girl wants to be wholly reasonable, it takes real courage to ask her to leave the comforts of a wealthy home and live, to say the least, on a more modest income.

So much for the young ladies. But is personal extravagance wholly unknown to the male sex? Your young society-man smiles at the expensive vanities of his younger sister, but he has darling follies of his own. Run over his clothier's bill, check up his club account, picture that long list of unitemized expenditures, tie clasps, tobacco, taxi fares. These, of course, are all necessities, as are the purchases of the lady. But they cannot be ascribed to the demands of courtship. They represent money spent simply and solely on self.

THE SOURCE OF THE EVIL

And right here we have the source of the whole difficulty. Selfishness is, of course, one of those beautifully universal faults that can carry the blame for every evil under the sun. But here the causality is more than ordinarily evident. Our young man begins adult life with only a vague and remote intention of marriage; for social and professional success his desire is earnest and intimate. He wishes to have a good income and get good returns for it. He wishes to be prompt and proper in his attire. He wishes to be prominent in fashionable clubs. He wishes to dine well and dance well and see good "shows." He wishes to read the latest books and be a clever talker. He wishes to be admired. He keeps company, of course, but with vague intentions. It is only a part of the social game. As he grows older, marriage does become a natural prospect. By this time he has acquired a settled desire for a life artistically complete in its externals. He would like to have a wife and a home, but these involve compromises. If he can marry without taking in his horns, he will marry. If he can marry and still be the clever, dashing fellow, still receive the multitude's adulation, then he will marry. But to modify or abandon that artistic ideal, to descend from his pedestal to wear the sackcloth and ashes of domesticity, that is another question. If he has to spend his money cautiously, prune his tailor's bills, drop a few of his clubs and settle down to the simple life, marriage, he thinks, is not a consummation devoutly to be wished.

Selfish Calculation

Plainly, the trouble with our young friend is that he is selfish, unspeakably selfish. Truly he cannot afford to marry and remain selfish. Marriage, if it is to be more than a mockery, demands sacrifice and humility. But in the modern whirl of artificiality, these virtues have small chance for play. Consequently our young man takes no thought of giving supreme expression to his manhood by loving and striving and struggling to make a family happy. He only wonders whether he can have a happy family without foregoing the poor vanities of his later boyhood. He does not really love, he calculates. If all this were not strangling inherent nobilities in our young man, if it were not an actual menace to society, if it were not helping to make our attitude toward one of Christ's holy Sacraments merely a sociological problem, then I should have nothing to say about it. But since it is doing all this, the occasion calls for speech.

Indefinite Caution

Yet the situation leaves much room for hope. These young men can afford to approach marriage cautiously; but caution does not mean indefinite delay. They are facing a problem that is really difficult. But they are by supposition men of initiative and resource. And have they no resource but bribery when they want to win a lady's heart and hand?

One word more about the girl's extravagance. Does it not seem that when he has really won her love, the example of the husband's economy and self-sacrifice will raise any worthy Catholic wife above her foolish extravagance? I think it will, and I think our Catholic young men should regard the problem in this light. Pray, I would tell them, to be guided to a virtuous wife. But do not be so vain as to ask all and give nothing. Do not be so vain as to pray merely for a woman whom you can love. Pray with humble heart for a great soul who can love you.

Francis J. Yealy, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

We are told in the New World of Chicago that St. Mary's Day Nursery in the loop district of that city harbored on an average two hundred and fifteen children a week during the month of September, and it is anticipated that the total will come up to more than ten thousand for the year. The children under care are of almost every nationality, their mothers are at work in the loop or live in the immediate vicinity. White and Mulatto, Syrian and Swede, Italian and American, learn and eat and play together. This is only one of countless prospering institutions of social welfare conducted by the Catholic Church throughout the country, and their number is increasing daily. There is room and need in every parish, however poor, for some organized effort at Christian charity according to the means of its members.

According to Deputy Commissioner William C. Archer of the New York State Bureau of Compensation, New York City alone annually yields 200,000 reportable industrial accidents. Of these about twenty per cent have a claim to compensation under the existing law, in as far as the disability is of at least two weeks' duration. The entire State of New York has 2,000,000 workmen and 180,000 employers amenable to the new legislation. It is evident of what incalculable advantage to all parties a just compensation law and an impartial and efficient bureau can be, and what endless litigations and court expenses are saved by this means.

In order to bring home to the public in a forceful way the havoc wrought by war, it has been suggested that the customary headlines: "Entire army corps annihilated," be replaced by:

> One hundred thousand homes wrecked.
> From two to three hundred thousand children fatherless.
> Approximately one hundred and fifty thousand mothers, wives and sweethearts placed in mourning.
> Five hundred thousand hearts broken.

If there be some less susceptible to sentiment than to considerations of a more personal and matter-of-fact nature, they are to be stirred by: "Taxes doubled by the latest drive." Evidently the poet did not tell the entire truth of the sad tale when he sang: "The paths of glory lead but to the grave."

The perfect centralization of all Catholic social enterprises in Italy had always been the earnest desire of Pope Pius X. This work is being actively carried on under his successor. One of its latest developments, as noted by Rome, is the combination of the already existing social and economic institutions of Italy into one national federation, known as the Socio-Economic Union. The object of this league is to extend practical assistance of every kind to the laboring classes and the poor. Its entire scope, as briefly outlined in the constitution of the Union, is "to promote, direct, and coordinate all the social and economic action of the Catholics of Italy, always in conformity with Catholic doctrine, with the instructions of the Holy See, and with the directing program and the deliberations of the Central Committee." The means by which this end is to be compassed are thus enumerated: "Propaganda by word of mouth, the press, visits, and inspections, special courses of instruction, general meetings and congresses of the affiliated institutions."

Dr. Frederick V. Beitler, head of the Bureau of Vital Statistics in the Maryland State Department of Health offers some valuable diagrams and statistics of mortality in the Journal of the American Medical Association. His studies cover an area of our country containing about half of our population, and are extended from 1904 to 1913 inclusive. It is consoling to note that deaths from tuberculosis have considerably decreased, and the same may be said in varying degrees of the greater number of diseases. Only two causes of mortality have steadily, though slowly, increased, one is cerebral hemorrhage and apoplexy, the other is cancer. Over a large area of the United States the latter has increased from 4.24 per cent of the total of deaths to 5.60 per cent. It is particularly noticeable that up to the age of twenty very few deaths from cancer occurred. Considerably less than one per cent of the deaths from cancer occurred before this age. Between the ages of twenty and thirty years the proportion becomes 2.04 per cent. Between the ages of thirty and forty years it has already risen to 6.68 per cent of the total, continuing to augment during the next decade to 16.09 per cent. Between the ages of fifty and sixty years it is 24.21 per cent; and between sixty and seventy has reached 25.52 per cent. During the next decade of years it declines and drops suddenly after the age of eighty years.

The Diamond Jubilee of the foundation of the Sisters of Providence in the United States was celebrated in the mother house, Saint Mary-of-the-Woods, Indiana, on October 20, with becoming ceremony. The Rt. Rev. Francis S. Chatard, Bishop of Indianapolis, presided, and at the Solemn Pontifical Mass sung by the Rt. Rev. Joseph Chartrand, Coadjutor Bishop of Indianapolis, the sermon was preached by the Archbishop of St. Louis, the Most Rev. J. J. Glennon. When Mother Theodore Guerin with her little band of Sisters came from France to America in 1840, their first foundation was made in what was almost a wilderness. "We must make a beginning," she wrote, "and trust to Providence. If it is God's work it will not fail." The elementary school, opened in the following year, has developed into a college which draws students from twenty-five States, and is housed in what many have considered the most stately group of collegiate buildings in the country, while Sisters who call St. Mary's "home" are teaching thousands of children in the parochial schools. The first home of these pioneer educators, described by the saintly Bishop of Vincennes, Monseigneur de St. Palais, as "a wretched log cabin," has long since passed away; but the spirit of these valiant women survives in their daughters who are an invaluable aid in the educational work of the Church in the Middle West.

The Square Deal, in its October issue, gives the following appreciative notice of the effective service rendered to capital and labor in a threatened industrial conflict by a well-known priest of the St. Louis archdiocese:

> The timely intervention of Father Timothy Dempsey, pastor of St. Patrick's church here, and founder of his famous workmen's hotel, brought to a sudden end last month a strike of 1,500 teamsters, which threatened at the time to completely tie up the city's transfer industry. Serious trouble was imminent when Father Dempsey stepped in, and it was feared that at least 3,500 union men in other industries closely allied with the transfer business, would walk out in sympathy. In a few hours' time the venerable priest had brought employer and employees together and secured an increase of 50 cents a week for the striking teamsters, and also a reduction in time was granted. Drivers by this agreement will not be required to work on Sundays, and those who are to be discharged are to be so notified the night before. The agreement is for two years.
>
> As a result of Father Dempsey's success in this strike Mayor Kiel has planned to create an industrial dispute Commission to arbitrate differences arising between employer and employee. The idea originated with the priest, who, it is believed, will be named a member of the Commission. A proposed ordinance establishing such commission is now being drawn up by City Counselor Daues.

Father Dempsey has for long years heroically devoted himself to the cause of those who can best be described as the flotsam and jetsam of humanity, or in the more expressive language of the street, "the down and out." He has earned the confidence that is placed in him.

The question of teaching the Bible as an elective subject in the public high schools of Indianapolis was recently tabled by the city's board of school commissioners. The reason advanced by the representatives of the Indianapolis Church Federation for introducing the question was that as they did not desire the Bible to be taught "along religious lines, but as a valuable contribution to English literature," the religious issue would not be involved:

> Men have disagreed for years on the interpretation of some of the passages from Browning and Shakespeare, yet you would not think of throwing Browning and Shakespeare out of your curriculum. Astronomers for many years have told us there are spots on the sun, yet hundreds and thousands of people are perfectly content to go on enjoying the sun as a means of ripening the corn and the crops and to let astronomers discuss among themselves as to whether or not there are spots on the sun, and if there are, how large they are.

All this only goes to show either how ingeniously the real purpose of the promoters of Bible study in the high schools is covered by plausible arguments, or how completely the profound sense of the sacredness of the inspired writers has been lost to them. Even Browning and Shakespeare cannot be taught intelligently without the teacher's personal explanations touching the vital truths contained in their works. But some of the most vital truths of Scripture are the Messianic mission and the Divinity of Christ, denied by the Jews; and the fact of the establishment of His Church upon Peter, ignored by Protestantism. To treat the inspired writings, on the other hand, as a mere literary effort, criticising them from a purely human standpoint as conforming or not conforming with the teacher's conception of the canons of art, is to destroy reverence in the mind of the pupil. The Scriptures were not given the world as a literary study, but as the Word of God, to be read in humility and prayerful devotion and interpreted according to the mind of His Church.

Everywhere the Holy Name rallies are producing a wholesome effect. They are helping to attract the eyes of men ever more to that city built upon the mountain which can no longer be ignored. The public press takes notice of them, often in enthusiastic terms. Men are impressed with the sincerity and profound convictions of the participants in these vast demonstrations. "It was a wonderful sight, a remarkable and inspiring demonstration," says the Passaic Daily News. "The parade and celebration of the Holy Name Societies was the most impressive and triumphant success of any similar affair on record." From Paterson comes the same note of deep appreciation in the secular Press Guardian:

> Kneeling on the green turf, just as the sun dipped below the Preakness hills, bathing the countryside in golden hues and scintillating on the rippling waters of the Passaic below, 10,000 Catholics bared and bowed their heads and recited Pope Benedict's prayer for peace. The impressive sight came as the conclusion of the most impressive Holy Name demonstration ever witnessed in Paterson.

So city after city becomes the scene of these splendid manifestations of Catholic Faith. All men of discernment and good will must realize that here is unfolding before their eyes a glorious movement that must be welcomed with sincerest joy by every loyal citizen. The Baltimore Sun writes:

> The parade of the Holy Name Societies of the Diocese of Baltimore, in which 17,000 Catholics of Baltimore and other Maryland cities, Washington and Alexandria, marched for three hours yesterday, was lauded by Protestant ministers from Washington pulpits last night. The Rev. Dr. Randolph H. McKim, rector of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the Epiphany and one of the best-known clergymen of Washington, declared that "the desire to combat blasphemy is the excellent object of the millions banded together for that purpose, and may God bless their efforts." . . . The Rev. John MacMurray, pastor of the Union Methodist Episcopal Church, extolled the work of the Holy Name Society and suggested the formation by the Protestant churches of a similar organization.

At the Holy Name Rally held in Cincinnati 40,000 men participated in the parade, according to the Catholic Telegraph, and 20,000 spectators were crowded in the park around the reviewing stand, upon which a temporary altar had been erected for the solemn Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament.

This is an Ameba, one of the Parasites found in Pyorrhea (Riggs Disease) Magnified 2500 Diameters.

Thousands Have Pyorrhea

(Riggs Disease)

and Don't Know It Till Their Teeth Have to be Pulled

Symptoms that may be Pyorrhea: Bleeding gums after brushing; loose teeth; receding, tender, inflamed or sore gums.

PYORRHEA may attack anyone, even children. It develops in your gums without ache, pain or warning.

Sozodont now contains Emetine, that new beneficent discovery, used by the science of dentistry in the treatment of Pyorrhea. Therefore Sozodont not only cleans, whitens, polishes, cools and freshens your teeth as it has done for 64 years, but Sozodont now Fights Pyorrhea.

Start your whole family on Sozodont today. Send 4c for a generous 10-day sample of Sozodont paste, powder or liquid (state which), and feel again that pure, vigorous, "arctic" sensation on your gums and teeth—which only Sozodont can give.

HALL & RUCKEL
216 Washington Street New York

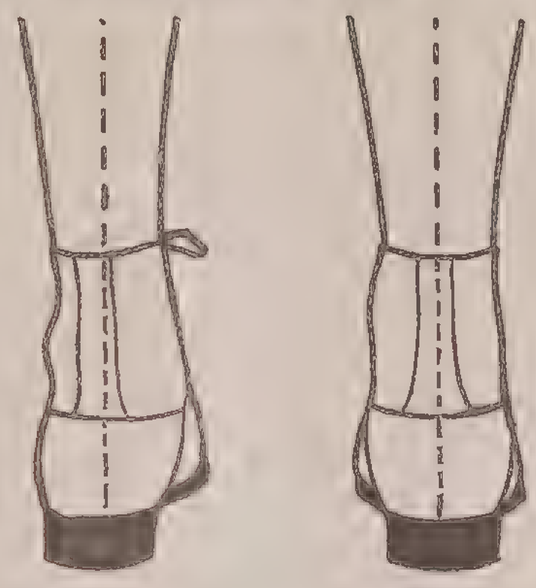
SOZODONT

Paste, Powder or Liquid, 25c.

Each contains Emetine

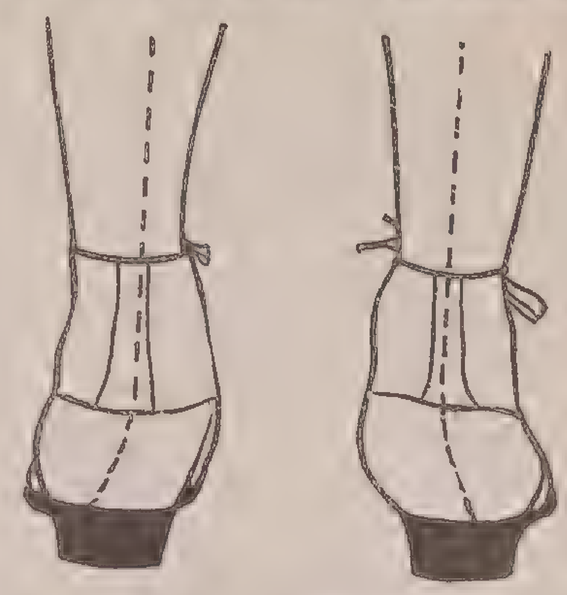
ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER"
AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
59 East 83d Street, New York City



Sarony

PHOTOGRAPHER



For 49 years patronized by the Clergy, who receive a special discount.

364 Fifth Ave. (Near 34th St.)
NEW YORK

Children's Feet Need Care

Sagging ankle and arch properly supported by Coward Arch Support Shoe.

Sagging ankle and arch without support of the Coward Arch Support Shoe.

The Coward Shoe

"REG. U. S. PAT. OFF."

The delicate bones of a child's feet are easy to mould.

Whether they are moulded into shapely, well formed feet or whether your child's feet will grow up ill-shaped and trouble-giving, depends largely upon the shoes his feet grow up in.

The Coward Shoes for children will make your child's feet natural and shapely when he grows up.

Sold Nowhere Else

James S. Coward

264-274 Greenwich Street, New York
(Near Warren Street)

Mail Orders Filled Send for Catalog

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON

16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST.
NEW YORK, N. Y.

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

For Non-Contagious Medical Cases

St. Mary's Hill

For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

ESTABLISHED 1864

Standard Altar Wines

	Per Gal.	Per Doz.
"Marsala"	$1.75	$5.00
"Puritas"	1.50	4.75
"Delaware"	1.50	4.75
"Vin de Concorde"	1.25	4.50
"Santa Fe"	1.25	4.50
"Vinum de Vite"	1.00	3.75
"Genesee Valley"	.90	3.50

Genesee Valley Vineyards & Winery

Lee Brothers

ROCHESTER, N. Y.

WRITE FOR SAMPLES AND CATALOGUE

THE

VATICAN

ITS HISTORY .·. ITS TREASURES

A TRUE ARISTOCRAT FOR LIBRARIES OF CLASS

THE LETTERS & ARTS PUBLISHING CO., Inc.
One West 34th Street, New York

To Teachers

Are you looking for a Text-Book of the highest efficiency that will prove an important adjunct in class life?

A rapidly increasing number of our Colleges and Schools, all over the country, are using AMERICA as supplementary reading in connection with their various courses.

One large college used last year more than ONE HUNDRED COPIES EACH WEEK.

Its carefully-written pages and well-developed thought, the breadth of its articles, the timeliness of its editorials, and the clear-cut division of the Review, render it a valuable asset in forming the pupils' minds upon the great questions of the day. To the Professor of Ethics, Oratory, Political Economy, Sociology, Pedagogy, Literature, Composition, History, Apologetics and kindred branches it affords an excellent store of illustration.

Precisely because AMERICA gives an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life, is the reason why we want the NATIONAL CATHOLIC WEEKLY in the hands of every Catholic student in the Universities, Colleges and High Schools of the country, as a means to clarify and extend the teaching of the classroom. To aid in this work we have made.

A Special Educational Rate

Applicable only to Catholic Teachers and Catholic Students in Catholic Schools

Send at once for the circular that will explain in detail the comprehensive viewpoint and importance to both teacher and student of this most attractive and advantageous program.

Let us hear from you to-day so that no further issue of the National Catholic Weekly Review may be lost to your class. Begin immediately so that besides instructing them through the pages of AMERICA you may introduce them to the most universally quoted Catholic paper in the English Language and have the reflex benefits of its use in the School felt in the Home.

Hundreds of Teachers and thousands of Pupils are being helped and inspired by its pages, which give a weekly record of Catholic achievement and a defence of Catholic doctrine built up by skilful hands in every region of the globe; an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life; removing traditional prejudice, refuting erroneous news and correcting misstatements about Catholic beliefs and practices.

Write for details.

CIRCULATION BUREAU

The America Press

59 East 83d Street

New York, N. Y.

ANY 3 FOR $1.00
ALL 6 FOR $1.50

You can't neglect this opportunity to secure a most attractive group of volumes combining pleasure, profit and instruction.

SOCIALISM

A volume of ten excellent essays by foremost Catholic writers. All written in a concise and popular style.
280 Pages Price 50 cents

LORETTO

Annals of the pioneer Congregation of American Sisters of Charity.
A Book of Historical Interest.
By ANNA C. MINOGUE
300 Pages 21 Illustrations
Price 50 cents

THE NAMES OF GOD

and Meditative Summaries of the Divine Perfection
By the
Ven. LEONARD LESSIUS, S.J.
Translated by T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.
248 pages, large type, with portrait
Price 50 cents

LIFE AND LETTERS OF

HENRY VAN RENSSELAER

Priest of the Society of Jesus
By EDWARD P. SPILLANE, S.J.
An illustrated volume of 350 pages
Price 75 cents

ISAAC JOGUES

DISCOVERER OF LAKE GEORGE
By T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.
55 Pages 9 Illustrations
Price 25 cents

LIFE OF

Venerable Philippine Duchesne

Founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, and one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.
Price 25 cents POSTAGE EXTRA

THE AMERICA PRESS,
59 East 83d Street, New York

FOR TEN CENTS

These three important pamphlets sent to any address

HOLY COMMUNION FOR CHILDREN

THE END JUSTIFIES THE MEANS

THE CATHOLIC WORKING GIRL

ALL THREE FOR TEN CENTS

—*—

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street NEW YORK

FOUR SPLENDID VOLUMES

Dealing with American History

For $6.00 Postage Extra

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold

Pioneer Laymen of North America

Telling the fascinating story of the adventurous Cartier, Menendez, Champlain, De La Tour, Maisonneuve, Le Moyne and Radisson.

One of the most picturesque and fascinating periods in American history, that of the exploits of the French in Canada is the foundation of the first volume "Pioneer Laymen of North America."—New York Sun.

Father Campbell has done a noted service to history and to the Church.—The Monitor.

The volume abounds in variety.—Tablet (Brooklyn).

Father Campbell has given to the public one of the most valuable books of his prolific career.—Catholic Columbian.

It is both historic and romantic.—Catholic Universe.

Father Campbell is to be congratulated for his timely work.—Tidings.

300 Pages. 16 Illustrations. Price $1.75. Postage extra.

Among the Iroquois

Volume I

An Interesting Story of the Missionaries among the Iroquois.

Father Campbell's book is one of permanent interest and value.—Evening Post (New York.)

Interesting to Protestants and Catholics alike for its historical value.—Star (Atlanta.)

333 Pages. 27 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

Among the Hurons

Volume II

Tells the Heroic Story of De Brebeuf and His Associates.

It is a story of which the Church and the Order may well feel proud.—Sun (New York.)

480 Pages. 24 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

Among the Algonquins

Volume III

The Ethnic Group that figured more extensively in Our History than any other Indian Family.

The noble history of those old French priests is excellently told by their modern confrère, and it is a history with which every intelligent American Catholic should become familiar.—Catholic Historical Review.

336 Pages. 22 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street
New York

Copyright Joseph Sibbel Studio

IV STATION

This set is modeled especially for Chapels, the size is 13 by 21 inches and the figures are 10 inches high, Will send photo on request,

JOSEPH SIBBEL STUDIO

(Established 1881)

214 East 26th Street, New York City

Religious Sculpture in marble, stone, bronze and composition,

---

Reverend Superiors of

Charitable and Educational Institutions

can SAVE MONEY on purchases of Groceries, Teas, Coffees, Canned Goods and Laundry Supplies by dealing with

MARTIN C. DYER

College, Convent, Institution and Hospital Representative of

AUSTIN, NICHOLS & CO., Inc.

New York Sales Office, 100 Hudson St.

Cor. Franklin and Leonard Sts., New York, N. Y.

MENEELY BELL CO

TROY, N.Y. AND 177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY

BELLS

MENEELY & CO.

Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.

Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequalled musical quality.

89 years' experience

Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal Memorials,

THE FRANK MEANY CO.

PRINTERS

Inc.

Magazines Catalogues

Periodicals Booklets

Programmes

216-220 West 18th Street, New York

Near 7th Avenue

Founded 1856

Clergymen's clothes permit of very little variation in design.

The prescribed standards of proper form eliminate the idiosyncrasies of fashion tendency—but place no bann on niceties of cloth, tailoring, cut and finish.

Our present showing of Fall and Winter garments for the clergy, demonstrates in full many desirable advantages which are quite apart from the conventional.

Special features

Soft finished cloths, very dark Oxford mixture.
Clear black worsted in indistinct self-plaids.
Clerical waistcoats with true-fit collars.
Black rubberized raincoats of special design
Clerical waistcoats made to match sack suits.

Hats and Haberdashery

BROKAW BROTHERS

Astor Place & Fourth Avenue

Subway Station at Door

It is in fact a very stirring call for recruits to the highest life, written throughout in a style that will catch the boyish ear, and it might almost be termed a sermon with the Decree of July 15th, 1912, as its text. Father Cassilly makes the most of his case, and does not forget to bring in that eminent member of his Society, Father Ribadeneira, whose vocation took its rise in the very unpromising occasion of a fight with another boy. We wish his pamphlet a large circulation and much fruit, and should like to see a reprint for use in our own country.—The Month.

What Shall I Be?

A CHAT WITH YOUNG PEOPLE

By the

Rev. Francis Cassilly, S.J.

A handy manual that presents in brief and simple form sound principles to assist the young in deciding their future course of Life. The choice of vocations is a pressing subject at this season of the year.

Cloth, 30 cents	Paper, 10 cents
12 copies, $2.70	12 copies, $1.00
50 copies, $10.00	50 copies, $4.00
100 copies, $22.50	100 copies, $7.50

Postage extra

The America Press

59 East 83d Street

New York

Priests, Brothers and Sisters are much needed in all parts of the United States. Is it not to be feared that many boys and girls who ought to give themselves up to God and to work for souls miss their vocation because they are not properly instructed? Father Cassilly in this "Chat for Young People" explains vocation to religious life and to the priesthood in a simple, attractive way that ought to appeal to our youth.—The Messenger of the Sacred Heart.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

5 Cents Each
40 Cents a Dozen

Published at a nominal price, on the eighth and twenty-second of the month, the CATHOLIC MIND pamphlets supply to the militant Catholic the most effective weapons with which to meet the threatening issues of the day. There are several important articles on some current question in each number. In handy form these tracts for the times can be kept for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

5 Cents Each
40 Cents a Dozen

The Educative Influence of the Catholic Press

A Catholic Writers' Syndicate

Good Qualities of Our Catholic Press

Father Tierney's idea of what a Catholic paper should be he outlined in an address delivered last Summer at Toledo. It is published in this number of the CATHOLIC MIND. Mr. Michael Williams, a journalist of wide experience, offers excellent suggestions regarding the formation of a syndicate for securing Catholic writers' best work, and Mr. Laurie J. Blakely points out the too readily overlooked merits of our Catholic papers.

Since June, 1914, 200,000 Copies of the CATHOLIC MIND have been circulated. We want you to help us to double that number before another year passes.

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

10. Plain Words of Socialism. C. S. Devas, M.A.
13. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
19. Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. Wilfrid Ward

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.

1910

4, 5, 6, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Halley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children
18. The XXI Eucharistic Congress. Edward Spillane, S.J.
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. Joseph Husslein, S.J.
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. Henry J. Swift, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific. II, III. Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M. Bishop of Christ Church
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
24. Father Algué's Barocyclonometer. New York Tribune, Dec. 1912

1913

5. Capital Punishment. Rev. John J. Ford, S.J.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. A. de F.
24. First Encyclical of Benedict XV.

1915

1. The Catholic Press. E. Hull, S.J.
2. The "Menace" and the Mails. Paul Bakewell
3. The Ethics of War. Edward Masterson, S.J.
4. Sixty Historical "Don'ts." James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.
5. The Jesuit Myth. Robert Swickerath, S.J.
6. Fifty "Don'ts" of Science. James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.
   Catholics in the Y. M. C. A. Nelson Hume
7. Catholic Sociology. Richard H. Tierney, S.J.
   Newman's Alleged "Scurrility" Paul Bakewell
8. Was Shakespeare a Catholic? James J. Walsh, M. D., Ph.D.
9. The Church and the Mexican Revolution. By a Mexican Lawyer
10. Dante's 650th Birthday. James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D., Litt.D.
    How to Reach the Medieval Mind. Vincent McNabb, O.P.
11. Magna Charta's Centenary. P. Guilday, Ph. D.
12. The Church and the Sex Problem. Richard H. Tierney, S.J.
13. The War's Lesson. Rt. Rev. Thomas O'Dwyer, D.D.
14. Catholic Schools for Catholic Youth. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
15. Temperance Against Prohibition. Henry Maurice
16. The Papacy. His Eminence Cardinal Mercier
17. The Church and the Immigrant. Rt. Rev. Francis C. Kelley, D.D.
18. The Contemporary Drama. James J. Daly, S.J.
19. The Catholic School. William D. Guthrie

Special Rates: Pamphlets for 1908-1911, inclusive, $1.00 per hundred; for 1912-14, inclusive, $2.00 per hundred; for 1915, $3.00 per hundred.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name.....Street.....

City.....State.....

THE UNIVERSITY IN PRINT

THE GUIDANCE OF A THOUSAND TEACHERS

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

WITH COURSES OF STUDY AND READING IN

Science, Art, Religion, History, Philosophy, Education, Literature, Social Science, Law, Economics, Civics

A NEW EDUCATIONAL MOVEMENT

With the Editors and Contributors of The Catholic Encyclopedia as a Faculty

AN EXPERT

Editor of Dictionaries and Encyclopedias, Frank H. Vizetelly, of Funk & Wagnall's, has this to say of

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

Some may think that this Encyclopedia is restricted to religion. It treats that, of course, but it treats more than that. As its title implies, it is a universal encyclopedia, for the history of the Catholic Church is the history of the universe.

Within the sixteen volumes of The Catholic Encyclopedia, the editors provide:

1. An Encyclopedia of Christian faith.
2. A Standard Dictionary of Catholic Theology.
3. An Encyclopedia of Church History.
4. A Book of Martyrs.
5. A Dictionary of Philosophy.
6. An Encyclopedia of Law—Civil and Ecclesiastical.
7. A Library of the World's Best Literature.
8. A Cyclopedia of Education.
9. A Dictionary of Biography.
10. An Encyclopedia of Music.
11. A Gazetteer of the World.
12. A Museum of Art.

To summarize the subjects treated the reviewer might have termed it a Dictionary of:

Civilization	History	Military Orders	Science
Controversy	Popes	Monasticism	Sects, Churches
Exploration	Saints	Nations, Races	Sociology

14,000 Pages
25,000,000 Words
15,000 Leading Articles
350,000 Subjects
1,543 Writers
153 Revisers, Indexers, and Editorial Assistants

The Catholic Encyclopedia

15 Goupil Color Plates
356 Full Page Halftones and Engravings
55 Original Maps
2,277 Text Illustrations

Fifteen Volumes, Royal Octavo, and Index Volume. Complete Set weighs 61 lbs. One-Half Leather. Size 7 x 10 and 1¼ Inches in thickness.

NEW SPECIAL LIGHT WEIGHT PAPER EDITIONS

IN THREE SPECIAL BINDINGS

For Cloth Binding $40.00 for Complete Set, 16 Volumes
For ½ Leather Binding $60.00 for Complete Set, 16 Volumes
For ½ Tan Arabian Morocco Binding $80.00 for Complete Set, 16 Volumes
Less 10 per cent. for cash or by easy monthly payments of $3.00 or more per month.

FOR CANADA AND PROVINCES, add to above prices $5.00 per set to cover customs and brokerage.

MAIL AT ONCE THIS SPECIAL LOW PRICE COUPON

THE K. of C. CATHOLIC TRUTH COMMITTEE
16 East 40th Street, New York City A. 10

Please send me the new Knights of Columbus Edition of The Catholic Encyclopedia, 16 volumes, bound in.....
for which I enclose.....payment of.....
Name .....
Address .....
Council .....
City .....State.....

N. B.—Complete information and copy of illustrated specimen pages sent free on request.

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL

HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

VERY REV. S. W. FAY, S.T.D.
Rector.

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, and the University of Kentucky
Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

Georgetown University

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E. St., N. W

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

ACADEMY OF MOUNT ST. URSULA

Bedford Park, New York City

An incorporated school for resident and day pupils. Full elementary course. Four-year academic course preparatory to College and Training School for Teachers. For particulars address THE MOTHER SUPERIOR.

ACADEMY OF OUR LADY

Ninety-fifth and Throop Streets
Longwood, CHICAGO, ILL.

A pure and lofty conception of life, high sense of duty, a noble type of Christian womanhood, refinement, and thorough scholarship, music and artistic culture, physical vigor and health, are the standards set for

YOUR DAUGHTER
AT THE
ACADEMY OF OUR LADY

Full range of Scientific, Classical, Literary and Historical Studies.

Catalogue sent on application.

St. Joseph's College and Academy

EMMITSBURG, MARYLAND

Courses College, Commercial, Academic, Preparatory

Course in Pedagogy open to Senior and Junior College Students

Exceptional advantages in Music, Art, Domestic Science

Founded 1809. . . FREE CATALOGUE

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES
Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in Separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers

LARGEST CATHOLIC COLLEGE IN AMERICA

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue . . . . . Prefect of Studies.

Catholic Reader's Guide

Introduction to Catholic Reading.

A Classified, Suggestive List of Select Catholic Publications

By J. HAVENS RICHARDS, S.J.

This list suggests the best works available in the surprisingly large store of Catholic literature. It is of special use to spiritual directors, teachers, parents, and librarians in encouraging those under their charge to develop a taste for profitable reading.

Ten Cents a Copy, Postage Extra

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street
New York

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT
Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson, 40 minutes from New York City.

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
MOUNT MARIAN, WASHINGTON, D. C.

High-class school for young women and girls. Situated in the Suburbs.

Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Abundant out-door exercise in beautiful suburban grounds; individual attention to character training; happy home life; thorough scholarship.

SPECIAL TWO-YEAR COURSE of COLLEGE work for high school graduates.

FULL PREPARATORY and ELECTIVE courses.

MUSIC, ART, EXPRESSION and domestic science.

All the advantages of the National Capital and sightseeing, with experienced chaperones.

For Illustrated Year Book Address
SISTER SECRETARY, DEP'T. F.

Carlton Academy

UPPER SCHOOL for older boys gives thorough preparation for all colleges. Individual attention. Commercial Courses. Athletic Sports. Resident Chaplain.

LOWER SCHOOL for younger boys, with Housemother to give personal care.

SUMMIT Charles H. Schultz. A.M.,
New Jersey Headmaster.

ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

Mt. St. Joseph's College
IRVINGTON, BALTIMORE, MD.

Courses in Classics, Sciences and Commerce, under able professors. Special facilities for Pre-Medical Students. Certificates Recognized.

Splendid health location. Spacious buildings. Extensive campus. Gymnasium. Outdoor swimming pool. Physical as well as mental training.

For Catalogue and particulars, address:

BROTHER DIRECTOR

ST. FRANCIS XAVIER
COLLEGE and ACADEMY

Sisters of Mercy

4928 XAVIER PARK, CHICAGO, ILL.

The first Catholic College for women in Chicago—chartered 1912. Freshman class only in September, 1915.

Write for Prospectus

Schools and Colleges

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute
For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

Seton Hill Schools

St. Joseph Academy for Girls

GREENSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA
On main line P. R. R., 30 miles from Pittsburgh
Elementary and High School Courses. University affiliation.
Two years' advanced Course for High School Graduates.
Conservatories of Music and Art.
Domestic Science. Gymnasium. Field Sports.
Address Department E

St. Mary's Annex for Small Boys

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent
On Hudson

CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B. A. and B. S.

COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT

ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON

CITY OF NEW YORK

Mount de Sales
Academy of the Visitation

CATONSVILLE (NEAR BALTIMORE) MARYLAND

Ideal School for Young Ladies

Classic, Literary and Scientific Courses. French and German receive special attention. Departments of Music, Art and Elocution. Magnificent situation.

Ask for Illustrated Catalogue

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts, Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

SAINT MARY-OF-THE-WOODS
For Women . . . College and Academy . . . . For Girls

Affiliated to the Catholic University

Departments of Arts and Sciences—Four-Year Course leading to degrees A.B. and B.S.
Department of Household Economics—Courses leading to the degree B.S. Elective courses offered to all college students.
Conservatory of Music—Teachers' and Artists' Certificate Courses.
School of Expression—Teachers' Certificate Courses. Various elective courses open to all students.
School of Art—Drawing, water color, oil, keramics. Certificates issued.
Academy—Full Four-Year High School Course and Grammar Department.
75th Year. A School of Four Generations.
Students from twenty-five States. Twelve modern buildings. New College Hall, Gymnasium, Natatorium, etc. Abundant out-door exercise. 40-acre golf course. Bulletins and illustrated booklets will be sent upon request.

Address Sister Secretary, Box 70, SAINT MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA

THE BERNARDINI STATUARY CO.
28 Barclay Street
New York City

Send for our circular showing all the different styles and sizes of our

Crib Sets

Our figures are finely sculptured and artistically finished.

SECOND VOLUME

READY EARLY IN DECEMBER

SECOND VOLUME

PIONEER LAYMEN OF NORTH AMERICA

BY THE

Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, S.J.

Uniform in style with the first volume
300 Pages; 15 portraits, illustrations and maps

This second volume of the series of historical sketches of Catholic pioneer laymen that have been received with such favor by the public, continues the narratives to include the careers of Le Moyne Perrot, D'Iberville, Frontenac, La Salle, Bienville, La Verendrye, and the famous Dr. John McLaughlin, the Father of Oregon.

"Father Campbell . . . has given to the public in Pioneer Laymen of North America one of the most valuable works of his prolific career."—Catholic Columbian.

"The general treatment is as scholarly as the sketches are fascinating."—Catholic Tribune.

"Father Campbell is to be congratulated for his timely work."—Tidings.

"These studies will go far to give American history a true and proper conception of these old Catholic heroes."—Tablet.

"One of the most picturesque and fascinating periods in American history . . . is the foundation of the first volume."—Sun (New York).

"The stories are told each with the same fulness of detail as in Father Campbell's earlier work."—The Month.

"A book for Americans."—The Monitor.

"From the Catholic viewpoint also, Father Campbell continues to correct the misstatements or misinterpretations of previous writers, largely non-Catholic and frequently prejudiced."—Catholic Historical Review.

Price $1.75 Postage Extra
The Two Volumes for $3.00

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d St., New York, N.Y.

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIV, No. 4
WHOLE No. 343

NOVEMBER 6, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, Oct. 26, p. m.-Nov. 1, a. m.—Serbia and the Teutons—Serbia and the Bulgarians. France: Religion; The Ministry. Germany: Catholics and the War. Great Britain: Recruiting. Ireland: Home Rule—Some Effects of the War. Mexico: The Week's News; Yucatan 73-76

TOPICS OF INTEREST
XLI–The Young Man and Salesmanship—Spread of Social Disorder—No Compromise with Heresy—The Church and Birth Control—Catholic English Hymnals 77-83

COMMUNICATIONS
Public Spirit in San Francisco—Woman Suffrage—Catholic Writers' Syndicate—Winning America for the Church.....83-85

EDITORIALS
By What Authority? — Cosmic Spray — Leaving Out the Accents—Less a Sacrament—Hyphenated Christians—Prayers of Hate.....86-88

LITERATURE
Mexican Poets and Poetry.

REVIEWS: Dieu, son existence et sa nature—The Collected Poems of Condé Benoist Pallen—The Goddess of Ghosts—The Normal Life—For Greater Things—A Voice from the Crowd—Russian Fairy Tales—Hero Tales and Legends of the Serbians—Teaching of History in Elementary and Secondary Schools—Old Roads from the Heart of New York—Debating for Boys—The Coming Newspaper.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The Catholic Mind—September's "Best Sellers"—"The Lord My Light"—"Making Money"—"The Little Iliad"—"Serbia; Her People, History and Aspirations"—"The Fortunes of Garin"—"Hempfield"—The Catholic World—"The Black and White Book"—"Sure Pop and the Safety Scouts"—"The Emerald Story Book"—"Water Babies"—"The Kingdom of the Winding Road".....88-93

EDUCATION
Dabble and Cram.....93, 94

SOCIOLOGY
Lemon Frappé and the Y. W. P. A.....94, 95

NOTE AND COMMENT
Protestantism in Japan—Efficiency—The Marist Brothers' Japanese Missions—Millions to Waste on Fakes—Don Miguel Maura Dead—Henri Fabre, the "Insects' Homer"—The Beginning of Real Charity—New Buildings for Mount Saint Vincent—"Sweating" in the Garment Trade—The Big Cities—The True Thought of the Age. 95, 96

CHRONICLE

The War.—German artillery has been active during the week in Belgium, especially in the vicinity of Het Sas, and Steenstraete, and in France, north of Arras. North of Arras, however, whatever gains have been made are on the side of the French. In Champagne the French have consolidated their victory at Tahure by storming and holding against counter attacks La Courtine, but have lost Butte de Tahure. The Italians have been making strong efforts both in the Trentino and along the Isonzo, with greater success than has attended their operations for many months. Further progress has been made towards the isolation of Riva, and Goritz seems to be in greater danger than at any previous time. It is under bombardment, and Austrian reinforcements are hurrying from other fields to meet the increased vigor of the Italian attacks. In the east the Germans have taken Illuxt, on the road to Dvinsk, and gained a little ground at several points between Riga and Dvinsk, but have not yet got their guns within range of either city, and on the whole the Russians seem to be holding their own. Further south, at Novo Grodek, Lida, and near Baronovitch, the Russians have been on the offensive, but have not gained any great advantage. Along the river Styr the Russians have been more successful, and the Austro-Germans in Volhynia find it hard to hold them back.

Bulletin, Oct. 26, p. m.-Nov. 1, a. m.

Serbia continues to occupy the attention of the world to the exclusion of almost every other theater in the war. The situation of the Serbians is growing more desperate. On the west the Austrians have driven the Serbians out of Bosnia, have pushed forward from Visegrad into Serbia, and have joined forces with the Germans at Milanovac. The advance of the Austro-Germans in the Morava valley is steadily proceeding, and has reached a point within eight miles of Cacak and Kragujevac. The vigorous resistance of the Serbians is unable to hold back the invaders effectually, but the Teuton progress will be increasingly costly, for the Teutons are now approaching a territory that is both mountainous and strongly fortified. By joining forces at Ljubicevac, in the northeastern corner of Serbia, the Austro-Germans and the Bulgarians isolated the Serbians from Rumania, got control of the Danube, and opened up communications with Turkey.

Serbia and the Teutons

From the east the Bulgarians are also closing in on the Serbians. One of the Bulgarian armies has captured Zaitcar, the only fortified place on the eastern Serbian border. Another Bulgarian army has taken Knjazevac, and advanced some miles beyond it toward Nish. A little further south a third army has reduced Pirot. The capture of these three places gives the Bulgarians control of the Timok valley, and establishes excellent railroad communications between Sofia and the Bulgarian armies, and between the armies themselves. As it has also removed the principal obstacles on their way to Nish, the fall of this city is now regarded as inevitable. This is the more likely, because the Allies, who have had some success in southern Serbia, having invaded Bulgaria and approached Strumnitza, are cut off from the Serbians, and as far as can be ascertained are not in sufficient numbers to overcome the Bulgarians or to prevent them from isolating the northern Serbian forces. For a time it was thought that the recapture of Kuprili by the Serbians was a step in this direction, but its second capture by the Bulgarians has put an end to this impression. The Allies are fighting with their backs to Greece, and may soon find themselves forced back into Greek territory. Meanwhile the Bulgarians are extending their lines through southern Serbia.

Serbia and the Bulgarians

The outlook for Serbia is all the darker because it now seems certain that neither Greece nor Rumania has any intention of intervention in her behalf. According to the latest reports, France has sent to Serbia 150,000 soldiers, Great Britain about 15,000, while Russia, in addition to bombarding Varna, has an unknown number of soldiers on transports proceeding by way of the Black Sea to the Bulgarian coast. The general belief, however, is that these forces will be too late to prevent the subjugation of Serbia.

France.—The Abbey of St. Denis has lately been the scene of a remarkable manifestation of faith on the part of French Catholics, who have just concluded several days of prayer for France. One day was given over to prayers for the wounded; another to prayers for the soldiers in the field; a third to prayers for prisoners; a fourth to prayers for widows and orphans and for the repose of the souls of those killed in battle, and so on. While this scene was enacting at St. Denis, Le Journal was suggesting that the Cathedral of Reims be secularized and made a memorial monument to the heroes who have been killed and will be killed in the war. Catholics have not yet been heard in this regard. Just at present the latter are discussing the reestablishment of some kind of diplomatic relations between France and the Vatican. Opinions are much divided on the subject of the ways and means of bringing this about. Many demand an official representation at the Holy See, insisting that this is necessary because of some religious problems now existing, and others which will come into existence at the close of war. Other Catholics believe official representation impossible, feeling that the Government will never consent to a resumption of relations with the Vatican; hence these Catholics have suggested an unofficial representative, a layman, chosen by a committee of bishops delegated by the hierarchy for this purpose. In this way it is thought that a permanent bond between French Catholics and the Vatican can be established. Needless to say the Holy See has had no part in the discussion.

Religion; The Ministry

The new Ministry was formed by Briand on October 29. The real reason for the change has not been made known. Viviani announced that Delcassé had resigned for reasons of health, but on interpellation refused to produce the letter of resignation. In the debate that followed, Painlevé demanded that information about the Balkan campaign be given the Chamber; this too was refused; Viviani resigned, and this Ministry was formed: Premier and Minister of Foreign Affairs, Briand; State, Freycinet; War, Gallieni; Marine, Lacaze; Finance, Ribot; Interior, Malvy; Commerce, Clementel; Public Works, Sembat; Justice, Viviani; Colonies, Doumergue; PublicInstruction and War Inventions, Painlevé; Agriculture, Meline; Labor, Metin; Ministers of State without Portfolio, Bourgeois, Combes, Guesde, Denys Cochin; General Secretary of Foreign Affairs with a seat in the Cabinet, Jules Cambon. Evidently an attempt has been made to placate all factions: Radical and Catholic are to sit side by side, probably not for long, however. There are several very old men in this Ministry. De Freycinet is eighty-seven years old, Combes is eighty, Meline is seventy-seven, Ribot, seventy-three; Bourgeois, sixty-four.

Germany.—The exact statistics of the members of Catholic Religious Orders and Congregations engaged in the service of the country have now been compiled, although they cover only the first half year of the war, to January 1. According to the carefully arranged tables, the Orders of men have furnished, during that time, 1,963 soldiers, of whom 232 were wounded and 62 killed; 1,307 hospital and Red Cross workers, of whom 386 were in the field; 127 chaplains at the front, 253 priests laboring in the hospitals and 20 in the prison camps. Thirty-eight of the members of religious Orders were decorated with the Iron Cross. The sisterhoods have been at least equally active; 1,054 Sisters were with the army and in the halting places, while 11,502 were engaged in hospital work at home, having had in their care no fewer than 270,250 wounded before January 1 of the present year. Of 18 Jesuits serving in the field and 13 in the capacity of chaplains, mentioned in one of the tables, nine received the Iron Cross. Many others are variously employed. No account is taken in these statistics of the great numbers of priests and seminarians not connected with religious Orders and Congregations. Catholics of all classes are nobly doing their full duty in the present war, while at the same time, in obedience to the desire of the Holy Father, they have earnestly made their own the papal prayer for peace. Characteristic, too, of the depth of faith of the German Catholics and their deep sincerity is the war prayer composed for them by the Bishop of Speyer to the "Lord of Hosts." After asking Him in glowing words to protect with His infinite power the troops and their princes, the prayer continues:

Catholics and the War

> Holy and eternal God, open the eyes of our people and give them the grace to see Thy Divine purposes in this hour of their trial, to bow in the spirit of penance beneath Thy mighty hand and to cast forth from their midst all foreign gods. In the days when our arms are triumphant we shall give the glory to Thy name and not boast of our prowess. In the time of misfortune we shall not despair. Before the graves where multitudes lie buried, we would by Thy grace grow in the fear of God and trust in God, in fidelity to the Imperial House, in love toward our people, and would make the brave resolution to begin a new life.

He then asks for unfailing strength under the burdens of war, petitions for the healing of wounds inflicted, for perseverance in works of charity and in the service of Him who is the Father of the orphan and the Consoler of the afflicted, and finally he begs the blessing of an honorable and a speedy peace.

Great Britain.—A recent edition of the London Times contains portions of a speech on recruiting, delivered by Lord Rosebery, at Leith. The speaker announced that "all that could be done by recruiting speeches had been done already, and if men would not come in, more serious and drastic plans would have to be adopted."

Recruiting

We were spending four millions a day, and if the war dragged on for years we should not merely lose our four millions a day, but we should lose the best of our manhood and we should be an exhausted country for a century to come even if we won. The need was infinitely greater now than before. With the torch of war lit in the Balkans, heavy, direful explosions were certain to follow. If the gentle methods of appeal and harangue did not succeed in getting enough men, there was something sterner coming. If the war turned to the advantage of Germany the young man who did not enlist would be slinking about the streets like a leper, feeling that as far as he was concerned the country was demolished, and he did not raise a finger to save her.

Some few days after this the Manchester Guardian announced that recruiting was proceeding more rapidly than at any time since the early days of the war. Dispatches state that one of the chief obstacles confronting the recruiting officers is the attitude of many employers who not only refuse to grant recruits allowances, as was done at the beginning of the war, but will not guarantee positions to them should they return from the war. The increase in recruits appears to be particularly gratifying to the authorities because it has come about despite the fact that Lord Derby's scheme for calling on men by sections, "drawing first the unmarried and those not engaged in work connected with the production of arms and munitions of war, has not yet been put into operation." The President of the Board of Education has addressed an appeal to teachers urging enlistment, warning them in these words, that the time for sacrifice has come. "There is a time when a man who is building must leave his work to guard against the destruction of the building itself. That time has now come."

Ireland.—Just at present the Irish press is much preoccupied with the discussion of Home Rule. The occasion for the new discussion is the election to the Protestant See of Dublin, by the Bench of Bishops, of Dr. Bernard, whose plea for peace between the different Irish factions was recently noted in AMERICA. Commenting on the election, New Ireland says:

Home Rule

We regard his appointment as full of the deepest political significance. It is the strongest confirmation we have yet received of a view which we have repeatedly put forward, that the Unionists outside of Ulster have practically abandoned their resistance to Home Rule. With the final stages of the Home Rule Bill that resistance showed signs of widespread collapse; and we believe that the war, which has left the Unionists of the three southern provinces in a minority in the new armies as they will be in an Irish Parliament, has worn down a great part of the barrier which has hitherto existed between the two parties. Archbishop Bernard is a leader of a great and growing body of opinion with whom ultimately must rest the settlement of the Ulster question. They alone possess the possible avenues of approach between the Ulster party and the remainder of Ireland; and on their success or failure in using their commanding position the settlement will depend. If civil strife in Ireland is to be averted at the end of the war, its prevention will depend almost entirely on the efforts of the southern Unionists.

Similarly Professor W. T. Trench of Trinity College, writes in the Daily Express:

. . . . At the present time, as everyone knows, there is a grave political problem to be faced by us sooner or later in connection with the proposed changes in the government of this country. It is natural that much strong language should have been used on behalf of Protestants and Conservatives in Ireland; yet it is worth inquiring whether the views of a majority of educated men among us are not represented by admirable words such as those of the Bishop of Ossory in his address to the Ossory Diocesan Synod. . . . If our differences are to be composed, if a satisfactory solution of our domestic problem is to be found, it will have to be found in Ireland, as Sir Horace Plunkett has said, and not at Westminster. But when is any attempt to be made to find a solution? It is universally assumed that no move is to be made until after the end of the war, and indeed it may be most desirable that it should be possible to postpone it until then, but, unfortunately, that will most probably be too late. . . . Those Protestants and Conservatives who desire an Irish reconciliation ought to be drawing together now. . . . It may be that much of the nation's future depends upon their doing so.

The National Volunteer exclaims:

It is only fools or fanatics who pretend to think that Home Rule is anything but an inevitable fact of the near future. The rule of a caste in Ireland is over.

The Leader, in the course of a vigorous paragraph, remarks: "Now that the no distant date is again 'in the air,' we think we correctly interpret the spirit of Irish Ireland as being similar to what it was, say, about a dozen years ago." This apparently means that "offensive has ceased all round." Be that as it may, the North is not appeased; sentiment there appears to be just what it was when the Irish Churchman said: "We have the offer of aid from a continental monarch who, if Home Rule is forced on the Protestants of Ireland, is prepared to send an army . . . to attach Ireland to his dominions. . . . The Protestants of Ireland will welcome that delivery."

The effects of the war on Ireland have been discussed quite dispassionately during the week. New Ireland is sure that there will be "a very heavy decline in the Irish population during the next decade." Before the war the male population between the ages of eighteen and forty-five amounted to about 650,000.

Some Effects of the War

Death and emigration are reducing this number day after day. Then, too, the prosperity due to the war is "a spurious prosperity" which cannot possibly last. Farmers are getting higher prices for produce, but the quantity grown has been sadly diminished and there has been, moreover, a great increase in the cost of feeding stuffs, of seed and of all raw material; besides these the enormous tax must be taken into consideration, an item which causes much uneasiness. There is, however, a ray of hope in the "Irish Agricultural Organization Society," which appears to be making splendid progress. This organization now numbers 1,023 cooperative societies with a membership of 106,200 farmers. The "turnover" for 1914 was £3,733,000, as against £3,333,000 of former years, thus giving hope that the farmers may help the nation to recover its balance after the war is over.

Mexico.—There has been little change in Mexican affairs during the week. Villa and Carranza are still at odds, with the odds greatly in favor of the latter, and the border is still disturbed, much to the chagrin of Texans whose desire for protection has just been met by our Government. Carranza, it is reported, has been recognized by Austria-Hungary and Salvador. Recognition by the latter country is a decided advantage to the Mexican, for it means the release to Carranza of a shipload of arms held in Salvador. Details of Carranza's financial operations in Yucatan are as follows: His Government practically monopolized the trade of Yucatan's staple product, sisal, paying an apparently high price in greatly depreciated paper currency. Carranza's agents sold the sisal in the United States and retained the gold received for it, thus depriving Yucatan of all profit. Meantime the prices of even the necessities of life rose enormously, a fact which bore hard on the poor. However, glowing reports of conditions were spread broadcast by the Carranzista agents. An example of their trustworthiness is had from a statement to the effect that 1,000,000 laborers are engaged in the production of sisal. The census of Yucatan, which accounts for men, women and children, numbers less than 300,000! AMERICA has already published facts concerning religious conditions in Yucatan, but the following letter, written by a Yucatanian, is of such historic value that it is reproduced, at the risk of some few repetitions:

The Week's News; Yucatan

Don Venustiano Carranza has solemnly protested that his government never persecuted the Catholic religion. In order to weigh this declaration at its just value, I shall not recall the outrages committed on various occasions by his agents against nuns and priests, the pillage and plunder of churches, and countless other acts committed against Catholic worship. These are already well known to the readers of AMERICA. There are, however, other facts, altogether new and striking, which tell us plainly and unmistakably how far from realization are the hopes entertained that the party recently recognized by President Wilson, as the government de facto in Mexico, can ever respect real liberty of conscience and belief. These I shall relate in order that you may get a complete idea of the régime under which we are living.

On the eve of the final decision of the Pan-American Conference, when Carranza was endeavoring, tooth and nail, to make good his claims as a capable ruler, a band of his favored minions under the leadership of Alvarado, himself the pet of the "First Chief," made a night raid on the churches of Merida, the capital of the State of Yucatan, which before the Carranza régime had been one of the richest and most flourishing states of Mexico. This band of malefactors ruthlessly destroyed altars dating from colonial days and looked upon as works of art and historical relics, plundered the Cathedral, an architectural gem of the sixteenth century, and mutilated its ornaments and walls, confiscated the costly jewels and treasures presented to it by the founders of the State, the fathers and ancestors of the people of Yucatan, committed the most sacrilegious and appalling outrages against the consecrated Hosts, and this while the bells were all the time ringing and clanging full peal to terrify the citizens. One of these robbers broke into pieces the famous Crucifix once carried into battle by the Conquistadores of the sixteenth century and naturally greatly respected by the people. Others reduced to ashes the archives containing most valuable documents relating to the history of Yucatan. In one of the chapels there had been for centuries a Crucifix which, so traditions say, had been carved by an Indian artist from the wood of a tree over which there gleamed a mysterious light. That Crucifix had always been an object of veneration to the people of Yucatan, and in many a tragic episode of the nation's history the faithful prostrate before it begged God for relief and protection. The Crucifix and its hallowed traditions were bound up with the very life of the people; their religious and patriotic sentiments centered around it. Against this sacred palladium these outlaws directed all their fury and attacks. They tore it from the wall, flung it to the ground, and as, according to the popular tradition, the famous Crucifix had been once miraculously saved from the flames when everything else had been consumed, they saturated it with oil and tried to burn it in the street. But to their astonishment it remained unharmed. Then they tried to break it to pieces. They were just as unsuccessful. Just then certain henchmen of Alvarado came on the scene and lyingly asserting that the famous Crucifix was the center and the rallying-point of disorder and revolt, they carried it off and flung it into one of the cells of the prison, where undoubtedly it is to-day.

The spot where all these outrages took place is but a few yards distant from the Executive Mansion, where Alvarado had his residence, and where there was a military guard. Close by there was a police station. The authorities might certainly have prevented or checked all these outrages contrary to law, to order and decency; they did not do it. The abettors of all these sacrileges were led by agents of Alvarado, men openly known as such and protected by him. When some one asked Alvarado to punish the guilty, he refused to do so. At the same time he openly declared his will and intention of doing away with all religious teaching and instruction, saying that he was going to put an end to all "superstition and fanaticism."

These facts can be read in the Yucatan papers which published them at the time, and which Alvarado has persecuted and harassed in every way for their boldness. They are proved and certified to by many eminent and highly respectable citizens of the State.

Thus the Carranzistas outraged the most hallowed beliefs of a whole people and insulted us in a thousand ways, while at the same time they were making profession of religious tolerance and of respect for individual liberty. At the very gates of your country a people's rights are violated, liberty of conscience is outraged and the authors and abettors of these crimes have your protection and friendship.

The letter hardly calls for comment.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

XLI—The Young Man and Salesmanship

THERE was a time when the man who went about the country selling the manufacturer's products was known as a "drummer." His efficiency was measured by his ability to tell funny stories. If he got a laugh he got an order. Today the salesman is neither a traveling clown nor a wandering minstrel. He is an earnest, energetic, capable man who must have a fund of reasons instead of a stock of yarns. He reasons with a prospective purchaser to make him think certain thoughts. The first vital point in selling, after the salesman has learned his goods or his proposition, is to settle on what his prospective customer must think before he will buy and how he can be led to think so.

A salesman must plan out the general lines of all he is going to do when he meets his customer, and of all he is going to say, so that his every action and every word will keep the prospective buyer's mind always working towards the final function.

Real advertising is salesmanship and true salesmanship is the power to persuade people to purchase a product at a profit to the seller, and to render a service to the customer. The power to persuade in selling comes from a knowledge of one's self, a knowledge of the goods you are handling, a knowledge of the customer, and the application of this knowledge. To render a service to a customer, the salesman must look at the sales transaction through the eyes of the buyer. When the buyer parts with his money for goods, he expects to receive an equivalent of the sum expended; if he does not, he is naturally dissatisfied, and adopts means of spending his money to better advantage.

There are five factors to a sales transaction: the sale itself, the salesman, the customer, the goods, and the advertising.

(1) The sale itself may originate in the mind of the salesman; if so, he calls, for instance, on Mr. Newlywed to convince him of the wisdom of carrying an insurance policy as an immediate and permanent protection to his home. Picture the mental stages through which the mind of Mr. Newlywed would pass, if the salesman should say: "You may meet with an accident today or tomorrow which may be the cause of using up your income and leaving your home destitute." He has thus made Newlywed think about the matter, and if conditions be favorable, brings him to sign the application form. This thinking, feeling, and action must enter into every sale.

(2) The salesman must above all things know himself, and knowing himself, he must correct his faults. He must have the sterling qualities of industry, honesty, perseverance, thoroughness, punctuality, courtesy, cleanliness, loyalty, imagination, discipline and personality.

(3) The salesman must be a student of human nature and have a special knowledge of his customers, and also the ability to apply that knowledge. He must know how to approach men; and to do this he should be able to recognize their characteristics at a glance. This can be acquired through contact, study, and experience.

(4) To secure satisfaction in the minds of the customers, and hence repeated orders, is the aim of the seller; and he cannot do this unless he has excellent goods and can show them to advantage. He must know his goods, and all about them; he must know how to describe them, their uses, and their strong points.

(5) Advertising is creating a demand for a thing through publicity. Advertising is the force that brings people with money into a store to buy goods. Every merchant who has something to sell needs to employ some form of advertising to increase his sales.

The work of salesmanship makes a certain demand on the physical powers. Unless a man has an adequate knowledge of the laws of health and of the best means of developing, using and conserving physical energy, there is danger of his falling sick at the moment when it is absolutely necessary that he should be at business. Similarly a man has mental powers which call for the same treatment. Success demands ability to think deeply and accurately. He must know his goods thoroughly, for he cannot convince a buyer that they will be of service to him unless they are described in detail.

It is necessary for a salesman to know his customers because human nature is so diversified that one method of approaching all buyers would not sell enough goods to pay expenses. The salesman makes prospective buyers think as he wants them to think by applying the knowledge of all the facts that come under the heads "the sale," "the customer," and "the goods." In that way he attracts favorable attention, creates desire, inspires confidence, carries conviction, and moves to action the prospective purchaser. So we see that salesmanship is an art because its successful exercise implies the skill and power of performing certain actions, acquired by experience, study or observation. Salesmanship of today is often called scientific salesmanship and it may well be called a science, because it implies knowledge and application of facts in the sale of goods.

The rewards of successful salesmanship are greater today than ever before, because the field of business is world-wide in extent. There are no limits to the possibilities of a salesman's career, excepting the limitations of human capacity and endurance. To be a salesman is no longer a reproach, for the successful salesman is afforded ample opportunity for the highest honors, for unlimited wealth and power. It is a field to attract the able and the ambitious and in which to exercise the greatest talents. Among all the careers open to an enterprising young man, three-fourths are crowded to the point of suffocation, the supply being much greater than the demand. But the demand for good salesmen is always greater than the supply.

When the power of salesmanship is once acquired, it will be a man's most valuable personal asset. He can first use it to obtain money for completing his education, or for experimenting with a more congenial employment, and if he should fail in other lines he can return to salesmanship and build up his fortune again. The selling power of a salesman is very largely the power of personality, and in a successful salesman's daily experience he has to bring to bear all the varied qualities that go to make up scientific salesmanship. He must do his duty loyally, maintain his self-respect, and thus command the respect of others.

JOSEPH GERARD MORGAN,
Young Men's Catholic Association, Boston.

Spread of Social Disorder

NOBODY expects a perfect society this side of heaven. But since both philosophy and practice have so far departed from the moral law, and since women seek to enter on equal terms those spheres for which they are disqualified by their physical being and their natural character, it is worth while to contrast the order within the spheres which women dominate with that existing where men hold the reigns of power. Are the home and social intercourse in a better state of morality than commerce and politics?

If the departments of civilized life over which women rule were strictly in order, then, indeed, they might assist in setting to rights man's world, for there is much to be done. Truly, things are due to Cæsar which men deny and things are done to Cæsar that stress and strain the civil peace, while the absence of economic justice sets class against class. Yes, it must be said that both politics and trade are in disorder, but men, not women, should set them in order. If men should permit their own work to be done by women, and women were able to do it, who then would do the work which women alone are qualified to do?

The Feminists have the answer, they look to see the woman made more of a man and the man more of a woman. Aye! the philosophy of a great English poet has ripened in these sixty years, for the superman will be not only absolutely soulless but practically sexless.

That the woman's world is greatly in disorder no one can deny. Men are helpless before the task of setting it to rights. The nature of the disorders in the home and in society are such that women alone can cope with them. But "votes for women" merely confounds the confusion. Neither can the votes of men reach to the core of the issue, for it lies in the mental and moral fabric of woman's weaving. Woman may, if she will, heal the sores that are festering within her own dominion. But if she will, she must call upon the Vicar of Christ for her instruction.

Suffragists have so long been weaving public opinion with the warp of mental rebellion and the woof of sex discontent that the very foundations of our Republic are being sapped, because of the failure of a vast number of women to do the work God set them to do. Even the mention of her natural qualifications and their corresponding activities is vexatious to those most advanced in denying the true mission of woman. Their insistent iteration is for freedom from all the limitations of convention. Lacking the structure of logic, they read into the meaning of convention those limitations of sex relations prescribed by nature itself. Moreover, as a consequence of a lack of interior womanliness that is compelling, our country faces the demoralizing influence of vain women, idle women, selfish women, luxurious women with their real rights contemned and their duties unperformed.

Woman's legitimate rights, as the second term of mankind, give her control of the home and of society, and her duties are to keep these environments in good order. But the following after strange gods has disordered her provinces and is constantly working havoc to the cause of Christ.

Besides woman's work in the home and in society, she plays a secondary, though very important, part within the civic and exchange spheres. So it is that woman's influence is good or bad in civics and in trade in proportion as she keeps within or exceeds her proper influence within these extended environments.

In the elevated arts, music, painting, architecture, comparisons are invidious, for men are freely at home upon these fields, while women are but occasional comers. But woman, as well as man, has her creative spheres. Her great art is worked out interiorly; in conscious union with the Giver of Life, she moulds the future of her unborn children, dedicating her first-born to the especial service of God. Women build in the hearts of the little ones, in the hearts of men, in the world of emotion and intuition. Masculine building, on the other hand, is exterior: men organize governments and build up the intellectual and moral codes that show the designs of Almighty God. Thus, working together in complementary spheres, men and women lay the foundation in the home and build gloriously those nations which honor God.

No votes are needed for the women to set their half of the world in order. Besides, the most fatal disorders are seen in the home, where even the votes of men are powerless, for men have not in their keeping the chastity of motherhood. It was to our Blessed Mother that God gave the custody of the Redeemer who was to appear. It is the woman who commits that abomination of desolation, murder of the unborn child, the most ruthless crime ever devised by the ingenuity of wickedness. Votes are not wanted to prevent another vile practice, which leading suffragists advocate. Votes are not wanted to give good care to helpless infants in squalid homes, but rather the early conviction of the mother that a child is a gracious gift from God, and a drill in the best practices known in the care of babes. Votes are not wanted to cure the incorrigible children who crowd our juvenile courts, but, rather, good government at home, where parents are commissioned by the Judge of judges. Votes are not wanted to clear our streets of hoodlums, but mothers who do not harken to evil counsels. Votes are not wanted to solve the servant-girl problem which is left all untouched while a multitude of illogical women pester men for votes that women need as much as the moon and are as well equipped to use as the baby is to handle the carving-knife. Votes are not wanted to protect the housemaids to whom the wages of sin make a most successful appeal, but rather a training of the young men in the family in Christian chivalry which guards defenseless girls even against their own desires. Votes are not wanted for the prudent spending of the husband's wages in the market place, but rather a sober sense of the fitness of things, which adjusts one's expenditure to one's income. Votes are not wanted to shame the rich bargain-hunter, but rather a sense of fair-play, demanding measure for measure in economic value. Votes are not wanted to better conditions and raise wages for girls working in shops and factories, but a right public opinion.

Neither are votes wanted to empty those theaters and moving-picture houses where pleasure seekers are gorged with the vile trash they feed upon. Women support, largely, the "problem plays" with their false mental concepts and emotions reeking with the sweat of lust. The daughters of mothers are there with their mothers, together breathing in the fire of sex rebellion. The "best sellers" are bought with hard earned cash of husbands and fathers, and read, seducing the mind and capturing the fancy for a life the exact opposite from wholesome ideals. Newspapers carry into every home the most shocking tales of disordered families and social scandals, together with the vagaries of the so-called science of our day, which finds the "same root for man and brute," to borrow a great Pope's phrase. In the ball-room good women stand unabashed in scandalous attire, while luxurious women spare no pains in their appeal to the sensuous in mankind. The tango teas bring heart to heart the panting prig and the newest girl, both bred in the atmosphere of a soft and decadent environment, lurid with passions uncontrolled. On the street, one may be at pains to discover the line between the woman in self-conscious scarlet and the woman merely in the garb of fashion. Vice in schools astounds and alarms the sober-minded. But sex hygiene and eugenics are preparing a stench not yet endured, while the school strike is but a ripe fruit of the revolt against the moral order which subjects children to parental control. For the rod has been long since spared and many a child has long since been spoiled in that home where "the baby is the head of the family," because the father has abdicated his authority and the mother has forgotten that under God she stands at the head in the home.

These disorders within the spheres that women dominate cannot be cured by creating new ones within those departments under the rightful control of men; they must be cured by protecting the family as the unit of society.

MARTHA MOORE AVERY.

No Compromise with Heresy

RECENTLY a correspondent asked the readers of AMERICA to believe in the sincerity of the religious conviction of Anglicans. This appeal may be acted on, provided we remember that such sincerity is founded on error, and that the tenacity with which members of the Anglican or any other church cling to error, no matter what may be its subjective characteristic, is something that in itself is wrong. It is not inconceivable that they do not see, either by reason of ignorance or traditional prejudice, that they are rejecting Christ's doctrines and so insulting the Divine Majesty; but their excuse does not change the fact. It is some palliation for the insult, but the insult remains. The heretic may be well-meaning, and devoted to Christ; but this is in spite of his heresy; heresy itself must always be held in abhorrence. It is with heretics and heresy as with sinners and sin: we may love the individual, but we must hate the evil.

Anglicans have protested against the reluctance which the Catholic Church has shown to meet their overtures of peace. They have held out the olive branch, but the Church has not been willing to accept it. This has caused both pain and surprise. They think they are so much nearer to us than others, and they hold with us so many more of what they call the "fundamental doctrines"; yet our attitude toward them is scarcely less cold than that toward those who are worlds removed from Catholicism in spirit, practice and belief. Our attitude, however, is logical. It is a necessary consequence of our absolute loyalty to Christ. He demands complete submission to His Word, an unrestricted acceptance of the whole of His revealed doctrine. Therefore His Church, both in her hierarchy and in her members, demands the same. There can be, and must be, no compromising with heresy.

Heretics are alike in this, that they reject the Word of Christ. This is the head and front of their offending, the long and short of their error. That they reject, some of them more of the Divine Word, and others less, is a question merely of detail. They are at one and on a par in the fundamental mistake that they are unto themselves the arbiters of their own belief. Doctrines that appeal to them they accept, of the rest they will have nothing; and thus at their own sweet will they pick and choose between Christ's doctrines, building their faith not on the rock of Divine Revelation but on the shifting sand of their own weak understanding. Thus the Anabaptists, for instance, find themselves in accord with Christ on the necessity of good works, but in disagreement with Him on the matter of Baptism. They hold Baptism to be a mere figurative rite; Christ's view of it as a Sacrament and a channel of supernatural grace they do not approve. Quakers are with Christ in laying great stress on the necessity of the interior life, but they set up their judgment against His in the matter of the ministry of teaching. Lutherans reverence Christ's words in so far as they are committed to writing, reserving meanwhile to themselves the right to understand them as they please, but they have nothing but scorn for that Word as handed on, according to Christ's own directions, by the living voice of divinely constituted teachers, and officially interpreted with infallible truth by the Christ-appointed medium of the Apostles and their successors.

So, too, is it in a measure with the Anglicans. They have "certain tremendous convictions, such as the necessity of Apostolic Succession, the Real Presence of Christ in the Blessed Sacrament, the Eucharistic Sacrifice . . . and innumerable others"; but they repudiate Christ's doctrine of the Papal Supremacy. They are nearer to Christ than are the members of certain other sects, at least in the sense that they have the consolation of believing a greater number of His saving doctrines. Unfortunately, however, this greater proximity still leaves them outside the Fold; in the essential act of heresy they are as far away as the rest. For they, no less than the others choose from among Christ's doctrines, accepting and rejecting at their pleasure.

Christ said, "Going therefore teach all nations. . . . Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you" (Matt. xxviii: 19-20). Now one of the things that Christ commanded was the universal headship over the Church of St. Peter and his successors. This the Anglicans reject. They will not admit it. They will not observe it. They refuse to believe it. To other things that Christ taught they are willing to give assent, but that the Pope is the Rock, the foundation stone on which Christianity is built; against this they set their face. They were not present when Christ said to Peter: "And I say to thee: That thou art Peter; and upon this rock I will build my Church." And like St. Thomas, they say, "I will not believe." Because of his affection for his brave follower, but more especially because of His desire to add circumstantial proof of His Resurrection, the Saviour did condescend to the arbitrary laying down of conditions on the part of His doubting Apostle; but He reprobated the attitude of doubt and said, "Be not faithless but believing." Thomas believed everything except the Resurrection, and he was called faithless. The Anglicans believe everything, let us suppose, but the Papal Supremacy. With what word would Christ characterize them were He to appear to them and enlighten them? No doubt many Anglicans are sincere, and deny the Papal Supremacy only out of ignorance, because they do not know that this doctrine belongs to the deposit of Faith. Those who are of this state of mind are not formal heretics, they are not guilty of malice. But neither their ignorance nor their absence of malice alters the objective fact that they do reject one of Christ's doctrines, and that, therefore, they are in material heresy. How far they may be guilty of sin in not making a thorough investigation into the motives of credibility which the Catholic Church adduces for faith in this tenet of Christianity, is a question which must depend for its solution on the circumstances of each individual case. It is impossible to escape the conviction that many Anglicans are in good faith, and the determination as to how far their ignorance is culpable may well be left to God; but this is the most that can be said even for the most sincere. Objectively they are in error, nor can all the sincerity in the world change the lamentable truth, that whereas Christ says, "Thou art Peter: and upon this rock I will build my Church," Anglicans, one and all, say this, "I will not believe."

J. HARDING FISHER, S. J.

The Church and Birth Control

IN a recent issue of a popular magazine a Protestant clergyman expresses his frank agreement with the doctrine of the Catholic Church on the subject of family limitation, and his earnest hope that this doctrine will prevail throughout society. He believes, however, that the Church should go further. He would have her promote race betterment by refusing to sanction marriages of the unfit, and encourage large families by raising her voice in favor of a better distribution of wealth.

The marriage of defective and subnormal persons is a very complex subject, and therefore cannot be adequately treated in a short article. The most that can be done here is to say a word on each of the more important phases of the question. In the first place, the Church always looks upon the spiritual and moral side of individuals and institutions as much more important than their physical aspects or consequences. She regards marriage as a considerable aid to right living in the case of the majority of persons, and she thinks of the offspring not merely as a more or less perfect organism, but as a person possessing a spiritual and immortal soul. Hence she desires that the individual should have the fullest practicable and reasonable liberty with regard to marriage; she counts the earthly existence of a helpless cripple, a chronic invalid, or a mental weakling intrinsically good, and she knows that all such persons are capable of a life of eternal happiness face to face with God. Consequently her viewpoint is infinitely removed from that of those practical atheists who measure the worth of a subnormal person by the same standard that they apply to a dog or a horse. While the Church is not unmindful of the interests of society and the welfare of the race, she is not yet convinced that these have been sufficiently endangered to justify her in denying to large classes of individuals the rights and privileges of normal life. As a matter of fact, "the welfare of the race" is in the minds of the majority of persons who use the phrase a mere abstraction that corresponds to no definite idea; or it means the welfare of the fortunate majority who do not desire the inconvenience of helping to support any considerable number of defectives.

In conformity with her doctrines concerning the right of the individual to marry, the worth of the human person, and the sacredness of the human soul, the Church has never established any impediment to matrimony on the mere ground of the kind of offspring that might be expected to result. She sanctioned the marriage of lepers even when the social presence of such persons was looked upon as a grave danger to the community. While she forbids the marriage of insane persons, the reason is not to be found in the quality of the children, but in the fundamental circumstance that the parents are incapable of making a binding contract.

Now this position of the Church is entirely reasonable, and in the long run socially beneficial. Suppose that the Church were willing to forbid the marriage of all defectives on the ground that their offspring would be subnormal. Two question would then arise. What is a defective? And what kinds of defectiveness are hereditary? Some of the eugenists would favor so broad an interpretation of defectiveness as to take in a very large proportion of the population, probably a majority of our ordinary, undistinguished citizens. They would include all those classes that they are pleased to call "inferior types," restricting the privilege of marriage to the superman and superwoman. This would be a fine thing for society, that is, for the supermen and superwomen, who alone would constitute society! However, let us assume that a rational definition of defectiveness were adopted, that only those persons would be included who were in a very pronounced way subnormal, either physically, mentally, or morally. We should then be confronted with the second question. Do these persons really transmit their disabilities to their offspring? In the midst of the enormous ignorance, the absurd exaggeration, and the conflicting opinions surrounding this question, the ordinary person hesitates to set down any definite answer. Nevertheless, there are three propositions which, if not absolutely conclusive, are at present incapable of disproof. First, the only hereditary mental defects are insanity and feeblemindedness; second, the only physical defects of any significance that are even probably handed down by the generative process are alcoholic degeneration and the deterioration resulting from certain chronic venereal diseases; third, there is not sufficient evidence to create even a slight probability that moral degeneracy as such is transmissible to the offspring.

In this situation the present attitude of the Church toward the marriage of the "unfit" is clearly the only prudent, fair, and reasonable attitude. The more pronounced victims of feeblemindedness are either segregated from society, and therefore prevented from marrying by the State, or their condition is so obvious that, even should they be capable of a contract, not many of them would enter upon it. After all, it is possible for the clergy to discourage and prevent undesirable unions by the exercise of common sense and tact in individual cases, without the need or aid of a rigid ecclesiastical prohibition. This would be done. And in the present unsatisfactory state of our knowledge on the whole subject of heredity, this informal method of dealing with certain and pronounced cases of feeblemindedness is both fair to the individual and sufficiently effective for the interests of society. The less pronounced cases of feeblemindedness should be given the benefit of the presumption that these persons have a right to marry, and that the amount of mental defectiveness which they will transmit is not of serious social importance. As to the only other classes involved; namely, alcoholic and venereal degenerates, they would certainly be strongly discouraged from marrying by any priest, not so much on account of the assumed transmissibility of these defects as for the sake of the welfare and happiness of the married persons themselves.

It is not impossible that the Church may some day institute a new matrimonial impediment which will exclude those whose union is a social danger. But it is certain that she will take no such step until the laws of heredity are much better understood than they are at present, and the danger to society from inherited defects is much greater both in depth and in volume than it appears to be in the light of existing scientific information. She has had a long history, and has witnessed the rise and fall of innumerable social theories; hence she is disposed to be cautious and patient, to submit each new proposal to the rigorous test of adequate knowledge and experience, and to refuse to be stampeded into making radical changes in her legislation at the behest of every novel theory that proclaims itself to be scientific. And it is well for both the individual and the race that she is thus cautious and conservative, aye, and scientific in the true sense of that term. It is well that she refuses to take theories for established facts in such a vital matter as the liberty of the individual to fulfil one of the two primary demands of his nature. It is better to concede too much to individual liberty than to exaggerate the interests and claims of society. The latter course leads inevitably to the aggrandizement of one section of the population at the expense of another section, and to such a volume of dissension, lawlessness, social expense, and individual demoralization as to leave the latter state of society worse than the first. How easily disregard of individual rights and hasty generalizations concerning the welfare of society may issue in mistaken and harmful legislation, is seen in the movement for the sterilization of defectives and habitual criminals. Within the last ten years several of our States have enacted laws to carry out this extremely radical proposal. Yet the best scientific opinion now holds, in the words of Professor Ellwood (The Social Problem, p. 129) that this "is a dangerous or at least a questionable law."

A considerable proportion of the public easily assumes that certain things are conclusively proved just because somebody who pretends to have expert knowledge asserts that they are true, and calls them "scientific." One of the most ludicrous and amazing instances of this shallowness is furnished by "Judge" Henry Neil, who is glorified in certain quarters as the "Father of Mothers' Pensions." He maintains that these pensions should be extended to deserted wives because only bad fathers desert, and society should not desire bad fathers to remain with their wives and beget feebleminded children! (The Public, Oct. 8, 1915). The learned Judge calmly assumes that the kind of badness which impels husbands to desert is a species of feeblemindedness, and that it is hereditary. No doubt his assumption is based upon some solemn assertion to this effect by some pretended expert, and no doubt many other superficial persons will adopt the same view because it has been dogmatically voiced by Judge Neil. Let us thank God that the mind of the Church is more critical and scientific!

Concerning the duty of the Church to "raise her voice for a more equitable distribution," in order that all parents may have the means to bring up a family of normal size, two points deserve brief consideration. First the rearing of a large family is, indeed, a grievous hardship in the case of a large section of our working people, and it is the duty of the Church to proclaim, and as far as practicable to enforce the moral right of all such persons to the economic requisites of decent family life. But the Church has done and is doing this very thing. It is now almost a quarter of a century since Pope Leo XIII laid down the doctrine that the laborer has a strict natural right to a wage that will enable him to live in reasonable and frugal comfort; and the document in which he published this teaching indicates in more than one place that the Pope had in mind the needs of a family, not merely the personal needs of the laboring head of the family. Were this teaching heeded no parent could truthfully assert that he was limiting the size of his family on account of economic necessity. That the doctrine has not been so widely and continuously disseminated and followed as it should have been, is unhappily true; but we must bear in mind that the application of it to concrete cases is often extremely difficult, and that our industrial organization is bewilderingly complex. In the meantime more and more is being done to give publicity and effect to this far-reaching truth that all who labor have a moral right to the goods that are necessary for reasonable family life. Our ecclesiastical seminaries, and colleges, and universities are giving courses of instruction on social questions, study clubs and lectures on the same subject are increasing in number and scope, and day by day the number of persons is rapidly growing who are coming to realize that a better distribution of the world's goods is of vital moral importance.

In the second place, it is easily possible to exaggerate the relation between a decent livelihood and decent conjugal conditions. As a matter of fact, the abominable practices that make for race suicide are much more in vogue among those persons that have sufficient goods for reasonable living than among those who are below this level. Not the desire to live decently but the desire to live luxuriously and indolently, is the main force impelling men and women to these disgusting devices. So far as such persons are concerned, a better distribution of goods would not improve matters at all. On the other hand, if all the workers were in receipt of decent wages, and if they were to adopt contraceptive devices in the same proportion as the middle classes and the rich, the evil that we deplore would be more widespread by far than it is at present. The plain truth is that the evil is fundamentally moral rather than economic. It has its roots in a wrong view of life, and of what constitutes a worthy and reasonable life. This false philosophy of life can be eradicated only by sound moral education, and one of the most effective elements in such an education is the unyielding teaching and attitude of the Church.

JOHN A. RYAN, D.D.

Catholic English Hymnals

A WRITER in the London Tablet some few years ago had occasion to treat of Catholic hymnals in the English language, and his brief but pithy judgment was summed up in the opinion that they were "a sorry lot." At the first hearing the judgment seems a trifle unkind even though true; but after all, granting that they were "a sorry lot," it is worth while considering whether this is to be counted to their glory or to their shame. For I am of the secret opinion that however just the above stricture may be regarding the majority of hymn books we have nowadays, and even the most zealous enthusiast must admit that the poetic quality of most of our hymns is not above reproach, formerly, say fifty or more years ago, the matter was on quite a different footing, and the inferiority of English Catholic hymnals so far from being a reproach had, in this very mediocrity, something bordering on the heroic; and not without reason. There is always this much of consolation, and perhaps it occurred to these earlier hymnologists: the Beatitudes nowhere say: "Blessed are the versifiers: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven," but they do say very unmistakably: "Blessed are they who suffer persecution for justice' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven"; and the connection between persecution for justice' sake and the poor quality of the English Catholic hymnals is a very real connection.

Whatever may be the opinion of the literary critics, and like less-favored folk who have to justify their existence, the story of English Catholic hymnology will be found to be written, not in printer's ink, but in blood, and in blood of no less dignity than that of the martyrs. It is conceivable that in some literary nightmare utopia, where none but the efficient might gain admittance, that mediocre hymnology might very properly lead the perpetrators to the rack and to the gallows; it is conceivable. On the other hand, the noticeable inefficiency of the vernacular hymnody that prevailed among English-speaking Catholics was directly due to the fact that the confessors for the Faith were too busily occupied in suffering persecution to be able to give their full attention to poetic diction.

So, to trace the real reason for the poor quality of these

English Catholic hymns we must shift the scene from America to Ireland and England. From May 4, 1535 when the Carthusians suffered for the Faith at Tyburn, down to July 1, 1681, when the Venerable Archbishop of Armagh, Oliver Plunket, was the last to receive the martyr's crown, there was, except for the brief reign of Mary, a succession of confessors for the Faith. The Catholic religion was proscribed, and to be apprehended for being a Catholic meant to suffer the penalty for treason; and that was to be drawn on a hurdle to the gallows, and there to be hanged and quartered. But in spite of this, the Faith never died out. Mass was said in secret, and the Faithful risked their lives and their possessions rather than deny their religion. The Faith was driven underground, so to speak, and the ready ear of the priest-hunter would have been acute to public worship and hymn singing. It was not until 1829 at the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Act, that even civil rights were allowed to Catholics.

The Catholics of Ireland were, if anything, in a worse plight than their brethren in England. For not only was the Faith proscribed, but the Irish language was forbidden; so the conditions were favorable for the utter suppression of a popular hymnody. Here and there, however, we find that this age of persecution actually did produce some of the finest Catholic hymns in English, but they are few.

These were external conditions, but there were others. The Catholics of Britain and Ireland did not go into exile, did not risk their lives and their property, to assert the right of a human being to sing hymns as he feels moved. Had their devotion been more to poetry than to principle they might have had less to suffer. But they suffered persecution for the sake of the Mass, and the supremacy of the Chief Pastor who is its guardian; and when the age of persecution had passed they stood forth strong in the Faith even if their poetry was a bit shaky.

And so, these early Catholic hymnals in English do not represent, as many would pretend, the intellectual poverty into which "Papists" had fallen; rather they stand for the first efforts of a persecuted people to whom the schools and universities had been closely shut for centuries, now, at last, allowed to practise their religion with a little less of intolerance. It is worth while noticing too, that from Catholic Ireland has come the finest Catholic hymnal in English, "The Armagh Hymnal," compiled by an Irishman, and published in Dublin.

The literary reputation of the Catholic Church, fortunately, does not depend upon hymns in the vernacular. Actually, the Church possesses the finest treasury of sacred poetry that the world has ever seen: this is the Latin hymnody contained in the Missal and Breviary. The treasury was greater and more precious than it is, but many poems have been displaced in the various reforms through which the liturgy has passed. These hymns and sequences which no longer find a place in the liturgical Office are fortunately still in existence, though they no longer form part of the official worship of the Church.

The Latin hymns and proses which are scattered throughout the Roman and other Missals and Breviaries make up a perfect collection of sacred verse suited for every day and festival of the ecclesiastical year. Many are translated into English, and many more might be so translated to the general advantage. Catholic scholars might very well concentrate their efforts on the translation of the liturgical hymns of the Church, rather than on the increase of what is largely very inferior verse; for the work of translation offers scope to poetic genius no less than originality.

But "The times change and we with them": the English hymns of the Emancipation period were the humble glowings of the dawn of the Second Spring, their mediocrity is swallowed up in the dark night of persecution whence they emerged. For us there is not the excuse. Charity may well cover a multitude of sins; but the interests of charity are not always best served by stretching piety to become a cloak for very poor poetry. "The Church," says Dom Pothier in his work on the Gregorian Chant, "has ever shown herself the protectress and foster-mother of the arts; bringing them together in her liturgy as in a common meeting-place." Had the learned Benedictine's studies led him to study Catholic English hymnals he would no doubt have felt the need for discrimination between liturgical and non-liturgical works, at least so far as the art of poetry is concerned.

HENRY C. WATTS.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

Public Spirit in San Francisco

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a spirit of friendly controversy I should like to make a few remarks concerning the paragraph that appeared in your "Note and Comment" for October 2, on "Moral Conditions at the Panama Exposition." Without attempting to disprove the statements made by Bascom Johnson concerning the moral turpitude of my native city, I think it only fair to say that there is, in my opinion, no city on the earth where the government is more dominated by Catholic influence than San Francisco. Our present Mayor, though not a Catholic, is largely supported by Catholic citizens. His three immediate predecessors were Catholics. The Chief of Police is a member of a most devout Catholic family, and had for predecessors in the office a long line of Catholics. Our School Board is half composed of Catholics and in other public offices the Church is well represented. If public opinion tolerates the indecencies mentioned by Mr. Johnson, it also tolerates open-air Mass, rosary processions in the streets, and suspension of public business on the day of a Catholic Archbishop's funeral.

San Francisco. S. C. BURNETT.

Woman Suffrage

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your September 11 issue, a pathetic recital is given of woman's work in New England mills, factories and canneries, of her low wage, the inadequate provisions made for her safety, her long hours and other ills. "Have these 200,000 women and children willingly left the fireside and the home?" is asked. Very many did. Nor is it true that the factories absorbed the work previously done in the home. The fact is that hundreds of women who had never had to work or were supporting themselves by domestic service rushed from the home. They were eager to do any work for the "unjust male" for long hours and at a low wage rather than do housework for themselves or other women. They do not want to be servants, but ladies; they would rather toil in mill, factory or shop than do "menial tasks." The problem of domestic help as a consequence has become one of the most exasperating and imperative that a housekeeper and mother has to face. It is almost an impossibility nowadays to get any young or middle-aged woman of sufficient decency and refinement for work in a home where there are young children.

In olden times no stigma of disgrace rested on the performance of household tasks. The housemaid of early colonial days was often of the same social standing as the mistress of the home, and enjoyed a position above that of the factory girl now. What has made "housework" so unendurable to the "finer feelings" of the young woman of today whose ancestors for generations were of the serving class? I firmly believe that it is natural for the average normal woman to want to marry, to have children, and to prefer the fireside and home to any other sphere in the world. The noble women who voluntarily relinquish these natural desires of the feminine heart, in order to devote their lives to prayer and works of mercy are worthy of all honor. But the women who remain single because wifehood and motherhood offer too "limited" a sphere for their abilities, or who leave the fireside because they detest its duties and prefer to do a man's work, do not belong to this honored class. Why have so many women apparently lost a normal woman's natural desires and ambitions?

Is not woman's invasion of man's "sphere" of business and her "superior" attitude toward housework in the last fifty years, due to her former invasion into man's sphere of education? Our forefathers opposed co-education and the "higher education" for women, maintaining it "would tend to break up the home and unsex women." But the women got it; as they always will if they persist long enough. Two results are a few women college professors, who are no improvement on the men, and an army of high-strung, neurasthenic spinsters. Another result is a tremendous flood of "impossible" fiction written by women, which has created more absurd "society notions" than it would be possible for this generation to appreciate. Also it has led women to treat "their suffering sister-woman" so that she "would rather walk the streets than work for them," inspired a distaste for housework in their daughters, and increased the cost of living. The entrance of women into the men's spheres of commerce and science has driven thousands of men from their jobs, reduced the average wage for men, made it harder for a married man to support his family, extremely difficult for a young man to marry, unfitted young girls to become the wives of young men of their own class, added to the ever-growing army of the unemployed and it has created the domestic help problem.

Now the women plan a third invasion; this time into the men's sphere of politics. The history of the world has been that women can get whatever they want if they try hard enough, and the granting of the franchise is, doubtless, only a question of time. What possible result can it have but infinitely to complicate an already too-complex civilization; and to make the lot of the suffering sister-woman almost impossible of amelioration?

Lansdowne, Pa. E. C.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A feminine advocate of woman suffrage, in your issue of October 9, states that "'Woman's place is the home' as a shibboleth for the 'antis' has been shattered by the fact that nine millions are toiling outside the home, most of them not of their own free will, but by compulsion," supplementing this initial effort with a whole column of descriptive verbiage which with little change, could be used by any rabid Prohibitionist, Socialist, or any other ultra-modern faddist. Because nine million women are toiling outside the home; therefore the truth that "woman's place is, or should be, the home" has been shattered. What transcendent logic! In all seriousness I ask, is not this seeing things backward, mistaking an effect for a cause?

Still another valiant daughter of the cause, in the October Catholic World, opens the skirmish by informing us that the diversity of opinion among Catholics regarding the merits of woman suffrage rests upon our forgetfulness "that the bond which unites us is purely ethical." How profound! yet subtly materialistic. If that bond were "purely ethical" then there would be no Catholic Church today. Later on we learn that "the closer we examine, the plainer does it appear that what is fallaciously called Feminism is in reality a powerful impulse toward Catholic ideals and a Catholic code of morals." This might be true if the "movement" were not controlled and shaped by its non-Catholic majority, whose leadership the small Catholic minority will have to follow. A few lines further on, the writer herself admits that "in every country Catholic Feminists have gone into the movement, not as Catholics [Italics mine], but as believers in what we now call votes for women and have joined the nearest organization." In other words Catholics have joined a non-Catholic organization that involves moral issues, with the admitted preliminary of, at least, a negative participation.

The democratic movement initiated by the great French Revolution, for the abolition of the intolerable absolutism consequent upon the pretended Reformation, was largely a Catholic movement, but we know how quickly it was turned against the Church into a bloody persecution, and repulsing all attempts at Christianization has now, almost, run to seed. A little while later the Socialist Movement, likewise largely a Catholic arrangement of society in its broad and benevolent aspects, and in its purpose to counteract a greedy capitalism, soon escaped from the molding influence of the Church, until today, in its world-wide ramifications, it is comparable to the Black Death which, during the fourteenth century, threatened to strangle the nations of Europe. The devil is keeping up to date, and the subtlety of his cunning threatens to deceive even the elect.

We have, during the past year, become sufficiently educated to watch the clash of these two sharply opposed Weltanschauungen, world-view points, in almost every incident that crops up in the larger events now taking place, and it is my conviction that as that crowning "movement" proceeds, so will these incidental agitations and movements clamor more loudly for recognition. The progressive movement of the whole is not even to be thought of; everything seems dark and hopeless; but as to the final victory there can be no shadow of doubt. Meanwhile, however, we have our own part of the work to accomplish, and while the chosen agencies will do their duty without anyone's little reminder, as is evidenced by the stand your esteemed publication has taken, yet we can each of us hasten events, make victory a little more complete, by realizing the relative import of seemingly disconnected phenomena, and acting accordingly. Let me add in conclusion, though it may be superfluous to you and sound foolish to others, that contemporary events in a Southern country, no less than our own anti-Catholic "movement," are not unconnected with the larger events referred to; they betray the tail of the serpent, so to speak.

St. Paul. B. M. K.

Catholic Writers' Syndicate

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A plethora of criticism, some of it just, some of it unjust, directed at the Catholic press, has been followed by a contribution from Michael Williams which offers something constructive. Permit the news-editor of a diocesan Catholic weekly, who realizes that Mr. Williams has written something worth while, to voice a word of approval of the points that he made in his article in your issue of October 16. The two points made by Mr. Williams strike the right note. A syndicate, such as he describes, is the thing needed to add the strength now missing in the Catholic press of the United States. Further, no one realizes the need more than those responsible for the make-up of the diocesan weeklies. The Catholic Press Association has been working, I am told, for five years to bring about just such a condition as he describes. A Roman letter, a Washington letter, a European letter and a Roman cablegram are the results of their efforts. Occasional stories, usually not suitable for the publication to which they are submitted, are another result. Good poetry and healthy toned articles by Catholic essayists of note are yet to come. The formation of a strong syndicate, supplying news features, literary features or cartoons, is admittedly a desideratum.

It has never been my privilege to attend a meeting of the Catholic Press Association. My readings of voluminous reports convince me, however, that the delegates have given much time to the matters outlined by Mr. Williams. Each year has seen a step further. Might it be too much to suggest that Mr. Williams submit his plans to the next meeting of the Catholic Press Association. We have no guarantee that a new "syndicate" formed now would immediately become a success. It would first have to travel the hard road that the C. P. A. traveled, for Mr. Williams' plan, though highly meritorious, has no more merit than the ideal which the various Catholic editors had before them when they met to form the association. It might be said, as a matter of fact, that his plan is precisely the basis of their combination. Incidentally, I would remark, the editor of AMERICA is the vice-president of the C. P. A.

Brooklyn. JOSEPH A. CUMMINGS.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the article, "A Catholic Writers' Syndicate," Mr. Michael Williams in AMERICA for October 16, precedes his final interrogation with a neat sketch of a journalistic "pool." The plan of obtaining contributions from Catholic artists and authors for syndication at nominal prices is a good one, and quite feasible. But the difficulty is that many of our Catholic papers are not hungry for literary assistance, either volunteer or regular. Certain of our papers are merely vehicles for personal opinion expressed in language not always free from the charge of flippancy. The primal purpose of a Catholic press is only a stereotype for such editors. They would hardly fully appreciate the nominal-price contributions from the clearing-house, and the nominal price itself would not pass unchallenged.

Just now, we who are not wealthy can help our favorite Catholic periodicals in a small way by accepting the invitations of "keyed," or "send-a-postal to advertisers" whose product appeals to us, mentioning in correspondence that the advertisement was read in the periodical. The fact that this is a small way of helping should be sufficient warrant for its efficacy. Only one in the advertising business knows what satisfaction both advertiser and editor derive from such "results." Take the tip, look through the general "ads," and, if invited to correspond regarding a commodity you desire, do so, mentioning the paper. Then you may very creditably be convinced that you have assisted the Catholic press.

Brooklyn. J. B. K.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Allow me to express my appreciation of the plan outlined by Mr. Michael Williams, in your issue of October 16, for the improvement of the Catholic press in this country. It is surprising his suggestion did not meet with instantaneous and enthusiastic approval, since the scheme he unfolds commends itself at once for its simplicity and the ease with which it can be carried into execution. Mr. Williams points the way to a veritable gold mine hitherto undeveloped, on which the returns will be large for a very small investment. Or rather, he advocates the institution of a central bank in which the gold of Catholic thought can be stored for the enriching of the Catholic press in this country. Mr. Williams has shown clearly how Catholic editors can be of the greatest assistance to one another. "A brother that is helped by his brother is like a strong city," and his experience in the camp of the enemy is now turned to good advantage. Fas est et ab hoste doceri.

The most striking feature of his scheme, it seems to me, is that in its adoption there would be everything to gain and nothing to lose. All he asks of Catholic editors is a little self-sacrifice and generosity. These certainly are not lacking, since even now nearly every Catholic paper in the United States is largely dependent on the spirit of self-sacrifice and zeal of its editors. Besides editorial writers there are a host of Catholic laymen most ready with their pens and zealous for the interests of the Church, who would most willingly send in their contributions if they knew in what way they could be of service, and if the central bureau, which Mr. Williams proposes, were once established. AMERICA has abundantly proved in the "Communications" columns the existence of a surprisingly large number of most intelligent and interesting Catholic writers.

New York. A. B.

Winning America for the Church

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your editorial anent "Winning America for the Church," in AMERICA for September 25, should not be let pass without further comment. In fact it might well provide the tocsin for a much needed offensive in an almost new direction. As that western Bishop intimates, our present system contains in it the germ of trouble, and long-continued persecution. In comparison with the well-known, Christ-given, conquering spirit of the Church, the present American Catholic mind is, to a great extent, introspective, inactive, dormant; and the tide must turn, or formidable foes will rise to crush us on every side. Zealous missionaries came to our shores at the outset of American civilization. They worked hard among the Indians and gained a goodly harvest of souls. Immigration then poured its steady stream upon our land. The Church said: "I must take care of these children, lest they perish." She has been taking care of them ever since. The task has been a big one, and, in the meantime the working-out spirit has been overlooked and forgotten. For us the units of God's family include Catholics only, the rest are not brothers, they are strangers. We are in the reservation; they are outside the palings. The Church in America has reached the incipient stages of starvation. But now the wise friend appears, a sort of composite personification of AMERICA, the Missionary, etc., sounding the alarm. We trust that Catholics will awaken from their lethargy, get to work, and tackle the big job of outflanking those 82,000,000 outsiders.

Why is South America predominantly Catholic today? Because the Church there, without neglecting the millions of Spanish and Portuguese settlers who flocked to that continent, went on penning up the red and the black sheep and now, down there, we have but one fold and one shepherd. Of course we know that the situation here is not exactly the same; for the Church in the United States has had and is having a great struggle to care adequately for Catholic immigration. But the point is this: we do not show toward our Protestant neighbors the same zeal the Spaniards and Portuguese manifest toward the Indian and the Negro. The Church will not accomplish God's work in His way until it places all of the people of America on an equal footing and gives to each soul the kind of food necessary for a proper sustenance. If Catholics to a man will get this viewpoint then we shall have nothing to fear, for God will be with us. Zeal will possess us.

The "Question-Box," the "Catholic's Ready Answer," and such books will grace the table of every Catholic, and of many non-Catholics. We shall flood the country with our literature. Missionaries to non-Catholics will have permanent positions, missions for non-Catholics will be the event of each year in every parish in the country, and every lay-man will be taught to see in every non-Catholic friend or neighbor a possible convert. This spirit will be instilled in the Catholic school; discussed at the supper-table and debated in the halls of the Catholic society. Then the Church Militant, true to its glorious traditions and true to the call of the Master to go forth and teach all nations, will gradually but surely conquer.

Pine bluff. Ark. JOHN J. ALBERT.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

By What Authority?

DISSENSION has divided the Mission Board of the Protestant Episcopal Church, on the question of accrediting delegates to the Panama Missionary Conference. The dissension is based upon something far more serious than a mildly acid academic debate on the official style of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Principles are at stake; principles that are fundamental. Is the Protestant Episcopal Church what its name implies; or is "Protestant" merely a party term forced upon the Catholic Church by usurping and persecuting legislators? Are the communicants of this Church Catholics or are they Protestants? Is there an authority in this Church, incapable of error in matters of faith and morals, which can command absolute and unquestioning submission to its decisions; or is the individual to be guided solely by those operations of the Holy Spirit within his soul, known to himself alone and judged by himself alone, to be infallible?

Bishop Weller believes that the Protestant Episcopal Church is not Protestant but Catholic. The Board of Missions and the majority of the communicants of the Church in question, believe with equal sincerity that the Protestant Episcopal Church is not Catholic but Protestant. The Bishop is correct in holding that the South Americans may rightly ask the American missionaries first to set their own houses in order by the repudiation of so grave a moral and social menace as divorce; but even this is a matter of purely secondary importance. Bishop Weller approached the heart of the question more nearly when he asked the Board, "Is this Church Catholic or Protestant, and which do you wish it to be?" Until the Protestant Episcopal Church can settle its mind on this question, it is the merest trifling to build up arguments on the validity of Orders, and the sin of communicating with heretics and schismatics. By what authority does the Protestant Episcopal Church, or any faction or party within it, presume to bind and loose the souls of men? The corporate body known as the Protestant Episcopal Church in America can never furnish a satisfactory answer. By its own profession, whatever response it may give is subject to error.

Cosmic Spray

CAN you make your mind reverberate? If you cannot, you can hope for no part in the Cosmic Mind, which is a concentration of the multitudinous reverberation of countless Individual Minds; you are even less than the spray of the Cosmic Surge as it breaks on the sands of Time. These sad reflections, borrowed from a Monist pamphlet, show that we are not living, as we thought, in an age of "jaded disillusion." There are still choice souls among us, bearing about them some faint glow of the Götterdämmerung of the mid-Victorian era; gentle souls who eschew all violence and lead the world into the ways of peace by the lure of art, particularly music. Like this, for instance:

> Let us preach Peace; talk Peace; think Peace; and SING Peace. Let us establish in the Cosmic Mind a powerful Thought Wave that shall overcome the force of the cannon, or the destruction of the dreaded shell. Let every village, town and city call together, with fife and drum, every singer that can sing, and every musician that can play, and let us have wonderful musical performances and Peace Festivals everywhere. For as sure as the fife and drum and the brass band lead to the slaughter, so sure will the Cosmic Mind, thus attuned to Peace by this Musical Demonstration, end this terrible slaughter.

But art is ever impractical. May not these "Musical Demonstrations" simply transfer the seat of war from Europe to our own fair land? One shudders to think of the invasion of such peaceful communities as Crab Orchard, Kentucky, and Tombstone, Arizona, by these devastating bands. True, this modern peacemaker would engage only singers who can sing and musicians who can play; but who will sit in judgment? Wars shall long have ceased before a musician admits that he is not perfect. A Socialistic brother who has poured out his soul in criticism of this pamphlet, scoffs at prayer as a means of world-pacification, but the remedy which he in turn offers is a kind of Trojan horse, filled with all eager creators of strife.

Leaving Out the Accents

WHEN the women of England first went up to Oxford to study classics at the newly-opened women's college in that University, they are said to have inflicted untold tortures on professors and other learned dons by writing their Greek without putting in any accents at all. But the Hellenic tortures inflicted by the university woman of the later Victorian era in England, are easily paralleled by the theological stabbings and thrusts perpetrated by the same gentle hand of woman in the New York newspapers.

The versatile Mrs. Wilcox, for example, is seldom at a loss for a phrase; but even she, like the English women with their Greek accents, sometimes sets down on paper things that give one the creeps. For instance, she had occasion some days ago to protest against the persecution of the Jews. And to prove that the non-acceptance of the Divinity of Christ could not be the dominating factor in the treatment served out to the Hebraic peoples, she said:

> A large percentage of church members believe Christ to have been the highest expression of divinity which the earth has known, and believe His example to be the one to follow: but they do not believe in the immaculate conception. (sic.)

That is true. Church members of the type to which Mrs. Wilcox refers do not believe in the Immaculate Conception, nor, for that matter, do they believe in many another article of the Christian Faith. So it is all the more curious that the writer should pick out from the whole compendium of Catholic theology a dogma that has been declared to be de fide only during the past century, and then announce as a palliation for the Jews that the members of the different Protestant sects do not believe it. The actual truth is this: like the Hellenistic ladies, Mrs. Wilcox got it all mixed up. The Immaculate Conception about which she writes is not the Immaculate Conception at all, but what has come to be known among Protestants as the "Virgin Birth"; and the point to which the lady wishes to draw attention is the fact that many "Christian church members" have no more Christianity than the unbelieving Jew. Just like newspaper scribes, who really mean to express some kind of sense! But, alas! they leave out the accents, and sense becomes nonsense.

Less a Sacrament?

"MARRIAGE," says a Modernistic writer for the magazines, "is much more a contract than a Sacrament." Then he rests from his heavy intellectual labor; his work is done; he has upset an institution of Christ by one short, crisp sentence. So he thinks at least. Fortunately the Sacraments are not so easily destroyed; they rest on Christ's unchanging word and stand firm despite the vagaries of lawless minds and the high winds of many doctrines. What Christ has joined together, no man may put asunder. Enactments, legal or otherwise, can no more separate the contract from the Sacrament in the case of marriages between baptized persons, than they can grant divorce between husband and wife. The writer would have us believe that progress has repudiated the sacred character of the union between man and woman, and thrown it aside as a thing that has outlived its usefulness. Such is not the case; marriage now is what it has been ever since the days of Jesus Christ. Between infidels it never was a Sacrament, although of its nature it is something holier and more binding than a mere agreement, such as the sale of a horse or the lease of a house. The infidel marriage is a contract, but a contract of a peculiar kind. It cannot be rescinded at the will of the participants. Once contracted it is indissoluble, not less so in fact, with one exception, than if it were a Sacrament. There is, however, this grain of truth in what the Modernist says: the number of infidels is growing. Fewer are being baptized. And as Baptism, at least in one of the persons married, is a prerequisite for the reception of the Sacrament of matrimony, the number of those who do not receive this Sacrament and with it the graces to fulfil the arduous duties of married life, is constantly on the increase. No wonder, then, that violations of the rights and obligations implied in the contract are also on the increase. But the greater wonder is that there should be found persons to rejoice in this fact. Marriages between baptized persons and infidels are also becoming more numerous. If it be true that such marriages, although the greater weight of theological opinion is against this view, are in no wise sacramental, even when dispensations are granted, then it is also true that in this sense also the number of non-sacramental marriages is still more on the increase. This great danger should be a warning to those who look lightly on the intimacy that their sons and daughters are contracting with folk outside the Faith. If parents wish to be absolutely sure that their children will receive God's blessing on their marriage, and get the graces so necessary for the sanctity of married life, they must be careful to safeguard their young hearts from entanglement in affections for those who reject Christ.

"Hyphenated" Christians

"HYPHENATED" is now a weary word. The present war has caused the term to be so cruelly overworked in this country and the state of hyphenation has become so ignominious that everything points to the final disappearance of the hyphen from our language. When peace is at last made, the market will probably be flooded with dictionaries wholly innocent of that obsolete mark of punctuation, and even the words ScotchIrish and AngloSaxon will be written like that; i. e., those who wickedly pen such terms as Franco-Prussian or Latin-American will be placed under police surveillance; and those who persist in having hyphenated names or addresses engraved on their visiting cards will be deservedly visited with social ostracism.

Should the modern American's hostility to the hyphen result, however, in diminishing the number of religious bodies that are now flourishing so luxuriantly in this country, the "Great War" will have brought us at least one blessing. For the members of the 168 Protestant sects which are now in our land can justly be called "hyphenated Christians." The Adventists, for instance, have six varieties of churches ranging from the Evangelical to the Seventh-Day type. The Baptists offer an even wider selection of creeds. Those who cannot abide the Six-Principle Baptists may find peace for their souls, peradventure, in the Old-Two-Seed-in-the-Spirit-Predestinarian or in the Free Will conventicles. The Presbyterians and Methodists, moreover are by no means poor in branches. If the Primitive Methodist should find his pastor's doctrines too severe, he can attend the Free Methodist's services, and should the United Presbyterian suddenly prefer to be a Reformed follower of John Calvin, the change is easily made.

From the beginning the terms Christian and Catholic were meant to be synonymous. But early in the Church's history heresies arose, the hyphenated Christian was born, and he has increased and multiplied ever since. But the Church's unity of doctrine and government preserves her children from the sectarian punctuation mark: Catholics are the only unhyphenated christians.

Prayers of Hate

ONE of AMERICA'S correspondents sends the following extracts from a new book "of lofty and serious piety," written by a "Catholic," under the title of "The War and Life":

> My God, when I think of the enemies of my country, I am possessed by a feeling of the deepest hate. . . . They do not kill in order to conquer, but for the pleasure of killing. . . . My God, how can it be Thy will that I resist this horror which assails me, and that I shall not hate these infamous people with all my heart?

Nothing better indicates the unchristian character of the present European conflict than the fact that such passages as the foregoing are found in a book designed for the "meditation and spiritual reading" suitable just now "both for those at home and for those at the front." Without question, the ideals of the medieval warrior who fought like a gentleman and prayed like a monk are becoming obsolete. However responsible the rulers and statesmen of Europe may be for this war, the soldiers who are actually engaged in it, are conscientiously fighting for their homes and country. Surely the Frenchman loves France no less than his foe loves Germany, and both are equally ready to make every lawful sacrifice to protect and defend what they hold so dear. Both may pray that victory may attend their country's arms, but a person who deliberately asks God for the "grace" "to hate these infamous people with all my heart" is not offering a Christian's prayer at all. Rather he is seriously violating the new commandment Our Saviour gave in His Sermon on the Mount, and is mocking the holiness of God Himself. Moreover, books of this kind keep peace far off, by prolonging the reign of hate. There is no peace without good will, and where hate reigns, good will is impossible.

LITERATURE

Mexican Poets and Poetry

MEXICO had poets before the days of the Spaniards. Some of their works survive in books written in an almost forgotten tongue, which in the hands of some later translator will shed light on the character and customs of a strange race. For the most part, however, their works have been perpetuated by the troubadours who have recited and sung their crude verses for each generation, handing them down from century to century, changed and modified to some extent, but in the main retaining their original thought and form. Around the revolutionary camp-fires in Mexico today they chant odes composed in commemoration of victories of the war-lords of Montezuma.

Of the early writers of fugitive verse a few names survive, notable among them being Francisco Terrazas and Luis de Alarcon. The one whose name stands out above all others is Sor Juana Inéz de la Cruz, who is known in Mexico as "the Tenth Muse." She was born in a village near the City of Mexico, November 12, 1651. Her unusual intellectual power was manifested very early, and when only a few years old she was placed at school in the City of Mexico. Here she received all the instruction in philosophy, arts, sciences, and languages which the schools and private tutors of the capital could supply. For many years she was the central figure in the social life of the city, being maid of honor in the vice-regal court. But at the height of her intellectual and social success she entered a convent where the last twenty-six years of her life were spent in retirement. It is difficult to realize that this brilliant and gifted woman was born of a semi-barbarous race more than two centuries and a half ago. She is the most notable figure of that period, the only one, some critics maintain, whose work will survive. Her literary style is clear and simple, her themes religion and friendship.

More than half a century elapsed from the time of Sor Juana Inéz de la Cruz until the advent of a school of poets represented by Friar Manuel Martinez Navarrete, whose best known production is "La Alma Privada de la Gloria," and Joaquin Fernandi Lizardi, the author of "A Hymn to Divine Providence," and a number of short poems called "Masques." The style of these writers is lofty and pure and their subjects almost exclusively religious. To this school belong those remarkable contemporaries, Manuel Carpio and José Joaquin Pesado. They were born in neighboring provinces within a few years of one another, Carpio being a native of Vera Cruz and Pesado of Puebla. In life they were united by harmony of character and work, and in death only a few weeks divided them. Both were bereaved of a father's care early in life, and were induced by strong religious tendencies to consider an ecclesiastical career. Ultimately they found their true vocation in literature and thereby left it much enriched and adorned. Pesado's most brilliant efforts were contributed originally to religious periodicals. Carpio's first published work was an "Ode to the Virgin of Guadalupe," and all that followed was of the same profoundly religious character.

The foundations of a distinctive Mexican literature were laid half a century later by a group of writers whose leading spirits were Ignacio Ramirez, Juan Diaz Covarrubias, Augustin F. Cuenca, Ignacio M. Altamirano, Manuel M. Flores and Antonio Plaza. They came into prominence during the early turbulent years of the Republic and reflect the spirit of the times. To them possibly as much as to any others the national unrest was due. Their activities took many and varied forms. Often they were in high office under the Government, often in prison and exile. Many times the dungeon of San Juan de Ullóa opened to receive one of these indefatigable and irrepressible geniuses. They founded newspapers and organized clubs and societies. They traveled about the country lecturing to the rabble in public places, and taught the scions of noble houses in the select colleges of the metropolis.

The leaders of this group were two Indians, whose proudest boast was that not a drop of alien blood flowed in their veins. They were Ignacio M. Altamirano, a native of Guerrero, and Ignacio Ramirez, who was born in Guanajuato. These two poets present wide contrasts in personal appearance, in character and work. Threaded with delicate imagery and childlike faith, their poetry also has the strength of the race from which they sprang. In Mexico Altamirano is still designated as "the Master." The writings of Ramirez, however, though almost faultless, lack the warmth of a great soul. The dominant note in the songs of this period is patriotism. Devotion to country breathes through all that is written. The only dissenting voice is that of Antonio Plaza, who stands alone as the solitary satirist of Mexico; and has rarely been equaled in his ability to search out the secret places of the human heart, and in his subtlety of expression. He is best known by his poem: "La Voz del Invalido."

The latter-day school of Mexican poets, the pupils and followers of Ramirez and Altamirano are more numerous and more varied in theme and method. Easily first among them in the heart of the nation is Juan de Dios Peza, the poet of the home, but the most striking, the most brilliant of all is the ill-starred Manuel Acuña, who during a fit of melancholy died by his own hand at the age of twenty-four. Manuel Acuña was born in Saltillo, the capital of the State of Coahuila, in 1849. He was only fourteen years old when he went to the City of Mexico and entered school. The remainder of his life was spent in that capital, where he became one of the coterie of brilliant young men the like of which may be found only in the great cities of Europe.

The chosen friend of his heart was Juan de Dios Peza, and from Peza we learn that Acuña was addicted to fits of melancholy which ultimately led to his untimely death. Something of the tragic mood which was on him may be gathered from that most beautiful and saddest of all his poems, written but a few days before his death, "Nocturne." He also wrote a play which was produced with great success in his own country. He has been likened to Byron, to Keats, and to Poe, and his versatile genius partakes of some of the qualities of each. Today he is the first of the Spanish-American poets, and at last is being shown the appreciation which he merits.

E. C. HENDRIX.

REVIEWS

Dieu, son existence et sa nature. By Father R. GARRIGOU-LAGRANGE, O.P. Paris: Gabriel Beauchesne, 10fr.

The learned Dominican, Garrigou-Lagrange, professor of theology in the Colegio Angelico, Rome, has given life long study to the subject of God and His attributes. The article on God in the "Dictionnaire apologétique de la foi Catholique" established for the author a reputation for thoroughness and scientific accuracy, and the present voluminous work is an expansion of that article.

The first part treats of the existence of God; the second, of His nature and attributes. As guiding posts to the arguments of the first part, is set the teaching of the Church in the Vatican Council and in the various legislations of Roman Congregations. Especially timely is the explanation of the decrees of the Vatican in their bearing upon the anti-modernistic oath ordered by the Motu Proprio "Sacrorum Antistitum." The possibility and the fact of the proof of the existence of God are treated in a manner that is entirely up to date. The philosophical writings of James and his sort receive full justice. The findings of Andrew Lang and the learned Austrian, Father Schmidt, are given as a contrast to the vagaries of Tylor and Spencer and later animists.

The second part of this excellent study is on the nature of God and His attributes. The essential constituent of this nature, according to our imperfect knowledge, is established; the attributes are deduced therefrom; and all important difficulties are met that seem to set one attribute against another. The Thomistic solution is given of the great difficulty of saving human liberty without destroying Divine omnipotence. The will always retains the "power to resist," though the act of resistance is incompatible with the Divine, efficacious and physical premotion. The treatment of the Jesuit solution would have been more effective had Molina's opinion not been dubbed "naive and strange."

W. F. D.

The Collected Poems of Condé Benoist Pallen. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $1.25.

Judged by the accepted canons of literary criticism, Mr. Pallen's poetry is, in the main, considerably above the ordinary; some of it ranks exceptionally high. Often there is grace and music in his verse-structure; his imagination is fertile and like the true seer's is quick to appreciate and interpret hidden spiritual values. Especially worthy of praise is the elegy entitled "A Fable for Lydia," which is a finely-wrought poem filled with exquisite imagery, and painting a pen-picture that leaves the reader with "the ranged gods upon the verge of high Olympus," wondering as to the sequel.

It is not surprising to find that Homer, Virgil, Milton, and Tennyson are continually in one's thoughts as he ponders over these pages; not, indeed, that the author lacks originality, but because of the delicate perfume of chastened classicism that permeates Mr. Pallen's poems. His vision has swept a wide range. Of his themes, some are sacred, some profane, and others neither sacred nor profane. He has a fine poem in honor of the Queen Immaculate; there is a splendid "Ode to Georgetown," the poet's Alma Mater; two well-sustained dramatic poems, "Agláë" and "The Feast of Thalarchus," together with a collection of less pretentious efforts on varied subjects, some of which are familiar to readers of Mr. Pallen's previous works, while others are now published for the first time. Much of this minor verse reaches high levels of excellence; some, on the other hand, is liable to be more philosophic than poetic, but all bears witness to the scholarly attainments of the Managing Editor of the "Catholic Encyclopedia."

E. A. W.

The Goddess of Ghosts. By C. C. MARTINDALE, S.J. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $1.50.

"The Goddess of Ghosts" is a series of musings inspired by some incidents of Hellenic mythology and history, presented to the reader with all the skill of a master of narrative, dialogue and description, rich in striking contrasts, but withal mystery-begetting and mystifying, and, once at least, uncannily coordinating the things of light and the things of darkness. Herein lies Father Martindale's charm, and his weakness. He weaves a magic spell as he croons the sad tale of young Elpenor, he strikes a tender chord when he sounds the soul-depths of Baby "White-thoughts," he makes one a very comrade of the runner, Phidippides, the while he leaps and bounds from phantasy to phantasy, shrouds the moral in difficult allegory, reaches out for the lessons of nature which underlie the hoary myths of Hellas, and with lyric liberty contrasts the goddess Persephone and the true "Mother of the Dead" in the course of a musing entitled "The Goddess of Ghosts." In a word, Father Martindale has fashioned a rich mosaic, whose components, bright and attractive though they may be in themselves, portray, when fitted together, an image blurred and not entirely pleasing.

J. T. L.

The Normal Life. By EDWARD T. DEVINE. New York: Survey Associates, Inc. $1.00.

This book begins with a blasphemy, and ends with a paragraph which is an excellent sample of what Dr. Devine calls "the dry-rot of stupidity." Between these extremes, Dr. Devine discusses a variety of topics, entertainingly for the most part and sometimes with profit to the novice in sociology, but always with a lightness of literary touch only equalled by the lightness of his intellectual grasp upon the principles fundamental to his subject. He solves fewer difficulties than he suggests; his procedure is that of the unwary guest who delicately takes up a potato only to drop it forthwith and permanently, on ascertaining its heat; he is like a man who carefully picks his way across an egg-strewn floor. Only, it will be thought, Dr. Devine has not had the good fortune to evade all the eggs, for he was obliged to walk in the dark, and his progress, to continue the figure, marked the gradual confection of a most marvellous omelette. Whether or not "race suicide is an ominous danger," the head of the New York School of Philanthropy sagely regards it as "a perplexing question;" and as if the thing were a physical possibility, the Doctor gravely warns us that "it is not desirable that the human race should be perpetuated in the wasteful fashion of fishes and the lower animals." Sex-hygiene is to be taught in the schools, "very generally and very delicately," as a barrier against social diseases; nothing, however, is said of religion in this connection, and probably with consistency, for one who apparently equalizes "religion, art and industry" as permanent human interests, may be pardoned for regarding social salvation as synonymous with salvarsan. Our current penal methods are "demoralizing to the society which cherishes them," and it seems to be absurd that "Courts should . . . fix sentences." The reason is obvious, "judges are neither physicians nor teachers." What we have to do is "to socialize the police (a perilous task!) socialize the courts, and socialize the prisons, which means as prisons to abolish them altogether," and then we shall be ready to arrange our robes for the millennium. To a good many folk, Dr. Devine's normal life must seem quite as normal as a house upside down.

P. L. B.

For Greater Things. The Story of Saint Stanislaus Kostka. By WILLIAM T. KANE, S.J. With a Preface by James J. Daly, S.J. St. Louis: B. Herder. $0.50.

This charmingly told biography of Poland's Jesuit patron is just what our Catholic children have been waiting for. The author, formerly on the staff of the Queen's Work, has admirably succeeded in portraying his subject as a real boy of flesh and blood. He shows how Stanislaus worked as hard to fit himself for sainthood as other lads do to attain distinction in a worldly career. A boy of sixteen who could walk at the rate of thirty miles a day from Vienna to Rome, Father Kane points out, was no weakling. "If Stanislaus had done this for the glory of the world, we should have stories woven about him, the whole world would cry 'Bravo!' But he did it for God, and the world cannot understand him at all: the world is silent." It can safely be predicted that every normal boy who can be induced to begin "For Greater Things" will eagerly read the book through, though he may excuse the deed by explaining: "It isn't a 'life of a saint' at all, but a fine story." Such a remark the author should consider a high compliment. Father Daly in his excellent preface observes that "The lively and energetic style adopted in the present biography may create a trace of mild surprise in older readers." But it is just the style in which a saint's life for boys should be written, so let us hope that this is the first of a series of similar biographies from Father Kane's pen.

W. D.

"A Voice from the Crowd." By GEORGE WHARTON PEPPER. New Haven: Yale University Press. $1.50.

It is good to see ourselves as others see us. Mr. Pepper paints the preacher of the Gospel as the layman sees him and would like to see him; he has gathered together in an interesting and suggestive synthesis his own experiences and the experiences of others, and the fruit of his strivings is embodied in "A Voice from the Crowd." Throughout six thought-inspiring lectures the pulpit orator is discussed in relation to God, his fellow man, and the ideals that should be constantly kept before his mind; he is reminded of his obligations towards the young and the old, towards the just and the unjust, towards the ninety-nine of the fold and the errant sheep of the desert; he is exhorted to see the difficulties of those committed to his charge, to insist on the Christian education of the little ones, to cultivate a universal charity, to labor and pray for the return of Christian unity. Of course no Catholic could accept Mr. Pepper's plan of reuniting Christendom; it lays too much stress on the invisible Church, and is, moreover, somewhat modernistic; but, be this as it may, every loyal Catholic is at one with the author of "A Voice from the Crowd" when he writes: "Of the evils of our present godless system of education I seem to be keenly sensible. I do not think I am unaware of the difficulties in the way of constructive reform. I confess myself wholly without suspicion respecting the motives and aims of our Roman Catholic brethren. If I am alive when they propound a remedy for existing mischiefs I shall make an earnest effort to place myself in agreement with their proposal."

J. T. L.

Russian Fairy Tales. From the Skazki of Polevio. By R. NISBET BAIN. Illustrated by NOEL L. NISBET. New York: The Frederick A. Stokes Co. $2.50.

Hero Tales and Legends of the Serbians. By WOISLAV M. PETROVITCH. Illustrated by WILLIAM SEWELL and GILBERT JAMES. The Frederick A. Stokes Co. New York: $3.00.

It was inevitable that the ban which has been put upon the study of hostile languages in the schools should eventually reach the nursery, and that the Grimm brothers, at least in certain quarters, should get into bad odor, that Grimmelshausen should be relegated to the attic, and that even the gentle Baron Munchausen should find himself in disfavor not only in the library but even on the shelves of the children's bookcase. Even when the name is single, it is hard these days to find unhyphenated hearts, and loyalty to the old sod has made otherwise smiling faces frown on all alien and enemy names. For months therefore, it has looked rather glum for the dreams of chivalry and the spirit of high romance that have been the undisputed right and possession of the children of all nations for untold years. This was too bad. Life for all humans, far too soon, becomes dull grey prose; nowadays it is mostly blood red, but it was a pity that even the little ones must be robbed of their poetry and ideals, of their beauteous maidens and their valorous knights, of their wicked step-mothers and witches, of their elves and fairies and all the other gossamer creations of youthful imaginations. Fortunately the Stokes Publishing Company has come to the rescue, so that now even the most fiery supporters of the Allies may, without going over to the foe, turn page after page and find the ever recurrent magic words "Once upon a time" at the beginning of many a tale. The books are rather expensive, but they are works of art both in illustration and in general technique, and having their scenes and characters taken from the mysterious lands of Serbia and Russia, they have something that the old tales lacked, something of the fierceness and wildness and heroism that we have usually associated mostly with the Sagas of the North. The danger therefore that threatened the imaginations of the children of English parentage, ancestry or sympathy has happily been averted. They may now delve into fairyland to their hearts' content.

J. H. F.

Teaching of History in Elementary and Secondary Schools. By HENRY JOHNSON, Professor of History in Teachers' College, Columbia University. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.40.

At a time when education in this country is still suffering from the evil effects of mere experimentation, it is highly gratifying to see a work such as this appearing on the market. Its appeal is, of course, directed primarily to actual or prospective teachers of history; yet all, in any way interested in pedagogical principles, will find much matter in it for profitable consideration. History, as those who have ever had anything to do with teaching it will know, has always held a rather anomalous position in education. It has been from early times agreed that no curriculum could be considered complete without it; but what the definite purpose should be for including it or what method ought to be used so as to adapt it to the ulterior aims of education, are questions that have been left largely to the judgment of the individual teacher.

Mr. Johnson has set himself the task of determining definitely what the real pedagogical value of history is as a branch of study in the schoolroom and how it should be dealt with as an educational instrument. Starting from the standpoint of "the scientific conception of history," he argues with those who maintain that "the lessons of history, to be really useful, must also be true." He weighs its value in the light of its cultural content without neglecting, on the other hand, to point out its no less important worth as a means of developing the faculties of the mind and for the training of character. His analysis and criticisms of other theories on the teaching of history that obtain, both in this country and in France, England, and Germany, are thorough and clear. Though the reader may not always agree with the author's conclusions, yet there is no part of this book that does not contain some valuable suggestion of either a theoretical or practical nature.

M. I. X. M.

Old Roads from the Heart of New York. By SARAH COMSTOCK. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

The average New Yorker probably knows little and cares less for the wealth of historic lore which surrounds him. But if he should plan a sight-seeing trip, this book of journeys of today by ways of yesterday would prove a valuable guide. With the Battery as a hub, the author follows one by one, for a distance of thirty miles, those ferries and roads which most nearly correspond to the ferries and roads of other days. Starting eastward, she conducts us over historic Long Island; she then enlivens, by anecdote and story, the old ways to the south, to Staten Island and New Jersey; after sketching the country to the west and north, along both sides of the Hudson, she brings us back to the city by way of Long Island Sound and the East River; arrived once more in Manhattan, she calls up the ghosts that haunt the heart of the city and the great artery, Broadway.

From the viewpoint of the Catholic antiquarian, the book is somewhat disappointing. Though there is no end to the accounts of the Puritan and Quaker and Dutch Reformed settlements and churches, of early Catholic foundations there is not a word. Prejudice, it is true, and penal restrictions discouraged any attempts at early settlements, still there are many isolated facts that might well be mentioned, such as the governorship of Thomas Dongan, the visit of Father Jogues, and the foundation of old St. Peter's, on Barclay Street. The book is well illustrated, containing maps of the present and the past, and one hundred splendid photographs. For the person seeking additional information, Miss Comstock furnishes a complete bibliography, and for the sightseer, detailed itineraries to all the places of interest mentioned in the text.

F. X. T.

Debating for Boys. By WILLIAM HORTON FOSTER. New York: Sturgis & Walton. $1.00.

A practical explanation of what a debate is with very helpful suggestions for beginning and conducting a debating society is presented in this little book. After proposing one or two questions as examples, the author goes through the preliminary work of narrowing the question and of selecting the strongest evidence to prove it, and then gives an excellent chapter on the positive work of the brief. Here, however, one feels the lack of something on the actual writing of the debate. Boys, no matter how carefully they have planned, find difficulty in expressing themselves clearly and orderly in public, unless they have written carefully and even memorized their debates. Step by step we are taken with "The Fairfield Boys" through the process of organizing a debate and with them see the parliamentary procedure in operation. This practical method and the seriousness about the work of debate, recommended to the boys and well illustrated in the "Ford Town Hall Meeting," give special value to the book. The appendix contains questions for debate, the constitution for a society and a table of parliamentary rules. P. C.

The Coming Newspaper. Edited by MERLE THORPE, Professor of Journalism in the University of Kansas. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $1.40.

The title of this book is somewhat misleading. It offers the reader, in place of an indication of the "coming newspaper," more of a blanket indictment of present journalism, framed by twelve expert newspaper men. They obtain their material from the answers to a questionnaire sent to a thousand prominent people asking for suggestions as to the most vital problems connected with journalism today. The conclusion to be drawn from the symposium these critics have compiled is that whatever is, is, in great measure, wrong throughout the newspaper world. There are now thirty-nine institutions at which schools of journalism offer courses that are supposed to be a factor in the stimulation of a newly-awakened professional conscience. But the ethical code advanced in most of the dissertations presented in this book seems based on the speculation: "Will it pay?" rather than on any of the fundamental verities. Twelve States, during 1913, we are told, considered newspaper regulation, in one form or other, and Congress accepted several bills of the same import. It is the handwriting on the wall, according to one of the contributors, a leading editor of international repute, and he warns his fellow-journalists:

> If we do not profit by it, if we do not set our house in order ourselves, our glorious freedom from a hateful supervision and control will crumble away, and with it many of the present-day splendors, powers and opportunities of our craft.

He also says that the responsibility for having the right kind of newspaper is clearly on the reading public. For the complaint, therefore, that Catholic interests do not receive proper attention in the secular press, the remedy, in their view, is very plain. The two great newsgathering agencies and the 1,400 subscribing papers that print their reports will respond to the prodding of their readers, if it is done in an organized and practical manner. But sporadic or half-hearted methods will effect little. T. F. M.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The excellent address Archbishop Hanna delivered last month at San Francisco before the International Peace Congress begins the current number of the Catholic Mind. His Grace shows how the Church has always striven to promote peace among Christian nations and he recalls what the Pope has done to mitigate the horrors of the present war. "Homicide Excusable and Felonious," by J. Harding Fisher, S.J., and "What Women Can Do," by Daniel A. Lord, S.J., two other papers in this issue of the useful little fortnightly, are very timely and practical, and there is a short refutation of the Neo-Malthusians, by Father Blakely.

The six novels, according to the Bookman, that were most in demand during September in some forty-five of our cities were these: "Michael O'Halloran," "K," "A Far Country," "The Money Master," "The Rainbow Trail," and "Pollyanna Grows Up." All but the fifth have already been noticed in AMERICA. As for "The Rainbow Trail," it is a lurid story about Navajo Indians, Mormons, desperadoes and Protestant ministers which would somewhat resemble the "dime novels" of thirty years ago if its salacious pages were removed. What trash the people read!

Father Joseph Rickaby, S.J. has gathered into a substantial book entitled "The Lord My Light" (Herder, $2.00) the best of the instructions in his two volumes of "Oxford and Cambridge Conferences" which are now practically out of print. The talks are meant for the better rather than the less well educated and aim "at removing current prejudices and misconceptions concerning the Catholic Church, and at instructing the layman on points of theology that he ought to know." The fifty conferences in the volume cover a wide range of topics, are for the most part apologetic in character and are full of erudite lore that should especially appeal to university students.

Owen Johnson's "Making Money" (Stokes, $1.35) has a beautiful blue and gold cover, and is printed on good stock, but the binding is exceedingly poor. The story itself lacks the interest of "Stover of Yale," as well as the impropriety noted in other of Johnson's books. The last fact is commendable and gives some promise of fairer returns from the author in future.——Helen of Troy was happy enough, no doubt, in her early married life. She had her bit of tapestry to weave during the day and at night listened as her liege lord recounted the more exciting incidents that had kept him longer afield than had been his intent. Humdrum, maybe, but quietly happy for one so beautiful that "for her it was meet a thousand men should die." Then came Paris and the elopement followed. But had it not been for a Homer would the tale ever have achieved more than the local notoriety deservedly attaching to such bad conduct? "The Little Iliad" (Macmillan, $1.35) is a tale as sordid as was the incident that occasioned the great Iliad, and Maurice Hewlet, the author of the novel is not a Homer to transmute these base elements into gold. One would conjecture, by the way, that all the actors in "The Little Iliad" are Catholics!

"Serbia: Her People, History and Aspirations" (Stokes, $1.50), by W. M. Petrovitch, relates the history of Serbia from pagan days to the second Austrian invasion of 1914, the closing pages being devoted to a study of national beliefs and customs. The story of Serbia is not pleasant reading, as she has been for centuries the victim of her stronger neighbors. Oppression from without and disunion within tell the tale of Serbia's years and days. M. Petrovitch, who is in the Serbian legation, London, maintains that his people have upheld their ethnographic features, their national traditions and language, despite their wanderings and trials. The peasants are both brave and superstitious, capable of enduring hardship untold. In temperament lively, sensitive and highly emotional, they are ever ready for war, but in agricultural and industrial pursuits they have lagged behind other countries. Jealousy and an inordinate thirst for power are the national sins of Serbia. It is the writer's view that his country was neither prepared for the present war nor desirous of a conflict with Austria. There is much valuable information contained in this small volume.

The interesting period of the latter half of the twelfth century when Crusaders and troubadours walked in the flesh, and Southern France, that home of medieval poetry, are the time and place of "The Fortunes of Garin" (Houghton, $1.40), Mary Johnston's latest novel. A knight named Garin, with his powers of song and sword, his thrilling career to win his spurs and his marriage at last with "the ugly princess," supplies the story with the element of romance. The beginnings of the serfs' dissatisfaction with their lords' administration, the enthusiasm of the Crusaders and the indulgences granted them; the lives of monks and nuns of the time are pointedly described, but a Catholic reader will note the unmeant lack of reverence in the telling, and must recall that a bishop of political aims and a lying cleric, if actual, were yet not typical of the period; that the Crusaders, though adventurous, were for the most part truly desirous of having their souls shriven from sin; that the Church is certainly emotional, but it must needs be much more to make it the enduring institution it is. The heroine, Audiart, is not the conventional, impossible lady of this kind of tale, but a flesh-and-blood reality, drawn with deft fingers. The siege of Roche de Frêne gives occasion for some vivid writing of the author's best.——"Hempfield" (Doubleday, $1.35), by David Grayson, is a quiet, simple narrative of a quiet, simple village. It is not in the crises of life that we are to look for its great truths, but in the small events of the ordinary day. Such happenings, cast in the form of reminiscences, are the theme of this novel. The scene is always the village of Hempfield, and, almost always, the printing-office of a country weekly called the Star. Around the precarious existence of this newspaper hang the lives and histories of an interesting group of characters. Though they create and live in but one atmosphere, they are all distinctively different. The dignified old captain, Nort Carr, the enthusiast; Anthy, the perfect woman; Fergus, the traditional Scot, are excellently drawn figures. The characters, indeed, so far outshine the plot in interest that we almost forget the current of events. Mr. Grayson is photographic in his descriptions; he snaps persons and places just in the nick of time and portrays them always with a smile.

The paper on "The Natural History of a Reform Law," with which Dr. William J. Kerby opens the November Catholic World, is a valuable study of the influence of conservatism and radicalism on legislation; in "Ut Quid Perditio Hæc" Sir Bertram Windle gives a scientist's convictions regarding the necessity of the Church's training "specialists" in prayer; Mr. Aloysius J. Hogan, S.J., contributes a discerning appreciation of Francis Thompson's prose; Dr. James J. Walsh gleans some interesting facts from the history of feminine education; Richardson Wright has an article on the Russian artel, or village craftsman; P. W. Browne writes on the material and spiritual worth of books, and there are readable stories and verses besides.

"The Black and White Book" (Gibson & Perin Co., Cincinnati, $0.50) is not, as might be presumed, a new volume of diplomatic disentanglements. It is related neither to the German "White Book" nor the English "Blue Book"; but is perfectly neutral, consisting of thirty charming silhouettes of child-life accompanied by suitable rhymes. Beginning with their winter sports it carries the little ones through their year of play and make-believe. Miss Charlotte Vimont Arnold, the author of the booklet, is a recent graduate of the Sacred Heart Convent at Clifton, Cincinnati.——"Sure Pop and the Safety Scouts" (World Book Co., Yonkers, N. Y.), by Roy Rutherford Bailey, is an attractive little book published under the auspices of the National Safety Council, and presents the safety idea in the guise of a series of interesting adventures, any one of which could easily happen to a child. The leader in these episodes is the quaint little "Colonel Sure Pop," half-human and half-elf, whose enthusiasm proves so contagious that not only the children of the story, but those also who read it are filled with a desire to urge caution and care in the ordinary doings of daily life.——"The Emerald Story Book" (Duffield, $1.50), by Ada and Eleanor Skinner, is a volume of well-chosen stories for spring and the out-of-doors life and includes tales and verses by Eugene Field, Kate Douglas Wiggin, Henry Van Dyke, Katherine Pyle, Helen Keller, James Baldwin, Hans Christian Andersen and others. The myths and legends are interesting and amusing, and present flowers, insects and birds as persons. The children will enjoy the book.

The "Water Babies," a book that is a perpetual joy to all children and many adults, has been brought out in delightful form by Houghton, Mifflin Company ($2.00). The numerous illustrations by W. Heath Robinson are all amusing, and some of them are beautiful and will serve to render Kingsley's charming classic even more attractive to little children.——"The Kingdom of the Winding Road" (Macmillan, $1.25), by Cornelia Meigs, is a pretty little excursion into the realms of fancy which most boys and girls will enjoy. As the setting is medieval, it is a pity that all reference to religion has been omitted. The excision of this important factor in the lives and aspirations of medieval folk lessens both the artistic effect and the historical truth of the picture.

EDUCATION

Dabble and Cram

THERE are schools and schools. I hazard it that this statement does not fall on your expectant ear with the grateful ring of novelty; long usage has dulled its welcome. You are a neologist; you have forgotten the poet's decies repetita placebit. There is no valid reason why you should not occasionally, say on greater feasts, allow some aged truth to warm its tottering limbs by basking in the refulgence of your distinguished consideration. Therefore, I shall repeat the ancient apothegm that all schools are divided into two classes, which by your leave, I shall term the Class of Dabble and the Class of Cram. The precise reason of this natural division the philosophic reader shall find, unless I forget to allege it, in a subsequent paragraph. For the present, let us recall for our mutual instruction, a famous representative of each school. And first, out of deference for the cloth, the Reverend Lawrence Veal, sometime Chaplain to that unfortunate nobleman, the Earl of Bareacres.

THE BLOOMSBURY SCHOOL

You will recollect that in his elegant establishment in Hart Street, Bloomsbury, this clerical person with his excellent lady, prepared young gentlemen for the universities, the senate and the learned professions. Thackeray hints that the success of this eminently respectable institution was built upon "advertising and pushing sedulously," but this I take to be mere cynicism. The real cause I find in Mr. Veal's devotion to "the Curriculum," which was of prodigious extent. Whenever Mr. Veal spoke, he used the very longest and finest words in the dictionary, "rightly judging that it was as cheap to employ a handsome, large and sonorous epithet, as to use a stingy little one," and he founded his curriculum on the same broad philosophy. "The young gentlemen in Hart Street," records Thackeray, "might learn a something of every known science." Mr. Veal had provided an orrery (look it up in the dictionary if you don't know what it means), an electrifying machine, a turning lathe and a select library, and had transmogrified the wash-house into a theater. This list of facilities sounds like the description of a Gary School, and fully proves that our ancestors were not the preadamitic beings which our fancy sometimes paints. It also shows beyond cavil, that Mr. Veal's pupils did not suffer from lack of proper opportunities.

VEAL AND ASCHAM

Unfortunately, however, intensive criticism indicates that as a teacher of youth Mr. Veal cannot be ranked with Ascham. He seems to have talked too much, for one thing, and a verbose teacher makes a mute pupil. As a disciplinarian, he held too literally to a belief in the sanctity of the individual's aspirations for liberty: no Orbilius plagosus, he anticipated the methods ascribed to the Warden of the School for Social Reform at Sing Sing. Other phenomena, difficult of reconciliation, present themselves to the careful historian. Mr. Bluck, for instance, although he had arrived at the age of twenty-three and used to weep over the insuperable difficulties of Eutropius, was accounted worthy of a prize at the end of the year; and Georgy Osbourne, a lazy little scamp, was pronounced "excellent" in three languages. It is hard to escape the conclusion that the pupils had a lengthy curriculum which they were allowed to ignore. Possibly Mr. Veal, like many of his professional brethren since his time, found no other course open to him; but considering the evidence, this genteel establishment in Hart Street, Bloomsbury, must stand as a representative of the Class of Dabble. Let us now call a model of the Class of Cram.

THE BRIGHTON SCHOOL

Mrs. Pipchin's ideal of a school was realized in Dr. Blimber's famous establishment. "I have heard that it is very strictly conducted," she remarked, rubbing her ancient nose vigorously, "and there is nothing but learning going on from morning to night." Let no jump be made to the conclusion that the bitter memory of the Peruvian mines, coupled with the carking care of bringing up the saturnine Master Bitherstone, and the daily shampooing of little Miss Pankey, debars this venerable lady from expressing an opinion on the subject of schools. If she sins, she sins in good company; most of us share her ideals. Dickens observes that there was no nonsense about Mrs. Pipchin, and there was no nonsense about Dr. Blimber's school, except that crassest of nonsense, the kind that only a pedagogue can invent and defend. "The studies went round like a mighty wheel," writes our authority, "and the young gentlemen were always stretched upon it." This is the school which most of us, who pride ourselves on being "practical common-sense people" want for our children. Sometimes we get it. Dr. Blimber agrees with Mr. Veal in providing an ample curriculum; he differs from this gentleman in believing that it is to be followed, regardless of consequences. He proposes, not to educate, not even to instruct, but "to cover the matter." Persons of the intellectual capacity of Mr. Toots are the usual product of the School of Cram. Neither Cram nor Dabble has any place in a civilized community, but on the whole I prefer the School of Dabble. It is a trifle more human.

OUR OWN SCHOOLS

There are then, schools and schools; they did not end with the passing of the Victorian Age. Like the world, they are still too much with us. With scarcely an exception, our modern secondary schools are suffering from that dread disease, Enlargement of the Curriculum. Have you never heard of a Catholic high school in which adolescent boys and girls are forced "to cover the matter" in Latin, Greek, English (with author-study and composition), Evidences of Religion, Science (Physics, or Chemistry, or Biology), History, Mathematics, French or German, with ruffles of elocution and frills of music or china-painting? In all your travels, have you never beheld the Veal or Blimber methods in operation in a Catholic high school? Without comment upon the keenness of your vision or the delicacy of your sense of hearing, I accept your statement that our Catholic schools have all the perfection possible in created beings. Glowing then, with the sense of our excellence, let us take a little unholy pleasure in those shortcomings of the secular secondary schools, set down in the New York Sun for October 24, by a number of college presidents.

PROFESSIONAL OPINIONS

Dr. Heaps of Milton University, Baltimore, considers the first fault of the secondary school to be "that the courses are too broad." He thinks that the secondary school should insist upon "a mastery of elementary English" and upon such disciplinary studies as "Latin, Greek, Algebra, Geometry and one elementary science. Concentration and discipline rather than breadth and culture are the crying needs of our preparatory schools." Dr. Judson of the University of Chicago, writes that secondary schools "would be benefited: 1. If the subjects of instruction were fewer; 2. If the time devoted to a given subject were longer, in order that a more thorough grasp of that subject might be attained; 3. If there were less attention to social activities, athletics and the like." Dr. Ellis of Ohio University is of the opinion that "the present high school courses are too pretentious. Quality of work is sacrificed to quantity. . . . Such a course really prepares for nothing definitely. . . . Depth counts as much as length in educational effort. Fewer studies and those better taught and more intensively studied by the pupils, suggest conditions that will develop mental power."

FURTHER CRITICISM

Other college presidents have expressed similar opinions in the New York Times. In the issue for September 5, Dr. Sparks of the Pennsylvania State College, Dr. Currell of the University of South Carolina, Dr. Mees of the Rose Polytechnic Institute, Dr. Eggleston of the Virginia Polytechnic Institute and Dr. Harris of Elmira College, unite in the criticism that "the attention of the pupils is dissipated by the attempt to teach too many subjects." In the same journal for August 15, Dr. Thwing of Western Reserve University, says that "the subjects are now too numerous" and suggests that "four or five great subjects represent both in quantity and quality, a proper course for a pre-college school." "The great bane of all secondary school training," writes Dr. Evans of Ripon College on September 12, "is the multiplicity of subjects and the painlessness of methods. We need more tonic of astringency for the brain. The psychology of interest has been overworked. The education of the will is the prime essential. I would have the high school take fewer studies and compel thoroughness."

OURSELVES AND OTHERS

Wise heads wag assent; the tireless makers of school programs alone remain untouched by the justice of these reflections. Of a truth, it is pleasant to know that they do not in the least apply to our own high schools and academies. Our scientifically planned curricula banish the Veals and the Blimbers from our midst, and secure almost automatically "that power of accurate, comprehensive, large and well-proportioned thinking" which Dr. Thwing deems the ideal to be aimed at in secondary education. We do not believe that the mind of a boy or girl of fourteen winters can be concentrated upon eight subjects of instruction. Holding this to be actual dissipation, fatal to normal development, we select a few subjects of proved educational value for intensive study, and with pity in our eyes, watch the wicked world of secular secondary instruction as it merrily dances along the primrose path of fads and fancies.

We have our virtues; who may doubt it? But after all, would not a sincere prayer for the gift of seeing ourselves, not as others see us, but as we are, profit us more than this somewhat pharisaic self-congratulation? PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

Lemon Frappé and the Y. W. P. A.

'TIS Chicago. A room in the Great Northern Hotel is ablaze with light and alive with an engaging bevy of sweet young damosels. Mesdames, their mothers, are there too. A charming debutante is seated at the piano, her nimble fingers dancing out a lively air, the while in pairs the girls go gracefully through terpsichorean mazes. In one corner of the room is a table set with flowers and lemon frappé. Thither ever and anon the gay young creatures repair for refreshment. Light hearts, sparkling eyes, innocent jollity! Pray, what can the merry company be?

SOCIOLOGICAL BUDS

Let us inquire of the Chairlady of the Young Women's Protestant Auxiliary, "the seventeen-year-old Christian Sociologist," as a Chicago reporter gallantly calls her.

> "We brought our erring sisters here," she tells us, "to give them a good time. We know what we are doing. These girls are of the same flesh and blood as we are. They have done wrong because they haven't had a chance to do right. We are giving them that chance tonight. We will offer them entertainment, we will show them the beauties of clean living, we will open our clean arms to them and they can enter, clean!"

Not all these happy girls, then, whom we see in the brilliant room are innocent of the "Scarlet Letter." No, kind reader, some dozen or fifteen are here whom the Protestant Women's National Alliance has reclaimed from a life of sin; these unfortunates, though not saved in the first instance by the Young Women's Protestant Auxiliary, are nevertheless, as its ingenuous seventeen-year-old chairlady says, being kept saved through innocent amusement by the Y. W. P. A.

The means, therefore, by which the Y. W. P. A. intends to keep these women of the pave from pursuing their course of sin further is by innocent amusement. Indeed, the sweet seventeen-year-old chairlady is quite confident of her authority for these means. "Christ said, 'Let him who is without sin cast the first stone.' We feel we are carrying out the spirit of His teachings."

GRACE OR AMUSEMENT?

But search the Scriptures as we may we cannot find it anywhere said that Christ advised sinful women, as a means to regain and hold God's friendship, to enjoy themselves innocently. He had a great deal to say to sinners about penance as a way to the Kingdom of God, but nothing about innocent amusement. And while, of course, we have nothing but admiration for the charitable spirit that informs these methods of the Y. W. P. A., we cannot but smile at the futility of the methods themselves. For, even supposing these women already reconciled with God, the only real help to persevere that they would find in the action of the Y. W. P. A. is sympathy. And sympathy is the smallest item in the needs of women of this character. Above all the current of God's grace must flow into their parched and shriveled souls through its sacramental channels. Then they must live apart from the world in retirement and discipline; and this must constitute the least penance they have to perform in expiation. Finally, they need, constantly, daily, the loving care and sympathy of devoted women whose hearts beat for Christ only; not the occasional chit-chat of slips of girls.

Just here I can fancy some indignant reader exclaiming: "There you are again! Never a new idea is started outside the Catholic Church but AMERICA "ups with its hammer" of destructive criticism and pops it on the head! "Why doesn't it stop negativing everything and give us something positive!" Nay, nay, dear reader, I do not say that you would be guilty of so absurd a protest, nor yet that your friends would be so foolish. I only say I can fancy someone exclaiming in this wise. Even then, on reflection, this indefinite someone might repent his words. But if he didn't, I would say to him that AMERICA offers weekly for our wants new things and old, the treasure-house of the Catholic Church, and for this particular want that great work of a part of the Catholic Church, the work of the Good Shepherd nuns.

SOCIOLOGICAL EXPERTS

And indeed, I wonder how many of us Catholics are aware of the magnificent activity, magnificent at least in Christ's eyes, of the Sisters of the Good Shepherd? If I were to tell the sweet young creatures of the Y. W. P. A. that the Good Shepherd nuns in this country alone have reclaimed for Christ, not for lemon frappé and innocent amusement, 100,000 women; if I were to tell our censorious reader, imaginary, mind you, that at present in the United States 1,200 Good Shepherd nuns have under their care 7,000 of these poor girls, I can imagine the former in despair throwing the lemon frappé out the window, and the latter in tears of repentance inditing the editor a note of apology.

MARK S. GROSS, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The influence Protestantism has acquired in Japan is worthy of notice. There are at present in that country, the Epworth Herald informs us, 728 ordained Japanese ministers, 713 unordained Protestant workers, and more than a hundred thousand students in 1,875 Sunday schools. About 13,000 pupils attend the boarding schools, day schools and kindergartens. In the theological seminaries there are 400 candidates for the ministry, and 350 women are being taught in the Bible schools. During the last thirty years the total number of copies of the Bible or portions of the Bible distributed throughout the Sunrise Kingdom has amounted to six millions. Everywhere in the mission fields Protestantism is intensely active and Catholics must feel that the decisive hour has come for them to uphold and strengthen their own missions.

The Independent gives the following brief outline of the much-discussed Taylor system of efficiency.

> 1. Find ten or fifteen men in a given trade peculiarly skilled in the work to be analyzed. 2. Study their exact series of elementary motions or operations, with implements used. 3. Study with a stop-watch the time required to make such elementary movements, then select the quickest way of doing each. 4. Eliminate all slow, false and useless movements. 5. Collect into one series the quickest and best movements, as well as the best implements. 6. Standardize all work accordingly, and train workers in new methods. 7. Provide just rewards and human interest, factors in rousing, impelling and educating workers.

The Taylor system, as at present promoted, has aroused considerable opposition, particularly on the part of the labor unions, who believe that it is exploited in the interest of the employer only. An independent objection urged against it is that human beings are not to be treated as machines, and that under it labor would lose the little joy and spontaneity it still possesses. The system has been enthusiastically advocated as well as bitterly opposed. If ruthlessly employed it will lead to the nervous collapse of the workers.

Considerable progress has been made by the Marist Brothers in Japan. Their primary school and lyceum at Tokyo count 850 pupils; Osaka has 700 pupils, of whom 625 are following the catechetical instructions. There are seven Japanese lay teachers engaged at this institution, all of them converts and deeply interested in the work for souls. Native Catholic teachers, graduated by the Japanese Government, have the confidence of the pupils and enjoy greater influence among them, it is said, than Europeans. At the Nagasaki school the number of boys has increased from 100 to 280 since its transformation from a commercial school into a lyceum. Urakania has some sixty boys destined for the Church; St. Joseph's College at Yokahama has likewise begun the new school year with satisfactory prospects. The good work thus accomplished by the Marist Brothers in the primary and high schools can now be gradually supplemented by the labors of the Jesuits in their own and the public university.

Mr. Barnum was evidently on safe ground, the Springfield Union says, when he held that the American public liked to be humbugged. "Certainly if the public does not like to be imposed upon, a goodly percentage of those comprising it are very willing to give proof of their gullibility." This fact is further impressed upon us by a Washington dispatch stating that in the last four years the American public has been swindled out of $239,000,000 by a variety of fraudulent schemes. The Post Office Department is striving to some extent to check this wholesale victimizing by the occasional issuance of fraud orders where schemes are evidently open to just suspicion. The order denies the person named in it the use of the mails. "Perfectly legitimate home enterprises in need of capital can go begging until they starve to death, but the people still have millions to waste on fakes."

Don Miguel Maura, brother of the celebrated statesman and ex-Premier, Don Antonio Maura, recently died in the island of Mallorca. He was the founder of the Eucharistic Center, popular through Spain, and particularly flourishing in Madrid. Its purpose covers in part the work of the Extension Society in our own country, by supplying poor churches with all the articles necessary for "duly and decorously carrying out the Divine worship." He was moreover the author of various devotional books, the best known of which, "Eucharistic Harmonies," likewise draws its inspiration from the Hidden Lord within the Blessed Sacrament. For His service too he educated and trained a sound and highly cultivated clergy during the twenty years of his rectorship of the Seminary of Palma de Mallorca. The magnificent college church which he erected is considered one of the wonders of the island. His loss will be felt by the Spanish Church and clergy.

Henri Fabre, the "insects' Homer," who recently died at the age of ninety-two years, said many things worthy of consideration. Among them is the following:

> Because I have stirred a few grains of sand on the shore am I in position to know the depths of the ocean? Life has unfathomed secrets. Human life will be erased from the archives of the world before we possess the last word that the gnat has to say to us. Scientifically nature is a riddle without a definite solution to satisfy man's curiosity. Hypothesis follows hypothesis; the theoretic rubbish heap accumulates and truth ever eludes us. To know not to know might well be the last word of wisdom.

Well said and true! To distinguish between absolute truth and plausible assumption is the lesson modern science and its popular votaries have still to learn. When this is thoroughly understood and applied, there will be no longer any question of conflict between scientific and religious truths, for nature and religious truths alike come from God who cannot contradict Himself in His works or in His words.

"But for good luck, there go I." This thought, says the Saturday Evening Post, is the beginning of real charity. Christ has set us a still higher standard: that in the poor we see Himself, that we do for them what we would wish to do for Him, knowing that He receives all as done unto Himself. Yet the above thought too should urge us on both to gratitude towards God and generosity towards our neighbor.

It is an excellent thing now and then to look yourself in the eye and ask where you might have been if the scene had been set for you somewhat differently. You began, say, in a comfortable home, where you were properly nourished and protected. You went to school, where, though you did not learn a great deal, you at least had free and pleasant space in which to grow and play. You associated with a comfortably placed, uplooking sort of people; and when you struck out for yourself very likely some of them said a pleasant word for you that helped.

Started in poverty and pinched hard in youth, we too might have succumbed in the struggle. It is well, therefore, and according to the will of Christ, that we change positions in imagination and do for those in need and affliction, what we would that they should have done for us were the tables turned in reality.

The Sisters of Charity of Mount Saint Vincent-on-Hudson have begun preparations for the commemoration of the centenary celebration, in 1917, of the coming of the Sisters of Charity to New York City. The College of Mount Saint Vincent is a growing institution, and new buildings are needed for its adequate expansion. The raising of a building fund has therefore been enthusiastically undertaken by the Alumnæ. The Sisters of Charity have widely expanded the sphere of their activity during the century of their labors in the great metropolis and their efficiency has met with deserved success. This hope therefore expressed by the President of the Alumnæ Association should not be unfounded: That outside the ranks of their own Alumnæ "many other friends of the Sisters of Charity among the clergy and laity will gladly come forward and contribute their quota of help on this memorable anniversary." The resolution to begin with the building fund for Mount Saint Vincent was taken in a meeting attended by two hundred and fifty members of the Alumnæ Association. "On every side," said the President, "other Alumnæ are giving munificent help to their Alma Mater, surely the Alumnæ of Mt. Saint Vincent will emulate the most zealous and most generous of them all."

The pathetic stories of girls dwelling in squalid tenements and barely succeeding in keeping body and soul together from day to day by constant labor, were again revealed in a recent Chicago investigation of the garment trade. The witnesses came from the "cheaper shops" and hence their tales were at times peculiarly pitiful. Here are some of the recorded instances:

> Grace Gross told of an alleged system for evading the ten-hour law: "I go to work at 6, but I am not supposed to punch the time clock until 7:30."
>
> Bessie Alt, who earns $4.00 a week, said that she kept within her income by walking two miles to and from work and spending only twenty-five cents a day for food.
>
> Fannie Berg told of a system of fines: "If damage is done to a garment, the offender is fined $1.50 or $2.00. If the offender is not known, we all are assessed twenty-five cents apiece."
>
> Anna Simsky testified that she worked from 5:30 a. m. to 7 p. m. "How much time did you take for lunch?" asked Alderman Geiger. "No time at all. I work right through the noon hour because I can't live on $5.00 a week. I can't live on that and help my mother, who lives in the old country." The witness said she was paid by the piece, and by working at top speed throughout the day occasionally she was able to earn $7.00.

So in many a dingy shop and lonesome tenement the "Song of the Shirt" is still sung as the poet heard it long ago and expressed it in words that are among the saddest in the English tongue.

The Census Bureau has completed its estimates of the population of cities having over 8,000 inhabitants. The 1910 official population and the 1915 estimates of the ten leading American cities are as follows:

	1910.	1915.
New York	4,766,883	5,468,190
Chicago	2,185,283	2,447,045
Philadelphia	1,549,008	1,683,664
St. Louis	687,029	745,988
Boston	670,585	745,139
Cleveland	560,663	656,975
Baltimore	558,485	584,605
Pittsburgh	533,905	571,984
Detroit	465,766	554,717
Buffalo	423,715	461,335

Cleveland is dissatisfied with the position assigned to it and claims that its population exceeds that of St. Louis. In answer to Cleveland's appeal the Census Bureau has approved the request for a new census and the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce has raised $12,000 to pay the expenses. St. Louis has made like application and the executive order of President Wilson is awaited to undertake the work. Boston, it appears, is calmly satisfied to hold her position between the two conflicting rivals. The phenomenal growth recorded for some of the leading cities within recent years is largely due to annexation of populous territory by extension of the city limits.

"All that is loftiest, sturdiest, strongest and most uncompromising; all that is most truly sacred in the artistic development of our people precedes the days of the Reformation." These are not the words of a Catholic obscurantist. They come from the land whence the Reformation took its rise, from the University of Berlin, from a Protestant leader of historic research, bearing witness to Protestant readers of a truth which history cannot deny. They are from the pen of Kurt Breysig and appeared in the Tag as part of an article calling upon Protestants to cast aside their prejudices and unfounded accusations against the Catholic Church and study her doctrines and practices in a sincere and friendly spirit. "The Catholic ages of our nation represent the time of its vigorous youth, not yet rationalistic and therefore all the stronger," he writes, "but the living Catholic Church is the living witness of this youth." Advancing even farther he thus casts a gauntlet before our materialistic age:

> He whose intellect and spirit have not yet been entirely blinded by the poverty and excessive emptiness of our time may divine from the simplest village church that not only faith, but the might and intellect of humanity are lifted there to a height which our age could never have been able to attain of its own power, nor could any other century have reached to it unaided since the days of the separation from the Catholic Church.

Such is the writer's impartial conclusion necessitated by the obvious testimony of the present and the past. Voices like his are not uncommon in our day. They express the deeper, truer thought of our age. Materialism has proved a failure; Protestantism, a disappointment. Truth and beauty and human happiness must all be sought in that Church for which the hearts of men are yearning, often unconsciously. Within her fold alone they can find all that they have long desired.

Longmans' New Books

The Grand Duchess Benedicta.

By A. E. BURNS. With Colored Frontispiece, and 8 Illustrations in Black-and-White. Crown 8vo. Pp. vi+216. $1.00 net.

A story for girls, the scene of which is laid in a Convent School in England. Some of the younger girls, by way of hoaxing certain of their elders, set on foot a rumor that one of the new comers is a princess, in disguise, and in danger of kidnapping; but the plot is discoverd before any real harm is done.

Life of George Washington. The Father of modern Democracy.

By the Very Rev. JAMES O'BOYLE, B.A., P.P., V.F. With Portrait. Crown 8vo. $1.00 net.

"The work is well written, with a due sense of perspective and proportion and in an altogether appreciative and sympathetic vein."—Ave Maria.

Spiritual Letters of Mgr. Benson to One of His Converts

With a Preface by A. C. BENSON, and Portrait. Crown 8vo. $1.00 net.

"The mere fact that . . . in charm and style and intrinsic value these hurried missives of his pen maintain the high level of his finished works, bears eloquent witness to the indefatigable zeal and charity and the spiritual wisdom and literary mastery of Robert Hugh Benson."—America.

Longmans, Green, & Co.

Fourth Ave. and 30th St., New York

Letter Fourteen to

Rosary Sellers

The Vatti display easel is made expressly to show the nine styles in twelve colors together; a pretty thing with the rosaries hung alongside one-another and yet distinct; twelve different colors.

One easel, with changing signs to fit each rosary selling season, is sent with the smallest supply. There are also cards for the window and store.

Our selling helps will double your rosary trade.

VATTI ROSARY CO., 106 Fulton Street, New York.

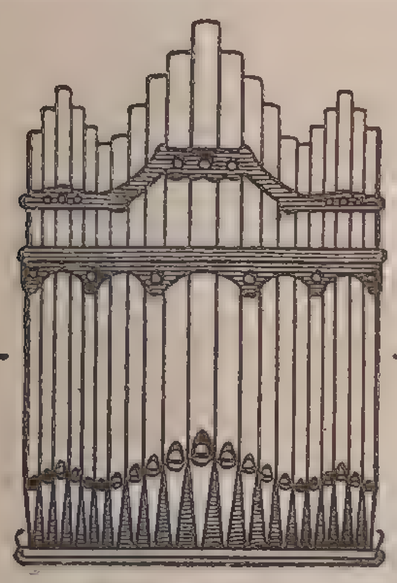
ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

HIGGINS'

Drawing Inks Eternal Writing Ink
Engrossing Ink Taurine Mucilage
Photo Mounter Paste Liquid Paste
Drawing Board Paste Office Paste
Vegetable Glue, Etc.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives



FOR SCHOOL, HOME AND BUSINESS USE

Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the Higgins' Inks and Adhesives. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., MFTS.
271 Ninth St., Brooklyn, N. Y.
Branches - Chicago - London

The Pipes of Esteycraft are playing hymns, anthems, wedding marches and funeral dirges all 'round the earth.

Esteycraft is as busy as ever, for as churches in this country multiply and methods change, the Esteycraft must suggest new conditions and new facilities for increasing musical efficiency.

Estimates and specifications on request.

ESTEY ORGAN COMPANY
Brattleboro Vermont

Memorial Stained Glass Windows

Designed and Executed by Mayer & Co., of Munich

New York Office -:- 178 Madison Avenue

5% First Mortgage Notes

Catholic Church Property in Chicago

executed and signed by the Catholic Bishop of Chicago, by Very Reverend M. J. FitzSimmons, Administrator

These Notes are a direct obligation of the Catholic Bishop of Chicago, a Corporation Sole, created by a special act of the Legislature of Illinois, and legal title to all the property covered by these Mortgage Notes is vested in this Corporation. These Notes are secured by First Mortgage on certain and specified pieces of property. They are further secured by all the church property of the Archdiocese of Chicago. Principal and interest are absolutely secured and the Notes will be converted into cash at their face value by us at any time you may wish to realize upon them. A safe, sound, and convertible investment.

In Denominations of $500 and $1000

Maturing in one to ten years

Maturing interest coupons and principal Notes may be deposited in your own bank for collection or forwarded direct to us. Just as secure—just as safe and in every essential detail just as desirable as placing your money in the best-managed savings bank in the United States.

The Security Increases Each Year

The value of the Catholic Church property in the Chicago Archdiocese has kept step with the vigorous growth of new parishes. The real estate covered by these Notes is located in some of the choicest sections of the city of Chicago and is increasing in value. Though a certain number of the Notes are payable annually, none of the security is to be released until all Notes shall have been paid. In this way the security behind this investment becomes relatively greater each year. Send today for full information, details, etc. We will be pleased to submit a full description of the Notes.

Redeemable at Face Value

These Notes will be redeemed by us at their face value if you wish to convert the Notes into cash. We will charge only a small sum for redeeming them.

Any Banker in Chicago can inform you of the character of these Notes and will also acquaint you with our standing.

We will be pleased to mail you a full description of these Notes. Send today for full information, details, etc.

Ask any Chicago banker if he considers these Notes a safe and very desirable investment.

Cremin & O'Connor,

105 N. Clark Street Dept. 7403 Chicago, Ill.

THE UNIVERSITY IN PRINT

THE GUIDANCE OF A THOUSAND TEACHERS

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

WITH COURSES OF STUDY AND READING IN

Science, Art, Religion, History, Philosophy, Education, Literature, Social Science, Law, Economics, Civics

A NEW EDUCATIONAL MOVEMENT

With the Editors and Contributors of The Catholic Encyclopedia as a Faculty

AN EXPERT

Editor of Dictionaries and Encyclopedias, Frank H. Vizetelly, of Funk & Wagnall's, has this to say of

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

Some may think that this Encyclopedia is restricted to religion. It treats that, of course, but it treats more than that. As its title implies, it is a universal encyclopedia, for the history of the Catholic Church is the history of the universe.

Within the sixteen volumes of The Catholic Encyclopedia, the editors provide:

1. An Encyclopedia of Christian faith.
2. A Standard Dictionary of Catholic Theology.
3. An Encyclopedia of Church History.
4. A Book of Martyrs.
5. A Dictionary of Philosophy.
6. An Encyclopedia of Law—Civil and Ecclesiastical.
7. A Library of the World's Best Literature.
8. A Cyclopedia of Education.
9. A Dictionary of Biography.
10. An Encyclopedia of Music.
11. A Gazetteer of the World.
12. A Museum of Art.

To summarize the subjects treated the reviewer might have termed it a Dictionary of:

Civilization	History	Military Orders	Science
Controversy	Popes	Monasticism	Sects, Churches
Exploration	Saints	Nations, Races	Sociology

14,000 Pages
25,000,000 Words
15,000 Leading Articles
350,000 Subjects
1,543 Writers
153 Revisers, Indexers, and Editorial Assistants

The Catholic Encyclopedia

15 Goupil Color Plates
356 Full Page Halftones and Engravings
66 Original Maps
2,277 Text Illustrations

Fifteen Volumes, Royal Octavo, and Index Volume. Complete Set weighs 61 lbs. One-Half Leather. Size 7 x 10 and 1¼ Inches in thickness.

NEW SPECIAL LIGHT WEIGHT PAPER EDITIONS

IN THREE SPECIAL BINDINGS

For Cloth Binding $40.00 for Complete Set, 16 Volumes
For ½ Leather Binding $60.00 for Complete Set, 16 Volumes
For ½ Tan Arabian Morocco Binding $80.00 for Complete Set, 16 Volumes
Less 10 per cent. for cash or by easy monthly payments of $3.00 or more per month.

FOR CANADA AND PROVINCES, add to above prices $5.00 per set to cover customs and brokerage.

MAIL AT ONCE THIS SPECIAL LOW PRICE COUPON

THE K. of C. CATHOLIC TRUTH COMMITTEE
16 East 40th Street, New York City A, 10

Please send me the new Knights of Columbus Edition of The Catholic Encyclopedia, 16 volumes, bound in.....
for which I enclose.....payment of.....
Name .....
Address .....
Council .....
City.....State.....

N. B.—Complete information and copy of illustrated specimen pages sent free on request.

To Teachers

Are you looking for a Text-Book of the highest efficiency that will prove an important adjunct in class life?

A rapidly increasing number of our Colleges and Schools, all over the country, are using AMERICA as supplementary reading in connection with their various courses.

One large college used last year more than ONE HUNDRED COPIES EACH WEEK.

Its carefully-written pages and well-developed thought, the breadth of its articles, the timeliness of its editorials, and the clear-cut division of the Review, render it a valuable asset in forming the pupils' minds upon the great questions of the day. To the Professor of Ethics, Oratory, Political Economy, Sociology, Pedagogy, Literature, Composition, History, Apologetics and kindred branches it affords an excellent store of illustration.

Precisely because AMERICA gives an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life, is the reason why we want the NATIONAL CATHOLIC WEEKLY in the hands of every Catholic student in the Universities, Colleges and High Schools of the country, as a means to clarify and extend the teaching of the classroom. To aid in this work we have made.

A Special Educational Rate

Applicable only to Catholic Teachers and Catholic Students in Catholic Schools

Send at once for the circular that will explain in detail the comprehensive viewpoint and importance to both teacher and student of this most attractive and advantageous program.

Let us hear from you to-day so that no further issue of the National Catholic Weekly Review may be lost to your class. Begin immediately so that besides instructing them through the pages of AMERICA you may introduce them to the most universally quoted Catholic paper in the English Language and have the reflex benefits of its use in the School felt in the Home.

Hundreds of Teachers and thousands of Pupils are being helped and inspired by its pages, which give a weekly record of Catholic achievement and a defence of Catholic doctrine built up by skilful hands in every region of the globe; an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life; removing traditional prejudice, refuting erroneous news and correcting misstatements about Catholic beliefs and practices.

Write for details.

CIRCULATION BUREAU

The America Press

59 East 83d Street

New York, N. Y.

The Coward Shoe

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Is a Product of American Brains and Industry

The Coward Shoe was born in America 50 years ago. It is the product of the brain of an American shoemaker and is made of American leather, in a sanitary American factory by skilled American workmen with American capital.

We have been told that they are the very best shoes that American brains, industry and capital can make.

Support your home industries. Wear Coward Shoes.

For Men, Women and Children

Sold Nowhere Else

James S. Coward

264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(Near Warren Street)

Mail Orders Filled — Send for Catalog

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

For Non-Contagious Medical Cases

St. Mary's Hill

For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

Reverend Superiors of

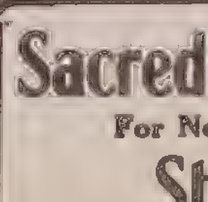
Charitable and Educational Institutions can SAVE MONEY on purchases of Groceries, Teas, Coffees, Canned Goods and Laundry Supplies by dealing with



MARTIN C. DYER

College, Convent, Institution and Hospital Representative of

AUSTIN, NICHOLS & CO., Inc.

New York Sales Office, 100 Hudson St.

Cor. Franklin and Leonard Sts., New York, N. Y.

MENEELY BELL CO.

TROY, N.Y. AND 177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY

BELLS

MENEELY & CO.

Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.

Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequalled musical quality.

59 years' experience

Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal. Memorials.

A Delicious

Sea-Food

Of the Finest Quality

Have you ever tasted codfish a few hours out of the sea? B & M FISH FLAKES are a real New England delicacy that show how delicious fresh codfish really is. Every care is exerised to maintain the flavor and quality of

Burnham & Morrill

Fish Flakes

10c—sizes—15c (Except in Far West)

The deep-sea cod are brought direct from the fishing grounds to our kitchens—prepared at once for the table. Only the choicest parts are used—immediately cooked—slightly salted—then sealed in parchment-lined tins—every ounce is white, solid fish. No bones—no waste—no preservative—pure, sweet, fresh and tender—ready to use without picking, soaking or boiling and as tasty as the hour the fish were caught.

Try one tin and you will use many, because of the quality of the fish, and the ease with which you may quickly prepare delicious and other dainty and appetizing dishes.

Creamed Fish, Codfish Balls, Fish Chowder, Fish Hash

Just try for Breakfast to-morrow CREAMED FISH with Baked Potato

Sold by most grocers. If not at yours, send his name and 2c stamp for generous sample.

Our new booklet "Good Eating" free for the asking.

Burnham & Morrill Co., 12 Water St., Portland Me.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

5 Cents Each
40 Cents a Dozen

Published at a nominal price, on the eighth and twenty-second of the month, the CATHOLIC MIND pamphlets supply to the militant Catholic the most effective weapons with which to meet the threatening issues of the day. There are several important articles on some current question in each number. In handy form these tracts for the times can be kept for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

5 Cents Each
40 Cents a Dozen

The Church and Peace

What Women Can Do

Homicide Excusable and Felonious

Cheap and Precious

What the Church and especially the present Pope have done to promote peace among the nations is shown in Archbishop Hanna's splendid address before the International Peace Congress at San Francisco, which is printed in the CATHOLIC MIND for November 8. What women can do to correct three great evils of the day is outlined, in the same number, in a most illuminating and convincing manner by Daniel A. Lord, S.J.; and two other timely and practical topics, "Homicide Excusable and Felonious" and Neo-Malthusianism are attractively discussed by Father Fisher and Father Blakely.

Since June, 1914, 200,000 Copies of the CATHOLIC MIND have been circulated. We want you to help us to double that number before another year passes.

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

10. Plain Words of Socialism. C. S. Devas, M.A.
13. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
19. Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. Wilfrid Ward

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.

1910

4, 5, 6, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, V. Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Halley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children
18. The XXI Eucharistic Congress. Edward Spillane, S.J.
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. Joseph Husslein, S.J.
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. Henry J. Swift, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
9. Lord Halifax and Anglican Orders. His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific. II, III. Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M. Bishop of Christ Church
17. The People's Pope. M. Kenny, S.J.
24. Father Algué's Barocyclonometer. New York Tribune, Dec. 1912

1913

5. Capital Punishment. Rev. John J. Ford, S.J.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. A. de F.
24. First Encyclical of Benedict XV.

1915

1. The Catholic Press. E. Hull, S.J.
2. The "Menace" and the Mails. Paul Bakewell
3. The Ethics of War. Edward Masterson, S.J.
4. Sixty Historical "Don'ts." James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.
5. The Jesuit Myth. Robert Swickerath, S.J.
6. Fifty "Don'ts" of Science. James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.
   Catholics in the Y. M. C. A. Nelson Hume
7. Catholic Sociology. Richard H. Tierney, S.J.
   Newman's Alleged "Scurrility" Paul Bakewell
8. Was Shakespeare a Catholic? James J. Walsh, M. D., Ph.D.
9. The Church and the Mexican Revolution. By a Mexican Lawyer
10. Dante's 650th Birthday. James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D., Litt.D.
    How to Reach the Medieval Mind. Vincent McNabb, O.P.
11. Magna Charta's Centenary. P. Guilday, Ph. D.
12. The Church and the Sex Problem. Richard H. Tierney, S.J.
13. The War's Lesson. Rt. Rev. Thomas O'Dwyer, D.D.
14. Catholic Schools for Catholic Youth. Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
15. Temperance Against Prohibition. Henry Maurice
16. The Papacy. His Eminence Cardinal Mercier
17. The Church and the Immigrant. Rt. Rev. Francis C. Kelley, D.D.
18. The Contemporary Drama. James J. Daly, S.J.
19. The Catholic School. William D. Guthrie
20. The Educational Influence of the Catholic Press. Richard H. Tierney, S.J.

Special Rates: Pamphlets for 1908-1911, inclusive, $1.00 per hundred; for 1912-14, inclusive, $2.00 per hundred; for 1915, $3.00 per hundred.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

FOR TEN CENTS

These three important pamphlets sent to any address

HOLY COMMUNION FOR CHILDREN

THE END JUSTIFIES THE MEANS

THE CATHOLIC WORKING GIRL

ALL THREE FOR TEN CENTS

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street NEW YORK

ANY 3 FOR $1.00
ALL 6 FOR $1.50

You can't neglect this opportunity to secure a most attractive group of volumes combining pleasure, profit and instruction.

SOCIALISM

A volume of ten excellent essays by foremost Catholic writers. All written in a concise and popular style.
280 Pages Price 50 cents

LORETTO

Annals of the pioneer Congregation of American Sisters of Charity. A Book of Historical Interest.
By ANNA C. MINOGUE
300 Pages 21 Illustrations
Price 50 cents

THE NAMES OF GOD

and Meditative Summaries of the Divine Perfection
By the
Ven. LEONARD LESSIUS, S.J.
Translated by T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.
248 pages, large type, with portrait
Price 50 cents

LIFE AND LETTERS OF

HENRY VAN RENSSELAER

Priest of the Society of Jesus
By EDWARD P. SPILLANE, S.J.
An illustrated volume of 350 pages
Price 75 cents

ISAAC JOGUES

DISCOVERER OF LAKE GEORGE
By T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.
55 Pages 9 Illustrations
Price 25 cents

LIFE OF

Venerable Philippine Duchesne

Founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, and one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.
Price 25 cents POSTAGE EXTRA

THE AMERICA PRESS,
59 East 83d Street, New York

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS

This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc., with serges, merinos, draps d'été, linens, etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM AND STRAUS

420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

ATLAS OF IRELAND

Coats of Arms of 700 Families. Write for free list and see if you are entitled to

Heraldic Honors

P. Murphy & Son, 279 Church St., N. Y.

What Shall I Be?

A CHAT WITH YOUNG PEOPLE

By the
Rev. Francis Cassilly, S.J.

A handy manual that presents in brief and simple form sound principles to assist the young in deciding their future course of Life. The choice of vocations is a pressing subject at this season of the year.

Cloth, 30 cents	Paper, 10 cents
12 copies, $2.70	12 copies, $1.00
50 copies, $10.00	50 copies, $4.00
100 copies, $22.50	100 copies, $7.50

Postage extra

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

VERY REV. S. W. FAY, S.T.D.
Rector.

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.
Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates) Schools
The Dean, Georgetown University
The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.
The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital
The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.
The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E. St., N. W
The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University
The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

Carlton Academy

UPPER SCHOOL for older boys gives thorough preparation for all colleges. Individual attention. Commercial Courses. Athletic Sports. Resident Chaplain.

LOWER SCHOOL for younger boys, with Housemother to give personal care.

SUMMIT Charles H. Schultz. A.M.,
New Jersey Headmaster.

Send your boy to
MT. WASHINGTON SEMINARY
Mt. Washington, Maryland
COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR BOYS
6 TO 13 YEARS
For catalogue apply to DIRECTRESS

FOUR SPLENDID VOLUMES

Dealing with American History

For $6.00 Postage Extra

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold

Pioneer Laymen of North America

Telling the fascinating story of the adventurous Cartier, Menendez, Champlain, De La Tour, Maisonneuve, Le Moyne and Radisson.

One of the most picturesque and fascinating periods in American history, that of the exploits of the French in Canada is the foundation of the first volume "Pioneer Laymen of North America."—New York Sun.

Father Campbell has done a noted service to history and to the Church.—The Monitor.

The volume abounds in variety. — Tablet (Brooklyn).

Father Campbell has given to the public one of the most valuable books of his prolific career.—Catholic Columbian.

It is both historic and romantic.—Catholic Universe.

Father Campbell is to be congratulated for his timely work.—Tidings.

300 Pages. 16 Illustrations. Price $1.75. Postage extra.

Among the Iroquois

Volume I

An Interesting Story of the Missionaries among the Iroquois.

Father Campbell's book is one of permanent interest and value.—Evening Post (New York.)

Interesting to Protestants and Catholics alike for its historical value.—Star (Atlanta.)

333 Pages. 27 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

Among the Hurons

Volume II

Tells the Heroic Story of De Brebeuf and His Associates.

It is a story of which the Church and the Order may well feel proud.—Sun (New York.)

480 Pages. 24 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

Among the Algonquins

Volume III

The Ethnic Group that figured more extensively in Our History than any other Indian Family.

The noble history of those old French priests is excellently told by their modern confrère, and it is a history with which every intelligent American Catholic should become familiar.—Catholic Historical Review.

336 Pages. 22 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street
New York

Schools and Colleges

Mt. St. Joseph College and Academy

DUBUQUE, IOWA

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity, B. V. M.
Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, Washington, D. C.
Chartered by the Legislature of Iowa.

Excellent facilities for the Education of Young Women. College Courses of four years leading to Baccalaureate Degrees. Academy Courses four years. School of Music. Teachers' and Supervisors' Training Course in School Music. School of Fine Arts. Teachers' Training Course in Art. Department of Household Arts and Science. Normal and Commercial Courses. Preparatory Department. Fifty-acre Campus. Pineries. Finely equipped Buildings.

For Year-Book address SISTER SUPERIOR.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES
Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in Separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

St. Joseph's College and Academy

EMMITSBURG, MARYLAND

Courses College, Commercial, Academic, Preparatory

Course in Pedagogy open to Senior and Junior College Students

Exceptional advantages in Music, Art, Domestic Science

Founded 1809. . . FREE CATALOGUE

ACADEMY OF OUR LADY

Ninety-fifth and Throop Streets
Longwood, CHICAGO, ILL.

A pure and lofty conception of life, high sense of duty, a noble type of Christian womanhood, refinement, and thorough scholarship, music and artistic culture, physical vigor and health, are the standards set for

YOUR DAUGHTER
AT THE
ACADEMY OF OUR LADY

Full range of Scientific, Classical, Literary and Historical Studies.

Catalogue sent on application.

Catholic Reader's Guide

Introduction to Catholic Reading.

A Classified, Suggestive List of Select Catholic Publications

By J. HAVENS RICHARDS, S.J.

This list suggests the best works available in the surprisingly large store of Catholic literature. It is of special use to spiritual directors, teachers, parents, and librarians in encouraging those under their charge to develop a taste for profitable reading.

Ten Cents a Copy, Postage Extra

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street
New York

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT
Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the
Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson, 40 minutes from New York City.

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
MOUNT MARIAN, WASHINGTON, D. C.

High-class school for young women and girls. Situated in the Suburbs.

Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Abundant out-door exercise in beautiful suburban grounds; individual attention to character training; happy home life; thorough scholarship.

SPECIAL TWO-YEAR COURSE of COLLEGE work for high school graduates.

FULL PREPARATORY and ELECTIVE courses.

MUSIC, ART, EXPRESSION and domestic science.

All the advantages of the National Capital and sightseeing, with experienced chaperones.

For Illustrated Year Book Address
SISTER SECRETARY, DEP'T. F.

MT. ST. AGNES COLLEGE
Mt. Washington, Maryland

Day and Resident Students
Courses leading to Degree of A.B.
Professors of Distinction

Department of Pedagogy. State Certificates, teachers' license for public schools of Maryland, issued by the State Board of Education.

Music, Art and Domestic Science

For Information Apply to the Directress

College and Academy of St. Genevieve
FOR YOUNG LADIES
ASHEVILLE. N. C.

Located in the "Land of the Sky," 3,000 feet above sea level. Unsurpassed climatic conditions with mild winters. Ideal home-life. Instructors hold degrees from European and American Universities. St. Genevieve's also has a Preparatory Department for young children.

On account of the war which prevents Americans from visiting France, a new Department, known as the Lycée has been formed where students have exactly the same advantages as in France.

A few Lady boarders are received during the Summer months.

For Catalogue and Particulars Apply to the Mother Superior

ST. FRANCIS XAVIER
COLLEGE and ACADEMY
Sisters of Mercy
4928 XAVIER PARK, CHICAGO, ILL.

The first Catholic College for women in Chicago—chartered 1912. Freshman class only in September, 1915.

Write for Prospectus

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute
For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

Seton Hill Schools

St. Joseph Academy for Girls

GREENSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA
On main line P. R. R., 30 miles from Pittsburgh
Elementary and High School Courses. University affiliation.
Two years' advanced Course for High School Graduates.
Conservatories of Music and Art.
Domestic Science. Gymnasium. Field Sports.
Address Department E

St. Mary's Annex for Small Boys

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent
On Hudson
CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B. A. and B. S.

COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT

ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON

CITY OF NEW YORK

Mount de Sales
Academy of the Visitation
CATONSVILLE (NEAR BALTIMORE) MARYLAND
Ideal School for Young Ladies

Classic, Literary and Scientific Courses. French and German receive special attention. Departments of Music, Art and Elocution. Magnificent situation.

Ask for Illustrated Catalogue

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts, Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE WORCESTER MASS.
Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers
LARGEST CATHOLIC COLLEGE IN AMERICA

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue . . . . . Prefect of Studies.

The W. J. Feeley Company

347 Fifth Avenue, New York City

169 South Angell Street, Providence, R. I.

Chalice
No. 1811
Height
9 inches

Of sterling silver,
gold plated,
$60.00

Sterling silver cup and paten,
gold plated,
$40.00

In every line there is one product that is recognized preeminent. The Ecclesiastical Work of the Feeley Company has long since been awarded that distinction. Their artistic staff of designers and modellers with an efficient corps of skilled workers produce the most artistic creations in metal. A visit to the New Factory, now in complete working order, will be of interest. Catalogues on application.

Ready December 6th

A Notable Contribution to American History

The Life of Father De Smet, S.J.

BY

E. LAVEILLE, S.J.

Authorized Translation by Marion Lindsay

With an Introduction by Charles Coppens, S.J.

8vo Cloth. Gilt Top. Illustrated. Boxed. $2.75 net.
(Postage Extra.)

No book of recent years is more deserving of attention by the Catholics of America. Not only is the subject of this biography the most celebrated of the missionaries to the Indian during the last Century, but his remarkable zeal for souls and his wonderful achievements commanded the attention of our Government, which relied upon his great influence to negotiate with the Indians the treaties necessary to the establishment of law and order. We have no hesitation in saying that a more fascinating book of biographical and historical interest to Catholics has not been published in the last decade.

Advance orders will be shipped on day of publication.

P. J. KENEDY & SONS

44 Barclay Street, New York

SECOND VOLUME

READY EARLY IN DECEMBER

SECOND VOLUME

PIONEER LAYMEN OF NORTH AMERICA

BY THE

Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, S.J.

Uniform in style with the first volume
300 Pages; 15 portraits, illustrations and maps

This second volume of the series of historical sketches of Catholic pioneer laymen that have been received with such favor by the public, continues the narratives to include the careers of Le Moyne Perrot, D'Iberville, Frontenac, La Salle, Bienville, La Verendrye, and the famous Dr. John McLaughlin, the Father of Oregon.

"Father Campbell . . . has given to the public in Pioneer Laymen of North America one of the most valuable works of his prolific career."—Catholic Columbian.

"The general treatment is as scholarly as the sketches are fascinating."—Catholic Tribune.

"Father Campbell is to be congratulated for his timely work."—Tidings.

"These studies will go far to give American history a true and proper conception of these old Catholic heroes."—Tablet.

"One of the most picturesque and fascinating periods in American history . . . is the foundation of the first volume."—Sun (New York).

"The stories are told each with the same fulness of detail as in Father Campbell's earlier work."—The Month.

"A book for Americans."—The Monitor.

"From the Catholic viewpoint also, Father Campbell continues to correct the misstatements or misinterpretations of previous writers, largely non-Catholic and frequently prejudiced."—Catholic Historical Review.

Price $1.75 Postage Extra
The Two Volumes for $3.00

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d St., New York, N.Y.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIV, No. 5
WHOLE No. 344

NOVEMBER 13, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, Nov. 1, p.m.-Nov. 9, a. m.—Central Serbia—The Fall of Nish—Southern Serbia—Other Items. Austria-Hungary: New Emblems. France: Policy of France; Finance. Germany: The Food Problem. Great Britain: Kitchener Leaves London—Mr. Asquith and the House of Commons. Ireland: Recruiting; Home Rule. Mexico: The Week's News; Important Testimony 97-100

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Right Reason the Cure—Socialistic Misunderstandings—The Church and the Laity—XLII—The Young Man and Forestry—Catholic Landmarks of Boston.....101-107

COMMUNICATIONS

The Open Shop—Modern Prison Methods—Objectionable Names for Institutions—The "Articles" and the Sacraments—Rational Athletics. 107-109

EDITORIALS

Archbishop Prendergast — Votes for Women — Comstock's Latest Critic—The Nation's Delinquent Debtors — Herman Ridder — "Scientific Character Analysis"—The Governor's Daughter. 110-113

LITERATURE

XIII—Joseph Conrad.

REVIEWS: The Pilgrim Kings—The German Jesuit Fathers of Bombay—The Fall of Tsingtau—A Hilltop on the Marne—The Neutrality of Belgium—The Log of a Non-combatant—The Drama of Three Hundred and Sixty-five Days—The Lusitania's Last Voyage—Recollections of an Irish Judge—The Irish Abroad.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The November Queen's Work and Extension — "Dear Enemy" — "Steve Yeager" — "The 'Summa Theologica' of St. Thomas Aquinas, Part II"—"Popular Sermons on the Catechism"—"Christopher Columbus"—"Lotta's Career"—"The Burden of Honor"—"'Common Sense' Applied to Woman Suffrage."

BOOKS RECEIVED 113-116

EDUCATION

The Gary Plan in New York: A Criticism..117

SOCIOLOGY

Are Parents Superfluous?.....118, 119

NOTE AND COMMENT

Federation of Catholic Alumnæ—The Pennies of the Poor—A Touch of Oxford—Socialists and Suffragists — The Immigration Problem — The Pan-Protestant Congress—"Our Knowledge of Christ" 119, 120

CHRONICLE

The War.—On none of the battle fronts except the Serbian has the situation undergone any material change. Vigorous fighting in Artois and Champagne has left the Allies and Germans in the same deadlock. Italy's offensive in the Alps has been blocked by heavy snow, while her attacks on Goritz have not only proved ineffective, but have prevented her from sending assistance to Serbia. The rumor that the Allies were to withdraw from Gallipoli has so far proved false, but fighting in this theater seems to be more or less at a standstill. The Austrians have had some unimportant successes along the Strypa, otherwise the Russian line is where it was last week.

Bulletin, Nov. 1, p. m.-Nov. 9, a. m.

The subjugation of Serbia is proceeding irresistibly. About two-thirds of her territory is in the hands of her enemies. Her armies are divided into two parts, with a strong Bulgarian force between them, and there is no prospect of reuniting them short of an overwhelming victory over the Bulgarians, a thing that at present is scarcely within the range of possibility.

Central Serbia

The portion of Serbian troops that is operating north of Uskub, and still holds a considerable part of central Serbia, is fighting stubbornly but apparently hopelessly along three-fifths of what may be roughly described as the circumference of a giant circle, and is steadily giving way before superior numbers and especially before superior artillery. On the west the Austrians, having advanced from Visegrad, have taken Uzice, driven the Serbians to the east of the Jelica Mountains, and at the same time moved south from Milanovac and Cacak, and reached Ivanjica. To the west of the Morava, the Germans operating in conjunction with the Austrians have moved south and captured both Kragujevac and Kralievo. The Germans have proceeded down the Morava valley, captured Varvarin, crossed the West Morava, and seized Krusevac. The loss of Krusevac is the more serious for the Serbians because it means the loss of their last large arsenal; it has also given the invaders control of the Nish-Uzice railroad, and combined with the fall of Nish and the advance of the Bulgarians to Sarko Banja, has forced the Serbians to abandon the thirty-five miles between Varvarin and Nish, the last portion of the Orient railroad still in their hands.

Now that this remaining strip of the railroad is in possession of the Germans, they have established unbroken railroad communication with Constantinople. There is a good deal of speculation as to what will be the next move of the Central Powers. Austria and Bulgaria would doubtless prefer the entire subjugation of Serbia. Germany is said, with what truth is a matter only of conjecture, to have turned her eyes towards Suez and Egypt. But in any case the Allies, with Germany at Constantinople, will have little chance of success at Gallipoli.

The fall of Nish was the principle event of the week. A strong Bulgarian force advancing from Knjasevac attacked the city from the northeast and the east. The Bulgarian force to the east of the city, in the Nisava valley, was at first routed by the Serbians, but this victory proved unavailing as soon as the Bulgarian guns on the heights to the northeast of the city began to shell the Serbian positions. After three days of bombardment, during which the Serbians made heroic efforts to repel the attack, the Bulgarians took the city by storm.

The Fall of Nish

Between Nish and Uskub the Serbians are falling back at Leskovac. They have fallen back, also, a little to the west of Uskub and Kuprili, but have succeeded in defeating the Bulgarian efforts to outflank the forces of the Allies at Krivolak. Pushing south from Kuprili the Bulgarians made their way as far as the Babuna Pass, where they were defeated by the Serbians and the Allies and forced to retreat. Except for this victory, however, and another success gained by British cavalry over the advance troops of the Bulgarians near Ochrida, on the western Serbian border, neither the Serbians nor the Allies have accomplished anything of importance.

Southern Serbia

The Serbian forces in central Serbia are doomed unless they can retreat into Montenegro and Albania by way of Novibazar and Prisrend. Even this chance of escape is now menaced by the Austrians, who have advanced from Cattaro and Bilek, in Dalmatia, and are fighting vigorously along the western boundary of Montenegro. The Serbian forces in southern Serbia are not as yet in danger; but if the Austrians, Bulgarians and Germans throw the united strength of their armies against them, a move that is not thought likely, the Serbians will have to retreat into Greece, unless they are helped by much larger forces of the Allies than are at present stationed, mainly on the defensive, along the line from Krivolak to the south of Strumnitza. The Serbian situation, therefore, bids fair to be a repetition of the situation in Belgium.

The internal affairs of Greece are again in confusion. The War Minister, General Yanakitsas, having put what M. Venizelos called an affront on the Chambers, an apology was demanded. The Premier, M. Zaimis, preferred to risk a vote of confidence. This was refused by the deputies by a large majority. As a consequence, M. Zaimis and his Cabinet resigned. The King has induced M. Skouldoudis to form a new Cabinet, which, except for the Premier, is the same as the Cabinet of M. Zaimis. As this Cabinet, like the last, is at the mercy of M. Venizelos, its success is to a large extent problematical.

Other Items

The United States has sent a note to London, which protests against the blockade as illegal, declares that Great Britain is guilty of a manifestly unjust curtailment of the rights of American citizens, insists that the relations between the United States and Great Britain "be governed, not by a policy of expediency, but by . . . established rules of international conduct," and then asserts that the "United States unhesitatingly assumes" "the task of championing the integrity of neutral rights."

Austria-Hungary.—A very significant step has been taken by Emperor Franz Joseph. At his command the Dual Monarchy is henceforth to have one and the same banner and one common coat-of-arms. The emblems of Austria and Hungary have been united into one to express the intimate bond which makes of the kingdom and empire one single realm. For this purpose a new coat-of-arms was first designed for Austria and Hungary respectively, the two emblems were then combined, forming the new coat-of-arms of the realm. The band uniting them was inscribed with the motto: Indivisibiliter ac inseparabiliter. The new Hungarian coat-of-arms takes Dalmatia and Bosnia into account, while Cisleithania is henceforth "Austria." The round-about expression hitherto officially used, "the kingdoms and countries represented in the realm," has passed into history. The Emperor has addressed a letter to the army and navy, telling them that the many nationalities now fighting side by side with heroic bravery and self-sacrifice, will leave an unfading memory behind them in this new symbol of unity.

New Emblems

France.—Briand, the new Premier, set forth to the Chamber of Deputies France's policy in these words:

> France will not sign a peace agreement until after her restoration by right of victory, and until she shall have obtained all guarantees of a durable peace.
>
> . . . . . .
>
> France in this war is the champion of the world. She is fighting for civilization and liberty. A durable peace can be given to the world only when France and her allies have restored the liberty of the peoples, secured for them the enjoyment of their autonomy. Then why vain discussion? Grant us today unanimous confidence. Do not follow us blindly, and judge us by our acts.

Policy of France; Finance

At the conclusion of the speech from which these passages were taken, a resolution of confidence in the new Government was passed by a vote of 551 to 1. An examination of France's finances shows that within the last three months 2,075,000,000 francs were spent each month. During the preceding three months the average monthly expense amounted to 1,870,000,000 francs, while during the first half of the year 1915, it was 1,665,000,000 francs. The last balance-sheet of the Bank of France reports a gold-reserve of over 4,437,000,000 francs, exactly 308,000,000 more than at the end of July, 1914. This increase has resulted from the fact that the public exchanged gold for banknotes; the total amount of this exchange from June 1 to September 16, was 730,000,000 francs. Since July a weekly average of 75,000,000 francs of gold has poured into the Bank. The silver reserve is 364,000,000 francs and the Bank's available sums abroad reach 973,000,000 francs. On August 31 the sum total of National Defense Certificates subscribed (reimbursements deducted) amounted to 7,871,000,000 francs, while the sum total of the National Defense Bonds subscribed amounted to 2,241,000,000 francs. These sums have met almost all the expenses of the war since the beginning of July; the State has borrowed from the Bank, from July 15 to September 16, only 200,000,000 francs. Another issue of bonds is expected in a short time and indications are that it will be well received.

Germany.—The food problem has again come to the foreground in Germany. According to Government statements there is no shortage of food, but the supply at hand has been manipulated to the disadvantage of the poorer classes. Apparently speculation in food has likewise helped to bring on the crisis which now calls for stringent Government action. "Those who are practising usury with food supplies are traitors to the nation," says the Kölnische Volkszeitung, a paper which severely criticises the Prussian Minister of Agriculture, declaring that "The prices of the bare necessities of life have become impossible." "It is an ostrich-like policy to wonder at the increasing discontent which is overmastering large sections of the people. This dismal and unholy practice must not proceed further. It must be stopped, and the Government must at once take steps to make life possible for the poorer classes." The following is the statement made upon the subject by the Mayor of Berlin:

The Food Problem

> It is not a question of food shortage at all. It is a question of prices. The prevailing high prices have caused an unequal distribution. We are not worried over any prospect that the food might not last, because we know exactly what we need and we have it. But it is our duty to see that every one gets what he needs and the Government intends to do just that.

A huge potato crop will be apportioned throughout the empire by the newly organized Imperial Potato Department. That there is a decided shortage in other kinds of food is without doubt. The Government is seeking to meet this situation by the newly assigned "no meat" days. Two days of each week are to be without meat, Friday being one of them; two days are without meat cooked in fat and one without pork. Maximum prices have been set for butter, milk, eggs, cheese, fish, paraffin, bread, lard and potatoes.

Great Britain.—Rumor continues to find new occupations for Lord Kitchener. He has left London, an official statement announces, "at the request of his colleagues for a short visit to the eastern theater of the war." An additional bulletin issued on the same day, November 6, denied that Kitchener had tendered his resignation or that his departure "in any way betokens that such resignation is contemplated." However the London Globe persisted in holding that the Minister of War had resigned, and was suppressed for its pains. It is thought that Lord Kitchener is proceeding to the Balkans and that his trip will include Egypt, Mesopotamia and the Dardanelles.

Kitchener Leaves London

Henceforth the conduct of the war will be entrusted to a Cabinet committee of from three to five members. This is probably the most important announcement in the speech of the Premier to the House on November 2, and is considered to be the result of a compromise with those who hold that a Cabinet of twenty-two members is too unwieldy to be efficient. Speaking of the possibility of conscription, the Premier very probably expressed the opinion of the nation when he said that "if you apply compulsion without the general assent of the people you defeat your purpose." He felt satisfied with the methods which had been applied by Lord Derby; and he thought that by November 30, the scheme would have proved its value. If it had not, then he would not "hesitate to recommend some form of legal obligation." Touching upon the Dardanelles campaign, Mr. Asquith wished to accept all the responsibility, admitting that it had been undertaken without the complete assent of Lord Fisher. The movement, however, had not been wholly unsuccessful; it was, moreover, necessary, not "as an isolated thing, but as part of the larger strategic questions raised by reason of developments in the Balkans." For the future, the Premier announced, there would be closer cooperation between the staffs of the Allied Powers. At the conclusion of the speech, Sir Edward Carson rose to criticise with some sharpness the ill-considered plans of the Cabinet, and in particular its "gyrating policies" in the Balkan affair. The Premier was defended by Sir Edward Grey and by Mr. John Redmond.

Mr. Asquith and the House of Commons

Ireland.—Lord Kitchener and the recruiting officers are calling for more and more men. The former has written a letter of appeal to the Lord Lieutenant praising the Irish for their gallantry and asserting that Irishmen will never allow their regiments to be left without reinforcements. General Friend in a report to the Lord Lieutenant states that since the beginning of the war Ireland has furnished 81,000 new recruits. In a recent Mansion House speech Redmond said:

Recruiting; Home Rule

> Let me give you a few figures. In addition to some 30,000 odd reservists who were called to the colors from Ireland when the war began, and in addition to some 22,000 Irishmen from Ireland who were in the army at the time the war began, Ireland has sent 81,408 recruits since the war broke out. The City of Dublin, where I am now speaking, alone has sent 14,151 men. Of these 81,408 recruits, 44,689 were Catholics and 36,719 were Protestants. And today, taking the number of men in the Army at the commencement of the war and the reservists who were called up, and the recruits who have since joined, there are in the Army now from Ireland 133,454 men; and of that great total 79,511 are Catholics, and 52,943 are Protestants. . . . I have made inquiries in every direction, and from these inquiries I have come to the conclusion that at least 80,000 more men were rejected by the military authorities. . . . In many places that I know two out of three recruits were rejected by the authorities; and if you take that figure that I have given you of 80,000 as approximately correct, then you will have the extraordinary fact that, in addition to the reservists and the old soldiers, 160,000 men in Ireland have since the war began volunteered for the British Army.

Perhaps the significance of this can be judged from the fact that General Friend estimates the wastage of war at 100 per cent each year. Despite Mr. Redmond's usual optimism he, in common with many other Irishmen, is becoming a bit apprehensive about Home Rule. His Mansion House speech contains this significant passage:

But, gentlemen, those of us who are responsible for leading the national forces of Ireland would be guilty, not only of an act of folly, but a grave betrayal of our duty, if, in the face of the uncertainties, of the dangers of the situation, a situation, remember, changing almost hour by hour, we did not warn the Irish people of the risks of disorganization.

In the present position of affairs no man can tell the moment at which the gravest political issues may arise. The existence of the present Coalition Government is precarious. It is threatened by internal as well as external dangers. There is no doubt about it, at the present moment a rich and powerful conspiracy is menacing its very existence, made up of men who apparently are ready to sacrifice national unity in the face of the enemy in order to further their own predilections and theories and convictions, and any day we may be faced with a new reconstruction or by proposals which would end instantly the political truce, and rend the British people into contending factions. It is the common talk of political circles in England today that a General Election, not, mark you, on agreed lines, but on lines of the fiercest contention, may possibly arise.

Apparently the warnings of New Ireland, frequently noted in AMERICA, are not without foundation.

The Week's News; Important Testimony

Mexico.—The important news of the week can be briefly summarized as follows: Villa, who is apparently enraged against the United States, was worsted in the battle of Agua Prieta and suffered some defections from his army; Carranza still continues to score diplomatic triumphs; Lind and Silliman, it is reported, have been in conference with him, and his Government has demanded the extradition of Huerta, basing its argument on the supposed confession of Cardenas, who was shot by the Carranzistas a short time since, for alleged complicity in the murder of Madero. Meantime testimony about conditions in Mexico continues to be given by unimpeachable witnesses. The Red Cross, it will be remembered, was requested by our State Department and the Carranza Government to discontinue its work in Mexico, on the plea that further assistance was unnecessary. The current number of the American Red Cross Magazine has this to say of conditions at the time of the Society's withdrawal:

At this time, just as was the case a month previous, many deaths were occurring daily from starvation, and the country as a whole was in a pitiable plight economically and industrially. It had been devastated from end to end and so impoverished and demoralized that under the most favorable conditions it would be possible only slightly to alleviate the suffering which will be forced upon the Mexican people during the ensuing winter. General Carranza's assurances that the situation will be cared for, therefore, have not wholly dispelled the feeling of sincere regret on the part of the American Red Cross over relinquishing its part of the relief work. It is hard, for instance, to leave a locality where many thousands of families, mothers and babies predominating, have been absolutely dependent for sustenance upon small portions of nourishing vegetable soup which we have daily distributed. Half famished mothers with skeleton babies at their breasts have besought the Red Cross agents in the name of all that is holy to do something for their babes, to save them if they could not save the mothers, and there have been many formerly well-to-do persons, not the peon class, who have been among the pitiful petitioners for Red Cross aid.

The following letter just received from a Central American republic is equally significant:

To the Editor of AMERICA:

May the voice of an exile convey to you his sincere appreciation and thanks for your fearless and intelligent defense of the unfortunate Mexicans? Your editorial "The Wonder Grows" in the issue of October 2 is excellent, stating, as it does, briefly and clearly just what Carranza is. Had the Catholics of the States heeded your clear exposure of the state of affairs they could have convinced the public of the truth of your statements founded so strongly on undeniable facts. . . . For all of us who have had the "rare privilege" of knowing Carranza and Villa personally, it is a matter of wonder how any decent people or government can deal with such rascals. I could tell you more disgraceful deeds which of late the Carranzistas have done in Merida, even profaning the most Holy Eucharist, but what is the use of sickening people with the same old stories? Humanly speaking we hope for no remedy from men. God only can help us, and I beg the Catholics of the States, that they unceasingly pray God to lessen the sufferings of so many who are starving, soul and body.

These two passionless reports are borne out by this statement of the Washington correspondent of the Chicago Tribune:

All that is known is that the archives of the State Department, which the Wilson Administration has made more secret than the dossiers of the Russian secret police, are crammed with reports from American diplomatic and consular officers and confidential emissaries depicting conditions in Mexico shocking beyond belief. There are important reports of a late date setting forth a state of anarchy in Mexico which raise a substantial doubt of the ability of Carranza or any other factional leader to establish a stable government.

There are hundreds of reports of the murdering and spoliation of Americans and the persecution of the Catholic clergy and nuns. There are recorded in these secret files the names of more than three hundred Americans whose lives have been sacrificed, since Diaz was kicked out, to the weak policy of the American Government in protecting its citizens in a neighbor State. There are also filed the claims of Americans for damages for destruction of property said to aggregate more than $100,000,000.

Needless to say Carranza's press agents are diligent in picturing the great reforms that are to be inaugurated; they assert, too, that "Catholic priests are not to be molested unless they have interfered or will interfere in politics." It should always be remembered that, in this matter, Carranza is judge, jury, prosecutor, and attorney for the defendant.

LOYOLA LIBRARY PACIFIC SCHOOL OF RELIGION

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Right Reason the Cure

MUCH of the opposition to woman suffrage has been as trivial or false as are the representations in its favor; and this irritant has reacted in favor of the propaganda of votes for women. Superficial objections are exasperating even to women of ordinary culture having a conscious sense of the dignity of their human nature and an interior conviction that social disorder is not past cure. To object to women voting on the silly pretext of the time it takes to drop a piece of paper in a box down-town, is to arouse their contempt for conservatism in general. This is a grave matter, for upon the popular contempt for what is medieval has been set up this false standard: What is new is good and what is old is bad, merely because it is no longer new. By going over to the evolutionists' camp, women disgusted by silly objections, swell the army of those who take it for granted that this false hypothesis is scientifically demonstrable. No, the rock of right reason is not split, it cannot be, but the enemy, departing from it, pitch their camp upon the sands. These cultists have an arbitrary starting-point, nowhere. They read the origin of the race in a painful uplifting on his hind legs of the beast which through eons of progress became the tool-using animal of today, and is evolving towards greater perfection. What the final outcome will be only the idealists see in suprasensible vision. Yet it is their fixed conviction that the human being is all incomplete. So, logically from this false reasoning a multitude have taken as their god progress, going somewhere, just where is a mental delirium.

Fortunately these up-to-date folk find their progress barred by the real conservatives, those who accept the truth that while God's design of the cosmos is complete, the phenomena of the human world roll on from one historic epoch to another with never a change in the basic nature of mankind, and never a change in those fundamental laws which we are bound to obey because our Creator imposed them upon us. Hence we may make heavenly progress by obedience to God's law, or progress in evil by disobedience to God's law. Of course, Catholics have no difficulty on this score; we know we shall arrive, ultimately, at one place or the other, heaven or hell. But, as progress is but a process, the question is whither do we want to go, while yet under the law of Cæsar? Into greater disorder? If not, we must defend marriage as a Sacrament; taking steps to recover the moral ground already lost by Cæsar and we must devise new measures for safeguarding domestic integrity.

Conservatism does not mean stagnation, but an active defense of what is old and good and a spirited advance in what is new and good. All human doors are indeed open to error, but we should be able to distinguish between mere matters of public policy and movements in defiance of the Decalogue; between free trade or protection which a nation may adopt without the violation of basic rights, political or economic, and Socialism which cannot be endorsed without the violation of our natural right to private property in land and capital. So, too, we should be able to distinguish between widowed mothers' pensions which preserve the home to broken families and woman suffrage which invades the political integrity of families.

However trivial many objections to woman suffrage, there are others sweeping in character yet utterly useless. To refuse the vote on the ground of inferior intelligence is an outrage to woman's nature, and it breeds sex rebellion. It has set up the endless iteration that men, stupid men at that, make the laws which class women with the irresponsible members of the community, children, paupers, idiots, criminals. The question of woman's rights has been confounded with the question of votes for women and the battle has waxed hot and furious, these many years, upon this impossible ground of adjustment. Woman's rights are hers by the gift of God, and are protected at the court of Rome. But votes for women is a plank in rebellion's platform made by those who scorn Rome and contemn the moral order by presuming an independence of the sexes which right reason cannot tolerate. Human intelligence is necessarily expressed through the male and female structures, and the form of these structures being unlike, but perfectly complementary, should show and does show that the male intelligence and the female intelligence follow necessarily upon the functions naturally and basically in operation within the complementary fields of life work. It is not then a question of equal intelligence or of equal rights or of equal duties, but rather, if I may so express it, a question of male and female rights and duties within those spheres of operation native to man and to woman, and the basic cooperation between the intelligent halves of the one race.

It should be simple enough that the norm for measuring the intelligence of women is not the same as that by which man's intelligence is judged; unless we are willing to be classed at the level of the wit of the old woman who, insisting that "a pint's a pound the world around," gave the hunter a pint of buckshot for the price of a pound.

If only God and Cæsar were better served, votes for women could gain no foothold. God put man at the head of the family and woman at the head of the home. If the natural law is violated, we must suffer the consequences, for human nature is self-assertive. If men lose the heroic, we must expect women to be strident, thus maintaining a complementary, though very unlovely, difference between the sexes. What a sinking at the heart of those who love democracy when, to the clamor of suffragists, men consent: "Let them have it, if they want it"! What an appalling misery is in store for our young Republic when the standard of statesmanship is no higher than the intelligence of the straw vote, taken in a shoe factory, in favor of the extension of suffrage to women! Since when did a right public opinion, for leadership in new ventures, go to people less qualified to decide fundamental matters of statecraft? Truly the charm of spurious philosophy has become well-nigh suffocating when men born to better things cry out: "It's coming, so what's the use?" So it is that arm in arm feminine men and masculine women make progress on the road from bad to worse.

Shall then, the forces of evil work greater havoc to our national stability with never a stouter battle in its defense? Shall the cry for an impossible political equality, economic equality and for sex freedom drown out the voice of right reason?

Catholics do not embrace divorce because the monster is coming our way. No, loyal to God's law, they form the one impregnable fortress against the final assault upon the marriage bond. So, too, they are found defending the outer forts, builded by God's Providence, for the protection and maintenance of the family. For right reason demands that to Cæsar be given what belongs to Cæsar, well ordered families, men in command of politics and commerce, while women lead at home and in social intercourse.

But should Catholic women go to the polls where women have a vote? The answer is plainly, yes. In case the political unity of the family has been disrupted, Catholic women may make use of the franchise to stay further encroachments upon the moral and economic integrity of the family which is included in the program of the Socialist-Feminist-Suffragist leaders. God disposes even though the devil proposes.

Since individuals live and thrive with numerous physical, mental and moral ills, so, too, does our country thrive though afflicted with social disorders. But, as we strive to throw off our individual disorders, so it were worse than folly to aid votes for women.

Somebody has cited our divorce laws in proof that this is a Protestant country. And reasoning rightly, it will be seen that woman suffrage is but a further extension of that rebellion inaugurated more than three hundred years ago against the moral order as instituted by Christ Our Lord.

The refusal to disrupt one family, the king's, cost Rome a whole nation. In this country, where Catholics withstood the influence of the withering yet fine scorn of the Transcendentalists, it cannot be conceded that real Christians will now succumb to the psychology of their successors, free-thought leaders, in state-wide application of the doctrines which failed at Brook Farm. Plainly, it is the privilege, as well as the duty, of those who stand upon the rock of right reason to insist that under the moral law the family, not the individual, is the unit of the State.

MARTHA MOORE AVERY.

Socialistic Misunderstandings

"NOW, please don't misunderstand me." Such is the horrified answer of the Socialist when you strike a weak spot in his theory. Perhaps you have unbosomed yourself of the opinion that State ownership would produce a slavery worse than Capitalism ever dreamed of. "Oh, but we don't believe in State ownership as you understand it," says the Socialist, with the pitying Socialist smile. "Please don't misunderstand me." "But, my dear sir, you are so easily misunderstood!"

If the Socialist does not want State ownership, free love, freedom from any law beyond man himself, what does he want? He wants a modern version of the corporate Christianity of the Middle Ages; nothing else can satisfy him. He does not realize it as yet, partly, I take it, because the pall thrown over the Catholic Ages by passionate Protestantism has obscured his vision, and partly, perhaps, because he is deceived by the superstition, that the society of today, the pride of Protestantism, is really Christian society. To one who knows what Christianity really is, today's chaotic and individualistic society is almost as far removed from Christian society as anything which claims to have grown out of Christianity can well be. No society is Christian which is not corporately Christian, which is ashamed to express Christianity in its law, business, art, and education, in the family and social life of its people; which hesitates to infuse religion into its literature, courts, schools, marts, and pageants.

A society in which corporate Christianity would be the source and foundation of every social institution and activity of the people, would be as different from the present unjust and inefficient state of things, as that ideal for which Socialists are sighing. True, it would not be Socialism, but Socialism is really not what the Socialists are actually after at all. They do not realize that a society not founded on revealed Christianity, corporately organized on earth, would ultimately find itself founded on no moral law whatever; that it would, if carried to its logical conclusion, admit no authority for marriage, family life, obedience, morality, social organizations or institutions of any kind. Those who would do away with Christianity as a corporate authority on earth have apparently made the blunder of thinking that the laws of the evolution or growth of living material organisms are also the laws of morality, which they deem, when they admit the existence of morality at all, a changing, growing thing. They do not seem to know the difference between the physical and the moral orders.

The Socialist does not want the chaos that would result from the denial of the difference. Perhaps this is the reason for his "Please do not misunderstand me" and his denial of some things which are apparently of the very warp and woof of consistent, complete Socialism. Perhaps also, there are no downright, complete Socialists. They probably do not want, most of them, State ownership, or free love. It may be that their rejection of some things Socialistic is a sign of the gradual decay and death of Socialism itself.

But we should not wish Socialism merely to die. We wish it to reach the real haven of some of its hopes, although not in the way it desires. Socialism has emphasized some things which it has been valuable to know, although it has discovered other things which it will be even more valuable to forget. The real, supreme discovery still lies before it, for which, rightly considered, Socialism's wanderings have been but preliminaries. This supreme discovery is the realization that corporate Christianity alone is the true foundation for human society.

I see no reason why Socialism, if it digs deep enough, should not actually discover the Church. Individual Socialists have done so already. Why should not the movement as a whole? I see no reason why Socialism should not find in a restoration of corporate Christian society the remedy for evils which Socialism as it really is would only augment. Men who believe in Christianity, in free will and its efficient domination of material things; in marriage, the family, in Christian morality and an incorruptible Judge on whose law morality is based, are not Socialists and do not belong to the movement. The movement itself is a progress towards chaos, the denial apparently of almost everything except the natural laws of physical growth.

Perhaps the best way for some Socialists to find this out is to travel the full, logical distance with the movement. They are seeking for freedom, order, justice, efficiency and all earthly happiness man can have, but these they will find only in corporate Christian society. It does not exist now. But it is for them and for others to restore it. It would not be a mere duplicate of medieval society, for it would rest on the surer foundation which has come from the bitter experience of the sad centuries that followed the rejection of the old order. It would be a thing of beauty and of joy, rewarding men as a whole for man's acceptance of it. Will this millennium come? It is hard to say, but it is the only haven.

HENRY A. DOHERTY, JR.

The Church and the Laity

THE response to the advice of Leo XIII, that the activity of the laity be brought into play to "help spread the light of undefiled faith," has hardly been sufficient to bespeak this as the "layman's age." For these days offer opportunities all unused of making the sublime yet practical principles of Catholicism better known and loved. We are especially inert as compared with our enemies, though our zeal should be much greater than theirs, for truth is more precious than error.

There are thousands of persons of good will longing for truth, to whom Catholicism is an unknown quantity, and who can be reached best by the laity. If they could be led to look at the Church as she really is, they would fondly embrace her and work devotedly to make her light shine in the darkness. To make America Catholic should be our battle cry, for now is our opportunity. But alas, only a few respond! Alas, so many sit idly by never lifting a finger to defend the Church against the misrepresentations of her enemies! Why should Catholics permit themselves to be treated as though they were aliens in this, our land, which men of Catholic faith discovered, explored and shed their blood to defend and expended their best efforts to maintain? Should Catholics halt now when they should be on the march advancing the cause of Christ? No one will answer, yes, for the Catholic laity do not lack courage, certainly not. Yet many seem to slumber on after the call of the Vicar of Christ to defend the Faith upon the sociological field against a powerful and subtle foe. Many a Catholic would have laid down his life cheerfully at the call from Washington, if the Government had decided upon armed intervention in Mexico, but most of them were so little concerned about their religion that they did not say a word in its defense. The laity have kept silent, not so much as writing to the press against the misrepresentations of the Church and the atrocious crimes committed against priests and Sisters. It must be assumed that some of the laity "recoil before an enemy or keep silent when from all sides clamors are raised against truth," because, as Leo XIII says, they are "either devoid of character, or entertain doubt as to the truth of what they profess to believe." There is, of course, no hope of a lay apostolate from such as these. Happily there are many laymen and laywomen with talent, enthusiasm and the spirit of apostleship who if they were brought together, instructed and directed, would constitute a formidable body of workers in defense of the Faith upon the sociological field. The immediate task is then a concentration of our forces for a particular task, by formulation of a plan the operation of which will put a specific set of lay apostles at work.

It goes without saying that Catholic principles are the same today as they were in the beginning and will ever be, while the conditions under which these principles are to be applied, and the opportunities for demonstrating their soundness change from time to time. It is, therefore, necessary to meet modern conditions in a modern way, a way in which no encroachment whatsoever shall be made upon the mission of such existing organizations as the Saint Vincent de Paul, the Holy Name, the Total Abstinence Societies, "Retreat Gilds," and sodalities which are of inestimable value to their members, to the Church and to civil society. There are fields all uncultivated which promise a rich harvest, and it is out upon these, open sociological ground, that the greater part of those not of our faith may be reached today. Our enemies realize this much better than we do. They are taking the lead in what is new and false, rather than opposing what is sound and old. They are not so much discussing Papal Infallibility, Transubstantiation, indulgences, and other doctrines of the Church, as doing their best to outflank her by establishing public forums and advocating reforms many of which are based upon principles of a decidedly anti-Christian character. In the public forum and in the press their measures, good and bad, are set forth with an air of intellectual superiority that is brazen indeed, but impressive nevertheless to untrained minds. These self-styled reformers write and speak as though the Protestant Reformation, the French Revolution, and assumed scientific discoveries had relegated the Church to a limbo, where things are dark.

These are the enemies whom the laity might be trained to meet in the public press, with only the cost of a postage stamp. An organization similar to the "Advocates of Saint Peter" might be set up in this country. Its membership could be extended to both men and women, thus utilizing all the available talent which is now running to waste for want of direction. The Advocates of Saint Peter, organized in the days of Pope Pius IX, and in the beginning composed of jurists, admitted laymen. Its purpose was "to refute the calumnies of enemies of the Church whether derived from distortions of history, jurisprudence, or dogma," and "to devote legal knowledge to a defense of the Church's rights before civil tribunals." Assuming the existence of the organization, we may instance the Mexican situation as a proper subject for the defense of the Faith. The members could be furnished with Monsignor Kelly's "Book of Red and Yellow," and those copies of AMERICA giving the bloody story of Mexico. Thus supplied they could be directed to bombard the daily press, which gives plenty of openings on this subject. Who shall say that if such a method had been followed out a public sentiment might not have been created which would have compelled attention to the just and altogether legitimate demands made in behalf of an outraged people?

Long ago the foe appreciated the importance of creating public opinion in its favor. The Fabian Society by an organized system of writing to the press forced the leading papers of England to open their columns to Socialist propaganda. Besides bombarding the press, the Fabian "members were urged to correspond with Parliamentary or municipal representatives on all vital points, to worry the life out of them if they were obstinate or wrong-headed or dishonest, to make them yearn like the poet for a lodge in some vast wilderness where they might never receive another letter or vote of censure as long as they lived." These brilliant men and women artificially created a public interest in order to force their opinions.

Some years ago the Socialists, Anarchists, anti-vaccinationists, anti-vivisectionists, Single Taxers and upholders of a dozen other radical doctrines organized the Newspaper Writers' Association for press propaganda. Their plan of work was simple and effective, as the rate of influx of unstable argument in the public press shows. A like plan could be followed, a protective society could be formed, each member having a list of the entire membership. If an article appeared in the public press giving a chance for a Catholic answer, copies of it would be sent to those capable of replying. These writers by their replies would prove to the editor that his matter is under the surveillance of Catholics. A monthly bulletin could be issued giving the members advice regarding the press: telling them, for instance, what papers are open freely to letters, what space is allowed, what subjects are at the time uppermost. Such a course would make the Catholic viewpoint better understood. Locally the dozen or more writers could meet monthly to confer upon the subjects of the day. They could in turn be federated by the central bureau which would issue the monthly bulletin, give the sources of information necessary for effective work and report upon the receptivity of the public press. In some such way we could begin to realize something of the vision of Leo XIII, the zeal of the laity could be brought into this untilled field for advancing the cause of Christ. DAVID GOLDSTEIN.

XLII—The Young Man and Forestry

OF the true professions that of forestry is probably the most recently developed in this country. The first American foresters are, with a few exceptions, still living, and most of them are now only in middle age. These men received their professional training abroad. The earliest foresters trained in this country are still young men. The first forest school in the United States was established at Cornell, in 1898. There are now twenty-two institutions, including several of the larger universities, which give courses leading to a degree in forestry. In most of these schools the study required for a degree represents four years of undergraduate work or two years of post-graduate work. About forty other institutions include forestry in their curricula, most of them as an adjunct to agriculture.

Forestry may be defined as the scientific management of woodlands. The methods of management differ with the ends in view. One forest tract may be handled for the production of lumber, another as a game or recreation preserve, another for a combination of purposes; and the method which should be applied must suit the purpose sought. The character of a forester's work, therefore, varies under different conditions. Some members of the profession spend the major part of their time in purely scientific work, estimating amounts of growing timber, determining rates of growth and deciding upon the best methods of cutting to secure additional forest crops. Others may be called upon to give more attention to the business aspects of the profession, such, for example, as have to do with the administration, protection, and utilization of forests. Such work may consist, for example, in the devising and application of methods of fire prevention and control or in determining the most effective and cheapest methods of lumbering. Most foresters are required to combine the business and the technical aspects of the work, and must, therefore, to attain success, be both well trained in forestry itself and equipped with good business ability.

From forty to sixty per cent of a forester's time must ordinarily be spent in the woods, usually on short trips up to six weeks in duration. He will probably live in a small town and he may, therefore, have little of the opportunities which city life abundantly affords. He is apt also to be changed frequently from place to place, especially during the early years of his career and to have small opportunity of establishing a permanent home until he reaches the higher grades of his profession.

To one who likes perpetual out-door life, not a mere vacation in the open, a life into which many hardships enter and in which exposure for long periods at all times of the year is unavoidable, forestry should prove attractive. However, the life is far different from camping, hunting, and fishing in the woods for a summer holiday, and any who have been attracted to it solely through such vacation experiences should investigate further before selecting this field of effort. Neither should the profession be entered by one who is not robust, for the work is physically very exacting. A forester is required to make long hard trips, sometimes afoot, sometimes on horseback, over rough country, during which he must put up with many actual hardships such as the ordinary camper or sportsman is seldom called upon to endure.

The fields of work open to foresters in this country lie principally with the Federal, State and city governments, lumbermen, private timberland owners, and educational institutions.

Up to this time the Federal Government has been by far the largest employer of foresters. Probably ninety-five per cent of the trained foresters in this country have at some time been in the employ of the Government and at least sixty per cent of them are with the Government now. Most of these are engaged in the administration and protection of the national forests. These forests occupy a gross area of about one hundred and ninety million acres, chiefly in the mountains of the West. The rest of the foresters are engaged in cooperation with State and private owners of timberland, perform technical investigations, and publish the results of forest service work.

The call for foresters in State work is growing rapidly. Within the past few years more than twenty States have established State forestry organizations. When a State forest organization is first established, the greater part of the work must be devoted to propaganda, but as the organization becomes older and more stable the work grows more technical and administrative.

In city work, a forester's activities are today, in most cases, devoted to the planting and care of street and park trees, the work rather of a tree warden and landscape architect, but as the watersheds of cities come under scientific management, the application of municipal forestry and the employment of forests for the purpose will increase. It is probable, too, that in the future municipal forests will be acquired and administered for commercial purposes, as are many municipal forests abroad, and these will need foresters to handle them.

Four-fifths of the timberland of the country is privately owned, and it is on this that the greatest opportunity for foresters lies. Private owners of timberland may be classed generally as lumber companies; public service corporations, such as railroads, water companies, and mining companies; recreation clubs; private estates, and farmers and other small woodlot owners. Foresters engaged in handling these privately owned tracts may work either as regular employees of the owners or as consulting foresters working independently, just as do most doctors and lawyers. As with other scientific professions, the opportunities of teaching and research offer a constant though limited field.

The financial returns in this profession will never be great, though a competent man will be assured from it a comfortable living. In public employ the salaries range from $1,000 a year, as an entrance salary, to $5,000. The remuneration in private employ depends upon the ability of the forester to obtain results. The true reward, however, comes from the satisfaction of great public service performed. Every zealous worker in the ranks of forestry must of necessity be a public teacher in a field profoundly affecting the country's welfare. One of the great internal problems of the nation is the conservation of our natural resources. The forest is one of the most important of these and to a greater or less extent controls all other classes of resources. A forester's work if well done is constructive and public spirited, his efforts are directed towards the welfare of his fellow-men. It is this fact more than all else which marks the calling as a profession.

DON CARLOS ELLIS.
Government Forestry Service.

Catholic Landmarks of Boston

THE late Charles Warren Stoddard is credited with saying that reading the time-table of a certain California railroad was like repeating the Litany of the Saints. Now, New England, as everybody knows, has no such wealth of Catholic nomenclature; yet it is always pleasant for Catholics, whether native or merely resident here, to remember that New England's chief city perpetuates, although in a very contracted and hard-to-be-recognized form, the name of a Saxon saint.

The Puritans who gave the name of Boston, St. Botolph's Town, to the settlement which later developed into the metropolis of New England had no intention, need it be said, of honoring a Catholic saint, Saxon or otherwise. For them there was no Litany of the Saints. They had broken with England's Catholic past, and the first syllable of the name of the new settlement, chosen because of their memories of Boston in Lincolnshire, had in their minds no Catholic significance whatever.

They builded, however, better than they knew; they chose more appropriately and prophetically than they suspected. Today if St. Botolph should return to earth and visit the great city in the New World, which bears his name, he would find the greater part of the population of the same Faith as his; and he would further discover the greater part of this greater part to be composed of people who had either come themselves, or whose forbears had come, from that island whose missionaries helped to Christianize his own Saxon ancestors in the long-ago centuries. In other words, the religious complexion of this erstwhile Puritan stronghold has become strongly Catholic; and although we have in Boston a vast and increasing number of Catholics of nearly every race, the Catholic of Irish blood still predominates in number and influence. So much is this so, that in Boston, more notably perhaps than in other places, "Irish" and "Catholic" are interchangeable terms among the less precisely-spoken members of the community; a fact illustrated by the story of the old-fashioned Boston woman who, seeing a colored man entering the Portuguese church, exclaimed that she had never before seen a Portuguese negro; "and him Irish, too!"

And if St. Botolph should time his visit so as to arrive in this city on his own feast-day, he would find the citizens "celebrating" with great fervor; for, by a curious circumstance, St. Botolph's Day coincides with the anniversary of the Battle of Bunker Hill, June 17, a day peculiarly Boston's own, and one which she observes without any regard for latter-day neutrality. Boston Catholics, however, seem as generally oblivious of this as their Protestant fellow-citizens, although none of them has to be told that when Boston celebrates on Evacuation Day, March 17, the departure of the British from hereabouts in 1776, she is also observing the feast of Ireland's patron saint.

The first settlers of Massachusetts were pious—in their way. But who needs to be reminded that their way was not the Catholic way? They had no love for Catholics, and they made no attempt to conceal their feelings on the matter. It is true that the presence of French priests in Boston may be traced to 1643 and 1646. But the visits were brief. The priests came under the protection of their government and were therefore courteously treated by the Puritan governor. Had they come as presumably permanent residents the case would undoubtedly have been different. Father Druilletes came to Boston as an envoy of the French Government in 1650 and possibly said Mass here privately then. However, in 1689 it could be asserted that there was not "a single Papist" in all New England. Yet the Papists came; for there is extant a warrant issued by Governor Belcher in 1731, the exact date, March 17, giving it a peculiar interest, which directs the sheriff to search for Papists who, joined with their priest, "speedily" designed to celebrate Mass; and if need be to break open any dwelling house, etc. A year later, March 20, 1732, the Weekly Rehearsal contained this item: "We hear that Mass has been performed in town this winter by an Irish priest among some Catholicks of his own nation, of whom it is not doubted we have a considerable number among us." There may have been many such Masses said in private houses. There is at least a belief that Mass was so celebrated in a house on Green Street; but it is not until after the Revolution that we come to the record of the first public celebration of Mass in Boston in a church.

American Catholics seem quite careless about the beginnings of their history. Here in Massachusetts, the most be-tableted part of the United States, Catholics have done little or nothing to mark places of special historic interest to them. The Catholic tourist or traveler entering Boston and desirous of visiting places particularly dear to him, as being connected with the early days of the Church in Boston, has very little to help him in the way of guide-books or markers. And because of this even those of us who spend our days amid surroundings that should be an inspiration to our Catholicism go on our daily round uninformed and therefore unmoved.

Should good St. Botolph, for example, ask the average Catholic Bostonian to point out to him the place where the first Mass was said publicly in a church or chapel in Boston, and to please furnish him with the date, it would be a great wonder if the reply were not the Boston equivalent for "Search me." Yet thousands of Catholics pass every day the building on School Street, not far from Washington Street, which covers the site of the little Huguenot chapel which Boston's early Catholics leased from its owner, and in which Mass was celebrated on November 2, 1788, by the Abbé de la Poterie, the first priest to have charge of a Catholic congregation in Boston. This should be a sacred spot to Catholics, and it deserves to be permanently marked.

The site of the Franklin Street Cathedral, Boston's first Catholic church, built by Bishop Cheverus and Father Matignon, Boston's two Catholic immortals, is better known—at least to Catholic Bostonians of the older generation. But it would not be too venturesome to say that thousands of Catholics walk by the corner of Franklin and Devonshire Streets day after day without giving a thought to the fact that they are really treading on ground that should be holy to them, inasmuch as here stood the pioneer of the more than three-score churches within which in Boston today the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass is offered.

Like the old Cathedral of the Holy Cross, several other of the early Boston Catholic churches are numbered among the things that have been; and save to veteran Catholics the sites are unknown. Down on Purchase Street, which is now the very heart of the business district of Boston, there once stood a church, originally a Protestant church, but bought and converted to Catholic uses in 1848. Having served the Catholics of the Fort Hill district for almost a generation, it was taken down in 1872, and the stone used to build a church of the same name in South Boston, St. Vincent's. But the site of that church on Purchase Street is unknown to the present generation of Catholics. So also with the site of the Holy Family Chapel on Beach Street, the old St. James Church on Albany Street, and the church on Washington Street near Castle Street, which was purchased from Harvard College and used as a pro-cathedral pending the building of the new cathedral, and in which the funeral services of Bishop Fitzpatrick were held. Business has invaded the places where these churches once stood, but is it not a pity that the Catholics of the present and future generations should not be taught to know and revere those footprints of our holy Faith?

Our oldest link with the past in Boston is St. Augustine's Chapel in St. Augustine's Cemetery, South Boston. This was built by Bishop Cheverus, Boston's first bishop, in 1819, as a mortuary chapel for his friend and fellow-pioneer, Father Matignon, who died in 1818, and whose body lay temporarily in the old Granary Burying Ground on Tremont Street. Later the little chapel was enlarged and used for public worship; but not for many years has it been so used. The next oldest church building in Boston is "Old St. Patrick's," on Northampton Street. Mass was first said in this church in 1836 and it serves still as a mission of St. Philip's parish. Work on this church was begun the year after that most distressing event in Boston's Catholic history, the burning of the Ursuline Convent on Mount St. Benedict, Charlestown, by an anti-Catholic mob, August 11, 1834. Charlestown was not then as it is today, a part of Boston, but the mob of anti-Catholics was quite largely made up of Boston men. The change in municipal boundaries has placed the site of that convent in Somerville; but the Catholic visitor will find no mount of any kind there today. The hill on which the convent once stood has been graded down into perfectly level streets, and there is nothing to indicate that such a dark deed ever was committed there as is recorded in this incident in the history of Boston. The name, however, is perpetuated in St. Benedict's Church; and the local council of the Knights of Columbus has assumed the title Mt. St. Benedict. More significant perhaps, the arch of the main door-way of the Cathedral of the Holy Cross is formed of bricks taken from the burned convent.

Today with a Catholic Governor on Beacon Hill, a Catholic Mayor in the City Hall, a Catholic Commissioner at Police Headquarters, a Catholic District Attorney in the Court House, a Catholic Sheriff at the Jail, a Catholic Registrar in the Registry of Deeds, and Catholics represented on the judiciary, at the bar, and in all other professions and callings, it is difficult to realize that Boston was ever unfriendly to us. But it should always be remembered that in the midst of the worst anti-Catholic storms in Boston, this city always had fearless and friendly Protestant sons who failed not to espouse the cause of their oppressed fellow-citizens. Boston's first Catholic church was built by the help of Protestant good-will and Protestant money; and in every generation since there have been manifestations of this same spirit. And this is a tribute not only to the non-Catholics of Boston, but to the men providentially chosen to represent the Church here and interpret it to them. The memory and example of those men are our best "landmarks."

DENIS A. MCCARTHY,
Associate Editor, "Sacred Heart Review."

COMMUNICATIONS

The Open Shop

To the Editor of AMERICA:

AMERICA has many times voiced its warm sympathy with those who toil for a daily wage and has quoted frequently from Pope Leo XIII's Encyclical, and its position, if I read its articles on the labor question aright, is to urge a square deal for all concerned, employer and employee alike, a fair day's wage for an honest day's work. With the foregoing in mind I read the communication of V. N. Daspit, "Practical Catholic Journalism" in the issue of September 18 and among other suggestions: "If AMERICA told Catholic employers that they were in conscience bound to recognize and encourage legitimate trade unionism . . . this utterance would be epoch-making." It certainly would, and the Jew, the Protestant or the Catholic who would run his plant on such narrow lines as to make it an asylum for his coreligionists would, unless provided from another source with an exceptionally long bank roll, find his affairs in the hands of the sheriff.

V. N. Daspit desires "practical" discussion. For forty-nine years my time has been about equally divided on each side of the labor question, as employee and employer. It was the proud boast of the first head of the concern with which I have been connected in both capacities, that for forty years a labor dispute had never occurred and in his opinion was likely never to occur, because his shop was operated in the open, the latch string was always out, so that the highest paid or the lowest paid could step in to the owner and state his grievance. This all occurred before the end of the nineties. In 1898, the molders demanded a "closed shop"-agreement and after some preliminary correspondence the company was called upon by an out-of-town representative of the union and given an hour to sign documents he presented. Naturally his demand was refused. A walk-out resulted, the procession being headed by men who had begun as apprentices in the plant twenty or thirty years before. Anyway, an agreement was signed and it remained in force until May, 1906. During all that time a week hardly passed that I did not sit with the shop committee. Now a shop committee of the iron molders is composed of one thoroughly reliable old molder, one who owns his own home and two of the latest arrivals in the company's employ. The personnel of the committee often changed from meeting to meeting even when the subject under discussion remained the same. The 1906 molders' strike was to enforce the recognition of the core-makers with a minimum wage for them of $2.75 per day of nine hours. This matter had been under discussion all through April; the employers everywhere in the country expected the molders to concede that for a job at which ninety-nine per cent of the workers could become sufficiently expert in thirty days, it was unfair to the employers to exact such arbitrary conditions. But the iron molders in 130 of the large machine shops walked out May 6, 1906. Owners of the plants affected met in Detroit and passed resolutions to run "open shops." The writer was the first at the meeting to be called upon for an expression of opinion, and he declared absolutely for the open shop. The strike cost the plants affected many millions and it took two years to peter out, but the peace that has been the portion of employers and employees since, was cheap at the purchase price.

To a man, employers would prefer collective bargaining were the thing workable, that is if the bargain struck were adhered to. A typical instance of the opposite can be read in the preliminaries to the unionizing of the Athol (Massachusetts) Tool Works. Most solemn pledges were given that the quality and productivity of the plant would not be impaired. But the signatures were scarcely dry before the output began to be limited. Production decreased from month to month, until it finally dwindled to a point at which the company, after innumerable conferences with the national officers of the Machinsts' Union, had to choose between going back to the open shop or going out of business. They chose the former alternative and, in the opinion of one who has been through both mills, the logical one.

In conclusion, I would suggest that if our Catholic Press, throughout the length and breadth of the land, instead of coddling labor unions and unionism, took its cue from the public utterances of Cardinal Gibbons during the 1901 machinists' strike, good to all addressed would result.

Milwaukee. T. J. NEACY.

Modern Prison Methods

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A clever satire in a recent number of AMERICA, "Alice in Wonderland," very ably poked fun at some weaknesses in the modern propaganda for "prison reform." In a late issue of the Review of Reviews, Warden Osborne of Sing Sing prison details the new methods he is using. The very weakness which AMERICA points out is apparent in his article, namely, the danger of making prison life so attractive to the man of low morals, that it would appeal to him as a crime incentive, a reward, rather than a penalty. Nevertheless, the greatness of the task which Warden Osborne is attempting should not be frowned upon because of weakness in method. The State has a two-fold duty. The "common weal" necessitates that offenders against society be punished, that the punishment fit the crime, and that the penalty be such as to serve as an example to other would-be wrong-doers.

The State is well within its right in exacting justice when it imposes the death sentence and the long prison term. But the State, over and beyond its interest in the common weal, has a duty to individuals, as members of society, whether they be criminals or not. Punishment as such must be of a certain severity and extend over a certain period of time; on the other hand, punishment when too prolonged, loses its value both as a penalty and a prevention, since the wrong-doer thereby becomes the wronged.

Consider for a moment the case of a man imprisoned for life. By the end of several years, under ordinary prison methods, he has probably made atonement, so far as feeling repentance and the pressure of wrong-doing is concerned. He is, moreover, placed where weakness of will gives him no opportunity to fall again. Prison discipline, solitary confinement, the lockstep, lack of liberty, have taught him a hard lesson. But must the self-same treatment hold for interminable years? Is he to feel that nothing can lift the weight, nothing can be done to change the disaster wrought by wrong-doing? Must he, day by day, year in, year out, feel this irremovable pressure, regardless of any change in himself? True, he may be made a "trusty," but there is small comfort in that. The hopelessness of such a life will beget in any individual a sullen rebellion against mankind, a hardness which constantly grows with brooding. The criminal has atoned, suffered; his sorrow avails nothing. The result? Bitterness, hopelessness, sullenness. How often do we read of men sentenced for short prison terms, coming out hardened criminals! Is there not some flaw here? Is the anarchistic feeling against society which the young criminal exhibits wholly without cause? When a man has paid the penalty, and by the end of a period of years most men in a prison repent as much as they ever will repent, cannot the State, without removing its ban of exile, give a helping hand to its fallen member? Why not allow him to converse with his fellows, to some extent, at least, and lift his mind by books, education, labor, religion, until by a gradual training of his mental as well as physical being, a training of habit, he attains to higher ideals? The spark of morality, no matter how dim, should be fanned and nursed and warmed to something brighter!

The State should impose a penalty severe enough to deter others, but if it becomes a machine to grind the last grain of good from the soul of the criminal, its duty to society is only partly done. If "habit" has any value, psychologically speaking, surely here in the prison is found its greatest test. Perhaps some day a religious order of men may arise, like the Sisters of the Good Shepherd, whose chief task will be the regeneration of the ex-criminal, at least to the extent of enabling him to achieve self-support. But that is another phase of the question. The "golden mean" is not yet reached when the scales of justice merely balance evenly. Despite its incongruities, the modern tendency to "prison reform," seems a good one.

Chicago. S. A. S.

Objectionable Names for Institutions

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I was very much interested in the correspondence in AMERICA regarding the name "parochial" for our Catholic primary schools. To my mind the word conveys better than others the character of these schools, and moreover, it is a short, distinctive name that has nothing objectionable in it from any standpoint, and is far preferable to a name with a denominational addition which is unnecessary in our day when the well-known superiority of the parish or parochial schools is now established and admitted, even by those outside the Church.

There are, however, other worthy institutions of the Church that destroy much of the good they do by their most objectionable names, and these I am sure could be modified or changed for the benefit of everyone. I refer first to the homes or institutions for orphans. An orphaned child is handicapped enough in the loss of its parents without putting an additional burden on it for life by a misfit name for the place in which it is fortunate enough to be taken care of as a child. In Philadelphia there is a recently built, well equipped institution for little girls, and the big sign on the outside of it indicates it as the "Catholic Home for Destitute Girls." An ignorant person passing there recently and seeing some of the little ones, could not understand, he said, how children become bad so young. He thought the word destitute meant even worse than it does. It is certainly bad enough to be destitute without being branded with it. There is an admirable place for boys on Pine Street, Philadelphia. It is practically like a large family home, yet it is almost killed for any good it may do for the Church or its inmates when they arrive at manhood, by the name of St. Joseph's House for Homeless Boys.

Why not call the former a "Catholic Academy," and the latter a "Preparatory School," and call others like them grammar schools or day schools or public schools? Even the Protectory could be called a trades school or an agricultural college or even a foster school. We have St. John's Orphan Asylum and the Foundling Asylum. The former could be called a boarding school and the latter a nursery, thereby avoiding the brand for life which is unintentionally placed on these innocent boys and girls by calling them asylum children. The same applies to the House of the Good Shepherd. The worst character has some chance in life, but the moment one is classified as an inmate of the House of the Good Shepherd prejudice is aroused. There is no reason why such a place could not be called a hospital or a sanitarium.

Our Protestant friends are better in this respect. For example, Girard College is a huge orphanage, but no one is ashamed of it on account of its name. The State has started to change the horrible names of its reformatory institutions. For instance, the name House of Refuge has been changed to the Glen Mills School. The City of Philadelphia changed the name of the Blockley Almshouse to the Philadelphia Hospital, and even in Ireland the poorhouses are now called district hospitals and rich and poor frequent them.

I think the name Parochial School sounds well enough, but with regard to the unfortunate little ones who are forced to accept the Church's kindness and charity, their prospects could be improved considerably and without any cost if the names of their foster schools were improved.

A young man recently applied for a position in Philadelphia and the application required him to state his school, etc. He refused to do so because he had been brought up in a Catholic orphanage in Rochester with an asylum name, and he did not wish his wife to know it. She found it out anyway and left him. Across the street was a family the father of which was a graduate of Girard College, as he called himself, and he was proud of it and his wife was also proud of it, yet there was no difference, whatever, between it and the Rochester asylum, except in name. I think the matter of names is one for serious consideration on account of the future of the children who are the wards of the Church.

Philadelphia. J. A. C.

The "Articles" and the Sacraments

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In reply to Mr. Rusk's latest points let me say first that the "Articles of Religion" are not held by Anglicans to be literally accurate statements of dogma, as all Catholics claim the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds to be. Rather was their original purpose primarily negative, to condemn errors which were prevalent at the time they were drawn up. No Anglican authority of any consequence nowadays holds them to be of permanent value or entirely binding in the details of the faith. As one of our theologians points out, the Articles condemn thirty-one Protestant doctrines and but four practices, and not one doctrine, of the Church of Rome,—hardly an anti-Catholic bias when all things are considered. And in case of any points therein seeming contrary to Catholic principles, they are to be interpreted, as in the case of the many apparently contradictory statements in Holy Scripture, always in accordance with the teachings of Catholic tradition. Even less than this can be said for the Homilies, their value being purely historical, and even the Articles can say no more for them than that they do "contain a godly and wholesome Doctrine, and necessary for these times." This implies that they were regarded by the compilers of the Articles as of unequal and purely temporal value. Nor can we admit any claim for Bishop Browne to be a Pope or infallible teacher of Divine truth.

But coming to the substance of the matter, various opinions have been taught in the early history of the Church as to what ordinances and how many were properly to be called sacraments, the number seven and the present list dating certainly no further back than Peter the Lombard (1164). The twenty-fifth Article does not say that the five are not sacraments, but merely that they are not "sacraments of the Gospel," in that their matter and form were not specifically ordained by Christ in the Gospel, as were the matter and form of Baptism and the Holy Communion. Even the Homilies refer to Matrimony and Holy Order as sacraments, and the quotation from them by Mr. Rusk is very explicit as to the sense in which they exclude the lesser five from the class of the greater two.

Finally, the doctrine of Transubstantiation condemned by Article XXVIII, far from being a "flat, official repudiation of the Holy Eucharist as accepted by Catholics," is rather a condemnation of a theory held by a certain school of Roman Catholics at that time, and itself condemned by the later Roman Catholic Council of Trent. The condemned view denied any "outward part" to the Blessed Sacrament, and so "overthroweth the nature of a sacrament." The accepted Tridentine definition, in terms of the scholastic philosophy, explicitly affirms the reality of the outward as of the inward part, so bringing the accepted modern Roman view into conformity with that of the early Fathers.

Cleveland. JARED S. MOORE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Moore in his last reply still clings to the fanciful idea that Anglicanism must be Catholic because it teaches the "true doctrine" of the Catholic Church. I have asked him to tell us plainly what Anglicanism does teach, what it stands for, to enumerate a set of dogmas to which all its bishops, clergy, and laity conscientiously subscribe. Thus far he has maintained a discreet silence. On the other hand I have given him proof evident and clear that false doctrines are at present taught officially by its shepherds of the Flock, and have been so taught for the past four hundred years. Now if this be true,—and who will be bold enough to deny it?—how can Anglicanism, by any stretch of language, be considered a true part of the Catholic Church, which is, as St. Paul says, "the pillar and ground of truth"? How can it teach all nations, a duty that is the primary function of the Church of the Living God, if it cannot officially teach its own members?

I see Mr. Moore admits that Christ founded one Church but still takes kindly to the idea of a three-branched church, a term unheard of in the annals of Christianity, but created "within recent years" by certain Anglicans because of their hatred of the name Protestant, a name, it is to be noted, which is given them by their own Supreme Head on the day of his coronation. Now if Christ's Church during the sweep of the centuries has failed to remain one, has split up into branches, each damning what the other teaches, each repudiating what the other claims, what becomes of Christ's solemn promise? Would not this failure brand the Son of God with glaring falsehood and strip Him of His Divinity? Yet that very Anglican Church to which Mr. Moore clings with such tenacity has not hesitated, equivalently at least, so to stigmatize the Redeemer. For in its Homilies, a book explicitly commended by the Articles as containing "a godly and wholesome doctrine," and to be read and subscribed to by every minister at his ordination, it is stated that the whole of Christendom had been steeped in "abominable idolatry for 800 years and more." And what hope of salvation was there during all that period for man, woman, or child?

Now I put the puzzling question: if all Christendom was idolatrous for 800 years and more, then surely the Catholic Church had disappeared from the earth. By whose masterhand was it suddenly discovered and awakened from its long slumbers? Again, if such was the shocking state of Christianity for so long a time, from what does the Anglican Church claim her descent? From idolaters? Mr. Moore cannot in conscience excuse the Anglican authorities for teaching, and permitting to be taught, doctrines subversive of all Christianity, for by that very fact his Church proves itself not to be part of that true Catholic Church which its Founder promised would never fail. Mr. Moore further states that for him who believes in the catholicity of the Anglican Church, to secede to Rome would be formal and mortal sin. Strange and wonderful reasoning! The sin would consist in knowingly and deliberately embracing error instead of truth. Now if both Anglican and Roman are true branches of the Catholic Church there cannot be formal and mortal sin in exchanging truth for truth. If, however, the Roman Church is in error, and Mr. Moore is aware of this, then he is guilty of wishing to hold intercourse with what he knowingly considers to be false and heretical. Here would be formal and mortal sin.

Springhill, Ala. E. I. F.

Rational Athletics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In recent letters to AMERICA on the subject of athletics there seems to lurk a certain offhand implied criticism of Catholic colleges that is only equaled by lack of knowledge of actual conditions in those colleges. As to the wail about the poor fellow in the grandstand and the so-called widespread evils of competitive athletics, the facts are so contrary that one wonders how close is the acquaintance with real conditions of those who say such things. Let me take just one case, that of one of the largest Catholic colleges in New England where competition is very keen. If the critics had visited the campus any day last May they would have seen things to surprise them. Among the Freshmen a baseball league was organized, in which were seven teams, one from each section. Two games took place each day, and much enthusiasm was the result. About eighty-five students took part in this series. At the same time about twenty others were practising with the regular Freshman team, ten more with the "Varsity," the track team had fifteen more from the class; still others merely "came out for the exercise," for all were welcome. The gymnasium also had its votaries, and the twelve tennis courts were crowded till dark, while over in a corner the "bush league" was filling the air with excitement and flying baseballs. There were 200 in the Freshman class, and hardly ten could be named who took no part in some game. In the other classes almost the same practice prevailed.

So much for one Catholic college; let the others speak for themselves, and I have no doubt they can render as good an account. But before we look outside, let us first know and appreciate what we are doing ourselves. If those correspondents who take such a pessimistic view are after all attacking non-Catholic colleges only, will a discussion in AMERICA do any good? If they really have the Catholic college in mind, they should acquaint themselves with actual conditions in those institutions.

Woodstock, Md. J. W. P.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Archbishop Prendergast

BY a remarkable coincidence, strangely but happily arranged by a kindly Providence, Philadelphia is about to celebrate, on the seventeenth of the present month, the golden jubilee of the ordination of its Most Reverend Archbishop, and the golden jubilee of its magnificent cathedral. Before the close of the Civil War, Bishop Wood dedicated to the Divine service a temple, hewn not so much out of living rock as out of living hearts; and in the next year he consecrated a young levite of whom he conceived high hopes, but for whom God had destined greater things than even his bishop had dared to hope. It was in the fall of the year 1865 that Edmond Francis Prendergast, then not yet twenty-three years of age, went up the altar steps of the new cathedral, held out his hands for the holy oils, was ordained priest, took into his trembling hands the immaculate host and the blushing wine, and fearfully, bravely, reverently changed them into the Body and Blood of the great High-priest, Jesus Christ.

Five decades have come and gone since the day of his ordination; and now that same levite, weary but still strong, weighed down with many labors but still erect and undaunted, is making ready to go up those same cathedral steps to lay on the same altar the golden fruits of fifty years of sacring and of healing. In that long lapse of time he has done many things for the Master. For half a century he has lived pure, righted wrong, followed the King; he has preached many sermons, confirmed many children, anointed many priests, shriven many sinners, built many churches, established many convents; but greatest and best of all, for full fifty years he has broken the Body of the Lord and poured out His Precious Blood for the saving of his people.

It is not easy to single out of Archbishop Prendergast's many qualities the one for which he is most remarkable. He has borne his honors so meekly and performed the duties of his many offices so efficiently and so conscientiously, and in his many relations to his flock has been so conspicuous for piety, justice and level-headed judgment, that those who know him well are not at all agreed as to what constitutes his greatest claim to the affection and veneration of his people. But his place as one of the makers of Church history in Philadelphia is assured mainly by his preeminence as a great administrator. When those who have experienced his personal charm have passed away and with them the recollection of what he was, there will still remain many lasting memorials of what he did. Schools, churches, parishes, and hospitals, testify to his energy, his sound financial policy, his good taste, and profound knowledge of ecclesiastical art. Men will point to the completion and decoration of the cathedral as an example of the business talent and artistic sense, which he combined in a rare degree. Many and great were the Archbishop's labors, but they never distracted his mind from the claims of the Master, nor chilled the ardor of his simple unassuming piety. Proof of this is had in the fact that even when the burdens of a great diocese bore heaviest upon him, he never for an instant ceased to formulate plans to have fitting honor given to Christ in the Blessed Sacrament. Finally, his work in this direction culminated in the introduction into Philadelphia of the Sisters of the Holy Spirit, who day and night kneel in adoration before the tabernacle, making reparation for sin. Such the man on whose head the dust of the way of life is a crown of glory. The end, thanks be to God, is not yet; his motto, Ut Sim Fidelis, still points his way to the stars. God's golden blessing on his Grace!

Votes for Women

A POST-ELECTION announcement by a prominent suffragist bears about it just a touch of feminine pique. If the public press is to be credited, this lady declares that "the voters will not be be asked again to pass on the question of votes for women." They have been tried and found wanting. Men do not know how to use the ballot; the proof lies in the fact that they refuse the vote to women. Thus does this suffragist wash her hands of the garden variety of voter. Henceforth, with her undaunted cohorts, she will encamp on the steps of the Capitol, and by harrying unwary Representatives and shrinking Senators, "will endeavor to persuade Congress to pass an amendment to the Federal Constitution."

After this, very probably, although the lady says nothing on the subject, the unwearied workers for votes for women will begin a campaign to persuade the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States to adopt this harmless little amendment. This seems to be very much like asking "the voters again to pass on the question" after all. True, the issue is thus submitted to the voter indirectly, but ultimately the appeal is to an "unintelligent electorate."

To add to an unwilling or incapable body of voters would not be an act in keeping with the American genius for government. The franchise is neither a right, nor a privilege to be granted lightly; it can be reasonably allowed only when the extension has been shown to be beneficial to the State. There is something exceedingly naive in the assumption, for it is pure assumption, that either by nature or by acquired quality, woman is better fitted to use the ballot intelligently than man. Perhaps, as has been suggested, she could hardly use it more absurdly than men have sometimes done; but this is only a reasonable criticism upon our whole elective system. As an argument, its logical conclusion is that the use of the franchise should be considerably restricted, rather than extended to a group the majority of whose members are neither experienced in government nor interested in politics.

Comstock's Latest Critic

WHEN a man throws a quotation from "Thus Spake Zarathustra" at your devoted head, you had better do something more than dodge. When he follows this up with a composite note from Havelock Ellis, Morton Prince and Stanley Hall, your chance of survival is equal to that of a 'possum in a hollow log with a darkey at one end and a pack of coon-dogs at the other.

In an article in the current Survey, Mr. John Corbin does all these things. He uses more sizable words and disoriented phrases than any magazine writer who has burst upon an unoffending public these last twelve months. "Historically synchronized," "emotionally liberated," "group-egoism," "the shrinkage of life's volume," and "the cumulative eagerness of expectancy," show what Mr. Corbin can do when he gets a pen between his fingers to toss off an ordinary essay. He has lived at great feasts of languages and has stolen the scraps. Once really warmed to his task, one feels sure that Mr. Corbin would leave the largest dictionary completely denuded of its finest verbiage.

Carefully following the trend of the argument, the patient reader will gather that Mr. Corbin is decidedly "peeved" with the late Mr. Comstock. He thinks, first of all, that the attitude of Mr. Comstock towards those Sir Galahads of the modern world "the vendors, propagandists and publishers who (for a price) made bold to encourage and facilitate a limited birth-rate," was "radically pernicious." Next, he anathematizes Mr. Comstock's philosophy. This simple, effective code was based on the principle that since everything in the intellect had made its way there through the senses, it is well to guard the senses against the entrance of uncleanness. But social anthropology and contemporary psychology, Mr. Corbin kindly informs us, "prove objectively and with exhaustive detail" that this is all wrong. Impurity is fostered by "secrecy, repression, deprivation and taboo."

Mr. Corbin draws out the thread of his verbosity finer than the somewhat unwashed staple of his argument, thereby exposing himself to the danger of misinterpretation. Yet if he takes his philosophy seriously, he will hardly shrink from the experiment of allowing an innocent child to spend his week-ends in a house on the street of the scarlet light. Here there is an amount of very genuine "biological expression"; and why should these actualities be taboo? In the corridors of the house of sin, the child will find no "institutionalized modesty," no "repression," no "conventional precepts," no "deprivation," and above all else, no taboo "which impedes sex sublimation among all the people."

The Survey philosopher will not, of course, carry out this laboratory experiment. He will very rightly protest that certain unlovely but real phases of life must be excluded absolutely from the child's experience; a happy conclusion, but quite at variance with his philosophy which finds nothing but evil in secrecy. Mr. Corbin's theories, so far as a finite intellect may fathom them, are decidedly perilous. Certain facts in human life have always been and must always be in some sense, taboo. We do not deny them; but to keep them in the background is more profitable both to society and the individual. In civilized communities the elemental social virtue of reticence is fairly common; to borrow one of Mr. Corbin's phrases employed for another purpose, "it is historically synchronized" with civilization.

The Nation's Delinquent Debtors

WHEN thousands of American tourists found themselves stranded and penniless in Europe at the beginning of the war their cries of distress were promptly heeded by our Government, which hastened to relieve their needs. Sums ranging from one dollar to $2,000 were lent to the grateful exiles who joyfully signed a promise to pay the money back when they reached home. But engagements made with so impersonal and soulless a being as the United States Treasury rested lightly on many of these tourists. Perhaps they thought that their country was fully reimbursed by the very fact that they returned to it. At any rate, the Government after proving itself a patient creditor was recently forced to publish its first list of delinquent debtors numbering about 2,000 persons.

A study of the list suggests some queries and reflections. The sum of $1.00 brought a modest Newark man safely home, but an arrogant Harlemite, who seems to have had a less distance to go, secured $1,300. The O's and the Mc's who have repudiated their obligations are edifyingly few, only one Murphy has lost his financial integrity, while the escutcheons of the Kelly and the Sullivan clans remain untarnished. There is an imposing array, however, of names that begin with Sch or end with ein and the noble "Anglo-Saxon" race is magnificently represented by a profusion of such historic names as Howard, Bancroft, Sherman, Clarke, Spencer and Hawkins. Among the delinquents, too, is even found an occasional de, von or Van, who feels that no one can reasonably expect him to mortgage his ancestral acres in order to satisfy a vulgar government's claim. Moreover, as many of the names and addresses given were false, the Treasurer of the United States, it seems, must resign himself to losing a considerable portion of the passage money that was provided. As for the rest of the delinquents, perhaps the slumbering conscience of some may be awakened by the repeated publication of their names. The root of the evil, however, lies in the absence of sound moral principles in the shirking debtors and that great defect is doubtless due in many instances to a lack of religious training.

Herman Ridder

THE loss suffered by the Catholic laity of New York and of the country in the death of Andrew Jackson Shipman has been deepened by the passing of another Catholic champion, Herman Ridder. With no advantages of wealth or of unique opportunity, he rose from obscurity to a position in which the highest offices of his city and State might have been his had he cared to embrace a public career. The long list of religious, educational and charitable institutions to which he was ever ready to lend his aid, shows his practical interest in the cause of Catholicism. His whole life is a history of devotion to duty. He placed principle above wealth, he counted honor more than fame, and the greatness of his soul was proved in the trials that shadowed the last months of his life.

His memory will be in benediction, an example, an inspiration, a support. The outcast and the friendless who found life less bitter for his kindliness, can never forget him; the prayers of the little ones whom he rescued from the streets and a fate far worse than death, will plead for him with the Divine Lover of children. "May we soon have peace," were almost his last words. Herman Ridder, after life's fitful fever, will find peace, the peace of God surpassing all understanding, with the Master whom he served so faithfully, and to whom he ministered in Christ's least brethren.

"Scientific Character Analysis"

PERHAPS with the object of emphasizing the importance of retrenchment in everything connected with a large city's educational system, the Superintendent of New York's Public Employment Bureau has recently gone to the expense of preparing an elaborate formula for "scientific character analysis." It has been solemnly decreed that every boy and girl under twenty-one years of age who applies for work shall fill out carefully a "vocational guidance blank," containing eighty-six searching questions like the following:

Would you have remained at school if conditions had been to your liking?

Has anyone ever suggested or advised you as to what your future course should be? If so, who gave such advice and what was the nature of it?

Do you live at home? If not, why not?

Sight, hearing, smell—good, fair or poor?

Do you take regular exercise? Are you interested in sports?

Who has shown the greatest interest in your welfare?

What kind of reading have you done? What is your hobby? What is your ambition?

Does your mind concentrate or skip around? Can you remember things well and for a considerable period?

How do you spend any leisure time you have? What do you look for first in newspapers?

Do you consider yourself absolutely honest? What habits or vices do you have to fight down in yourself? What is your religion?

Are you self-supporting? How many depend on you for support? Can you save money?

What special ability have you? What limitations or defects?

What life work do you think you prefer? Are you willing to pay the price in hard work to attain success?

We shall now await with breathless interest the publication of some of the answers the young people make to this merciless questionnaire. Those who meet the test satisfactorily need seek no further, it is plain, for steady and well-paid employment, for they will have proved themselves profound psychologists and consummate masters of asceticism. What a flood of light, for example, will be thrown on the subject's character by the answer to that query regarding his favorite page in the newspaper! And what a marvel among men will that youth be who can modestly call himself "absolutely honest"! The second and third questions on the list, however, offer the conscientious applicant such a splendid opportunity for telling everything that he or she has heard about shoes and ships and sealing-wax that many a boy or girl will hardly have any time left to answer the other eighty-four queries. For nearly everybody is fond of giving young people advice regarding the career they should follow, and as all such counsel costs nothing, it is always given without stint.

Stern critics, however, of this new character analyzing experiment may hold that by a greater outlay of municipal funds, the questionnaire can easily be made longer, more searching and more detailed than at present, thus enabling boys and girls to learn with absolute certainty the exact defect that delays their progress. Tactful inquiries should be made, for instance, regarding the applicants' preferences in ribbons or neckwear, breakfast foods and automobiles; their attitude toward the Ptolemaic system should also be learned and subtly worded questions should show what the political proclivities were of the boys' and girls' maternal ancestors. We know that oftentimes the beginning of a successful career is determined by seeming trifles, hence if a more elaborate and costly questionnaire will help our young people to discover the one shortcoming, perhaps, that has hitherto kept them from securing agreeable employment, can the taxpayer reasonably complain?

The Governor's Daughter

EVEN a newspaper reporter may serve some worthy if humble place in the universal scheme of men and things. Curious pickers up of unconsidered trifles, they chance now and again to draw a diamond from the common bin of human experiences. Fate chose a young man from the Chicago Tribune to place this gem in the setting of his paper:

"Have you made many resolutions on your wedding-day?" asked the reporter as the happy couple stepped from the train.

"Only one," answered the bride, the daughter of the Governor of Illinois, "I am going to try to be a good wife."

This is mere sentiment, the kind that makes the world go dizzily around, and worse, an unhallowed trifling with the sacred dignity of free womanhood. This benighted daughter of the twentieth century dwells not on the Right but the Duty of Woman. She knows nothing of woman's unforgettable right to live her life to the full, to work out her idiosyncratic destiny, to break through the trammels of conventionalized society in pursuit of her ideals, even though they flee along the path that leads to Reno. Shall the precious heritage won for the modern woman by struggling pioneers, be thus lightly, gladly, flung away for matrimonial chains which clank though gilded?

But the Governor's daughter has chosen the nobler part. "I am going to try to be a good wife," is a saying worthy in these recreant days of imperishable bronze. Her task will not be difficult, for wisdom is in her heart and the babblings of the Gospel of Revolt are far from her lips. Hers is the ancient, sacred ideal of Christian marriage which gives happiness to the individual, stability to the State, and souls to Heaven.

LITERATURE

XIII—Joseph Conrad

JOSEPH CONRAD made his first deep impression upon the reading public some twenty years ago, when his "Nigger of the Narcissus" appeared in the New Review, under the editorship of William Ernest Henley, who possessed a sort of genius for the discovery of literary talent, and under whose stimulating leadership a band of new writers quickly found their way to the very highest places in English letters. It was in the pages of the New Review that H. G. Wells, for example, won recognition with his "Time Machine." Such writers as Lionel Johnson, Charles Whibley, W. B. Yeats, Max Beerbohm, Rudyard Kipling and R. B. Cunninghame Graham were either discovered or encouraged by Mr. Henley. It was my good fortune to read the New Review, and to form literary tastes which have remained constant ever since. Few artistic pleasures are keener than to have recognized a master in the dawn of his day of glory when others were asleep, or unconscious of his auroral promise.

As soon as I entered upon the reading of "The Nigger of the Narcissus" I knew that a great writer had appeared. Impossible not to feel the power of his imagination, the poetry of his vision, the truth of his expression, and the peculiar beauty of his style. There was, moreover, the emanation of something so rarely met with in English novels that its presence, even when unaccompanied by beauty, rythmical style, distinction and depth of thought, was a notable and memorable event, but which when it appeared, as in Conrad, strengthened and adorned with the qualities named, constituted a literary happening of the utmost importance and value. I refer to spiritual interest: the recognition by the writer of the innate and ineluctable seriousness of human life. Several of the men in whose company Conrad began his career also possess this quality, and, of course, other writers before and since the days of the New Review have also possessed it. It is the mark of a sincere artist in imaginative prose, as distinguished from the purveyor of literary entertainment. But Joseph Conrad stands almost alone among modern English novelists in that this deep interest in life is characteristically Catholic, and, therefore, in him it is truer and safer than in his clever compeers, such as Hardy, Meredith, Shaw, Wells, and other authentic artists.

No doubt this statement somewhat obviously requires explanation and justification. Let me make myself quite plain. For the purpose of making my point, novelists may, I think, be divided into two classes. One, by far the most numerous, are merchants in amusement; they write simply to entertain, and to make money in doing so. It is quite commendable, so long as they deal in good stuff, and don't traffic, like pandars, in vice and falsities. A great many of them do; but that's another story. The second class, a small, diversified, and exceedingly influential group, write with serious purpose. Either they desire to reflect an artistic vision of life, or they write with motives of propaganda—moral, immoral, or unmoral motives of sociological or intellectual, or, though rarely, religious propaganda. Among this group today are, to mention only a few, Shaw, Chesterton, Wells, Benson, James, and, of course, Conrad also. These writers may, and indeed do, amuse and entertain us, at least some of us, as much or more than the writers of the first-mentioned class; still, they differ from them radically; they are serious artists, and sources of serious influence.

This group, again, may be divided into two main and opposing camps of thought. Thus, no matter how widely Shaw may differ from Wells, for example, and Wells from Galsworthy, and Galsworthy from both, all three of them are firmly united by a sort of common atmosphere of thought. They and with them a host of lesser lights, both in England and America, are exponents in imaginative literature of that powerful spirit of modern thought which may be termed "humanistic." It is a school in which William James is a sort of prophet, and its fundamental assumption, the point upon which all these diversified writers seem to agree, is that Man is the superior force in the universe, or, at least, that he is becoming so. Although at present, they will admit, man may be cribbed, cabined, and confined by various circumstances, he will, by and by, after sufficient stimulation and instruction of his will (by themselves, and others who will follow them) become definitely conscious of his own supreme power. Then he will proceed to reconstruct the world in which he lives after patterns copiously provided by his mentors, and change its name from vallis lacrymarum to Utopia. This, I think, is a fair statement of the fundamental point upon which the modern philosophies, of which modern fiction is the chief disseminating agency, do agree.

The other group expresses the Catholic view of the world and its problems. However, for instance, Chesterton, Benson, or Belloc may differ on other things, they absolutely agree on one point, the exact opposite of that which the other school agrees upon, namely, the proposition that above man there is God, and that man is not in the world as a creator but as a creature, not a master, but a servant—an unwilling, or rebellious servant, mostly, yet a servant nevertheless whose only hope for improved conditions is to render dutiful, yes, and more than dutiful, loving, and willing service. Now, although Joseph Conrad never thumps a pulpit or a rostrum, although I know of no explicit credo, in all the range of his work, he is, just the same, a great Catholic artist; all his work is steeped in and can only be interpreted by a profound Catholic spirit.

I would rest my whole case as to this point upon one thing, namely, Conrad's consistent treatment, again and again repeated, of the mystery of evil. Contrast it with the treatment of the same theme by the humanistic artists, who either deny the reality of evil, sometimes perversely daring to call that which is evil good, or else they invent a score of ways, pray let us mark this well, in which man may evade the responsibility for his evil acts. This is the crux of the matter. The chief humanistic writers of today are men and women often of the most tender sympathies, of soft, pitying hearts. They look out upon the world and behold their brothers and sisters suffering, baffled, frustrated, sighing and dying in pain and loss, and they write of what they see and hear in blood and tears. But they will not see, at least will not admit that "from the heart come forth evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false testimonies, blasphemies, . . . the things that defile a man." No, never! They pity man, but they add that the poor chap is really not to be blamed. Heredity is to blame, capitalism is to blame, the English nation is to blame, the German nation is to blame, or the Church is to blame. But all man's woe will be over, by and by, when, after becoming socialistic, or humanistic, or feministic, or atheistic, or superhumanistic, or something, he will banish pain and disease and death. Thus, though their books deal predominantly with evil, they will not term it evil, nor admit that for most evils man himself is responsible.

How different with Joseph Conrad! Remaining exclusively an artist, his sole aim being to reflect in his magical mirror a true picture of the world and of his fellow-men and women, he finds, as his fellow-writers do, that scenes of sorrow and suffering and darkness predominate, but he never tampers with the truth which over and over again he reiterates, directly and indirectly, that out of the corrupted heart of man proceed the most of his woes and pains and evil misfortunes. Nor does he try, as do so many of his powerful but deceived and deceiving fellow-masters of illusion, to explain the inexplainable, to reveal the mystery of evil precisely because it is a mystery. But, what man may know of this mystery, what indeed man does know, because the Eternal Truth has spoken, this dread fact Conrad's every story brings home to us in gloomy grandeur, in dark poetry, in impeccable artistry of style, namely, that man's sad heart is sinful, and he himself is the source of most of the evils that torment his exiled soul. I have left myself no space in which to speak of Conrad's other great qualities, his wonderful imagination, his beauty of style, his deep and potent poetry; but these are the obvious things. It is Conrad as the greatest exemplar of Catholicism in fiction that, after all, we must find most significant and vital.

Catholicism in art, in all its branches, has for some time been dormant, but is now resurgent. In the high places of the mind the pride and self-will of man has too long prevailed. With the appearance of such masters as Francis Thompson and Conrad and Mestrovic, and Belloc and René Bazin and Bourget and Claudel and Benson and Chesterton, with scholars and scientists and publicists sounding the Catholic note on all sides, in all lands, is there not reason to think that a new era of militant Catholicism in art and thought is dawning upon a world that, alas, so sorely requires consolation, ministration, and help?

MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

REVIEWS

The Pilgrim Kings. Greco and Goya and Other Poems of Spain. By THOMAS WALSH. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

If, as some aver, we are entering upon a Catholic revival of poetry in America, Mr. Thomas Walsh will figure in the future history of the movement as a conspicuous leader. His work arrests the trained eye and challenges criticism on a high plane of art. His inspiration is gentle and authentic; and his art is his business, scrupulously and conscientiously pursued down to its smallest detail. He has thereby gained serious recognition where his Catholic inspiration is discounted; and he has set an example of the "passion for perfection" where there may still survive the delusion that the beauty of Catholic inspiration requires less rather than more elaboration of art.

This second volume of Mr. Walsh's is of the same rich vintage as "The Prison Ships," with a refinement of flavor and a touch more of mellowness. The title-poem was well chosen. It strikes a note, characteristic of Mr. Walsh's work, which every true poet must strike; viz., that spiritual achievement may involve material failure, but is not therefore to be despised or ever to be degraded from its supreme importance in a man's life. This is an easy note to strike in clamorous and repellent fashion. But Mr. Walsh is no beater of brass gongs. The note steals from his silvern pipe with the insidious flattery of sweet music that scales the dull porches of the ear and finds lodgment in the mind before the master of the house is aware.

Spain, of whose Toledo he sings:

> Sultans, Kings and Primates gone,
> Crescent, Cross and gonfalon
> Shine but down a sunset world, has exerted a strong influence on Mr. Walsh's development; and, we believe, fortunately for him. For it has saved him from the danger of that thin, false, hypertrophied spirituality which came into our literature with Emerson and still struggles in the shadowy and incoherent ramblings and sighings of contemporary agnostic verse. There is no New England bloodlessness here. On the other hand Spain's religion has kept the heady Spanish wine from superinducing brutish oblivion of the spirit.

This necessarily brief notice of Mr. Walsh's latest volume of poems has attempted to sketch broadly his main excellencies rather than to display his golden toll in too narrow compass. The desire to follow the latter course is not easy to relinquish. In the dramatic dialogues a silken tapestry of highly wrought speech is lifted for some ravishing glimpses of old Spain. Then we have "Invasion," "Sunset Balconies," "To Fray Junipero," "The Birth of Pierrot," "Georgetown Revisited" and Fray Luis de Léon's tender and beautiful "To Our Lady." "Egidio of Coïmbra" has for its subject, of all things in the world, a real, old-time, public disputation in scholastic theology. The confidence of the poet in his own resources on such a theme is amply justified by his performance. Though it is possible, since the great Suarez is the hero of it, that the present reviewer may be unduly prejudiced in its favor.

J. J. D.

The German Jesuit Fathers of Bombay. By an Englishman Who Knows Them: ERNEST R. HULL, S.J., Editor of the Examiner. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $0.35.

The Fall of Tsingtau. With a Study of Japan's Ambitions in China. By JEFFERSON JONES. With Illustrations. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.75.

A Hilltop on the Marne: Being Letters Written June 3-September 8, 1914. By MILDRED ALDRICH. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.25.

The Neutrality of Belgium: a Study of the Belgian Case Under Its Aspects in Political History and International Law. By ALEXANDER FUEHR, Doctor of Law. New York: Funk & Wagnalls Co. $1.50.

The Log of a Noncombatant. By HORACE GREEN, Staff Correspondent of the New York Evening Post, Special Correspondent of the Boston Journal. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.25.

The Drama of Three Hundred and Sixty-Five Days: Scenes in the Great War. By HALL CAINE. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. $1.00.

The Lusitania's Last Voyage: Being a Narrative of the Torpedoing and Sinking of the R. M. S. Lusitania by a German Submarine off the Irish Coast, May 7, 1915. By CHARLES E. LAURIAT, JR., One of the Survivors. With Illustrations. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.00.

Here is a bundle of recently published books bearing on the war. Though Father Hull proves conclusively in his excellent essay that the German Jesuits have for sixty years done the Indian Commonwealth eminent service by educating thousands of loyal citizens, a service, too, which the British Government has often acknowledged gratefully, and though he shows that the Fathers have carefully avoided saying or doing anything during the present war that could be reasonably considered a breach of neutrality, nevertheless he could not save his religious brethren. Yielding to a popular clamor, which seems to have been inspired to a large extent by English Protestants, the Government first interned and then transported all the German Jesuits of India, thus leaving the Catholic schools and missions practically destitute of priests. The little book is a notable tribute to the Fathers' zeal and a very readable account of their work in India.

Mr. Jefferson Jones is an American on the staff of the Japan Advertiser, who happened to be with the Mikado's army when the German fortress of Tsingtau was taken last fall. The author thinks the Japanese have made the war their opportunity for securing a new hold on China, and though Premier Okuma protests that there is nothing further from his thoughts than "territorial aggrandizement," nevertheless, in Mr. Jones' opinion, not only Tsingtau but the entire Province of Shantung are likely to remain in the hands of the Japanese after the war is over, unless Europe and America see that China's integrity is preserved.

In "A Hilltop on the Marne" have been gathered a series of letters written by a Massachusetts woman who courageously remained in her cottage at Huiry while the French and German armies were fighting in the valleys below for the possession of Paris. The author, whose sympathies are with the Allies, entertained, at different times, English, French, Irish and German soldiers, and had nearly every day interesting adventures which she vividly describes for her American correspondent.

A strong presentation of the arguments offered by the partisans of Germany regarding "The Neutrality of Belgium" is made by Dr. Fuehr. He gives facsimiles of the famous "Brussels Documents" and maintains that, as early as 1907, Belgium "bargained away her status as a perpetually neutral country by entering into a military compact with England."

The most remarkable pages in Mr. Lauriat's story of "The Lusitania's Last Voyage" are those bearing testimony that contradicts the findings of Lord Mersey's Court of Inquiry. The author maintains that the ship's portholes were open when she went down, that the discipline of the officers and crew was poor, and that the collapsible boats were not fitted with oars. Moreover, he "resents with every spark of manhood" in him the assertion that the "disastrous attempts of the frightened passengers to assist in the launching operations" added to the "difficulties" of the crew.

The publishers of Hall Caine's new book modestly describe it as "not only the most forcible but at the same time the most intimate study of the meaning of the characters and the thunderbolts engaged." But the average reader will probably find the book a commonplace collection of literary tidbits about the men and deeds of the present war which the decidedly pro-English author has made from his contributions to the press.

Mr. Horace Green, who wrote the fifth of the books on our list, chanced to be in Antwerp when it was bombarded and evacuated. He subsequently found himself, before he realized it, within the German lines, and suffered from no dearth of "thrills." In an interesting appendix about "Atrocities," the author asserts that the "reports of unprovoked personal atrocities" on the part of the Germans "have been hideously exaggerated," and maintains that the "German private as an individual is no more barbaric than his brother in the French, the British or the Belgian trenches."

W. D.

Recollections of an Irish Judge. By M. McD. BODKIN, K. C. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.50.

The Irish Abroad. By ELLIOT O'DONNELL. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.50.

Books about Ireland are enjoying a present popularity; even the classics of the Repeal and Young Ireland era have been reprinted with success. Judge Bodkin's "Recollections" deal with the Ireland of our own generation. A reporter and chief editorial writer on the Dublin Freeman's Journal; editor of the National organ, United Ireland, during the strenuous Land League days; a member of Parliament and a busy practitioner at the Bar, all these avocations brought him into intimate relations with the leading men of the time and made him an active participant in the stirring events that affected so seriously the political fortunes of the British Empire. He has fashioned his experiences into a series of anecdotes and stories about Gladstone, Parnell, Davitt, Justin McCarthy, Father James Healy, Father Tom Burke, Tim Healy, Baron Dowse, "Peter the Packer" O'Brien, Lord Russell of Killowen, Lloyd George, Joseph Chamberlain, Labouchère and many others whose names are inseparably interwoven with the events of the stormy period during which the battle for Irish autonomy was fought out.

"The Irish Abroad" is a very different compilation. In its preface Mr. O'Donnell informs us that "It deals with the Irishmen out of Ireland in the broadest sense . . . anywhere, indeed, save in his own country." His intention, no doubt, was excellent, so it is unfortunate that his manuscript did not fall into the hands of some competent editor who could have saved the author from the absurd statements and grotesque blunders with which his printed pages abound. Mr. O'Donnell is apparently a believer in the famous political axiom: What's the Constitution between friends? for he tells us, "J. K. Polk, a native of the North of Ireland, was elected President of the United States in 1845. He was the second Irishman to fill that post, General Andrew Jackson, as has already been stated, being the first." The Civil War enables the author to offer a bewildering hodge-podge, including the "fact" that during the New York Draft Riots, "Horace Greeley, the Irish proprietor of the New York Tribune, had his office windows smashed." Space forbids yielding to the temptation to cite similar absurdities from many other pages. Mr. O'Donnell, however, betrays what his Irish readers would call "the bad drop in him" by his account of the heroic Irish Brigade that went to the defense of the Holy See in 1860. If it were not so manifestly silly and untrue it might be considered specially malicious. Its historic value may be gauged by his statement that "Victor Emmanuel and Garibaldi were tremendously popular" in Ireland!

T. F. M.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Father Garesché contributes to the November Queen's Work a good summing up of the Y. M. C. A. discussion. He shows that the organization, with its 150,000 Catholic members, is keeping that many young men away from the influence of the Church, promoting indifferentism and undermining "that absolute strictness of loyalty and undivided faith which make a fervent Catholic." Another interesting paper in this issue is Mary de S. Bond's account of the excellent things "The Dominican House of Retreat and Catholic Guild" is doing for the working girls of Philadelphia. "Cupid and Campion," a new serial by Father Finn, starts in this issue.——The November Extension is a "Catholic book number." Among the notable papers are Mr. Kilmer's "Catholic Poets and Poetry" and Father Joseph McMahon's "How to Start a Parish Library." John Ayscough begins a serial story called "A Roman Tragedy," and various lists of books are given with which Catholics should be familiar.

The numerous friends that Jean Webster made for Judy, the witty heroine of "Daddy Long-Legs," are sure to be highly amused by the history of Sallie McBride's subsequent connection with the John Grier Home for Orphans. Sallie's "Dear Enemy" (Century, $1.30) is the dour Scotch physician of the institution, and the quarrels and reconciliations she had with him, and all the trials it cost to make the Home thoroughly modern are delightfully described in a series of letters, which the author has illustrated with little masterpieces that marvelously enhance the value of the work.——William MacLeod Raine's "Steve Yeager" (Houghton, $1.35) is a "red-blood" story of the Mexican border, where Broadway slang, it would seem, is punctuated with pistol shots and "primitive passions." Pasquale is a good likeness of Villa.

"The 'Summa Theologica' of St. Thomas Aquinas, Part II (First Part) Literally Translated by Fathers of the English Dominican Province, Third Number (Q.Q. XC-CXIV)" (Benziger, $2.00), and "Popular Sermons on the Catechism from the German of Rev. A. Hubert Bamberg, Edited by Rev. Herbert Thurston, S.J., Volume III, The Sacraments" (Benziger, $1.50), are the full titles of new volumes of valuable works that have already been noticed in AMERICA. The treatises on Law and Grace are taken up in this part of the Angelical Doctor's great work and are translated with the same care and literary skill that characterized the former volumes. The fifty-nine clear and practical instructions in Father Bamberg's book deal with grace, the Sacraments and prayer and bring his work to a conclusion.

The "Christopher Columbus" of Mildred Stapley (The Macmillan Company, $0.50) is a brief review of the leading events in the life of the great navigator. The facts are well grouped, the narrative is clear and simple, yet with an animation and coloring which lift the book from the level of dull chronicle. The writer, although she once applies to Columbus the harsh word "foolish" is in sympathy with the Genoese discoverer, but does not let her admiration warp her judgment. When criticizing men or things, she writes calmly and without bitterness. We are sure that with her fair-mindedness, she will be willing on better acquaintance to revise one or two rather sweeping strictures on the Middle Ages. Miss Stapley does justice to the heroism of Columbus and pays tribute to the apostolic zeal of Las Casas and the generosity of Isabella of Castile. We think, however, that Columbus was even more than Miss Stapley says he was, "one of the greatest products of the Renaissance." In spite of faults and blunders he was a genuine crusader, and to the culture and learning of the Renaissance, he added chivalrous devotion to ideals and the Faith of the Middle Ages.

"Lotta's Career" (Houghton, $1.00), by Elia M. Peattie, is a clean, wholesome and interesting story of a real girl who, finding out that she is not the musical genius that others had imagined she was, bravely accepts the situation, returns home, faces the ridicule of her townfolk, cheerfully takes up the care of her sick father's village store, and wins success for herself and restores prosperity to her family.——"The Burden of Honor" (Kenedy, $0.75), by Christine Faber, is a story full of incident, which tells of the troubles and experiences of a small group of interesting people. It deals with the ruin of the happiness of two persons brought about by the machinations of a mean and ungrateful woman. The discovery of this treachery leads to a tragedy, and in the complications which result the story is skilfully developed.

"'Common Sense' Applied to Woman Suffrage," (Putnam, $1.00) by Mary Putnam-Jacobi, M.D., is a second edition of a book first published over twenty years ago. No changes have been made, but a short introduction is given by Frances Maule Björkman. The book itself is an expanded form of an address delivered before the Committee of Woman's Suffrage of the Constitutional Convention of 1894, the text of which address is added as an appendix. No claim is made that any new arguments are to be found in the reprinted volume. The author's complete lack of perspective is not unusual in similar treatises where all ills are to be cured by the same social prescription. Her defective historic knowledge is sadly evident in her attacks upon the Church, her needless digression to insult Catholics in their most sacred devotion to the Holy Eucharist, and her ignorant slander that Christendom, down to the day of the French Revolution has held in regard to woman, "the profound mental and moral inferiority of her entire nature." Such absurdities are unpardonable. There is no doubt that woman has often suffered grievous harm and injustice but it was due to mankind's neglect or ignorance of the teaching and spirit of that Church which has been woman's champion through the ages.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Acropolis Publishing Co., Philadelphia:
Dante and Other Waning Classics. By Albert Mordell.

Benziger Bros., New York:
That Office Boy. By Francis J. Finn, S.J. $0.85.

Civilta Cattolica, Roma:
Manuale di Teosofia. Parte Terza, Cosmologia e antropologia teosofica. Seconda Edizione. Giovanni Busnelli, S.J. L2.00; La Reincarnazione. Manuale di Teosofia. Parte IV. Seconda Edizione accresciuta. Giovanni Busnelli, S.J. L2.50.

The Century Co., New York:
Dear Enemy. By Jean Webster. $1.30; The Lost Prince. By Frances Hodgson Burnett. $1.35; High Lights of The French Revolution. By Hilaire Belloc. $3.00.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
The Hunting Wasps. By J. Henri Fabre. Translated by Alexander Teixiera De Mattos. $1.50; Storied Italy. By Mrs. Hugh Fraser. $3.50.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City, N. Y.:
American Ideals. By Clayton Sedgwick Cooper. $1.00; The Gray Dawn. By Stewart Edward White. $1.35.

B. Herder, St. Louis:
Studies in Church History. By Bertrand L. Conway, C.S.P. $0.75.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
Two American Boys in The War Zone. By I. Worthington Greene. $1.00; Steve Yeager. By William MacLeod Raine. $1.35; Prisoners of War. A Story of Andersonville. By Everett T. Tomlinson. $1.35; A Marriage Cycle. By Alice Freeman Palmer. $1.25; Smugglers' Island and the Devil Fires of San Moros. By Clarissa A. Kneeland. $1.25.

The Macmillan Co., New York:
What Is a Christian? By John Walker Powell. $1.00; Old Delabole. By Eden Phillpotts. $1.50.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
Memories and Anecdotes. By Kate Sanborn. $1.75.

EDUCATION

The Gary Plan in New York: A Criticism

THE frank but quaintly humorous presentation of the essential features of the Gary Plan in AMERICA for October 30, fortunately does not suggest in the remotest degree any of the puffs which Sheridan has characterized as the puff direct, the puff oblique or the puff collusive. Such a candid presentation is indeed welcome. Even the casual reader of the daily press must often marvel at the persistent but often injudicious exploitation of the educational scheme devised by Mr. Wirt. Father Blakely fails to do justice to this publicity campaign when he says that the Gary Plan has found its way to the Sunday Supplement, "where on occasion it has fought for space with the pictured antics of the Dingbat Family." He overlooks the fact that for months Cartoonist Goldberg's impossible humans have striven nightly, but in vain, to outshine the boxed column in the Evening Mail, devoted exclusively to an appraisal of the Gary school organization. This is a handicap for any plan, however great its merits. I honestly believe that Mr. Wirt has been treated with greater respect and more courteous appreciation by his critics, than by certain of his friends whose injudicious and extravagant advocacy has frequently aroused the suspicion that interests other than those of the children have impelled them to speak.

NEVER ACTUALLY DEMONSTRATED

What I wish to point out first of all is that our blank ignorance of the real value of the Gary Plan as tested in terms of practical administration is really amazing. Few indeed can fail to be roused to generous enthusiasm by the ideal type of school which Mr. Wirt contemplates, but which has never been actually demonstrated in any large school system. Father Blakely states that Mr. Wirt's "distinctive contribution to educational science is found in his synthetic treatment of hitherto unrelated community forces of educational efficiency." Yet, unless we can find this ideal concretely realized in some educational system, we may be pardoned if we assume the attitude of a doubting Thomas. We do not wish to lose through chaotic reconstruction what has been won by hard-fought battles in the cause of public education.

I know of no reliable data which show the extent to which the Gary system has been successfully operated under conditions such as exist in New York. Before fixing an educational budget with a resultant educational policy, we should know the number of cities in which the Plan has been tried, the size of the school population, the number of months or years during which the experiment has been conducted, and the consensus of the opinion of qualified observers as to its failure or success. Even credulous and naive persons are moved to doubt when sweeping generalizations are made, based on the alleged success of the scheme in such populous centers as Sewickly, Winnetka, Swarthmore, Kalamazoo and Gary. The aggregate school population of these towns is less than that of a typical school district of the lower East Side. Moreover our confidence in the practicability of the Plan is sorely tried when we find that the effusive appeals for the city-wide extension of the Plan in New York are in sharp contrast with the disapproval of the scheme in whole or in part, by Superintendents Maxwell, Ettinger, Haaren and Shallow of New York, and by Superintendents Clement of Elizabeth, New Jersey, Hughes of Syracuse, Spaulding of Minneapolis and Poland of Jersey City.

FAIR TRIAL IN NEW YORK

Furthermore, the advocates of the Gary Plan have little ground to complain of the opportunities offered them in New York for a thorough demonstration of the Garyized school. Seldom if ever in the history of public education has an educator with a purely theoretical scheme of reorganization been given a budget of practically one million dollars to show the efficiency of his schemes. This generous provision was made by the Board, despite the fact that the demonstration begun more than a term since in a Brooklyn school and in a school in the Bronx, has not proved the claims that had been presented. In these schools no notable economies have been effected, yet on the basis of a public campaign, intended to compel the adoption of the Gary Plan, the budget was voted by the Board of Estimate and Apportionment.

A constantly varying emphasis on the so-called essentials of the Plan and a lightning-like change in its administrative features were made the basis of a claim that there could be a saving of ten per cent of the present teaching staff; in addition, it was said that forty per cent could be saved in the cost of sites, buildings and equipment. As a result, the Gary Plan was seized by the Board of Estimate and Apportionment not as a broad educational scheme for the enrichment of school life, but as a device intended to effect certain economies. In short, during the last month, New York has presented an anomalous and deplorable spectacle of a board arrogating to itself a control over educational policies for which there is not the slightest warrant either in legal decisions or in the statute law.

AN EVALUATION DESIRED

Those teachers who have ever with an open mind demanded that a scientific attitude be maintained toward all the experimental work in the system, whether the work be organized by Dr. Ettinger or by Mr. Wirt, have been regarded as reactionaries. Yet they have merely held that before the Gary Plan be further extended, a scientific evaluation of Mr. Wirt's demonstration should be obtained. It is plain that the scheme involves a number of novel features in school administration, such as departmental teaching for all from the first year through to the eighth, supervision of classes by pupils instead of by teachers, a promiscuous grouping of the younger and older children for auditorium, laboratory and shop work, the omission of formal physical training, the deferring of scholastic work for young children until very late in the forenoon and afternoon; and the use of churches as a means of distributing pupils during the out-of-school periods. None of these features has as yet proved its value in either of the schools into which they have been introduced. Prudence then, would suggest that this experimentation be carefully examined before the city is committed to a system which may impair the present admitted efficiency of the schools.

HAZARD AND GRAVE RESPONSIBILITY

Prior to the present controversy, President Churchill of the Board of Education was always regarded as an inspired iconoclast in matters educational. His opinion of the proposal to adopt the Gary Plan for New York, is therefore of particular interest:

> To put the Gary Plan before full trial into general use throughout this city of many and divergent communities, aggregating upward of three-quarters of a million of children, would be an undertaking of such hazard and grave responsibility as to bid the most sanguine to pause. I believe in the influence of the layman in education to prevent the schools from drifting away from the needs of the world without; but despite criticism that may reasonably be made of the schools as they now exist, we should not ignore the experience of educators who have spent their lives in the study of the school problems of New York City.

Let us have a scientific evaluation of the New York demonstration before we commit ourselves unreservedly to the policy of adoption.

Manhattan. WILLIAM E. GRADY.

SOCIOLOGY

Are Parents Superfluous?

EVERY child loves a pirate. "Your little lad with dreamy gaze," for instance; what white imaginings are hallowed in the unsounded pools of his clear young eyes? Does his innocent vision, denied to us of grosser mold, penetrate the bounds of time and space, to where beyond these shoutings there is peace? Alas, no! Little Reginald is rapt into another world by the memories of his latest pirate. "As brave a gentleman as ever scuttled a ship," says the chronicler; and Reginald remembers with a thrill that ere the scuttling, great chests of bags, corpulent with doubloons and pieces of eight, had been transferred to the mizzen-deck of the Jolly Roger.

MISJUDGED PIRATES

Children, if the poets are to be credited, are excellent judges of character; no doubt, then, the general opinion that pirates are undesirable citizens, is founded on error. Pirates have virtues hidden from the general; their apparent villainies are heralded, but their motives are misconstrued. If now and again they scuttle a ship or line a shivering company along a narrow plank ten feet above the sounding main, they do these things in the spirit of the Walrus and the Carpenter, with sobs and tears, wiping the whiles their streaming eyes. Moreover they often break out into verse; simple, untutored rhymes evincing the deep faith of the piratical bard. There is a long poem on Death which cannot be quoted here in its integrity; but the concluding lines inculcate a valuable ethical lesson:

Take warning now from me,
And shun bad company
Lest you come to Hell with me,
I must die, I must die. (bis.)

This is indeed a most excellent philosophy, a rule of life better than anything in Ibsen or Shaw.

MODERN TYPES

Since, then, the pirate is a misjudged person, there is small reason for tears that he is still in our midst. He is not dead, he does not occupy a pedestal in a museum; he is very much alive, and as of yore, his favorite haunt is New York. Out of deference to modern prejudices, he no longer glories in the name of pirate; he is not a tarry-handed person with a cutlass, full of strange oaths. He disguises himself as an educator or a social worker; his chief weapon is a page of statistics and a volume on heredity; and his or her chief occupation is to scuttle homes or what seem the hulks of homes. Bitterness is removed from this truculent arraignment by the reflection that these pirates are actuated by the highest and holiest of motives. The flag nailed to the mast of their rakish sloop bears the legend "Get the Child"; their motto is Fortiter in modo sed suaviter in re, and they can roar you as gently as any suckling dove. What they do, may not always be regarded with approval by the old-fashioned person who believes that the authority of the fond parent should be strengthened at all costs; but that the intent of these pirates is heavenly, must be allowed as a self-evident proposition.

GETTING THE CHILD

Success follows their efforts to get the child, because in New York as in every large city, there are many parents who are so engaged with other interests that children can claim but little of their time and less of their attention. These are the homes, or the hulks of homes, upon which the social worker casts a baleful, piratical eye. Instead of endeavoring to patch up the wreck, he prefers to scuttle it, and to attempt the impossible task of building up a new home, according to the most approved modern social plans. His purpose is assuredly laudable; not so the ultimate results.

The problem which has brought the social pirate into being is this. During the late hours of the afternoon and even far into the night, and all day on holidays, thousands of boys and girls are running wild on the city streets. As a rule, their surroundings are decidedly unsanitary; worse than any physical evil, the companions whom they meet, and the sights which they cannot escape, are calculated to make these children useless, if not vicious, members of society.

DISSOLVING HOMES

What is to be done with these children? Only the most inane optimist will say that the problem does not exist, or that the solution is easy. The social worker of the usual type, honestly professes that he does not wish to do anything to break up the home; that he is loath, as he should be, to remove children from their parents. Yet his earnest efforts to solve this very difficult question must in the end substitute a worse evil for a quite undeniable present evil. He proposes, in effect, measures of relief which take from the parent the greater part of his responsibility toward his children. He will lengthen the school hours; he will have Saturday and evening classes; he will found neighborhood houses, and open a public playground for every half-mile section of the city. The child's physical health will be the care of the city physician; his mental progress is the business of the school; his vocation will be pointed out by his teacher or the physical director; his games, his clothes, his reading, his ambitions, all are "supervised"; even his soul may nowadays come under the care of persons who in the natural order of things certainly have no right to undertake this direction. From morning until night, the child is to be in the hands of the municipal authorities. That there is much in this supervision which is good and perhaps necessary, no one will deny. These varied activities assuredly keep the children off the streets, and place them, for the most part, in wholesome surroundings; but they have gone so far and propose to go so much farther, that one is inclined to ask what, after all, are parents good for? Are they to play no part in the education and formation of their children? Are they to be allowed and even encouraged to transfer all their responsibility to the State?

A PRINCIPAL'S TESTIMONY

The principal of a New York school in which the Gary Plan is now being tried, admits this dangerous tendency very frankly. "We cannot fail to realize," he writes in the Mail for September 21 of the present year, "that the more the school does for the children, the more it separates the children from their parents. In a word, the school tends to break up the home."

> It does this in two ways. The parents drift away from their children because they do not know what the children are doing. For hours every day the children inhabit a splendid mansion, filled with luxuries and conveniences that the poorer parents know nothing of. The children read books their parents never read. They do things the old people never did. The result is a breach which grows wider. The school further separates the child from his parents because he no longer works with them. He no longer shares in the common ambitions which once bound a family together. This is, of course, deplorable, and some means of restoring the lost balance must be found. The school is in duty bound to re-create the home.

The principal of this school thinks that the balance can be restored only when "the school and the neighborhood have been brought together for a common object." He finds this common object in gardening, and he would set the pupils of his schools at work with their fathers in truck-gardens in a corner of the school campus. No doubt gardening is a healthy occupation for the boy; but as a method of bringing parents and children together the plan does not seem practical. Few New York parents are farmers or truck-gardeners; and the few who gain a livelihood by this ancient occupation will rarely be found willing to dig a plot in a school playground to edify their children.

SHIFTING THE BURDEN

What is good in these modern public movements for the benefit of the child deserves our encouragement and the sincere flattery of imitation. No one is disposed to criticize the shortcomings incidental to a work of such difficulty; but there is reason to fear that in endeavoring to meet a very real and urgent need common in modern city life, a large class of social workers are creating a greater evil than that which with creditable if short-sighted earnestness they are seeking to remove. Unchecked, they may make the "dutiful parent" as superfluous as a pterodactyl in a kindergarten.

It is freely admitted that some so-called "homes" are beyond all hope of reconstruction, but it is also true that these homes form a very small minority. This generous shifting of the responsibility of the parent to the State, so noticeable during the last decade, tends to weaken the very spirit which makes homes possible. It is but human to throw off all possible burdens; and a citizenry trained under a régime of state bureaucracy can evolve in nothing but a nation of dumb driven cattle. We are now spending millions, and social workers are devoting themselves, often in an admirably unselfish spirit, to make our cities better places for children to live in. Without abandoning what is necessary or even suitable for the supervision of the child, would it not be more profitable to spend some of these millions in the task of devising ways and means of teaching parents to care for their children? A small beginning has been made by those municipalities which through the Juvenile and Criminal courts and other public agencies seek to strengthen in negligent parents a proper sense of their responsibility to their children.

TREATING SYMPTOMS

The bane of social work in America is that we insist upon treating symptoms, closing our eyes to the disease. A neglected child is a symptom; the real disease is a negligent father or mother. Municipal social work for children has many admirable features; but just at present it is in serious danger of going to a fatal excess. It is training up a race of mild-mannered, earnest social pirates, as brave a crew of gentlemen as ever scuttled a ship. We have had enough of these picturesque swashbucklers. What we now need is a prosaic crew of rescuers who can tow these battered hulks of homes into dry-dock for repairs.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The organization of an International Federation of Catholic Alumnæ during the past year was an event of no slight importance in the history of Catholic educational development. The chance which such a society affords for exerting Catholic influence upon contemporary life cannot be overestimated. While affording constant assistance and stimulus to Catholic educational institutions and enterprises, the Federation can at the same time make its claims and power felt in the widest circles. For it is an organization of educated Catholic women, trained in the highest ideals of Christianity no less than in secular learning, whose united efforts should be productive of the best results. The second annual convention of this Federation is to be held in Chicago, on November 26-28. The main purpose of the meeting is the proposal of a constitution, carefully drafted by the permanent organization committee. The constitution to be submitted has met with the approval of members of the legal profession and of the clergy, and on adoption will no doubt prove not only a strong bond of union between the various alumnæ associations that make up the International Federation, but also an incentive to noble effort for God and the nation.

Not from those who have the silver and gold, but from the poor who have only their coppers to give does the money flow which supports Christ's Church and helps to extend His Kingdom abroad. A legacy was recently paid to the Society for the Propagation of the Faith by the sister of a deceased benefactor. "We had to work hard to gather the little money we have," she said, "but we decided that the one whom God left would enroll both as Perpetual Members." On inquiry it was found that their total estate was less than $300.00. "From an estate worth three hundred thousand dollars," aptly remarks the editor of the Good Work, "it is doubtful if we would have received half the sum given by these humble folk." It is a proof that God's blessing rests with His poor, and it is not unreasonable to suppose, as the editor does, that the same blessing multiplies the gifts of sacrifice. More precious than silver are those hard-earned pennies of the poor given with open-handed liberality to the most deserving of God's poor, the Church's missionaries. "At any rate our coppers somehow turn into gold in the results accomplished." If this were not the case, how could our foreign missions subsist? How do they subsist? we often wonder. God's hand is beneath them and sustains them, but our own cooperation is required to win this favor from God.

The Catholic readers of the Boston Evening Transcript for October 30 must have been agreeably surprised at Rollin Lynde Hartt's excellent article on "Chestnut Hill's Touch of Oxford: a Near View of the Unappreciated Architectural Splendors of Boston College." The author writes:

> Apparently, we Protestants accept the principle of a Baptist, Methodist, or Episcopal college, which turns out bachelors of arts and cannot by any means turn out bachelors of divinity, but balk at the notion of a Catholic college doing the same thing. It is high time we left off the follies. Nor is this difficult. Walk boldly in from Commonwealth Avenue, and see for yourselves. Catholics don't bite. On the contrary, they receive you with a charming Irish courtesy, sufficient reward in itself for your coming, while there are other rewards, some romantic, some esthetic, some moral; moral, that is, in the sense that you feel a tingle of enthusiasm over the fine, manly struggle that has made the institution what it is and braves the future with a spirit of consecrated pluck very splendid to observe. The mere walk from Commonwealth Avenue toward the magnificent recitation building, the one with the tower, of course, for the Faculty Residence on your left is still an affair of derricks, scaffolds and tawny gray walls of but a quarter their intended height, has thrills you never suspected. How that majestic pile gains in beauty as you come nearer and get its noble lines foreshortened! You might almost be strolling within the Cathedral Close at Canterbury, and looking up, up, at a wealth of Gothic loveliness and grace. To call it "one of the sights of Boston" is no extravagance. Nor do you wonder that the Catholics boast of choosing "the finest campus in America." From that undulated hillside, where twenty collegiate structures of the same tawny gray stone are to be grouped in dignified harmony when the plans are carried to completion, you look out across the twin lakes, the wooded shores, the Brookline ridges and hillocks, and, far on beyond, the dim prospective of Boston, where a faint, ghostlike campanile, the Custom House tower, seems hanging in air.

After that, every "oldest subscriber" of the Evening Transcript ought to take her knitting along and go right out to Chestnut Hill and see what those medieval Papists are doing there.

Evelyn W. Hughan encourages Socialists by telling them in the Call that there is no reason to fear that women voters will be more conservative than men. Those who entertain such suspicions, she says, have not looked carefully into the record of the States which have given the vote to women. She then quotes with approval the following passage from the Remonstrance:

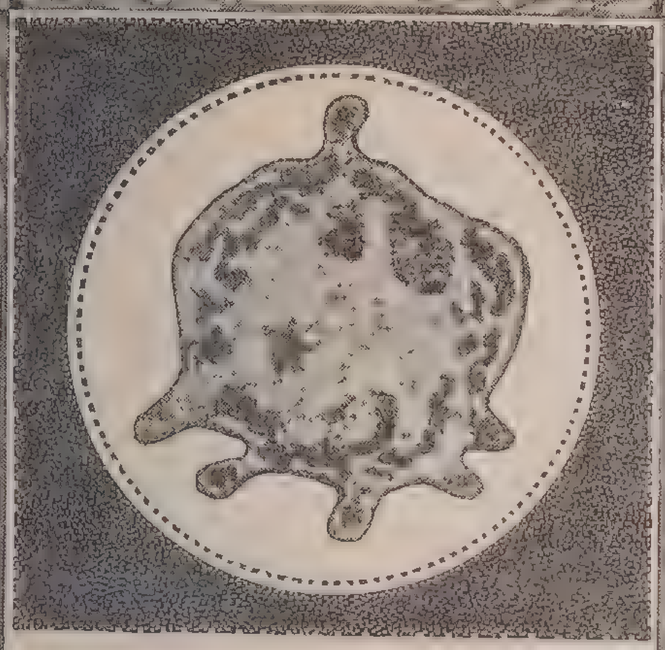
> That woman suffrage has already added materially to the strength of Socialism is apparent by the vote at the last Presidential election. The six full-suffrage States in which women were qualified to vote at that election gave Debs, the Socialist candidate, 159,496 votes. The six New England States, with a population nearly a million and a half larger, gave him only 30,170 votes.
>
> What the Socialists want is to increase their strength, through women's votes, in New England and other Eastern States. Their hope wherever woman suffrage is adopted is a reasonable one, because it is based upon experience in the States which already have woman suffrage. This is their slogan. It is for this that they exhort each other to "act, move, hustle."

However logical this argument may be, it is certain that Socialists in general build great hope upon woman suffrage and are everywhere its most consistent supporters. It is the belief of Evelyn Hughan that all the evidence in our country shows that the voting woman stands for "progressive" legislation. This she predicts will build up a class-conscious proletariat "that will work for and achieve the Socialist Commonwealth."

It is the opinion of the Commissioner of Immigration at the Port of New York, Frederick C. Howe, as expressed in the Review of Reviews, that immigration to America may in the coming years be followed by a change in the tide, culminating in a possible emigration sufficiently considerable to affect our industrial conditions. During the twelve months from August 1, 1914, to July 31, 1915, immigration gradually slackened and fell at the average rate of 32,444 per month. The decline for June, 1915, over June of the previous year was more than sixty-eight per cent. The immigration problem has been solved for the present and an emigration question may succeed. Owing to the possible effects of the war upon the land-owning nobles in Russia, Poland, Austria and Hungary, he believes, there may be a wider distribution of land ownership, as was the case in France after the French Revolution. The land thus broken up may be purchasable on easy terms and tempt many European immigrants in America to return to their native countries, taking with them substantial sums for the upbuilding of Europe. Doubtless contrary influences will likewise be at work to lead men to leave their native European soil. Most important among these will probably be the burden of taxation. Mr. Howe concludes with the following remarks:

> There will be little emigration from Germany, France and Belgium under any circumstances, for these countries have contributed but little to our ethnic composite during recent years. There may in fact be a reversal of the tide. Population may flow from the United States to Europe, and in any event, there is likely to be such a change in the position of labor that wages will rise not only in Europe, but in the United States as well. Wages may rise so rapidly and to such a point as to revolutionize not only the industrial, but the political status of labor even in the autocratic countries of Europe.



The lessening of emigration from Europe, and even the possibility of a certain measure of emigration from our own shores will be conditioned to a large extent by the skill of European governments in meeting a new situation by financial and administrative measures calculated to rehabilitate industry and agriculture. It is impossible to forecast with any certainty what the future may bring. Mr. Howe's point of view is perhaps novel and widely different from the supposition that there will doubtless be a general exodus from European countries at the end of the war, unless prevented by stringent laws.

Attention deserves to be given to the remarkable statement of the Rev. Elliot White, rector of St. Mark's Episcopal Church, Philadelphia, in regard to the action of the Board of Missions in deciding to send delegates to the Pan-Protestant Congress at Panama. The fact that his own sane judgment is endorsed by a number of clergymen is still more gratifying in face of the anti-Catholic bigotry fomented by men whose professed duty it is to bear Christ's message of peace and good will.

> The Panama Congress has been so hopelessly discredited that the question who should attend it is not in itself a serious matter. The spectacle of a gathering of men whose chief bond of union is hatred of the largest communion of Christendom is not one of which the present century has reason to be proud.
>
> Rome needs no assistance from us, nor does she ask any. She possesses in her fold men superior in wit, wisdom and piety to any this congress is likely to assemble. Our Board of Missions, it is to be remembered, is simply an executive committee, charged with collecting and disbursing of mission funds. When it goes outside of its province it cannot commit the church, and as I understand the present proposal to send delegates, the committing of our church to any principle or measure is expressly disclaimed. I regard it as unfortunate that the board has been pleased to place itself in opposition to the expressed decision of our bishops, who are our real leaders. Our delegates stand in an unenviable position. They attend the congress without power to do anything. They are without influence, because the church is not behind them.

The sanction of the Board of Missions, Dr. White concludes, does not indicate the true attitude of the Episcopal Church in America. That the valid reasons he gives for non-participation in an event whose bearing upon the Catholic Church has been made sufficiently plain should be disregarded by those who are bent upon antagonism to Catholicism at all costs, was to be expected.

Lucius Hopkins Miller, assistant professor of Biblical instruction in Princeton University, has recently seen fit to write a book and publish to the world at large the type of Christianity dispensed to the students of an institution which hails him as a teacher in Israel. The volume is most ineptly entitled "Our Knowledge of Christ," being mainly a display of the Professor's own lack of knowledge concerning the most vital subject of his Biblical instructions. "He denies the virgin birth of Jesus, His resurrection from the dead, His miracles, and that He was other than a human being." Such is the summary made of his doctrine by the Presbyterian Banner. The same organ then continues, in just indignation: "Is this the 'Biblical instruction' which Princeton University, with a Presbyterian minister for its president and with Presbyterian antecedents and history, gives to its students? Have the officers of this institution no responsibility in this matter?" To all which the author, unfortunately, has an answer ready made: "I can only say that these conclusions form the basis on which I have been able to maintain a vital, positive faith in Christ as Master, Lord and Saviour." Absurd as such a "basis" for "faith in Christ" evidently is, consisting in a denial of Our Lord's Divinity and of whatever constitutes our reason for accepting His doctrine, for worshiping and obeying Him, the question naturally suggests itself: By what authority can the Presbyterian Church, or any Protestant denomination, forbid the adoption of such conclusions? With the rule of private interpretation of the Scriptures accepted as the rock upon which their churches are established, in substitution for the authority of Peter, on whom the Church of Christ is built, it at once becomes the privilege of every man to interpret the Holy Books according to his own personal "lights," and so to wrest them finally to his own destruction. It is this reduction to absurdity, constantly repeated, which should lead men to see the untenableness of the position occupied by Protestantism and lead them back to the One Church, which alone can speak with the voice of authority, because to her alone Christ has promised the abiding presence of His Spirit, to teach her all truth even to the end of time.

This is an Ameba, one of the Parasites found in Pyorrhea (Riggs Disease) Magnified 2500 Diameters.

Thousands Have Pyorrhea

(Riggs Disease)

and Don't Know It Till Their Teeth Have to be Pulled

Symptoms that may be Pyorrhea: Bleeding gums after brushing; loose teeth; receding, tender, inflamed or sore gums.

PYORRHEA may attack anyone, even children. It develops in your gums without ache, pain or warning.

Sozodont now contains Emetine, that new beneficent discovery, used by the science of dentistry in the treatment of Pyorrhea. Therefore Sozodont not only cleans, whitens, polishes, cools and freshens your teeth as it has done for 64 years, but Sozodont now Fights Pyorrhea.

Start your whole family on Sozodont today. Send 4c for a generous 10-day sample of Sozodont paste, powder or liquid (state which), and feel again that pure, vigorous, "arctic" sensation on your gums and teeth—which only Sozodont can give.

HALL & RUCKEL
216 Washington Street New York

SOZODONT

Paste,
Powder or Liquid, 25c.

Each contains Emetine

Business is booming!

Dayton, Ohio.

Merchants everywhere tell our 800 salesmen that business is booming.

Farmers have had two record crops, at big prices, with big demand at home and abroad.

Stocks of manufactured material are short, and labor is in great demand.

Exports largely exceed imports.

Factories are busy, many working overtime.

More freight cars are needed, and steamers are taxed to capacity.

People are living better, and spending their money more freely.

This country has the best money in the world, and more of it than ever before.

Such a combination of favorable circumstances never has occurred before, and probably will never occur again.

Billions of dollars are passing over the merchants' counters.

The people who spend this money want the best service.

They demand it in all kinds of stores, from the smallest to the largest.

They get it in stores which use our up-to-date Cash Registers, which quicken service, stop mistakes, satisfy customers, and increase profits.

Over a million merchants have proved our Cash Registers to be a business necessity.

[Signed] John H. Patterson

Write for booklet to
The National Cash Register Co.
Dayton, Ohio.

ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

THE VATICAN
ITS HISTORY .·. ITS TREASURES

A TRUE ARISTOCRAT
FOR LIBRARIES OF CLASS

THE LETTERS & ARTS PUBLISHING CO., Inc.
One West 34th Street, New York

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

For Non-Contagious Medical Cases

St. Mary's Hill

For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

Sarony

PHOTOGRAPHER

for 49 years patronized by the Clergy, who receive a special discount.

364 Fifth Ave. (Near 34th St.)
NEW YORK

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils

Catalogue "M" FREE upon request

French Cooking Ranges and Broilers

Cooking Equipments of Every Description

JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON 16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST. NEW YORK, N. Y.

THE UNIVERSITY IN PRINT

THE GUIDANCE OF A THOUSAND TEACHERS

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

WITH COURSES OF STUDY AND READING IN

Science, Art, Religion, History, Philosophy, Education, Literature, Social Science, Law, Economics, Civics

A NEW EDUCATIONAL MOVEMENT

With the Editors and Contributors of The Catholic Encyclopedia as a Faculty

AN EXPERT

Editor of Dictionaries and Encyclopedias, Frank H. Vizetelly, of Funk & Wagnall's, has this to say of

THE CATHOLIC ENCYCLOPEDIA

Some may think that this Encyclopedia is restricted to religion. It treats that, of course, but it treats more than that. As its title implies, it is a universal encyclopedia, for the history of the Catholic Church is the history of the universe.

Within the sixteen volumes of The Catholic Encyclopedia, the editors provide:

1. An Encyclopedia of Christian faith.
2. A Standard Dictionary of Catholic Theology.
3. An Encyclopedia of Church History.
4. A Book of Martyrs.
5. A Dictionary of Philosophy.
6. An Encyclopedia of Law—Civil and Ecclesiastical.
7. A Library of the World's Best Literature.
8. A Cyclopedia of Education.
9. A Dictionary of Biography.
10. An Encyclopedia of Music.
11. A Gazetteer of the World.
12. A Museum of Art.

To summarize the subjects treated the reviewer might have termed it a Dictionary of:

Civilization	History	Military Orders	Science
Controversy	Popes	Monasticism	Sects, Churches
Exploration	Saints	Nations, Races	Sociology

14,000 Pages
25,000,000 Words
15,000 Leading Articles
350,000 Subjects
1,543 Writers
153 Revisers, Indexers, and Editorial Assistants

The Catholic Encyclopedia

15 Goupil Color Plates
356 Full Page Halftones and Engravings
66 Original Maps
2,277 Text Illustrations

Fifteen Volumes, Royal Octavo, and Index Volume. Complete Set weighs 61 lbs. One-Half Leather. Size 7 x 10¼ and 1¼ Inches in thickness.

NEW SPECIAL LIGHT WEIGHT PAPER EDITIONS

IN THREE SPECIAL BINDINGS

For Cloth Binding $40.00 for Complete Set, 16 Volumes
For ½ Leather Binding $60.00 for Complete Set, 16 Volumes
For ½ Tan Arabian Morocco Binding $80.00 for Complete Set, 16 Volumes
Less 10 per cent. for cash or by easy monthly payments of $3.00 or more per month.

FOR CANADA AND PROVINCES, add to above prices $5.00 per set to cover customs and brokerage.

MAIL AT ONCE THIS SPECIAL LOW PRICE COUPON

THE K. of C. CATHOLIC TRUTH COMMITTEE
16 East 40th Street, New York City A, 11

Please send me the new Knights of Columbus Edition of The Catholic Encyclopedia, 16 volumes, bound in.....
for which I enclose.....payment of.....
Name .....
Address .....
Council .....
City .....State.....

N. B.—Complete information and copy of illustrated specimen pages sent free on request.

To Teachers

Are you looking for a Text-Book of the highest efficiency that will prove an important adjunct in class life?

A rapidly increasing number of our Colleges and Schools, all over the country, are using AMERICA as supplementary reading in connection with their various courses.

One large college used last year more than ONE HUNDRED COPIES EACH WEEK.

Its carefully-written pages and well-developed thought, the breadth of its articles, the timeliness of its editorials, and the clear-cut division of the Review, render it a valuable asset in forming the pupils' minds upon the great questions of the day. To the Professor of Ethics, Oratory, Political Economy, Sociology, Pedagogy, Literature, Composition, History, Apologetics and kindred branches it affords an excellent store of illustration.

A Special Educational Rate

Applicable only to Catholic Teachers and Catholic Students in Catholic Schools

Let us hear from you to-day so that no further issue of the National Catholic Weekly Review may be lost to your class. Begin immediately so that besides instructing them through the pages of AMERICA you may introduce them to the most universally quoted Catholic paper in the English Language and have the reflex benefits of its use in the School felt in the Home.

Write for details.

CIRCULATION BUREAU

The America Press

59 East 83d Street

New York, N. Y.

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequalled musical quality.
80 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal. Memorials.

Everything in Brushes

E. J. KELLY
127 Reade St., New York, N. Y.

The Coward Shoe
"REG. U. S. PAT. OFF"

Will Put Your Feet Where They Belong

Most persons have some kind of foot trouble. Broken arches, weak ankles, corns, bunions and other foot ailments are due largely to wearing unnatural, tight fitting, foot-cramping shoes.

There is a Coward Shoe to remedy every form of foot trouble.

Don't you think your feet deserve a little more care than you have been giving them?

Wear Coward Shoes and put your feet where they belong.

James S. Coward
264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(Near Warren Street)

Mail Orders Filled Send for Catalog

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE

Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine

137 READE ST., NEW YORK

BETWEEN GREENWICH AND HUDSON STREETS.

3,000 PASTORS

have OUR SUNDAY VISITOR distributed either at the church door, or through the school, or through the officers of Catholic societies.

We send bundles of OUR SUNDAY VISITOR to every corner of the United States, to Porto Rico, the Panama Zone, to the Philippines, India, to England, Ireland, Australia and South Africa.

Ours is the POPULAR National Weekly. A Penny Paper

It is not a newspaper, and therefore does not trespass on the field of the Diocesan weeklies. Its aim is to instruct in a popular way, to undo the influence of anti-Catholic propaganda, and to hold up the Catholic Church favorably to the non-Catholic.

OUR SUNDAY VISITOR readers become enthusiastic Catholics; they are made at the very low cost of 50 cents a year

SUBSCRIPTIONS POSTPAID

Single Subscriptions 50 cents the year; bundle orders 68 cents per 100

OUR SUNDAY VISITOR
Huntington, Indiana

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

5 Cents Each
40 Cents a Dozen

Published at a nominal price, on the eighth and twenty-second of the month, the CATHOLIC MIND pamphlets supply to the militant Catholic the most effective weapons with which to meet the threatening issues of the day. There are several important articles on some current question in each number. In handy form these tracts for the times can be kept for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

5 Cents Each
40 Cents a Dozen

The Church and Peace
What Women Can Do
Homicide Excusable and Felonious
Cheap and Precious

What the Church and especially the present Pope have done to promote peace among the nations is shown in Archbishop Hanna's splendid address before the International Peace Congress at San Francisco, which is printed in the CATHOLIC MIND for November 8. What women can do to correct three great evils of the day is outlined, in the same number, in a most illuminating and convincing manner by Daniel A. Lord, S.J.; and two other timely and practical topics, "Homicide Excusable and Felonious" and Neo-Malthusianism are attractively discussed by Father Fisher and Father Blakely.

Since June, 1914, 200,000 Copies of the CATHOLIC MIND have been circulated. We want you to help us to double that number before another year passes.

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

10. Plain Words of Socialism. — C. S. Devas, M.A.
13. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
19. Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. — Wilfrid Ward

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. — H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.

1910

4, 5, 6, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, V. — Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Halley's Comet. I, II, III.
14, 15. St. Charles Borromeo Encyclical.
17. Holy Communion for Children
18. The XXI Eucharistic Congress. — Edward Spillane, S.J.
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. — T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
16. The Catholic Press. — E. Spillane, S.J.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. — Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. — His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
22. Children's Early and Frequent Communion. — Joseph Husslein, S.J.
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. — Henry J. Swift, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. — John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific. II, III. — Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M. Bishop of Christ Church
17. The People's Pope. — M. Kenny, S.J.
24. Father Algué's Barocyclonometer. — New York Tribune, Dec. 1912

1913

5. Capital Punishment. — Rev. John J. Ford, S.J.
16. Catholicism and Americanism. — Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. — Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. — M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. — R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. — John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. — A. de F.
24. First Encyclical of Benedict XV.

1915

1. The Catholic Press. — E. Hull, S.J.
2. The "Menace" and the Mails. — Paul Bakewell
3. The Ethics of War. — Edward Masterson, S.J.
4. Sixty Historical "Don'ts." — James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.
5. The Jesuit Myth. — Robert Swickerath, S.J.
6. Fifty "Don'ts" of Science. — James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.
   Catholics in the Y. M. C. A. — Nelson Hume
7. Catholic Sociology. — Richard H. Tierney, S.J.
   Newman's Alleged "Scurrility" — Paul Bakewell
8. Was Shakespeare a Catholic? — James J. Walsh, M. D., Ph.D.
9. The Church and the Mexican Revolution. — By a Mexican Lawyer
10. Dante's 650th Birthday. — James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D., Litt.D.
    How to Reach the Medieval Mind. — Vincent McNabb, O.P.
11. Magna Charta's Centenary. — P. Guilday, Ph. D.
12. The Church and the Sex Problem. — Richard H. Tierney, S.J.
13. The War's Lesson. — Rt. Rev. Thomas O'Dwyer, D.D.
14. Catholic Schools for Catholic Youth. — Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
15. Temperance Against Prohibition. — Henry Maurice
16. The Papacy. — His Eminence Cardinal Mercier
17. The Church and the Immigrant. — Rt. Rev. Francis C. Kelley, D.D.
18. The Contemporary Drama. — James J. Daly, S.J.
19. The Catholic School. — William D. Guthrie
20. The Educative Influence of the Catholic Press. — Richard H. Tierney, S.J.

Special Rates: Pamphlets for 1908-1911, inclusive, $1.00 per hundred; for 1912-14, inclusive, $2.00 per hundred; for 1915, $3.00 per hundred.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

FOR 25 CENTS

These three important pamphlets sent to any address

CATHOLIC READER'S GUIDE
Introduction to Catholic Reading

WHAT SHALL I BE
A Chat with Young People

HOLY COMMUNION FOR CHILDREN

ALL THREE FOR 25 CENTS

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street NEW YORK

ANY 3 FOR $1.00
ALL 6 FOR $1.50

You can't neglect this opportunity to secure a most attractive group of volumes combining pleasure, profit and instruction.

SOCIALISM

A volume of ten excellent essays by foremost Catholic writers. All written in a concise and popular style.
280 Pages Price 50 cents

LORETTO

Annals of the pioneer Congregation of American Sisters of Charity. A Book of Historical Interest.
By ANNA C. MINOGUE
300 Pages 21 Illustrations
Price 50 cents

THE NAMES OF GOD

and Meditative Summaries of the Divine Perfection
By the
Ven. LEONARD LESSIUS, S.J.
Translated by T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.
248 pages, large type, with portrait
Price 50 cents

LIFE AND LETTERS OF
HENRY VAN RENSSELAER
Priest of the Society of Jesus
By EDWARD P. SPILLANE, S.J.
An illustrated volume of 350 pages
Price 75 cents

ISAAC JOGUES
DISCOVERER OF LAKE GEORGE
By T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.
55 Pages 9 Illustrations
Price 25 cents

LIFE OF
Venerable Philippine Duchesne
Founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, and one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.
Price 25 cents POSTAGE EXTRA

THE AMERICA PRESS,
59 East 83d Street, New York

THE MONTH

gives the Catholic point of view on questions of current interest relating to theology, ethics, history, economics, science and all matters wherein cultivated Catholic opinion is of importance. It also publishes high class fiction and verse, and papers of a more general literary character. Subscriptions ($3.50 per annum) for the United States received by

THE DEVIN ADAIR CO.
437 Fifth Avenue
New York

Reverend Superiors of Charitable and Educational Institutions
can SAVE MONEY on purchases of Groceries, Teas, Coffees, Canned Goods and Laundry Supplies by dealing with

MARTIN C. DYER
College, Convent, Institution and Hospital Representative of
AUSTIN, NICHOLS & CO., Inc.
New York Sales Office, 100 Hudson St.
Cor. Franklin and Leonard Sts., New York, N. Y.

What Shall I Be?

A CHAT WITH YOUNG PEOPLE

By the
Rev. Francis Cassilly, S.J.

A handy manual that presents in brief and simple form sound principles to assist the young in deciding their future course of Life. The choice of vocations is a pressing subject at this season of the year.

Cloth, 30 cents	Paper, 10 cents
12 copies, $2.70	12 copies, $1.00
50 copies, $10.00	50 copies, $4.00
100 copies, $22.50	100 copies, $7.50

Postage extra

The America Press
59 East 83d Street
New York

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL
HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

VERY REV. S. W. FAY, S.T.D.
Rector.

Georgetown University
WASHINGTON, D. C.
Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E. St., N. W

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

Carlton Academy

UPPER SCHOOL for older boys gives thorough preparation for all colleges. Individual attention. Commercial Courses. Athletic Sports. Resident Chaplain.

LOWER SCHOOL for younger boys, with Housemother to give personal care.

SUMMIT New Jersey — Charles H. Schultz. A.M., Headmaster.

Send your boy to
MT. WASHINGTON SEMINARY
Mt. Washington, Maryland
COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR BOYS
6 TO 13 YEARS
For catalogue apply to DIRECTRESS

FOUR SPLENDID VOLUMES

Dealing with American History

For $6.00 Postage Extra

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold

Pioneer Laymen of North America

Telling the fascinating story of the adventurous Cartier, Menendez, Champlain, De La Tour, Maisonneuve, Le Moyne and Radisson.

One of the most picturesque and fascinating periods in American history, that of the exploits of the French in Canada is the foundation of the first volume "Pioneer Laymen of North America."—New York Sun.

Father Campbell has done a noted service to history and to the Church.—The Monitor.

The volume abounds in variety.—Tablet (Brooklyn).

Father Campbell has given to the public one of the most valuable books of his prolific career.—Catholic Columbian.

It is both historic and romantic.—Catholic Universe.

Father Campbell is to be congratulated for his timely work.—Tidings.

300 Pages. 16 Illustrations. Price $1.75. Postage extra.

Among the Iroquois

Volume I

An Interesting Story of the Missionaries among the Iroquois.

Father Campbell's book is one of permanent interest and value.—Evening Post (New York.)

Interesting to Protestants and Catholics alike for its historical value.—Star (Atlanta.)

333 Pages. 27 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

Among the Hurons

Volume II

Tells the Heroic Story of De Brebeuf and His Associates.

It is a story of which the Church and the Order may well feel proud.—Sun (New York.)

480 Pages. 24 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

Among the Algonquins

Volume III

The Ethnic Group that figured more extensively in Our History than any other Indian Family.

The noble history of those old French priests is excellently told by their modern confrère, and it is a history with which every intelligent American Catholic should become familiar.—Catholic Historical Review.

336 Pages. 22 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street
New York

Schools and Colleges

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, and the University of Kentucky
Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers

LARGEST CATHOLIC COLLEGE IN AMERICA

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue . . . . . Prefect of Studies.

St. Joseph's College and Academy

EMMITSBURG, MARYLAND

Courses College, Commercial, Academic, Preparatory

Course in Pedagogy open to Senior and Junior College Students

Exceptional advantages in Music, Art, Domestic Science

Founded 1809. . . FREE CATALOGUE

ACADEMY OF OUR LADY

Ninety-fifth and Throop Streets
Longwood, CHICAGO, ILL.

A pure and lofty conception of life, high sense of duty, a noble type of Christian womanhood, refinement, and thorough scholarship, music and artistic culture, physical vigor and health, are the standards set for

YOUR DAUGHTER
AT THE
ACADEMY OF OUR LADY

Full range of Scientific, Classical, Literary and Historical Studies.

Catalogue sent on application.

Mt. St. Joseph's College

IRVINGTON, BALTIMORE, MD.

Courses in Classics, Sciences and Commerce, under able professors. Special facilities for Pre-Medical Students. Certificates Recognized.

Splendid health location. Spacious buildings. Extensive campus. Gymnasium. Outdoor swimming pool. Physical as well as mental training.

For Catalogue and particulars, address:

BROTHER DIRECTOR

THE FRANK MEANY CO. PRINTERS Inc.

Magazines Catalogues
Periodicals Booklets
Programmes

216-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT
Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York
HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES
Conducted by the
Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary
Magnificently situated on the Hudson, 40 minutes from New York City.
PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES
European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.
For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute
For Girls and Young Ladies
Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.
Chestnut Hill — Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue — Philadelphia, Pa.

IMMACULATA SEMINARY
MOUNT MARIAN, WASHINGTON, D. C.
High-class school for young women and girls. Situated in the Suburbs.
Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods
Abundant out-door exercise in beautiful suburban grounds; individual attention to character training; happy home life; thorough scholarship.
SPECIAL TWO-YEAR COURSE of COLLEGE work for high school graduates.
FULL PREPARATORY and ELECTIVE courses.
MUSIC, ART, EXPRESSION and domestic science.
All the advantages of the National Capital and sightseeing, with experienced chaperones.
For Illustrated Year Book Address
SISTER SECRETARY, DEP'T. F.

Seton Hill Schools
GREENSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA
On main line P. R. R., 30 miles from Pittsburgh
Elementary and High School Courses. University affiliation.
Two years' advanced Course for High School Graduates.
Conservatories of Music and Art.
Domestic Science. Gymnasium. Field Sports.
Address Department E
St. Joseph Academy for Girls — St. Mary's Annex for Small Boys

MT. ST. AGNES COLLEGE
Mt. Washington, Maryland
Day and Resident Students
Courses leading to Degree of A.B.
Professors of Distinction
Department of Pedagogy. State Certificates, teachers' license for public schools of Maryland, issued by the State Board of Education.
Music, Art and Domestic Science
For Information Apply to the Directress

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN
College of Mount Saint Vincent
On Hudson
CITY OF NEW YORK
DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS
Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station
PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST
COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B. A. and B. S.
COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students
WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS
PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT
ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON
CITY OF NEW YORK

College and Academy of St. Genevieve
FOR YOUNG LADIES
ASHEVILLE. N. C.
Located in the "Land of the Sky," 3,000 feet above sea level. Unsurpassed climatic conditions with mild winters. Ideal home-life. Instructors hold degrees from European and American Universities. St. Genevieve's also has a Preparatory Department for young children.
On account of the war which prevents Americans from visiting France, a new Department, known as the Lycée has been formed where students have exactly the same advantages as in France.
A few Lady boarders are received during the Summer months.
For Catalogue and Particulars
Apply to the Mother Superior

Mount de Sales
Academy of the Visitation
CATONSVILLE (NEAR BALTIMORE) MARYLAND
Ideal School for Young Ladies
Classic, Literary and Scientific Courses. French and German receive special attention. Departments of Music, Art and Elocution. Magnificent situation.
Ask for Illustrated Catalogue

College of Saint Teresa
Standard Degree Courses in Arts, Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.
Winona, Minn.

ST. FRANCIS XAVIER
COLLEGE and ACADEMY
Sisters of Mercy
4928 XAVIER PARK, CHICAGO, ILL.
The first Catholic College for women in Chicago—chartered 1912. Freshman class only in September, 1915.
Write for Prospectus

SAINT MARY-OF-THE-WOODS
For Women . . . College and Academy . . . . For Girls
Affiliated to the Catholic University
Departments of Arts and Sciences—Four-Year Course leading to degrees A.B. and B.S.
Department of Household Economics—Courses leading to the degree B.S. Elective courses offered to all college students.
Conservatory of Music—Teachers' and Artists' Certificate Courses.
School of Expression—Teachers' Certificate Courses. Various elective courses open to all students.
School of Art—Drawing, water color, oil, keramics. Certificates issued.
Academy—Full Four-Year High School Course and Grammar Department.
75th Year. A School of Four Generations.
Students from twenty-five States. Twelve modern buildings. New College Hall, Gymnasium, Natatorium, etc. Abundant out-door exercise. 40-acre golf course. Bulletins and illustrated booklets will be sent upon request.
Address Sister Secretary, Box 70, SAINT MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA

LUXURY and ECONOMY COMBINED

Mattresses last longer, are sweeter and cleaner, sleeping hours are more comfortable on beds equipped with

Quilted Mattress Pads

Conscientiously and expertly made of two pieces of heavy bleached white muslin, both sides quilted, with dainty snow white wadding of the best grade between. Soft, springy, sanitary.

They can be washed easily without losing their light, fluffy texture or their attractive whiteness.

Mothers readily appreciate their usefulness; they keep babies' cribs absolutely dry and sanitary. They are made in all sizes to fit any bed or crib.

Look for this trade mark and thus avoid "Seconds," damaged or "Just as Good" pads, sold under other labels.

Examine closely stitching on our pads and see that sizes correspond with size on ticket.

Sold in all high class Department Stores.

EXCELSIOR QUILTING CO.

15 Laight Street New York City

Representatives
WANTED
NOW IS THE TIME

AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week

WANTS

Bright, intelligent men or women in cities and towns to handle its constantly increasing circulation.

Agents do not have to go out of their home towns to do a good business, as America is a national publication.

Write for details.

Circulation Bureau

THE AMERICA PRESS

59 East 83rd Street New York, N. Y.

SECOND VOLUME

READY EARLY IN DECEMBER

SECOND VOLUME

PIONEER LAYMEN OF NORTH AMERICA

BY THE

Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, S.J.

Uniform in style with the first volume
300 Pages; 15 portraits, illustrations and maps

This second volume of the series of historical sketches of Catholic pioneer laymen that have been received with such favor by the public, continues the narratives to include the careers of Le Moyne, Perrot, D'Iberville, Frontenac, La Salle, Bienville, La Verendrye, and the famous Dr. John McLoughlin, the Father of Oregon.

"Father Campbell . . . has given to the public in Pioneer Laymen of North America one of the most valuable works of his prolific career."—Catholic Columbian.

"The general treatment is as scholarly as the sketches are fascinating."—Catholic Tribune.

"Father Campbell is to be congratulated for his timely work."—Tidings.

"These studies will go far to give American history a true and proper conception of these old Catholic heroes."—Tablet.

"One of the most picturesque and fascinating periods in American history . . . is the foundation of the first volume."—Sun (New York).

"The stories are told each with the same fulness of detail as in Father Campbell's earlier work."—The Month.

"A book for Americans."—The Monitor.

"From the Catholic viewpoint also, Father Campbell continues to correct the misstatements or misinterpretations of previous writers, largely non-Catholic and frequently prejudiced."—Catholic Historical Review.

Price $1.75 Postage Extra
The Two Volumes for $3.00

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d St., New York, N.Y.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIV, No. 6
WHOLE No. 345

NOVEMBER 20, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, Nov. 9, p. m.-Nov. 16, a. m. —The Campaign in Serbia—Sinking of the Ancona — Greek Parliament Dissolved. Austria-Hungary: War Loan and Clergy. China: A Protest and Its Answer. France: Resumption of Work — Population. Great Britain: Foreshadowing Conscription—The New War Council. Ireland: Depopulation; Recruiting. Mexico: Continued Persecution; the Week's News. 121-124

TOPICS OF INTEREST
Wine, Cana, the Mass — The Ouija Board — What Women Wanted—Popular Hymnody—A Challenge to Catholic Laymen 125-132

COMMUNICATIONS
Votes for Women — Mr. Moore and Transubstantiation 132, 133

EDITORIALS
How to Lose the Hyphen—By Way of Comparison — Law in Wisconsin — A "Midrash" Merely?—Life and Mr. Carranza—Baptist Sympathy in Massachusetts.....134-136

LITERATURE
The Bear That Walks Like a Man.

REVIEWS: Lessons in Scholastic Philosophy—High Lights of the French Revolution—Storied Italy—An Idyl, Some Sermons and a Song—That Office Boy — Escape and Other Essays — The Latin Church in the Middle Ages—The Will in Ethics.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: L'École en Chine—The Fall Pax—"The Grand Duchess Benedicta"—"The Nowadays Girls in the Adirondacks" — "The Children's Book of Thanksgiving Stories"—"Solid Truths Slightly Sugar-Coated" — "National Floodmarks"—"The Man Jesus"—"Noble Lives of a Noble Race"—"Catechism of the Catholic Religion" — "The Stoic Philosophy" — "Business Psychology"—"Life of George Washington, Father of Modern Democracy."

BOOKS RECEIVED 136-140

EDUCATION
We Practise What You Preach.....141, 142

SOCIOLOGY
Woman's Right 142, 143

NOTE AND COMMENT
Exhibition of Father Carrasco's Paintings — Municipal Ownership Fails of Approval in Detroit—Wealth and Income Conditions in the United States—Tomas Santos Garcia Reconciled to the Church—Twelfth Annual Meeting of the Catholic Educational Society — Recklessly Propelled Vehicles—Protestant Bible Propaganda—Deaths of Father David Fleming and Booker Washington 143, 144

CHRONICLE

The War.—Serbia is the only theater of the war in which anything of importance is reported to have taken place, and even here military developments have begun to slacken. On the western Montenegrin border, the Austrians apparently have made no progress. In Serbia the entire Austro-German line has been moved further south, the Austrians having advanced from Ivanjica, and the Germans from Kralievo and Krusevac, but in neither case has the advance been extensive. On the east the Bulgarians have driven the Serbians out of Leskovac, south of Nish, and are reported to have reached Kalkandelen, to the west of Uskub, in their efforts to cut off the retreat of the Serbians westward towards Albania. This report, however, is contradicted by the Serbian statement that their line runs south from Gilan through Kikanic to the Babuna Pass. This much is certain, that the Bulgarian attempt to outflank the Serbian army has not yet succeeded; for the latter is still intact, and although steadily retreating is disputing every step. Undoubtedly the Serbians are helped by the fact that the invaders have now reached the mountainous country and are experiencing constantly increasing natural difficulties.

Bulletin, Nov. 9, p. m.-Nov. 16, a. m.

The Campaign in Serbia

Another factor in the success of their resistance has been the increased pressure which the Serbians and the Allies are exerting on the Bulgarians in the south. Here, according to reports, the Bulgarians have been engaged by strong forces and have been obliged to fall back from Krivolac to the immediate vicinity of Kruprili. In Southern Serbia, however, although the Allies have been on the offensive, and for the most part have had the advantage of the week's fighting, no decisive change has been reported in the military situation.

On Tuesday, November 9, about the hour of noon, the Ancona, an Italian steamer, bound from Naples for New York, with a long passenger list, made up largely of women and children, was sunk off the coast of Sardinia. Reports of the sinking are still rather confused, but 208 people, among them nine American citizens, are believed to have been lost. The accounts given up to the present by survivors, while differing in details, are agreed that the submarine was flying an Austrian flag, that without warning she opened fire from guns mounted on her deck, that some time was given passengers to get into the boats, but before all were able to do so, a torpedo was discharged and the Ancona with those still on board soon disappeared. In Rome the Italian War Office said:

Sinking of the Ancona

> The Ancona did not attempt to escape, but stopped within 300 yards after the firing of the first shot. The liner was torpedoed while boats were being lowered and 100 passengers were still on board. The submarine being German, Germany opened hostilities against Italy without a declaration of war.

In a note to the Powers Italy says the same, but omits the statement that the submarine was German. The Austrian Admiralty has assumed full responsibility for the act, and has issued the following statement:

> The submarine fired a warning shot across the bows of the Ancona, whereupon the steamer went full speed ahead. . . . The escaping vessel was pursued by the submarine and fired at and she stopped only after she was hit several times. Forty-five minutes were allowed to the passengers and crew to leave the ship. . . . In spite of the time allowed the passengers and crew to get into the boats only a few of the boats were lowered and manned. This was due mainly to the action of members of the crew, who hastily rowed away. A great proportion of the lifeboats, which probably would have been sufficient to save all on board the Ancona, were unoccupied. After some fifty minutes the submarine was obliged to submerge before a rapidly approaching vessel. She therefore torpedoed the steamer, which after another forty-five minutes sank. It is a gross invention to state that the submarine fired at the boats filled with people and on those swimming on the surface of the water.

The Captain of the Ancona is said to have given his affidavit that the submarine was German and that absolutely no warning was given before the attack.

Greek Parliament Dissolved

In Greece the King has taken a step which M. Venizelos is reported to have declared unconstitutional. The new Premier, M. Skouldoudis, refused to enter the Chambers unless assured of a vote of confidence. This vote M. Venizelos declined to pledge, because the Cabinet would not insist on the resignation of the War Minister who gave the offence which was the occasion of the fall of the last Cabinet. The King thereupon dissolved Parliament and ordered a general election to take place December 19. As a general mobilization has also been ordered which will keep the majority of voters from the polls, considerable feeling has been manifested throughout Greece, although the Chambers acquiesced more readily than was expected.

Austria-Hungary.—The subscriptions for the third Austrian war loan have exceeded expectations. By November 10 they had already risen to 4,015,000,000 crowns. A great spirit of sacrifice was shown by the ordinary bank depositors and the owners of land. The only class slow to contribute according to its means was that which is represented in particular by the directors of banks and great industrial enterprises. The very men whom the war is enriching are apparently the most loath to contribute their due share. Especial attention is called on the other hand to the energetic support given by the clergy. In printing the appeal of the Government authorities the diocesan paper of Vienna says: "In the spirit of this appeal the diocesan clergy is directed to help in the promotion of the third war loan with the same unwearied zeal which they manifested in connection with the first and second loans. They should do this by personally setting an example of generosity, and likewise subscribing to the utmost extent possible the means of the Church, of Church corporations and foundations, as far as these means can be disposed of for such a purpose. They should, moreover, with all possible earnestness urge the faithful, in an effective manner, to subscribe to the loan." The new war loan is advertised at the rate of five and a half per cent. The money loaned is to be repaid on October 1, 1930, the Government reserving for itself the right of anticipating this date on a three months' notice.

War Loan and Clergy

China.—Well-founded rumors that China was soon to change its form of government to a monarchy caused such concern last month to Japan, Great Britain, and Russia that diplomats of those Powers made representations to the Chinese Minister of Foreign Affairs. They pointed out that

A Protest and Its Answer

> The proclamation of a monarchy, while it would not alter the existing state of things generally, might very likely lead to disorders, owing to the strong republican party in different parts of China. They said that if disorders occurred, foreign interests would inevitably suffer, especially the missionary interests, and, consequently, they hoped that while the European war lasted no change would be made in the name or the title of the Chinese Government. They fully recognized the fact that the existing Government under Yuan Shih-kai formed the best guarantee for the preservation of order.

On November 1, however, the Minister, after politely thanking the Powers for their extraordinary interest in his country, assured them that the question was purely an internal one and as the movement was the outcome of popular sentiment, the Chinese Government could not suspend, delay or expedite the change. But he promised that there would be no disorders unless attempts were made to prevent the restoration of the monarchy. On November 4 eleven out of the eighteen provinces of China unanimously voted for the change, and later it was reported that the President intended to have himself proclaimed Emperor on November 10. Shortly before that date, however, a formal announcement was made that no change in China's government would take place this year, so it appears that the protest of the three Powers had some effect after all. Nevertheless, as President Yuan Shih-kai, the "strong man of China," is already king in all but the name, his people seem to desire an undisguised monarchy and that adequate provision be made for its maintenance after Yuan's death.

France.—The "inspectors of labor" recently reported the result of their investigations of 37,380 establishments employing, under normal conditions, 1,286,411 men. In August, 1914, more than half these establishments were closed in consequence of the mobilization; only 18,180, i. e., 49 per cent, remained open; the percentage of active establishments rose to 57 in October, to 70 in January, to 73 in April. In July last 29,465, i. e., 79 per cent, were active.

Resumption of Work

In August, 1914, the personnel of these establishments was but 35 per cent of the normal force; in October it was 59 per cent; in April, 64 per cent; in July, 1915, there were employed 885,341 men, i. e., 69 per cent of the normal number. If the number of mobilized workmen be thrown out of consideration, some 24 per cent of the whole personnel, the proportion of men out of work in July, 1915, was 7 per cent, as against 12 per cent in April, 18 per cent in January, 30 per cent in October, and 41 per cent in August. Establishments in the South seem most active. The following are citations from the reports of inspectors of two important cities. Bordeaux: "Not only are there no unemployed, but the workshops and yards have been forced to appeal in a large measure to foreign handicraft." Toulouse: "Economic situation has not ceased to improve on the whole; the numerous industries which are working for the army are experiencing exceptional prosperity at the present moment, and the situation of the other industries, as well as that of commerce, leaves a favorable average impression." In general economic conditions seemed to have improved throughout the country.

Population

Some late numbers of the Revue Pratique d'Apologétique contain interesting statistics about the population of France, and other European nations. In 1850 the population of France exceeded that of Germany; in 1913 France was deploring an approximate shortage of 18,000,000 people. In 1911 births in Germany exceeded those in France by 1,126,000. Before the war France had nearly 2,000,000 childless families; there were about 3,000,000 families with one child each, while the number of marriageable celibates had reached 6,000,000. In the years between 1850 and 1900, France gained 3,701,000 inhabitants; Great Britain, 14,000,000; Germany, 20,000,000; Austria, 14,000,000; Russia, 62,000,000; Italy, 8,833,000.

Great Britain.—Foreign observers who have wondered why England has not adopted the policy of conscription fail to understand both the temper of the English people and the industrial conditions of the country. Conscription has never been an English method of recruiting, and while the course of events seems bringing it nearer, nevertheless even those who urge it realize that unless enforced with the utmost tact and caution, the measure may defeat the purpose aimed at. The needs of English industries form another motive for deferring conscription to the last. Had every Englishman, or a large proportion of men between the ages of nineteen and forty-one not engaged in munition work, left his employment for military service, the industries of the country would have been in a state of chaos within a week. If England must raise a large army, it is likewise necessary that she maintain "business as usual," and it is difficult to decide which is her more important or more necessary task. Yet in spite of the difficulties which will certainly arise, conscription is now felt to be imminent. Speaking in the name of Lord Derby, now in charge of recruiting, the official press bureau "expresses surprise that his [Lord Derby's] statement in the House of Commons on November 2 should be considered ambiguous." The document then proceeds:

Foreshadowing Conscription

> The Premier on that occasion pledged not only himself but the Government when he stated that if the young men did not under the stress of national duty come forward voluntarily, other and compulsory means would be taken before married men were called upon to fulfill their engagement to serve.
>
> Lord Derby is further authorized to state definitely that if young men medically fit and not indispensable to any business of national importance or any business connected with the general good of the community, do not come forward voluntarily before November 30, the Government after that date will take the necessary steps to redeem the pledge made on November 2. . . . Whether a man is indispensable to his business is to be decided by the competent authorities.

Lord Derby's original scheme, which called for 30,000 recruits weekly, is said to have been successful, but in spite of this, it is thought that conscription is plainly foretold in this official announcement. That the young, unmarried men of England must either volunteer now or be conscripted after November 30, seems to be the general opinion.

The War Council consisting of five members has been appointed. These are, besides the Premier, A. J. Balfour, David Lloyd George, Andrew Bonar Law and Reginald McKenna. Mr. Winston Churchill, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and former First Lord of the Admiralty, has resigned his post and will join his regiment. In his letter of resignation Mr. Churchill says, referring to his exclusion from the Council, that he could not accept a position of general responsibility for a war policy, without any effective share in its guidance or control.

The New War Council

Ireland.—Statistics of population are appearing frequently these days in the Irish papers, and they make sad reading indeed. These figures are approximate only, and are not as a consequence entirely balanced. In 1841 the population of the country was 8,196,000, in 1915 it is 4,300,000. In Munster the population had fallen from 2,404,000 in 1841 to 1,035,000 in 1911; in Connaught, from 1,420,000 to 610,000; in Ulster, from 2,390,000 to 1,580,000; in Leinster, from 1,982,000 to 1,160,000. Munster is the heaviest loser. Today Kerry has but one-half of the population of 1841, 160,000 against 295,000; Waterford has lost three men and women out of every four; in 1841 it had almost 200,000 people, today it has 56,000; Tipperary has fallen from 435,000 to 152,000; Clare, from 285,000 to 104,000; Cork, from 854,000 to 315,000; Limerick, from 330,000 to 104,000. Seventy years ago Ulster had nearly 2,500,000 people, today it has 1,500,000. In that time Antrim has fallen from 355,000 to 193,000; Down, from 368,000 to 204,000; Armagh, from 232,000 to 120,000; Cavan, from 243,000 to 91,000; Tyrone, from 312,000 to 142,000; Derry, from 222,000 to 99,000; Donegal, from 296,000 to 168,000; Fermanagh, from 156,000 to 61,000; Monaghan, from 200,000 to 71,000. The loss in Connaught is still greater; Galway once had 440,000, it now has 182,000; Mayo has dropped from 388,000 to 192,000; Sligo, from 180,000 to 79,000; Roscommon, from 253,000 to 93,000; Leitrim, from 155,000 to 63,000. The Province of

Depopulation; Recruiting

Leinster is almost as badly off. Wexford has fallen from 202,000 to 102,000; Kilkenny, from 202,000 to 74,000; Carlow, from 86,000 to 36,000; Longford, from 115,000 to 43,000; Queens County, from 153,000 to 54,000; King's County, from 146,000 to 56,000; Westmeath, from 141,000 to 59,000; Louth, from 128,000 to 63,000; Meath, from 183,000 to 65,000; Wicklow, from 126,000 to 60,000; Kildare, from 114,000 to 66,000; Dublin, from 372,000 to 172,000.

These conditions have given rise to new and vigorous discussion about recruiting. A minister of Drumquin, Tyrone, has prepared the following table for controversial purposes:

		Ireland.
	Great Britain.	Total.	Protestants.	Catholics.
1. Total for 62 weeks..	2,119,000	81,408	36,719	44,689
2. Average per week...	34,177	1,313	592	721
Recruits per Million of Population.
3. Total for 62 weeks..	52,975	20,352	36,719	14,896
4. Average per week...	854	328	592	240
Percentage per Million.
5. Percentages.	100	38	69	28

A letter in the Irish Times speaks of the table as "more ingenious than ingenuous," and New Ireland points out that the figures, 81,000 are incomplete, since they do not include any branch of the service except the infantry, thus excluding "cavalry, artillery, army service corps, army medical corps, engineers, and all the other services." The same paper judges that 30,000 or 40,000 should be added to the Irish recruits listed in the table, and for this and other reasons proceeds to denounce the comparison between the Catholic and Protestant recruits as unfair.

Mexico.—Apparently Carranza's promise of religious freedom was not intended to be binding in Yucatan. Persecution still continues there; the Cathedral has not been restored to Divine worship; on the contrary, it has been stripped of much of its furniture; four more priests have been expelled; rural parishes have been closed, and their pastors have been concentrated in Merida; more than 200,000 Catholics are without Mass and the Sacraments. The house of the Teresians, at Leon, has been confiscated; protests to the Governor brought forth this impudent reply: "You may protest wheresoever you like." One strutting Carranzista has declared himself "master of life and property." Meantime a near relative of Carranza is "dropping in" on Catholic institutions; confiscation follows the visit. Our Red Cross agent has returned to the States and the press has printed this statement from him:

Continued Persecution; the Week's News

Conditions in Mexico City are appalling. The women and children are starving, the death rate is exceedingly high, and it is difficult to get food. I have seen women, children and dogs digging in the same garbage cans for a bite of food, while in the outskirts of the city I have seen these poor creatures without a morsel of food and living wholly on pigweed, alfalfa and parts of the century plant.

Continuing, this gentleman said that the death rate is four times above the normal; manufacturing is practically at a standstill; business in shops, hotels, restaurants, and so on, is at the lowest ebb. Not many days ago courtesies were passed between our State Department and the Carranzista agency. The agency asserted that the United States had turned over to Carranza the customs collected at Vera Cruz, and would not press Mexico for the settlement of claims, until that country was financially established. Both assertions were repudiated at our State Department as false and unwarranted. Evidently our officials were somewhat embarrassed by this lapse from the standard of honesty and diplomatic etiquette. Meantime, if dispatches be true, Villa is meditating vengeance. The Washington Post of November 10 states that he is minded to tell a tale of woe to the effect that he has been deserted in the hour of defeat by "United States Government officials, court officials and prominent border and New Mexico Americans," to whom he paid $1,500,000 for protection and help of various kinds.

In answer to accusations made against them the Mexican Archbishops and Bishops have once again restated their mind. Their apology is in part as follows:

Neither Don Venustiano Carranza nor any other person need have a fear that Mexican bishops and clergy may be an obstacle to the restoration of peace in Mexico, since such restoration has been the aim of all our work, writings, prayers and exhortations to the Faithful during these last years of civil war in our unhappy country. We are longing to work among our people in behalf of the great task of assuaging the misfortunes of our country and of cooperating through our apostolic ministry for the cementing of national peace and prosperity. We can assert that we never contributed either by our sermons or by our writings, either secretly or publicly, and far less financially, to overthrow D. Francisco Madero's government for we recognized him as a legitimate ruler. On the contrary we are able to prove by trustworthy documents that the Mexican episcopacy condemned every uprising against that unfortunate President. We are quite sure of having conscientiously fulfilled our duties during the revolution; we have not violated, even in the least, the laws of our country and we do not fear any accusation against us. If we fled from Mexico, it was to avoid being a burden to our people, because heavy exactions would have been imposed upon us and as we would not be able to pay them, our people would have had to do so in order to release us from jail and from other vexations which would dangerously rouse the feelings of the people as in the case of the prelates of Durango, Tepic, Tehuantepec and Vera Cruz. No one ignores these facts, they were publicly known, also the terrible threats made against us as well as the exorbitant taxes levied on some bishops in spite of their lack of money. Our behavior toward Gen. Huerta's government cannot be blamed as criminal and delinquent, because it was a merely passive attitude, avoiding any interference in political affairs. It is very much outside of our mission of peace to foster uprisings or to support an armed opposition.

The chronicle of next week's issue of AMERICA will contain an account of the trial and execution of Granados.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Wine, Cana, the Mass

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Now that Prohibition is so much discussed, an answer to the following questions would be pertinent: Was the wine obtained by the miracle of Cana, real fermented wine? Was the wine used by Christ at the Last Supper fermented wine, and was this kind of wine used for the Mass in the early Church?

Rochester, N. Y. J. R.

THE questions proposed are: (1) Was the wine obtained by the miracle at Cana real fermented wine? (2) Was the wine used by Christ at the Last Supper fermented wine; and was this kind of wine used for the Mass in the early Church?

The moral and religious issue involved in these questions is now of grave concern to Christians at large and to Catholics in particular. The State of Arizona has recently adopted among its fundamental laws one which prohibits absolutely the use of any fermented beverage. But such legislation cannot manifestly be just and binding in conscience if it reflects on what Christ did at Cana and stands in direct opposition to what He ordained at the Last Supper and ever since has been carried out by His Church. Hence it behooves us to answer briefly the questions proposed. As to the first, the exact kind of wine which Jesus miraculously supplied at Cana can be easily ascertained by taking into account the various particulars bearing on it which are found in St. John's narrative, ii: 1-11. The reader is therein told of a "marriage," at which the Mother of Jesus was present and to which Jesus also was invited, together with His disciples. The very mention of a marriage intimates one of those joyful occasions when the Jews of old considered the use of real fermented wine as indispensable to "rejoice men's hearts." It was indeed such "wine" that "failed" at this particular marriage, as is plain from the use here of the Greek word oinos, which in its literal sense throughout the New Testament denotes the fermented juice of the grape, and also from the fact that in John ii:10, the master of the feast regards such oinos as capable of blunting the palate of the guests at the marriage feast. When the Mother of Jesus tells Him: "They have no wine," she has manifestly in mind the same fermented wine, and delicately asks Jesus to remedy its present deficiency. When in compliance with her confident request, Christ bids the waiters fill up six waterpots with water, one naturally expects that this is for the purpose of supplying the want of real fermented wine already referred to, and this expectation is confirmed by the new direction of Jesus to the waiters that they should "draw out now and carry to the master of the feast." Jesus knew that "the water which had become wine," was a wine of the kind now wanted and fit to stand the test of a man manifestly used to judge of genuine fermented wine. Having "tasted the water become wine," the master of the feast has no doubt that this is "wine" indeed. Therefore, in addressing the bridegroom, he does not reproach him with supplying a different kind of wine, an unfermented wine which he would naturally deem inferior to the fermented wine already consumed. On the contrary, to his mind, this wine is of a superior quality, one which on this very account would have been served at the beginning of a festival like the present, and which consequently was really fermented like the wine used hitherto. Whoever then examines carefully St. John's narrative of the miracle at Cana, cannot help seeing that the wine obtained by Christ's power at the marriage feast was real fermented wine.

In the second question proposed, we are asked, first: "Was the wine used by Christ at the Last Supper fermented wine?" To this query the following is our brief answer: According to the Gospels, the Last Supper was undoubtedly a Paschal celebration, and one actually prepared after the usual manner among the Jews of the time. This is plain from the fact that on the appointed day, the disciples asked their Master not how but "where wilt Thou that we prepare to eat the Pasch?" and on having found the place indicated in His answer, "they prepared the Pasch," knowing full well what Jesus meant by His general direction to them: "and there prepare" (Cf. Math. xi: 17-19; Mark xiv: 12-16; Luke xxii: 7-13). That such preparation included a supply of wine, and indeed of fermented wine to be used at the Paschal supper admits of no possible doubt. No other kind of wine was then used by the Jews for the Paschal celebration, and no other kind has been used by them for this purpose to the present day. In fact, no other kind of wine could then be procured, for the Pasch came half a year after the grape harvest, and there is no hint in all the literature of the Jews that they used in Christ's time any device to keep the juice from fermenting.

While reclining at table for His Last Supper, Jesus did not raise any objection to the fermented wine which had been prepared, and no objection can reasonably be supposed to have been raised by Him, for in regard to the use of fermented wine, Christ's conduct was the very opposite of that of His forerunner, John. The son of Zachary rigorously abstained from every fermented beverage, wine included (Cf. Luke i: 15; vii: 33); the Son of Man, on the contrary, "drank" wine, and expressly resented the charge of being a "winebibber" directed against Him on this account by His relentless enemies (Cf. Luke vii: 34). In the eyes of Jesus, the wine poured into the cup at the Last Supper was indeed fermented, for in speaking of "this fruit of the vine" (Cf. Math. xxvi: 29; Mark xiv: 25; Luke xxii: 18), He used the familiar Jewish expression to denote fermented wine both in the Old Testament and in the formula used by the Jews of His time to bless the Paschal cup. Finally, according to Christ's own declaration,

"this fruit of the vine" is to be contrasted not with any other kind of wine, an unfermented wine for instance, that could be obtained on earth, but with the "new" wine to be supplied only in the heavenly bliss where all things will be "new" (Math. xxvi: 29; Mark xiv: 25).

A few words remain to be said anent the last query of the second question proposed, viz.: "Was this wine (i. e., fermented) used for the Mass in the early Church?" In the First Epistle to the Corinthians (x: 14-22), we readily see that the members of the early Church offered to God the Sacrifice of the Mass. In their meetings, they blessed the wine of "the cup of blessing" and broke "the bread" with a view to "communion" with "the blood" and "the body of Christ" (x: 16), and they performed a sacrificial act of Divine worship as did the non-Christian Jews ("Israel according to the flesh") who offered "sacrifices" at their own "altar" (x: 18), and as did the Gentiles who, however, "sacrificed to demons and not to God" (x: 20). Our query, therefore, amounts to this: Was the wine used for "the cup of blessing" real fermented wine? And to this we must decidedly answer: It was that kind of wine. Under the pen of St. Paul, "the cup of blessing" manifestly refers to the cup denoted by this very expression at the Jewish Pasch; the Christians blessed it as the Jews did in their Paschal celebration, and as Jesus had done in the Paschal celebration of His Last Supper; and such identity of both expression and rite evidently points to identity of contents for "the cup of blessing," viz., to real fermented wine. Again, in I Cor. x: 21, the cup which the early Church blessed at Mass, is called by St. Paul: "the cup of the Lord." Now one can easily ascertain the exact meaning of this expression by referring to the next chapter of this very Epistle, where the Apostle again calls "the cup of the Lord" (xi: 27) the cup drunk in the meetings of the early Church. He thus designates this cup after recording the institution of the Holy Eucharist even "as he had delivered it unto the faithful" (x: 23, sqq.), and after concluding his record of Christ's blessing of the cup with these words: "This do ye, as often as you shall drink, for the commemoration of me. For as often as you shall eat this bread and drink the cup, you shall show the death of the Lord, until He come" (xi: 25, 26). From these words any one can readily see that "the cup of the Lord" wherewith "the death of the Lord" was commemorated at Mass in the early Church was to be identical in respect to contents with the one prepared and used at Christ's Last Supper; fermented wine had to be poured into it, and this was to be observed "until He come," that is, for all future time. The early Church knew that this was the Lord's most express ordinance, and complied with it by using fermented wine for Mass purposes; in the following ages, the same Church ever felt bound to do this and actually did it; and at the present day, she does so, and cannot but feel bound to act this way.

FRANCIS F. GIGOT.

Dunwoodie Seminary, N. Y.

The Ouija Board

WORD comes from St. Louis that a certain "Patience Worth" has produced a small library of poems and plays, aggregating some thirty thousand words. We are assured by no less an authority than a former Lieutenant-Governor of Missouri, that these "are of excellent quality." If we are to trust the St. Louis Times, "Patience Worth," is "a mystic from spirit-land" who conveys her messages to the "earth plane" through the medium of the Ouija Board, operated by an estimable St. Louis lady. There is no need of suspecting conscious fraud on the part of the human factor in the phenomena. It may be readily admitted that some thirty thousand words have been registered and duly recorded during the past two years, and that these by reason of their external form may be styled by courtesy, "poems and plays."

But we do seriously question their "excellent quality." The market value of good verse, not to say poetry, is rather high, and a really "excellent" play is a gold mine to those who possess the acting rights. One who has waded through the endless pages of balderdash carefully collected by the Society for Psychical Research and published in their "Proceedings" may be pardoned for doubting the literary merit of any of these "communications from spiritland." Those which are not utterly incoherent or meaningless are banal generalities in colloquial diction inculcating kindness, helpfulness and a vague hope in a still more vague hereafter. In those infrequent cases where there is some display of "the form and pressure of high thought," the result to a literary critic is disappointing. They suggest nothing so much as the outpouring of a shallow school girl in a moment of petty spiritual elation; there is the same cloying sweetness, the same sickly sentimentalism. When we are privileged to read a really meritorious sonnet or a clever bit of dramatic dialogue, the authentic and unaltered product of "Patience Worth" and the Ouija Board, we shall modify our judgment. When a single one of her numerous poetical outpourings passes the test of acceptance by a reputable magazine on its literary merits alone, we shall admit that there is something new in "spirit-messages." But judging by past performances, we are compelled to doubt.

In its outward appearance, the Ouija is a very harmless toy. It may be purchased for a few dollars at almost any toy shop or department store. It consists, as many of our readers are doubtless aware, of a varnished board about the size of a desk blotter on which are painted the twenty-six letters of the alphabet, the ten digits and the words "Yes," "No," and "Goodby." A small triangular table about the size of the extended hand, moves easily over the varnished surface on three legs padded with felt. It is necessary for the operator to lay the tips of the fingers gently on the top of this small table. Any question may then be put and the table will move over the smooth surface of the board indicating the successive letters which spell the answer. And there you are!

Three theories have been put forth to explain the phenomenon of an intelligent effect from a seemingly inadequate cause. The first of these is natural, the second and third are preternatural in the assigned causality. The first hypothesis, elaborated by the late F. W. H. Myers in the two large volumes of his posthumous and incompleted work "Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death," is known as the Theory of Subliminal Consciousness. Mr. Myers, who was for some years the President of the Society for Psychical Research, devoted the greater part of his life to the scientific investigation of occult phenomena, patiently pursuing his labors, as he tells us, "per incertam lunam, sub luce maligna." According to this author, many of these strange phenomena are due to the intellectual and volitional activities functioning through speech organs, or nerve and muscle, but not rising to the supraliminal consciousness of the agent. In other words, while the intellect understands and the will acts in accordance with that intelligence, the soul is not conscious of either willing or understanding.

Thus, let us say, the operator of the Ouija Board has mislaid an article of value. The board when questioned, declares the whereabouts of the missing object, and investigation shows the accuracy of the revelation. According to the theory of subliminal consciousness applied to this particular instance, the owner knew consciously at one time where the object was, but subsequently, as we should say, forgot it. According to this theory, however, nothing is ever forgotten; it merely sinks below the threshold of consciousness and gradually loses its power to arise at the bidding of the will. Moreover, we are to believe that there is no experience of sense, however slight; no thought, however fleeting; no passing remark, however unimportant; no phrase or sentence or paragraph, read and seemingly forgotten long ago, which does not pass into the subconscious repository of the soul, ready to be manifested at any time in the same subconscious plane. Thus it is easy to understand how one who had read a deal of poetry or frequented the drama might subconsciously reproduce through the Ouija Board stray fragments of poetic or dramatic form, fused, it may be, into new relations. The intellect subconsciously supplies the thought and language; the will subconsciously guides the table across the board; the operator may with perfect honesty disclaim any conscious agency in the result.

Such an explanation, if admissible, would, of course, place the marvels of the Ouija and its predecessor, the Planchette, within the sphere of purely natural phenomena. The reader may judge for himself whether it is consistent with the testimony of experience or the dictates of reason.

The agency of departed spirits, however, is the explanation of the Ouija Board and kindred phenomena, most commonly urged. From the days of the Fox sisters, in 1848, this belief has been accepted by thousands, and, in spite of countless instances of fraud and charlatanism, has risen to the dignity of a religious creed. The Ouija and Planchette, spirit lights, spirit photography, levitation and materialization, form an ascending scale of extraordinary phenomena upon which this belief is based. That these phenomena do occur, cannot well be doubted; that they are guided by an intelligent causality, seems to be beyond dispute; that this intelligence is extra-mundane, is at least a plausible hypothesis. Is that extra-mundane intelligence, the spirits of the departed? Do they revisit thus the glimpses of the moon, to lead men on with more assured hope to the dawn beyond the night of death? Are their "intents wicked or charitable"?

Here we are confronted by one of the most extraordinary, as it is one of the most significant facts of all the observed phenomena of the occult. These messages are, for the most part, of the most trivial, lying, contradictory or even blasphemous character! There is no more doubt of this circumstance than there is of the objective reality of the phenomena themselves. It may be verified alike from the admissions of sincere investigators and from the many volumes of the "Proceedings." "If we are to learn anything of goodness and truth beyond the grave," declares one disillusioned investigator, "it must be from other sources than the tramps and frauds and liars who frequent the tables of the séance."

Now the messages of the Ouija are, as a rule, trivial, rather than evil in their purport. But we cannot accept the belief that souls detained in the cleansing fires of purgatory could engage in the Puck-like nonsense and silly revelations associated with the Ouija. Even more shocking would it be to assume that souls in the enjoyment of the Vision of God, could stoop to the fooleries of locating a hidden bracelet, or revealing the love secrets of an embarrassed girl. We are forced then to the reluctant conclusion, that if these messages are from the souls of the departed, they are the voices of those who have "no inheritance in the Kingdom of Christ and of God," whose end is destruction and whose hands drag down to hell.

Finally, for those who reject both of these explanations, there remains the only alternative of direct demonic origin. It is "Satan transforming himself into an angel of light"; the enemy of God and man in the harmless guise of an innocent parlor amusement. Such an explanation is at least in perfect accord with the history of the Old and New Testament and with the spirit of the Church praying for protection against the powers of hell "wandering through the world, seeking the destruction of souls." If the Ouija Board is the least harmful of these means of destruction, may it not, by reason of its easy accessibility and seeming innocence, be one of the most insidious? It leads to more daring experiments in the dark ways of Spiritism; it appeals to the latent curiosity of all men to venture into strange paths; its final end is the substitution for that Faith which is "the evidence of things not seen," the alluring evidence of sensible wonders. And the dark road of Spiritism leads in countless instances to infidelity, suicide or the madhouse.

CLAUDE J. PERNIN, S.J.

What Women Wanted

THE post-election agitation in favor of votes for women makes pertinent a discussion of an article in a recent issue of a popular magazine, by Mrs. Forbes-Robertson. The article, which is the author's version of the book "What Women Want," is well calculated to win adherents to Feminism, providing its perusers accept without earnest question, Mrs. Hale's various statements. A good pinch of reflection, however, serves to explode her airy doctrine.

Were it true that the woman's movement made for transforming the wife from a "drudge" into a "partner," a "plaything" into a "friend," and a "servant" into an "equal," men would undoubtedly be foolish not to endorse it. But it would seem that, if woman assumes the duties of civil life in addition to those of domestic, she will be more of a "drudge" than ever. Politics are no less a laborious matter than spring house-cleaning, especially when women have it in mind to accomplish the Herculean task of cleansing the Augean stables of city government. Notwithstanding indignant female protests to the contrary, one thing must obviously be sacrificed in part to the other. If a woman turns from the home to the forum, she is less an efficient wife; if she turns from the forum to the home, her value as a politician depreciates; if she turns to both, she excels in neither. The world will really be little the loser if she stays where she is.

Of course, it is with truth that fortune-favored devotees of Feminism declare that domesticity and female suffrage do not clash: servants may be hired to attend to the one while milady is looking after the other. But unfortunately the majority of women are, and must be, their own servants. To be sure, it takes little time to cast a vote; certainly it consumes much to conduct a campaign. And Feminism sets itself a broader purpose than mere voting; it gazes determinedly into flattering vistas of prospective sex-equality and civic achievement. Were the ballot all that women desired, many men might say "welcome." But it is through the polls that women are essaying to break pell-mell into an exposed sphere teeming with dangers which many of them either do not see or do not understand. What will their excellent intentions profit, if the evil circumstances, surging in the new life, gulp them under? Men succumb; can frail women triumph? It matters little what they achieve, if they lose perfect womanhood, which is their greatest achievement. And assuredly the nearer they approach the male standard, the farther they depart from the world's ideal of the true wife and mother. Women can acquire some idea of the bad logic of their belligerent attitude, by considering how ridiculous it would be for men to encroach upon feminine prerogatives. Yet it would be just as logical for men to invade woman's domain as it is for woman to assail theirs. The gentler sex will have to admit that they possess many choice privileges which do not obtain in man's life; it would be well for them not to forget these blessings when they feel inclined to bemoan their bonds. Christianity has gained so much for women that, if they demand much more, they want the moon. It exalted them to such a high dignity that men were compelled to look up to them with reverence. Now, expressly animated with a desire still higher, they are incongruously ready to drop to man's level and thus be poised half-way nearer to the debased plane from which Christianity originally raised them. Women should awaken to the hideous peril they are beckoning into their lives. In proportion as they lose their appeal on men's ideals, they will unleash his brute passions. Then equality will violently pass into inferiority. Let the grim significance of the outrageous assaults, so frequently and recently perpetrated by men on the persons of female seekers of suffrage, be duly appreciated. If women stir up the volcano of man's lower nature, they must expect to suffer by the ensuing eruption. It is only by being superior to man that they can be safe from him, worshipped by him, and helpful to him; not by being equal. Modern equality is a huge step toward ancient inferiority.

Mrs. Hale is not justified in calling woman a "drudge." The upper female class are so free from duties of any kind that they literally do not know what to do with themselves, and hence are unrestrainedly given to fads, among which is Feminism. The middle class divide their duties with servants, thereby precluding any hint of drudgery and largely opening their days to an incursion of the fads which beguile the rich. The lower class indeed toil hard in the home, but no harder than men do outside of it; and husbands in general work the harder that the bearers of their children may labor the less. Incidentally, Feminism finds it hardest to make proselytes in this lowest grade whence, if it possessed the appeal of real merit, it could draw them most easily.

And Mrs. Hale herself, further on in her article, admits, with charming inconsistency, that "our modern American women are brought up too softly to develop heroic, or even deeply womanly, qualities." Wherefore it certainly seems, from her own assertions, that they need a dose of drudgery, at least quasi drudgery. We should suggest that they depend less upon their servants and, in imitation of their poor but happier sisters, be mothers to their children in person and not by paid proxy; that they learn to consult their family's taste in preference to mastering sedulously the nonsensical variations of tango; that they become as familiar with the kitchen as they at present are with the parlor. Naturally women find little to do in their own world and are discontented with their lot, when they surrender entirely to hirelings the most sacred offices of true womanhood. Surfeited with leisure, they extravagantly desire suffrage; a taste of genuine domestic interest and industry would surely sober them, for it has kept sober most of the noble women of the lower social stratum.

Nor is woman man's "plaything," except in so far as she makes herself such by ceasing to be a woman. It would be nigh impossible for a sensible man to esteem highly for long a help-meet who puts far more time on the outside of her head than the inside; more jewels on her arms, neck and fingers than in her heart; more interest in bridge-whist than in her bairns. Such an artificial creature, and she stands undeniably and deplorably typical of a class of Americans, is nothing but an animated puppet that can attract only the eyes, not the soul, of men.

As for woman being a "servant," Mrs. Hale, after referring to her as such, demonstrates fairly well that she is not, provoking a smile.

She lays stress on the companionship between the sexes that would result from Feminism. It is desirable but unlikely. Men are not usually attracted to manly women, at least to the point of proposing matrimony. They like only manly men and womanly women for their soul-friends. As they abominate an effeminate man, so they find it repugnant to tolerate an ultra-strenuous woman. There is something intrinsically abnormal about both. Man finds an assuagement to his native roughness in woman's native gentleness; Heaven help women, if that gentleness should be swept away on the energetic and aggressive wave of Feminism!

Mrs. Hale tells us that "the average man avoids marriage with an intellectual woman, conceiving her incapable of tenderness." Hardly. If she really possesses tenderness, he will be as quick to discern it as to detect her intellectuality. One is as apparent as the other. And an intelligent man could not but be proud to have an intelligent mother for his child. The ideal of womanhood, as conceived by men who are not primitive, puts no ban on brains: it welcomes women to improve their heads as sincerely as it reminds them not to forget their hearts. The modern woman is well educated: this is a blessing. But she inclines to give the gold of her learning to the world, before it has passed through the mint of the home: this is regrettable. Her wisdom can never gain due currency unless it bears the stamp of true wifehood and motherhood. The home is woman's throne from which she can rule the world. Man must admire her the more, if she proves an intelligent ruler. Can he admire her at all, if she steps down from her glittering heights into the sordid fray and gets spattered with mud? Such a course would seem to him indicative of lack of intelligence.

Mrs. Hale calls attention to woman's "deep racial needs" of "love, children and work." But the home being the peerless producer of all three requirements, why should women look and reach beyond it for happiness?

"Women could not be free," she observes, "under feudalism, under patriarchism, nor under priestcraft." Feminism can thrive only in an era of democracy. As man advances to liberty, so must his wife and partner. But the lady apparently forgets that women advanced more under "feudalism," "patriarchism," and "priestcraft" than they have since. Their step from servile inferiority to gleaming stardom, effected in the days of chivalry, was decidedly greater than their trip from domesticity into the humdrum world, accomplished in these modern times of cheap schemes and expensive failures. If women would be wiser, with the wisdom of the past, they would be more content with the conditions of the present and more discreet in their plans for the future. The more meritorious Feminist movement would be, not a rush to wholesale "liberty," but a return to the glorious ideal which the maligned Middle Ages set them and which they then happily attained. Women are not fashioned for man's life, being limited to their own by physical disadvantages which are periodically increased by the advent of motherhood. It is clear that they need a provider and protector. If, however, they continue to assert their own powers of self-protection and provision and goad men on to giving them a chance to exercise these alleged possessions, one is appalled to ponder what little room will be left for the child. Wives, steeped in the cares and worries of a new existence, will hardly be over-inclined to add travail to their woes. Accordingly, as Feminism waxes, maternity will be likely to wane. Thus will the richest gem fall from woman's crown; and when she ultimately realizes the gravity of her loss, as our gray-haired, be-pearled, childless and sad-eyed possessors of Pekingese spaniels are today doing, she will probably appreciate that medieval standards would have been worth seeking after all.

It is true that many women have "learned a trade or profession which brings them economic independence." But their number is insufficient to constitute them representatives of the feminine class. Besides, they generally end their business careers when they begin the loftier one of matrimony; at any rate, they necessarily desist from them at the call of motherhood. Hence "economic independence" is not a particularly strong argument for female suffrage and Feminism, since such independence is neither adequately stable nor extensive. Indubitably, if women as a class were economically free from man, they should mingle in the world's doings on an equality with him. But comparatively few of them are, and all are not potentially.

It would seem that the Creator has consigned to men the coarser and commercialistic duties of the human struggle for existence, but has favored woman with a custodianship of the world's ideals. And so she has unlimited opportunity to advance within the very sphere of which she is now queen: the more cultured she becomes, the more effectually will she accomplish her mission, by illumining her husband's life and causing that of her children to blossom with virtue. And the more richly will she be repaid for this pleasant work in terms of contentment and love. Such is the true evolution of woman which will place her on a higher altitude of nobility than even chivalry did, because it will inspire a stronger chivalry.

That there are many and grievous social evils which could be remedied by a better understanding between the sexes, cannot be ignored. But women seem to be intensifying the difference by making it all the harder for men to understand them. Men could comprehend, sympathize and comply with a feminine concern for control in matters pertaining to such indirectly domestic questions as school elections, public sanitation, and so forth; but it is beyond their ability to comprehend the sense of the sweeping demands of Feminism, and it is naturally beyond their prudence to yield to them. Women should remember that the masculine brain has almost wholly done the world's business thinking for centuries, is quite capable of doing so for centuries more, and that consequently, though it may not be exempt from the charge of bias, there is strong probability that its judgments in social, civil and economic matters, may be a bit more correct than those of Feminism. The need and worth of women as a permanent and equal factor in the outside world neither appears nor appeals to them. If women would regard this more, men would misunderstand them less.

EDWARD F. MURPHY, M.A.

Popular Hymnody

THE subject of a vernacular hymnody is one that has engaged the attention of the ecclesiastical authorities in the English-speaking portions of the Catholic Church for some time, and it is generally agreed that so far, the question has not been adequately settled. To compare Catholic hymnals with those of the Protestant sects to the disparagement of the former is not only ridiculous, but entirely unfair, and helps us on not a whit. After all, the use of English hymns is but a minor portion of the Church's devotions; with Protestants it forms, together with the sermon, practically the whole of public worship. Yet, at the same time this does not dispose of the question of having as one of our cherished possessions an English hymnody worthy to rank beside the literary gems that are enshrined in the Latin Liturgy. The mean lies between a sacred poetry that shall not be tedious to the more educated by reason of its mediocrity, nor unintelligible to the more simple on account of the exclusiveness of its high-flown poetic diction. This throws us back to the ranks of the hymnologists as distinct from the poets and versifiers. The distinction is as real as that between the composers of music and the composers of hymn tunes, whose art, alas! has well-nigh died out.

The search for the definition of a hymnody that is both popular and democratic takes us to the early hymns of the Roman Church. The entire absence of anything in the English language in the nature of prosodic quantity makes it difficult to define satisfactorily, save to Latinists, the complete revolution that was brought about by the substitution of accent for quantity by the writers of the ecclesiastical Latin hymns. In place of the elaborate and somewhat artificial laws of meter governing the construction of Latin verse, laws appreciated only by those who had received a considerable education in the works of the classical authors, the first writers of Church Latin hymns, Prudentius, Venantius Fortunatus and others, substituted the idea of accent, of natural rhythm, a thing which even a child can understand; and in the alternation of accented and unaccented syllables lay the beauty of this new Latin verse. The rejection of the laws of quantity brought into use many popular words which had been debarred from classical poetry: so the popular tradition was begun, to be developed by later writers, finding its climax in such outbursts of poetic and devotional feeling as that of the hymn of St. Bernard:

> Jesu dulcis memoria,
> Dans vera cordis gaudia:
> Sed super mel et omnia
> Eius dulcis praesentia. . . .

In the despised Middle Ages the populace sang hymns of this kind as they went about their work, and they became a vital part of the poetry of the times. There is also in the better known example from St. Thomas Aquinas a strain that is both popular and devotional:

> O Salutaris Hostia,
> Quæ coeli pandis ostium:
> Bella premunt hostilia,
> Da robur, fer auxilium. . . .

In such hymns we have a perfect model of what should be found in popular hymnology: assured orthodoxy, simplicity of language, and indisputable poetic instinct.

The same spirit that inspired the Latin hymnologists was caught, here and there, by a later generation of Catholics. The following by Venerable Robert Southwell occurs in the "Armagh Hymnal":

> Behold a simple tender Babe,
> In freezing winter night,
> In homely manger trembling lies,
> Alas! a piteous sight.

an admirable example of Catholic sentiment without sentimentality. Crashaw, too, has the same noble gift:

> The gloomy night embraced the place,
> Wherein the Noble Infant lay,
> The Babe looked up and showed His face;
> In spite of darkness it was day.
> It was Thy day, sweet, and did rise,
> Not from the East, but from Thine eyes.

In discriminating between poetry and hymnody Mr. Shane Leslie sums up the matter thus: "Although the perfect poem is seldom a hymn, the perfect hymn should possess some relation to lyric poetry." His own rendering of Felix dies quem proprio is a happy exemplification of this dictum carried into effect:

> O happy day, which with His Own
> Redeeming Blood hath Jesus sown,
> O happy day, which saw begin
> The work of saving us from sin.
>
> Scarce was He born, the Holy Bud
> Poured forth a stream of Baby Blood;
> It is His far death's offering,
> The Love of Love's first preluding. . . .

A more popular character is seen in the well-known hymn of Father Caswall:

> Glory be to Jesus
> Who, in bitter pains,
> Poured for me the life-blood
> From His sacred veins. . . .

But enough has been shown to indicate some of the excellencies we possess in our English hymns, but against so much that is excellent we have to set a great deal more that is far from excellent: piety that has over-run into cheap sentimentalism, jingling rhymes that could scarce hope to find a place among magazine verse; often enough, too, the fervor of many amateur hymn writers leads them into what may be termed theological indiscretions, certainly they venture upon delicate ground. The Sacred Heart, the Blessed Sacrament, the life of Mary, form the favorite excursions of the pietistic rhymster, who forgets that a Catholic hymn requires not only a gift of poesy, and this is essential, but also the habit of accurate theological statement. To appreciate the lesson, compare these stanzas:

Conceived, conceived immaculate!
Oh, what a joy to thee:
Conceived, conceived immaculate!
Oh, greater joy for me.

Virgin wholly marvelous,
Who didst bare God's Son for us,
Worthless is my tongue and weak
Of thy purity to speak.

The former is absolutely lacking in poetic fancy; in the latter there is an adequate poetic expression combined with sound orthodoxy.

If, then, our English hymns are ever to find a worthy place among the literary treasures of the Church, it will only be obtained by subjecting them to a scrutiny and a comparison with the best models, the sacred Latin poetry. A careful study of the Breviary hymns will show that there is in them as definite a principle as in other poetical forms, and with the realization that hymnography is an art in itself, the day will not be far off when the incomparable genius of the Catholic Church will leave an abiding impress upon the hymns of her English-speaking children. An impress which has stamped itself imperishably upon the hymn of the heroic Irish Zouaves:

Who dares to fight the fiercest fight,
That God-like men have fought?
Who dares to stand for Peter's right
With heart and soul unbought?

Who dares enrolled in war below
And leaving hearth and home,
With Paul and Peter sworded go
To hold the gates of Rome?

Nor fear the girding cry of foes
Who hem the stricken flock,
Nor when the scorner's music grows,
Where God hath set His Rock.

Let hearts rise high and strong again,
Where fear and hate were sown,
The sons of martyrs yet are fain
To win the Pope his own.

And men salute the Holy See
The great Apostles' dome,
Whence Paul and Peter scorned to flee
But gave their blood for Rome.

O never think to sell for tithes
What Judas gave for gold,
In vain the Church is bound with wythes,
The keys are not yet sold.

Let pass the thought of pleasant peace,
The hope of distant home;
With Paul and Peter do not cease
To hold the gates of Rome.

Nowadays we need more hymns as full of courage and faith as that of the Irish Zouaves.

HENRY C. WATTS.

A Challenge to Catholic Laymen

AFTER much thought and discussion a striking poster has been designed by the Protestant Laymen's Missionary Movement, to be displayed successively in seventy-five of the leading cities of the United States, from October, 1915, to April, 1916. It represents two distinctive scenes to attract the attention of the passer-by.

Enclosed in a circle of black, in the right upper portion of the picture, is the monstrous squatting figure of the bronze Buddha of Kamakura in Japan. Stolid and unmoved by human need and misery, the great idol sits, wrapped in dreams, with vast eyelids closed over visionless orbs. The huge bronze petals of the lotus flowers in the gigantic vases before him are not more cold than he or less stirred by the sighs of the worshippers prostrate at his feet. This is a true symbol of paganism, but paganism only on its negative side, for there is no revelation here of the passion that accompanies paganism.

Below, to the left of the picture, is a figure more familiar to us, an immigrant newly come to our shores. With bundle and satchel in hand, he stands, helpless and bewildered, facing the new world that opens up before him. In the background may be seen the tops of towering apartment houses, and near by a church with barred doors and forsaken look, cold and uninviting. The church conveys to him no message and makes no appeal. His steps are timidly turning into other quarters, where the broken barrel and the rubbish at the door tell their tale. Soon the great city will absorb him. Its dangers and temptations will encompass him. Who can be surety for his soul?

"Men Wanted," is the notice written in large letters over the poster. "Enlist for World Service," is the invitation. "National Missionary Campaign. Conventions in Seventy-five Cities," is the announcement telling of the interdenominational propaganda on the part of Protestant laymen for their home and foreign missions, a campaign begun at Chicago, October 14, and closing in the capital city of the nation during April, 1916. Superlative opportunities, its promoters urge, constitute a superlative call.

The Women's Missionary Societies have in the past given mighty assistance to the Protestant missions. But it was desired above all to interest the men, and in November, 1906, the Laymen's Missionary Movement made its beginning. In 1909-10 the first real attempt was made in the United States to vitalize this movement by seventy-five conventions held in the leading cities. Seventy-five thousand men were thus brought together, the Christian Advocate writes, "to consider their missionary responsibility. The whole nation was challenged and stirred." During 1913-14 as many as 500 conventions were held at the invitation of the federated mission bands. The support which the Protestant press is giving this Laymen's Movement and the vast amount of space it is at all times devoting to missionary endeavors, together with the thorough development of national and local organizations for this purpose, must of necessity produce success both in the enlistment of recruits and the obtaining of adequate resources.

To quote a single instance, the first that comes to hand, the Epworth League alone, a Methodist organization, collected, during the last six years, $750,000 for special mission work and has at present 1,200 Epworthians preparing for foreign service. Their volunteer recruits for the year 1915 number 100. They do not expect personally to capture the non-Christian world, but will try everywhere to educate a native ministry in the doctrines of Methodism. "They will be seeking for strategic men, for children who can get the training of a whole youth-time in a Christian schoo[l every sort of material that promises to produce leadership in the growing native church."

Even Mormonism is in the field and the disbursements of its church for missionary work in foreign lands during the year 1914 was $228,000, or over one-tenth of the total collection of the organization for that year. What proportion of the total collections of the Catholic Church in America has gone to her foreign missions? What amount of space in our press, what degree of energy in our pulpits has been devoted to the extension of God's Kingdom in these lands so ripe for harvest? How do we compare in all this work with the divided Protestant sects? The Congregational churches alone have collected during the past year $1,104,565 for their foreign missions. Many other denominations have gathered hardly less and some considerably more. Where do we stand?

We have everything that is wanting to these denominations. We have the Sacraments, the Presence of Christ in our ever-open churches, the absolute unity of creed throughout the world, and a great central power to direct all our efforts. We have the certainty of an infallible Faith handed down to us from the days of the Apostles and the commission given to our priesthood and episcopate to teach all nations and make them one with us and with Christ in the Sacrament of Holy Baptism. What alone is needed is a realization of the truth, forcibly brought home to us by the most competent Catholic mission authorities, that unless we now combine our energy and organize effectively for a strong mission propaganda, the most populous and intellectual mission countries of the world will, humanly speaking, fall under the influence of Protestantism.

It may be difficult to understand why, at a time when Protestants have in great numbers lost their belief in the vital truths of Christianity, and are openly denying the Divinity of Christ and the inspiration of the Sacred Scriptures, the sects should nevertheless develop a new and widespread missionary propaganda. It is needless to suggest reasons; the fact remains. In their missionary campaign, both at home and abroad, Protestants have practically brought about for the present a working union, agreeing to disagree about their religious principles. Their motives or methods in this propaganda do not concern us here. One thing we know from past experience: that even though they fail to produce lasting religious results, they too often succeed in implanting in the mind of the foreigner among us, and of the native in distant lands, a profound misunderstanding and a senseless hatred of everything Catholic.

The ways of God are inscrutable; but may we not suppose that the great modern mission campaign of Protestantism is to serve us, at the present moment, as a mighty stimulus for bringing about more speedily and more perfectly the extension of God's Kingdom upon earth, His Holy Church? Already there is a thrill and throb of response. Already new mission impulses are felt throughout the Catholic Church of America. The idea of more adequate organization and unification of our efforts has seriously been advanced. The Church has abundantly provided us with opportunities ready at hand. The Society for the Propagation of the Faith, the Holy Childhood Association, and all the various missionary institutions are only waiting to be utilized. They are seeking for men and means and cooperation of every kind.

In the Protestant Laymen's Missionary Movement a challenge has been thrown down to us. Catholic laymen cannot hesitate to accept it. Delay might mean disaster. The time is pressing. World-conquest and world-service are the mottos of the hour. They belong to us; they have ever been our own; they must now more than ever be upon our lips.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

Votes for Women

To the Editor of AMERICA:

May I, through your columns, voice a most indignant protest against the wholesale arraignment of my sex indulged in by Martha Moore Avery in her article "Spread of Social Disorder"? That some women are vile is undeniably true; that more men are vile is equally indisputable; but that by far the vast majority of women are decent, self-respecting, moral, and conscientious in the performance of their duties as wives, mothers, sisters, daughters, and that the majority of married women do willingly, cheerfully and gladly bear and rear children, I most emphatically assert and believe.

Now, as to suffrage: I have been an active worker in the Woman Suffragist Party for three years and I have met suffragists of high and low degree. I have met the woman of means who believes in suffrage, because she believes that the taxpayer should have a voice in electing the officials who pass on the financial outlay of city, State and nation, quite irrespective of whether that taxpayer be a man or a woman. I have met the factory girl and the shop girl who believe in suffrage, because they see that women are discriminated against by laws which say that man must not be obliged to work more than eight hours a day, but that woman, the weaker vessel, is strong enough to work nine hours a day. I have met the woman in the home, the intelligent wife and mother, who believes in suffrage because she sees, as women are coming to see more and more every day, that there is scarcely a question with which government has to deal today that does not in some way, directly or indirectly, affect the home. Tariff, pure food laws, sanitary regulations, school administration, in fact the most vital questions which have to be decided in this and following generations are those relating to human welfare, a field in which women have a tremendous interest and a large experience.

Nowhere have I met the "leading suffragists" who "advocate" any "vile practice." I cannot imagine to what or to whom Miss Avery refers. Suffrage has to do with one question and only one, and that is the right of a citizen to use, for the protection of his rights as a citizen, the instrument which was designed by government for that purpose, viz., the ballot. Feminism, whatever that may be, and I have never yet found two people who defined it alike, has nothing to do with the plain proposition of "votes for women," and it is only begging the question and befogging the issue when our opponents attempt to obscure the perfectly plain, clear, common-sense proposition of "votes for women" by dragging in and erecting a "straw man" that is not a part of the proposition at all.

The majority of the men of New York State decided on November 2 that they were unwilling to try this new order of things, and suffragists have accepted their decision for the present. But that there are more than half a million men who registered their faith in women at the polls on November 2, is a great reason to believe that the sentiment for justice for women is growing among those who give it serious thought, and that a few years more of a campaign of education will bring an overwhelming majority to see that women as well as men should have every right to express their opinion about the administration of the government under which they live, whose laws they must obey, to whose expenses they must contribute, and to which they must be loyal under all circumstances.

Brooklyn. AGNES HULL PRENDERGAST.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Why does not the Catholic press support "Woman Suffrage," asks a contributor. How can the Catholic press consistently ally itself with a movement which has sprung from anti-Catholic sources, and is supported almost entirely by anti-Catholic bodies? It appears "all the forces of evil are arrayed against" the suffragist, and the help of the Catholic press is desired to obtain "votes for women." If Catholic women want to fight "all the forces of evil," why do they not rally to the standard of the Catholic press? Their support, moral, social and financial, their interest, zeal and enthusiasm are wofully needed. If the Catholic suffragist believes "votes for women" merely a political issue, why try to drag the Church into it? If she admits it is a moral and religious issue as well, how can she consistently belong to a party whose aims and ambitions are utterly at variance with the teachings of the Catholic Church?

What strange creatures we women are! Shall we arm with the sword of truth and righteousness to gain a wooden wand? Shall we deck ourselves with the "pearl of great price" to win a brass ring for our noses?

How Satan must smile at the thought of the "intelligence" and "purity" of the women that are going to "vanquish" him by means of the vote! The devil fears no woman who fights with merely human weapons. He knows how much of the greatly-vaunted "purity" of Eve's daughters is the result of mankind's instinct to barricade the child-bearing sex from the evils rife in this devil-harried planet. How he must smile as he sees the modern Eve peering wistfully over her barricade at the "man's world" beyond, while with curious fingers she assiduously picks at the hard-caked clay of "ignorance," and exults as the heavy logs of "prejudice" and "man-made laws" topple down before her vigorous onslaughts! It is the mighty feminine intellect, forsooth, that is to put him to rout! The same old sins, pride of intellect and disobedience to God's laws! All that was needed was the same old weapon of "flattery," the same old lure of "god-like power" and "knowledge of good and evil," and how Eve tramples poor, stupid, blundering Adam's "tyranny" under foot and holds out both hands for the prize! Does not Cardinal Gibbons declare the suffrage agitators "the worst enemies of the female sex"? Do not a tremendously great majority of the clergy agree with his views? How can the Catholic press, then, support these agitators, or a Catholic woman delude herself to the extent of joining their ranks?

There is only one woman the devil fears; only one whose purity blinds him, whose intellect confounds him, over whose immaculate soul he never had and never can have sway, "Mary, the pattern of humility," the Virgin and Mother of Nazareth who quietly went about her duties in the household. Let the Catholic woman who yearns to fight "the forces of evil" emulate the second great Mother of humanity, not the first. Satan himself hesitates to approach the threshold of a good home. Eve, if Adam slips and falls in the mud, what good will that "scrap of paper," the ballot, do you?

Lansdowne, Pa. E. C.

Mr. Moore and Transubstantiation

To the Editor of AMERICA:

At this juncture the issue between myself and Mr. Moore is this: Whether or not the twenty-eighth "Article" officially repudiates Transubstantiation. He says no; it simply condemns a theory held by a certain school of Roman Catholics. A glance at the "Article" is the best answer to this ludicrous assertion:

> Transubstantiation, (or the change of the substance of bread and wine), cannot be proved by Holy Writ: but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a Sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions. The Body of Christ is given, taken and eaten in the Supper, only after an heavenly and spiritual manner. And the means, whereby the Body of Christ is perceived and eaten in the Supper is Faith.

There are two parts here: The first part explicitly and clearly defines Transubstantiation as taught dogmatically by the Catholic Church, and then explicitly and clearly declares that such a doctrine is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture and destructive of the very nature of a Sacrament. That is, the first part of this article condemns and officially repudiates as false the official teaching of the Catholic Church, known as Transubstantiation, not a theory of a certain Roman Catholic School. This is point one, the point at issue. But as if to clinch this error the Article does not rest here, it proceeds to set up an absolutely un-Catholic doctrine about the Eucharist, in the place of the true doctrine, which it rejects in such unmistakable terms. For in the second part the Article says: "The Body of Christ is given, taken and eaten, only after an heavenly and spiritual manner. And the means whereby the Body of Christ is perceived and eaten is Faith (Italics inserted). In other words Christ is not "truly, really and substantially" present in the Eucharist, body, blood, soul and divinity, under the species of bread and wine by the power of the priest's words as a causal agent, to be received sacramentally and really, as the Catholic doctrine has it. On the contrary He is there spiritually and is given, perceived and eaten by Faith only. (Italics inserted). Lest we might mistake the meaning of this plain error Ridley and Cranmer to whom the Anglican church is chiefly indebted for these formularies, leave us in no doubt about its precise significance. The former says:

> The true Church of Christ doth acknowledge a presence of Christ's Body in the Lord's Supper to be communicated to the godly by grace and spiritually. . . . and by a sacramental significance, but not by the corporal presence of the Body of His Flesh. II. That heavenly Lamb is, as I confess, on the table; but by a spiritual presence, and not after any corporeal presence of the Flesh of the Virgin Mary.

Enough, but not all of Ridley. Now for Cranmer: "I say . . . that we receive Christ spiritually, by faith with our minds eating His Flesh and drinking His Blood." . . .

At other times Cranmer denied that the "bread was changed in substance." God simply added thereto a "high property" . . . so "that the bread doth shew unto us . . . that we be partakers of the spirit of God, spiritually fed with Christ's Flesh and Blood." Again he denied "a real and substantial presence:" that Christ is received "by a real and corporal presence," and he moreover asserted: (1) That Christ is received only "by a spiritual and effectual presence." (2) That our union with Christ in the Eucharist is as our union with Him in baptism, nothing more.

Hence the second part of the Article by itself and in itself plainly sets up the false doctrine that Christ is given, taken and eaten only after a heavenly and spiritual manner, by faith. This is confirmed by Ridley and Cranmer. The Catholic Church on the other hand declares: "Should any one say that Christ existing in the Eucharist is received (eaten) spiritually only and not sacramentally and really also, let him be anathema." To sum up: The first part of Article twenty-eight declares the Catholic dogma of Transubstantiation plainly unscriptural and destructive of the very nature of a Sacrament; the second part of the same article openly asserts a doctrine condemned in express words by the Catholic Church.

More might be said. I forbear to mention, save in passing and as contributory evidence, the horrid oath denouncing Transubstantiation, taken for centuries by each successive Supreme Head of the Anglican church. I omit too, the Westminster Confession of 1647, which rejects the same doctrine. Here my case rests. True Mr. Moore has made many other statements. But one thing at a time: I shall meet all his statements in due time. Most of them are ridiculously false, and one is in my favor.

New York. GEORGE RUSK.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

How to Lose the Hyphen

TO give "first aid" to New Englanders whose ancestors are lost, strayed or stolen, one of our contemporaries has long maintained a wonderfully effective "Genealogical Department." So competent and clever is the editor of the page that if you offer him a mere name or two, and possibly a single date, he can soon supply you with a complete line of distinguished forefathers. For example, if "Thomas Lilly and Rachel Vane, of Boston, whom he married September 30, 1725," seem desirable ancestors to some one bearing either of those names, the given data furnishes the genealogical editor with abundant material for building up a noble family tree. For several of his numerous correspondents will haunt so persistently old grave-yards, and others will ransack so carefully domestic archives and parish registers, that in a few weeks the Vane in question will be unmistakenly traced back to one of that name who came over in the Puritan migration of 1630, or the aspiring Lilly will be proved beyond all cavil a Pilgrim's great-grandson.

The inquirer can then easily follow his family back to the Conquest, the barbarian inroads and the Deluge, secure his coat-of-arms, join the Sons of the American Revolution, provide himself, at a moderate expense, with the proper number of ancestral portraits and a sufficient supply of heirlooms in the form of china, silver and furniture, and then pass the evening of his days comforted by the thought that none of his posterity will ever be called a "hyphenated American."

For it is a remarkable fact that men of English extraction can become thorough Americans much quicker than can those of Irish, German, French or Italian ancestry. Prominent lawyers, for example, whose grandmothers accepted the hospitality of our shores about 1845 are still called Irish-Americans, and successful physicians whose grandfathers fought in our Civil War are generally described as German-Americans. But an "Anglo-Saxon" from London, a "Scotch-Irish" from Belfast, or a canny Scot from Edinburgh, particularly if they are stanch Protestants, can become so thoroughly Americanized in half a generation that their children can resent with just anger the charge of "hyphenation." Yet by his descent from Old World ancestors is not every person in this country "hyphenated"? The only true American in existence is the Red Indian: and even he is probably of Asiatic origin.

By Way of Comparison

FROM the House of the Holy Childhood at Ningpo, China, comes a cry of sharp distress. It is only one of many similar calls for help. Thirty little waifs are lying outside the convent gate as the Sister writes, telling of her pressing need; thirty motherless babes crying to be fed; but there is not enough for the hungry little mouths within. "Unless help comes, every penny we have must go to buy rice and the babies outside must be left to die." There is anguish at the heart of the good Sister as she pleads for help, and her tender instinct strongly asserts itself: "We are the only mothers these children have!" The money annually sent for the support of this work has been cut down by the ravages of the war to one-fourth of its former amount, and still the same number of mouths must be fed daily. Only a handful of rice is wanted, but there is no money to buy it withal. The diminished support is far from sufficient to pay for the 250 mites already put out to nurse, besides the hundreds of others within the convent walls. Fifty cents are needed to keep a Chinese child in rice for a month. Surely little enough, but a prosaic fact that must be met by equally prosaic means. Charity is not purely a matter of sympathy, but of assistance and cooperation.

A glance from this appeal to a Protestant announcement reveals a different story. No particular boast is made. Thirteen denominations, grouped together there, have received during 1914 no less than $11,098,517 for their missions abroad. At the same time a daily paper at hand briefly conveys the laconic news that the Methodists of the North, "just closing their year, contribute $2,600,000 to the foreign missions."

Here, then, are two pictures which Catholics may profitably compare: the opulence suggested by the latter figures and the poverty suggested by the Sister. Perhaps the cases cited are extreme, nevertheless they convey a practical lesson. Catholics may not have the wealth that is to be found among the members of some of the Protestant sects, they doubtless have expenses which Protestants are not called upon to meet; but even a mite from each of us would suffice. The wail of the little ones at least should touch our hearts. There are mighty interests at stake and God has made them largely dependent upon the good will of this generation of Catholics in the United States. We are more than equal to the task without neglecting our home interests. Resolution alone is required to do our full manly part in making known the danger to our Catholic missions and the magnificent opportunities now presenting themselves to Americans of extending God's Kingdom, or in offering our actual contributions of means and service for the foreign missions. The Society for the Propagation of the Faith, the Holy Childhood Association and our other missionary institutions are waiting for our cooperation. It is God's cause. His grace and strength will not be wanting.

Law in Wisconsin

TO sentence a man to be hanged and to take up the trifling matter of his trial in connection with the post mortem, was once thought to be legal procedure as understood on the comic stage. The inference was incorrect. It is, apparently, legal procedure as understood in the State of Wisconsin.

If the press reports are to be credited, an iniquitous law prescribing mutilation not only for criminals of a certain degraded kind but for imbeciles, was recently enforced in that State. Forty "patients" were to be treated; in the event, however, but ten were subjected to the surgeon's knife. Thirty were reprieved on the ground that "it was thought well to await and report the results of the operation."

If the results of this operation were not known, why was it prescribed by legislative action? Presumably Wisconsin enacted this barbarous and beastly law, to attain a definite purpose; after its passage she began a series of experiments to discover whether or not the purpose could be attained by the law. The whole incident is an excellent illustration of what has been happily termed "fool law." And fools can be dangerous as well as silly.

The physicians who carried out the State's bequest will perhaps be defended. Speaking generally, however, it is well to remember that the world has an ugly and expressive name for the physician who subjects his patient to medical or surgical treatment not calculated to cure the disease.

A "Midrash" Merely?

AMONG those who have been observing the growth in the attitude of criticism of certain parts of the Bible, it has been a commonplace that outside the Catholic Church rationalism was making deep inroads into faith. Often ministers who have not dared to speak openly in the pulpit, have had no difficulty about expressing advanced ideas in books and magazines. An example in point is a recent Biblical article written by a certain Presbyterian divine of Brooklyn, and published, of all places, in the New York American. He says in part:

> Despite these difficulties and many more some of the best people you know of will go on accepting, line for line, as unquestionable and solemn fact the Bible account of Jonah. The earnest, scientific Bible scholars today practically unanimously reject this old view. What do these make of the book of Jonah? A parable, a midrash, as the elder Hebrews called a fanciful, spiritual story built partly upon some real fact or person.

Such statements make "good copy," no doubt; but they are nevertheless false. It is not true that there is practically unanimity among earnest, scientific Bible scholars in their rejection of the literal, historical character of the account of Jonas. Catholic scholars make no such rejection, and their name is legion. Moreover, for earnestness and scientific scholarship they are easily on a par with the advanced school. There is not a single Catholic Biblical scholar of any prominence today who does not assert that the prophet of Nineve was actually in the belly of the whale, or fish—for they are not concerned about identifying the species—for three days. As for the difficulties that have lead the rationalists to reject the miracle, such as the natural action of "the death-dealing gastric juices," and "the whale's nausea," they are either trivial, and would equally militate against all miracles; or else they are wholly inconclusive. For instance, the absence of all mention of the fact in the Cuneiform inscriptions loses all weight when set against the actual record of the fact in the equally historical document of the Book of Jonas, and the explicit testimony of Josephus.

There is a subtle danger in the rejection of this particular miracle, as it has a very striking parallel in the New Testament. Christ says, speaking of his future Resurrection, "For as Jonas was in the whale's belly three days and nights: so shall the Son of Man be in the heart of the earth three days and three nights." (Matt. xii: 40.) Here we have two events asserted by Christ to be similar. Reject the fact-character of one, and it is easy to destroy the fact-character of the other. Behold the trail of the serpent. True, well-instructed Catholics are not deceived. However, many unwary parents are allowing their children to read the "higher" criticism of penny papers, often to the ruin of their youthful souls.

"Life" and Mr. Carranza

"LIFE," ventured the aged man, in the accents of Polonius, "is a very solemn thing."

"I agree with you," rejoined the pert twentieth century child, "especially if you refer to the New York publication."

Out of the mouth of babes. This New York weekly is a solemn thing, and with solemnity goes slowness. Mayhap the editor of Life lives far from the madding crowd atop the Metropolitan tower, or mayhap again, in a moated grange like Marianna. Whatever or wherever his domicile, he is no modernist; the news of the day percolates but slowly into his consciousness. Under date of November 11, 1915, he owns to a slight doubt touching the real status of Carranza, scholar and saint. "Carranza," states Life carefully, as one who in the presence of savants, hazards a theory on the Fourth Dimension, "has the reputation of being the persecutor of the Roman Catholic Church."

Next week, very likely, we shall be informed that Woodrow Wilson has the reputation of being the President of the United States, and that the minor differences between Germany and the Allied Powers have the reputation of being a war. It is not well to commit oneself rashly. But whatever information the editor of Life may graciously impart to an expectant public, he can give us nothing more precious than his comment on this new-found bit of news about Mr. Carranza. It merits a line all to itself.

Of course, this won't do.

The middle name of Life's editor is Daniel. The first is Solomon.

Baptist Sympathy in Massachusetts

A POOR-SPIRITED timorous body is the Massachusetts Baptist Missionary Society; very like the trembling, hypnotized sweet Alice in the song. Just at present, it is hypnotized by the astounding rise of "Jesuitism" in this country, and is trembling away under the frown of "the Jesuit college which looks down from fair heights upon this city of Boston, whose free institutions are imperilled." On bright sunshiny days, it would be advisable for the members of this Society to bide within doors. Should they catch a glimpse of their shadows, the mortality rate would be higher than at any time since that holy year, 1620.

Like most timorous persons, the gentlemen who make up this body, lack a sense of humor. The Rev. Frederick L. Anderson, for instance, answering the question, "What Must Massachusetts Do to be Saved?" expressed his desire to "speak sympathetically." He then discoursed on "the sea of trouble prepared for us by Roman domination," on "the Roman Church with its reign of priestcraft, with its magic and fears; its decrease in the power of morals and lowering the standards of civilization." To accuse the Catholic Church of lowering the standards of civilization and morality, would be a fairly serious indictment, were it not ridiculous. If this is "sympathy," what is "serious criticism"?

Back of the drivel so liberally indulged in at this "Missionary" meeting, lies the old prejudice, utterly at variance with facts, that Catholics owe civil allegiance to a foreign potentate. This venerable calumny has furnished texts to non-Catholic pulpits and to malodorous ex-priests for many a year, but no amount of disproof makes it less dear to its friends. Yet no one but a fool or a knave questions the loyalty of American Catholics. From that splendid gentleman who presides over the Supreme Court of the United States down to the smallest child in the parochial school, every Catholic knows that patriotism is a duty imposed by religion. To die for one's country is a fair test of loyalty; and from the dark years of the Revolutionary period even to that April day when young Haggerty gave his life at Vera Cruz, Catholics have stood the test triumphantly.

LITERATURE

The Bear That Walks Like a Man

IT would be a relief to meet a man who would tell honestly why he likes Artzibashef and some of the rest of the modern Russian realists. It would be a relief to have some young radical say: "Yes, I know Techekhoff is dull and prolix, but then the atmosphere of his work is delightfully unwholesome, and every now and then there is something pleasantly morbid, like the man with phosphorous poisoning in 'The Steppe,' and his agreeable custom of eating live fish. And then there's dear Michael Artzibashef. Of course his style is no better than that of Laura Jean Libbey, and his plots are cheap melodrama, but you can't deny that he is consistently nasty. And I do like to read about sexual depravity."

But the young radical of this sort is hard to meet. Instead we find the lofty-foreheaded young man who praises Artzibashef's psychological insight, Gorky's sympathy with humanity, and—actually!—Tchekhoff's humor! Of course he does not mean what he says. He likes "Sanine" for the same reason that he likes "Three Weeks." But he would not dare to confess a liking for "Three Weeks" because that book is English trash. And "Sanine" is Russian trash. And from the point of view of intellectual snobbery, there's all the difference in the world between these two sorts of trash.

Now, it would of course be absurd to condemn all modern Russian fiction, or to characterize all admirers of contemporary Russian novelists as hypocrites and sensualists. Americans and Englishmen who know almost by heart the great poems and stories of Pushkin, who know Larmantov as they know Byron, and Gogol as they know Dickens, who were brought up on the novels of Turgenieff, have every right in the world to seek for new delight among the outpourings of the presses of Petrograd and Moscow. But the sort of person who is feverishly enthusiastic over Gorky and Artzibashef has discovered Russian literature, in all probability, during the few years which have passed since his graduation from Harvard. His most serious offence is not that he prefers that which is evil to that which is good, and praises untrue and inartistic work because the worst part of his nature responds to its salacious appeal. His most serious offence is that he thinks that the Hall Caines and Marie Corellis of Russia really are representative writers, and that he insults a race of great romanticists and great realists by calling works that are thoroughly morbid and vile "very Russian."

What is the remedy for this unfortunate condition? The ideal course to pursue would be, of course, to spank the serious-minded young men who think that the Russian novel is a cross between Nijinsky's dancing and a pogrom. They should be sentenced to a year in solitary confinement, during which they should be obliged to read daily a very thoroughly expurgated edition of all Artzibashef's works. This would convince them that it was not Artzibashef's "power of psychological analysis" that attracted them, and they would return to the world sadder and more honest men.

But this most desirable course has not the virtue of practicality. Perhaps some of the recent activities of American publishers will so educate the public that they will no longer be impressed by critics whose acquaintance with Russian literature is confined to "Sanine" and some of Gorky's plays. The Frederick A. Stokes Co. recently published Stephen Graham's admirable translation of Gogol's "Dead Souls," a novel which in its rich humor and sympathetic realism suggests "Pickwick Papers," while its whimsical romanticism brings to mind some parts of Don Quixote. It is one of the world's classics; no one who has not read it has a right to an opinion on Russian literature. The John Lane Co. has published Tolstoy's "The Death of Ivan Ilyitch," a book of short stories by the great novelist, half genius and half mountebank, who wasted his genuine talent in developing a new religion, which is merely a grotesque parody of Christianity. The stories in this book are compelling, in spite of their somewhat mad philosophy, for they faithfully reflect Russian manners and certain picturesque phases of Russian idealism. In the Home University Library Series, Henry Holt & Co. have published Maurice Baring's "Russian Literature," the best one-volume work on the subject in existence. And it is to be hoped that Mr. Alfred A. Knopf, in his interesting new enterprise, will publish those Russian novels which really belong to literature, rather than those which are of interest chiefly to the pathologist and alienist.

But meanwhile the market is flooded with viciously sensational works which are tolerated only because their exotic quality gives them a certain distinction in the eyes of the provincial. Here, for example, is Maxim Gorky's "Submerged," published by Mr. Richard G. Badger. Mr. Jerome's "The Passing of the Third Floor Back," and Mr. Charles Rand Kennedy's "The Servant in the House" were sentimental, but on the whole, effective treatments of a very dangerous theme: that of the miraculous reformation of certain phases of modern society or groups of individuals through the appearance on earth of a man possessing Divine attributes. Gorky's play has a similar plot, but, of course, he differs from the two English writers in making vice triumph in the end. The poor wretches who have endeavored to regain a little of their lost decency are thrust back into the slime. The people who make up this typical Gorky offering are drunkards, thieves, depraved creatures of every kind. They are utterly lost and the author seems to gloat over their depravity and misery. But then what else is he to do? He must live up to his name. Gorky, you know, is a pen name meaning "bitter," and Mr. Alexei Maximovitch Pyeshkov feels that he must justify the title he has so proudly assumed. But ridiculous affectation it is! It is as if Matthew Arnold had called himself "Matthew Sweetness and Light."

And here, from the press of Duffield & Co., comes a translation of Leonidas Andreief, "The Red Laugh." This is an attempt to flash upon the astonished world the novel idea that war is a very, very unpleasant thing. Mr. Andreief spills gore on every page, and the publisher assists him by making the title of the book blood red on a black ground. All the characters in the book go mad, and the author's utter inaptitude for literature turns what might have been passable third-rate melodrama into a farce. As a contribution to letters, and as a piece of pacifist propaganda "The Red Laugh" is inferior to "I Didn't Raise My Boy to Be a Soldier."

And then there is Artzibashef: he is being boomed and press-agented; the radical magazines praise his "assault on ordinary morality" and his "desperately poignant artistry"; long-haired young men with large eyes are telling the women's clubs all about him. Well, of course, "desperately poignant artistry" means nothing at all, and "artistry" is meaningless when used in connection with a man like the author of "The Millionaire." He doesn't write novels, he merely throws something evil-smelling into the reader's face.

If the scene of "The Millionaire" and "Nina" were laid in the United States, these stories would never have been printed. They are without literary merit; they are the crudest melodrama, but their grossness makes them appeal to the prurient, and their foreign origin charms the literary snob. To say that they reflect Russian life is to insult Russia grievously. They do reflect, it is true, the basest part of Russian life, the part which no friend of Russia or of literature can wish reflected. They reflect the gross and hideous bestiality of the Russian criminal class, they reflect the life of people who have added to their native savagery the vices of civilization. They call to mind a picture of the Russian people as something at once bestial and human, a monstrosity, a nightmare: perhaps the thing that Kipling had in mind when he wrote of the bear that walks like a man.

JOYCE KILMER.

REVIEWS

Lessons in Scholastic Philosophy. By MICHAEL W. SHALLO, S.J. Philadelphia: Peter Reilly, $1.75.

Every sincere attempt to bring scholastic philosophy within the reach of the English-speaking world should be encouraged. Not that we would disparage the scholarly Latin works, or replace them by texts in the vernacular; the former are invaluable, and should be in the hands of those who read Latin with sufficient ease to appreciate them. But to many Latin is an unknown tongue, and in consequence scholastic philosophy is not so widely read nor so well understood as it deserves to be. Of recent years some admirable manuals in English have come from the press, but scarcely in any of these have we met with such breadth of view, such depth of thought, such clearness of expression and such brevity of style as in Father Shallo's book. Ethics excepted, it contains a rapid but masterly survey of the whole field of philosophy; the positive doctrine is ably explained and defended; ancient and modern errors are briefly indicated; the main arguments of erroneous systems are proposed and refuted. And this is all accomplished within the compass of 398 pages. The book has been introduced already into many schools, and thoughtful readers who have not the leisure to attend regular classes will enjoy the volume and derive much enlightenment from its pages. A table of contents and copious examples would greatly add to the usefulness of the work. It is marred also by frequent typographical mistakes, and surely the book was worthy of being printed on far superior paper.

D. J. C.

High Lights of The French Revolution. By HILAIRE BELLOC. With Illustrations. New York: The Century Co. $3.00.

In a series of brilliant essays Mr. Belloc describes in these pages the telling moments in the most dramatic hour of modern history. The revolt of the Commons, the flight to Varennes, the storming of the Tuileries, the death of Louis XVI are some of the subjects he treats, and they are connected by introductory notes briefly outlining intermediate events. Interesting and vivid with all the flash of Carlyle, yet not blinding with Carlyle's prejudice, Hilaire Belloc grasps the salient facts of the revolutionary era and presents them in a style at once simple and strong. The writer's power in character study is remarkable. The King and Queen, the revolutionary leaders, as well as the minor actors during France's great upheaval, appear on his pages as living persons, with all the strength and weakness that life unfolds. Belloc has penetrated the genius of the Gaul, and he writes as no mere spectator, but as one whom ties of blood and sympathetic, accurate study have enabled to feel and know. Probably his appreciation of Lafayette is the queen-jewel in this literary crown. In it we see the idol of the American Revolution weighed in the balance of careful criticism that is kindly as well as fair.

Hilaire Belloc in this late effort has clinched his claim as the foremost English critical historian of the most momentous period in French history. Others have given us their views on the Revolution; Mr. Belloc gives us the Revolution in its strongest phases, and his critical analysis is too keen to be "viewy": it is thought-compelling. G. C. T.

Storied Italy. By Mrs. HUGH FRASER. With Illustrations. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $3.50.

Into this ornate holiday volume the author of "A Diplomatist's Wife in Many Lands" has gathered a dozen interesting papers, some of which are historical while others describe modern life in Italy. "September, 1914," is a good sketch of the election and career of Pope Benedict XV, "the Pontiff of Peace," and in "A Roman Christmas" there is an amusing account of an adventure an Italian prelate had in New York. He was returning from South America, and not knowing how priests dress "in the States," donned "a rough gray traveling suit, a turndown collar and tie and a pot hat," and, thus attired, went to the Cathedral to say Mass. But when the ecclesiastical authorities rightly insisted on seeing his papers, Monsignore was so indignant that he stalked out of the church and hurried over to Newark, where he found some one who knew him. Throughout this volume Mrs. Frazer's stanch Catholicism is in evidence. In "Romana di Roma," which is a charming little biography of St. Frances, she has an excellent answer for readers who say: "Tell us more about yourself: that interests us, the Saints don't," and observes: "The public that will swallow greedily any silly personal anecdotes about great people, any old scandal wittily related, that besieges the libraries for memoirs that the censor should have suppressed, calls itself too 'educated' to believe in the adventures of the Saints in their warfare for God." In another chapter the author gives a vivid description of the earthquake at Avezzano. If a new edition of this book is called for, perhaps the price could be lowered. W. D.

An Idyl, Some Sermons and a Song. By OWEN A. HILL, S.J. New York: The Fordham University Press. $1.00.

Father Hill's little volume deserves a place among our best religious poetry. Its verse is careful and dignified, it abounds in beautiful conceptions, its phrases are rich in suggestion, and into many a line has been infused the warmth of a thoroughly Southern heart and the reverence of a deeply spiritual faith. There are four poems in the book. The first is well called an idyl for although it lacks something of idyllic simplicity it has descriptive passages of much beauty. A love poem, like the idyls of Theocritus and Tennyson, it comes nevertheless with fitness from the pen of a priest, for it tells not only of an earthly love of idealized purity, but also of its sacrifice on the altar of zeal to the higher and more imperious call of the love of God. Although earlier in composition and different in development, the main idea is slightly reminiscent of one of Mgr. Benson's later novels. The second part of the title, which, aside from its being misleading, is forbidding and therefore unfortunate, comprises two poems. The first is a metrical development of the ascetical ideals of the Exercises of Saint Ignatius, which sets forth the tragedy of the Son of Man and the tragedy of the individual soul, each working its way from sin and darkness through sorrow to final triumph and peace. "Atheism, Heresy and Faith" is the strongest of the poems, being a fearless arraignment of the folly and unreasonableness of the enemies of God and Christ, and a delicate presentation of the peace promised to Faith and good-will. The last poem, which is the most subtle in thought, and the most finished in diction, has for its burden deathless hope. The strength and the weakness of the volume is in the harmony and the struggle between the poet and philosopher; but they harmonize far oftener than they clash. J. H. F.

That Office Boy. By FRANCIS J. FINN, S.J. New York: Benziger Brothers. $0.85.

Father Finn has once more given us a book which will be a source of delight to young and old. He has quaffed of the fountain of perpetual youth and years have not robbed him of that buoyancy of spirit and mirth of heart which are the charm of all he writes. He has a secret of his own, an art which is incommunicable and which wins its way straight to the heart of the reader. Years have only brought with them, as his latest story shows, a deeper sympathy, a broader vision and a richer fund of personal experience. His humor throughout is gentle and his fun contagious. His grasp on the realities of life is sure and firm, and he teaches a better social lesson than can be learned from crowded shelves of problem stories and "uplift" essays, with Christianity eliminated. But the finest quality in his works is the deep religious influence of all he writes. "Father Finn's books are a spiritual tonic," some one recently remarked to the reviewer. In them is preserved for us all the bloom of Christian ideals and chivalry which was the charm of the Ages of Faith. The spirit which animated those days of tender yet sturdy Christianity still lives on and we need but rediscover it, as Father Finn has done, in the homes of the Catholic poor. The reader who has well begun "That Office Boy" will be loath to lay it down until he has read to the end and closes it, as the author hopes, "rejoicing." J. H.

Escape and Other Essays. By ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER BENSON. New York: The Century Co. $1.50.

Mr. Arthur C. Benson's latest book of essays should prove deeply interesting to all thoughtful readers. His style is highly transparent and delightfully imaginative and emotional; and in the gentle shepherding of his thought he displays an ease and refinement which, as it clearly emanates from the inmost depths of a truly engaging character gives to the personal element in his writing a peculiarly pronounced, if somewhat subtle, attraction. His interpretation of life is large and generous and his range of vision is considerably wider than in his earlier works. The first eight essays are by far the best. The following seven, beginning with the one entitled "Dreams," suffer from being a bit overdrenched with personality, to the extent of striking the reader as slightly too particular and thus losing something of the universality of their emotional appeal. On the other hand there is a decided wistfulness running through the whole work, that lends something of a Virgilian pathos to his thought. This is due in large degree to a certain paleness of conviction, in the face of the realities and deeper mysteries of life, which was characteristic of the beautiful but pagan mind of the Roman poet and which is responsible for a good deal of the supineness of modern literature. Mr. Benson seems to forget that "an overflowing certainty of the true values of life" was no less characteristic of the Catholic Middle Ages than it was of the "earlier teaching of the Gospel"; and if he is out of sympathy with St. Augustine's ascetical attitude toward the beauties of this world and misses the charm in St. Francis' ideas on the value of preaching by example; or if he lays repeated stress on the opposition of what he calls ecclesiastical religion to our sense and yearning for the beautiful, he himself plainly suggests to us from what angle he is judging when, with reference to Puritanism, he says, "We shall take a long time before we can crawl out of the shadow of that dark inheritance." M. I. X. M.

The Latin Church in the Middle Ages. By ANDRÉ LAGARDE. Translated by ARCHIBALD ALEXANDER, PH.D. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

This is one of the volumes of the "International Theological Library," which claims as its parent the late Professor Briggs. The question presents itself: Why should there be such a thing as an International Theological Library? One does not see that nationalism and theology have anything in common. The matter of theology is Divine Revelation and the doctrinal declarations of the teaching Church; and it makes little difference whether these are discussed by a Frenchman, a German, an Italian, or an Irishman. The theologian, as such, is a Christian, a member of the Kingdom of Christ that, throughout the world, knows limits of neither time nor place. The very term, "International Theological Library," implies heresy and schism. But even so, the title is misleading. The library of such pretentious name contains only thirty-five volumes. Of these, one is by a German sectary, another, besides the present book, by a French sectary, the remaining thirty-two are by Americans and Englishmen of various denominations and degrees of unbelief. Perhaps the book before us is assumed to be the Catholic contribution to the library. Were it so, we might have asked: Que diable allait-il faire dans cette galère? As it is nothing but a heaping together of everything that has ever been said against the Church, the product of an embittered mind, we will occupy ourselves no further with it. H. W.

The Will in Ethics. By THEOPHILUS B. STORK. Boston: Sherman, French & Co. $1.25.

Through some two hundred pages the author of this work has made what cannot fail to impress the reader as an honest attempt to answer "an important, perhaps the most important, question in ethics, 'What a good will is.'" In an introductory "shop window" word he essays to acquaint his patrons in a general way with the nature of his thesis and its development. This he does that it may be seen at a glance whether there is "anything within worth looking at under any circumstances by anybody," and further, supposing that there is, whether "this worthy anything is of any worth" to the particular individual who stands hesitatingly on the threshold of the latest door opened by the hand of modern philosophy to show the way to truth. Were one to answer these questions with an eye fixed solely on the subject-matter of the volume in hand, the reply would be in both cases unquestionably affirmative. "The particular will and the Universal will and their mutual relations to each other is," or ought to be, "the most absorbing and important theme that the intellect of man can dwell upon," making, of course, as we should, these two assumptions: First, that by the particular will the author understands that dominant faculty in man whose function it is to express the one necessary tendency of his being towards a goal, very definite and specifically proper to his complex but single nature, and whose actions it is the province of ethics so to guide according to the principles of right reason that they will infallibly bring man to the attainment of that goal. Second, that by the Universal will is meant the will of the Maker of the universe, whose existence as a Personal Being distinct from His creation every sane system of ethics presupposes, and whose infinite intelligence and all-holy purpose in dealing with the works of His hands are the true beacon lights that illumine the way that man should walk on earth. But neither of these two fundamental truths seem to have been grasped by the author.

"The particular will is part of the Universal will, not to be understood or treated as separate, but only as part of the Universal." "The Universal will is made up of the particular wills; they are part of it just as it is part of them." "There is (in man) the craving for reconciliation, not merely with man, but with the all of which men are but a part." These words lead dangerously near to the brink of the pantheistic precipice from which, in at least one passage of his work, the author is sensible enough to shrink in terror. Considerable space is devoted to a discussion, not over clear, of the problem of free will. Here the author's notions are distorted as a consequence of his view of the will itself. He seeks an intricate explanation of that tremendous problem: how may the will act in response to a motive and yet be free? Perhaps a certain prejudice against the schoolmen which Mr. Stork permits to show itself in the last line of an otherwise rather clever foot-note, on page 21, barred his way to the writings of men who could have saved him from this pitfall. J. F.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

L'Ecole en Chine is the name of an educational monthly which the French Jesuits of the Shanghai Mission started in September. As the Church is now pushing on its work with great vigor in China, the new magazine ought to be very timely and useful, if the contents are always of as practical and valuable a character as are the papers in the first number. L'Ecole en Chine is published at Zi-ka-wei, Shanghai, and the subscription price is $2.00 a year. AMERICA wishes every success to the venture.——Abbot Aelred's letter in the fall Pax is more hopeful than heretofore, and the Caldey Benedictines' prospects seem brighter than they were. The monks are very grateful for the help received from American Catholics. In this number of the quarterly there are good papers on Ruskin, on Borrow's "Wild Wales," on the primacy texts in the twenty-first chapter of St. John, and on a recent work about St. Benedict's rule.

"The Grand Duchess Benedicta" (Longmans, $1.00) is an amusing story that A. E. Burns has written for Catholic schoolgirls. It tells the story of a practical joke that led to direr results than the perpetrators intended, for Sister St. John's aggrieved pupils exploited the Grand Duchess with unexpected success.——"The Nowadays Girls in the Adirondacks" (Dodd, Mead, $1.00) tells how four girls of the modern type, who can fish, play hockey, run a motor-boat, drive an automobile, and dance the newest dances, have many stirring adventures during their vacation days. The episode of the lost "maniac" is quite dramatic.——"The Children's Book of Thanksgiving Stories" (Doubleday, $1.25), edited by Asa Don Dickinson, who had previously brought out a volume of children's Christmas stories, contains thirty-one well-chosen tales by various authors, some of which are meant for quite little boys and girls. P. J. Stahl's "Kingdom of the Greedy" and Eugene Field's "Ezra's Thanksgiving Out West" are among the best selections.

"Solid Truths Slightly Sugar-coated," is the apt description given by the Rev. C. D. McEnnery, C.SS.R., to his collection of "Father Tim's Talks with People He Met" (Herder, $0.75), for it contains important instructions that are presented more attractively than is common in books of this kind. The paper on "A Happy New Year," and on "The Awakening of Dormant Forces," will give some new ideas to most readers of the volume. In fact there is scarcely a talk that does not bring out some new idea, or at least put an old one in a striking way. Father Tim evidently knows human nature too. He has met it and studied it from its manifestations in the lad who thinks more of where he left his "mitt" than he does of your erudite lecture, to the wooden-headed father who first determines not to send his child to the Catholic school and then sets about finding a reason for his action. This is a good book to place in the hands of Catholics, either for their own instruction or to give them a practical example of how instruction may best be imparted to others.

"National Floodmarks: Week by Week Observations on American Life as Seen by Collier's" (Doran, $1.50) is Mark Sullivan's selections from the editorials that have appeared in Collier's since he became editor of that journal. Under twenty-three such headings as "Peace and War," "Some Human Beings," "Here Are Ladies," "Home Matters," etc., are arranged the reflections on men and things that Mr. Sullivan and his staff have been moved to publish. We are told that "The only rule there has ever been about the editorials in Collier's is that each should be the sincere expression of either a conviction or a mood. They have never been written to order." The campaign waged by our contemporary against dangerous nostrums and the makers of drunkards is particularly praiseworthy, and many will enjoy the tributes the editor pays his stenographer and his proof-reader.

In "The Man Jesus" (Harper, $1.20), Mary Austin's "brief account of the life and teaching of the Prophet of Nazareth," Our Lord is painted not as He was and is, but as modern criticism and sentimentalism dream He should have been. "The Man Jesus" is a pietistic travesty. It abounds with good descriptions and archeological data; it is, in the main, well-written, but is withal a travesty. It distils the so-called legends of the Gospel narrative, lifts the veil with which Christian piety has shrouded the Prophet of Nazareth, discounts the story of the virgin-birth, desupernaturalizes the Evangelical miracles, revamps an obsolete theory to explain the Resurrection appearances; in a word, depicts Jesus as a mere man, extraordinarily united to "God, the Divine Mind, The Eternal Purpose, of the nature of which men are partakers, as the son partakes of the father."

"Noble Lives of a Noble Race" is a series of reproductions by the pupils of St. Mary's Industrial School, Odanah, Wis. It first appeared in the class-room in manuscript form, and its object was simply to acquaint the Indian children with the characters and qualities of their race, and to familiarize them with such literature as dealt particularly with their people. At the earnest solicitation of friends, and with the hope of materially aiding the school, these pages are now given to the public. Reflecting credit alike on the devoted Franciscan Sisters of the Perpetual Adoration and on their diligent pupils, the volume will afford hours of instructive, entertaining and edifying reading.——The Rev. James Linden, S.J., has recently compiled an excellent "Catechism of the Catholic Religion" (Herder, $0.25). It is quite complete, and is so arranged that it may be used in different grades. Questions marked with an asterisk may be omitted when the catechism is first studied; important questions are underscored, while frequently helpful explanations and suggestive applications are added in small type.

Mr. Gilbert Murray, the famous classicist, has done well to put in permanent form his Conway Memorial Lecture, "The Stoic Philosophy" (Putnam, $0.75). For the book, though far from acceptable on a few points, is yet a lucid exposition of the central principles of an organized system of pre-Christian thought worthy of study. The style of the lecturer is simple, his thought clear, though not always compelling, a defect due rather to the system under exposition than to the expositor himself.——The La Salle Extension University of Chicago has sent out Hugo Münsterberg's "Business Psychology" ($2.00) in a form that leaves nothing to be desired in binding, paper and print. The book, which is intended as a text book, is extremely interesting, and though there are portions of it that cannot be recommended for orthodoxy, yet there are other portions that will prove of great value to employers and employees in search of direction in their daily tasks.

In his "Life of George Washington, Father of Modern Democracy" (Longmans, $1.00) the Very Rev. James O'Boyle, V.F. shows himself an enthusiastic admirer of the person, character and achievements of George Washington. He has read extensively about the American Colonies, the Revolution and our Government. Perhaps he tends toward the ideal in sketching the early days of his hero. He does not pretend to have made any original investigations about his subject, but follows the standard authorities. Washington has been credited with the authorship of the "Rules for Civilities," which have come down to us in his handwriting. But it is known that many of them were in use long before his time, in Jesuit colleges in France and that they found their way to Fredericksburg, Va., by way of England. The lesson of Washington's devotion to the cause of democracy will always be inspiring and it is peculiarly valuable to Ireland at the present time.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Richard G. Badger, Boston:
Religious Education, and For the Healing of the Church. By W. A. Lambert. $0.75.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
Interpretations of Literature. By Lafcadio Hearn. 2 Vols. $6.00: Modern Austria: Her Racial and Social Problems. By Virginia Gayda. $3.00; Court-Life from Within. By H. R. H. The Infanta Eulalia of Spain. Illustrated. $2.50.

George H. Doran Co., New York:
Over There. War Scenes on the Western Front. By Arnold Bennett. $1.25; Theism and Humanism. By the Rt. Hon. Arthur James Balfour, P.C., F.R.S., D.L., M.P. $1.75; These Twain. By Arnold Bennett. $1.50; Through Terror to Triumph—Speeches and Pronouncements of the Rt. Hon. David Lloyd George, M.P., Since the Beginning of the War. Arranged by F. L. Stevenson, B.A. (Lond.) $1.00; Vagrant Memories, Being Further Recollections of Other Days. By William Winter. $3.00.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City, N. Y.:
France at War on the Frontier of Civilization. By Rudyard Kipling. $0.50; The Children's Book of Thanksgiving Stories. Edited by Asa Don Dickinson. $1.25; Kipling's India. By Arley Munson. $1.50.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
Back to Shakespeare. By Herbert Morse. $2.00; Fate and Free-Will. By Ardaser Sorabjee N. Wadia, M.A.; The Story of the Bible. By Eugene Stock. $0.75; Katrinka, the Story of a Russian Child. By Helen Eggleston Haskell. $1.25; Attila and the Huns. By Edward Hutton. $2.00.

Harper & Bros., New York:
Plashers Mead. By Compton Mackenzie. $1.35.

Henry Holt & Co., New York:
The Bent Twig. By Dorothy Canfield. $1.35.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
More Jonathan Papers. By Elisabeth Woodbridge. $1.25; America at Work. By Joseph Husband. $1.00; Scally, the Story of a Perfect Gentleman. By Ian Hay. $0.75; A History of Medieval and Modern Europe. By William Stearns Davis, Assisted by Norman Shay McKendrick. $1.50; The Baby's First Two Years. By Richard M. Smith, M.D. $0.75; The Book of Musical Knowledge; the History, Technique, and Appreciation of Music, Together with Lives of the Great Composers. By Arthur Elson. $3.50.

P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York:
Thoughts of the Servant of God, Thérèse of the Child Jesus. Translated from the French "Pensées," by an Irish Carmelite. $0.60.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
The Inquisition, a Critical and Historical Study of the Coercive Power of the Church. By E. Vacandard. New Edition. $0.50; The Church of Christ, Its Foundation and Constitution. By Father Peter Finlay, S.J. $1.00.

The Macmillan Co., New York:
The Road to Dublin, the Adventures of Seumas Beg. By James Stephens. $1.00; The Ways of Woman. By Ida M. Tarbell. $1.00.

The Page Co., Boston:
The Spell of Belgium. By Isabel Anderson. $2.50; Pollyanna Calendar; the Glad Book. Compiled by Eleanor H. Porter. $1.50.

Chas. Scribner's Sons, New York:
The Heart of Europe. By Ralph Adams Cram, Litt.D., LL.D. $2.50; Fountains of Papal Rome. By Mrs. Charles MacVeagh. $2.50.

Pierre Téqui, Paris:
L'Apostolat de la Jeunesse pendant l'Année de la Guerre. Abbé L. J. Bretonneau. 2 fr.; La Sainte Eucharistie. R. P. Ed. Hugon, O.P. 3 fr., 50c.

EDUCATION

We Practise What You Preach

THE eminent professor of psychology sat meditatively gazing into his grate, warming his soul at the brisk fire. The attitude was conventional and the exterior person of the professor was conventional; but aside from that there was little conventionality in the man. On the table near at hand lay the manuscript of the lecture he was to deliver to his class on the morrow, and now he sat conjuring up the faces of the two hundred young men who would drink in his revolutionary doctrine with something akin to excitement. All the afternoon he had labored at that lecture; blow after blow of his trip-hammer logic he had aimed at the obsolete doctrine of free will, and now the lecture lay there a miniature bomb ready for the terrific explosion.

THE THEORY

Beginning with the self-evident proposition that man is a mere physico-chemical machine without more soul than a billiard ball, he had traced the compelling power of heredity and environment upon the actions of that machine. "There is no such thing as sin," so ran his triumphant conclusion; "crime is but a psychical disease. Man is no more responsible for his crimes than he is for his weak tonsils, his falling hair or his tendency to insanity. With the delusion of free will, primitive man tickled his vanity. Science knows that it is as false as his creed in a happy hunting ground. Man is not free, but a slave."

The flame in the grate flickered, died down, then leaped into new life. There was an uproarious shout in the street such as only college boys can or dare utter. A moment's pause and then was heard a sharp rap at his door.

"Come in!" said the professor, who prided himself on his personal interest in his students. The door was flung open upon a youth whose clothes were a taunt to dignified reserve. He stood for a moment abashed in the sacred shrine of learning, and then impulsively offered the professor his hand.

"I've just dropped in," he said, "to congratulate you on your afternoon lecture on free will. It was the most important event in my life."

For a moment the professor was puzzled. He glanced at his desk calendar. To be sure, he had delivered that revolutionary lecture this very afternoon. Why had he fancied it was to be tomorrow?

"Sit down, my boy," he said, and his glowing countenance cast the flickering fire into complete shadow. "Delighted! Glad you liked it. It's a satisfaction to know that the undergraduate appreciates the fruits of years of mature study. Here, sit in this comfortable chair."

"Thanks," said the youth, "but I can't. The fellows are waiting for me. We're off for a night of it—down there."

The youth pointed through the window out into the night. Instinctively the professor turned to follow the line of his finger to where a blaze of white light glowed against the dull sky of a winter evening. It was a mysterious light, compounded of arc lamps and incandescent bulbs, of flashing diamonds and shimmering shoulders, of candles burning at both ends and the scorched wings of moths.

THE APPRECIATION

"I've never been there before," said the youth; "I've sort of clung to the creed of my youth which made me pray to be delivered from temptation. I felt a responsibility for my future, and I didn't want to take risks. But thanks to your lecture, I know that all this talk of responsibility is poppycock; and so I'm off with the crowd. The fellows say that down there it's glorious until midnight, and it's glorious to the fifth power. Why didn't you give that lecture months ago? I've been a fool in missing the fun."

"My boy," said the professor, wiping away the sudden dampness that chilled his brow, "sit down a moment. You see—er—that is, you mustn't take my words too literally. I——"

"Look here," said the youth almost fiercely, "you're not backing down on what you said this afternoon, are you?"

"Oh, no, no!" cried the professor, snatching wildly at the house that he saw falling suddenly about his ears. "Not that, but——"

"Well, that's all. Good night! I'd feel like the deuce hitting the pace if I really were responsible for it. But you said yourself a chap can't fight down his wild, hereditary impulses; he can't resist the chemical and physical forces that draw him on in spite of himself. I'd fancied I had succeeding in breaking the devil in me; but I know now that I was no more free in doing good than I shall be in tripping the primrose path. And the second's a lot easier. Thank you and good night!"

"My boy," the professor's voice was pitched high, "won't you stay with me instead. I'll explain further just what I mean. You don't quite grasp——"

The young man hesitated just a moment. There was a warning shout from the street below.

"No," he answered, "thanks just the same. I've given the crowd my word I'd go. I've fought them off for a long time with my conscientious scruples. When they invited me for a night of it, I told them honestly I had to take care of my soul. But after the lecture I didn't dare say that; and when they joked me about flattering myself that I was free to care for what does not really exist, you had left me no answer. So I pledged my word.

RESULTS

"You're lucky, Professor; you're not free to be bad if you wanted to. Here with the fascination of your books and studies, hedged in by strong public opinion, with your chemical forces as quiet as a crystalline compound after evaporation, everything forces you to be respectable. But study doesn't attract me, and life and light and laughter and love, and the whole alliterative group, do. There is no public opinion for me except that all college men have a certain acreage to be sown plentifully with wild oats, while the chemical forces of my nature are boiling and effervescing like Dante's sulphuric baths.

"And now I can take the whole group of "L's" to my heart, scatter wild oats till the seed sack is empty, and let the chemical forces of my nature bubble up and boil over; for I'm no more responsible than the Frankenstein was for the ruin in its wake. When I believed in free will I was a slave; with the knowledge of slave will, I am free."

As another shout from below reached the lad, he turned to go. "I'm off," he said, almost sadly, "I'd rather hate to have mother and the girls hear of this; but even if I smash their hearts I'm not responsible for that either; so I've got to take the risk. If I sleep in class tomorrow, Professor, I'll not be to blame for that either."

The door slammed and the professor rushed wildly to the window. Below a crowd of boisterous youths were welcoming the recruit with enthusiasm. Into the throbbing cars they tumbled, and away they went into the darkness that lay between the college and that seductive strip of light, with horns shrieking and the gleam of their lamps piercing a rent in the shadow of the night.

Trembling, panic stricken, at the sense of his own responsibility, the professor stood with his eyes following that flying car. It was he who had stripped the youth of the one thing that had held him back from moral ruin. His hands had flung down the bars to these turbulent passions. The sins of the youth were on his doddering old head. What though his theories were right, that free will was a foolish dream, had it not been better a thousand times that he had never spoken? Oh, to be able to bind in once more the wild passions he had loosened, he would give——

SCIENCE TRIUMPHS

The flame in the grate flickered and died down and then leaped into new life. The professor half sprang from his chair. On the table lay his lecture with the ink fresh upon it. The desk calendar registered the day previous to the day set for its delivery. With a quick movement he seized the manuscript and thrust it toward the flame. He paused; smoothed the crumpled page gently, his eyes turning slowly toward that light still glowing against the wintry sky. He read the opening sentence thoughtfully, and then carefully laid the paper back on the table.

"Let science prevail," he murmured, "though the heavens fall."

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

Woman's Right

I SAW a picture the other day in the window of a department-store. Its gorgeous frame was an offense to the eye, the coloring was garish. Only its theme, hackneyed as the sunrise or spring violets, redeemed it. For it represented a mother with two little children at her knee, and the legend was written below, "Now I lay me down to sleep."

There is a beauty in this picture that many will not find in the choicest treasures at the Metropolitan, and so much purity and sweetness that one stands before it as in the presence of a holy thing, with head uncovered. And it is sacred. God who saw in motherhood a type of His own great love for the world, has consecrated it and has enjoined upon mothers duties that are only less than sacerdotal. In the heart of woman He has placed the world's great miracle, mother-love, and into her hands He has given the souls of these little ones to be loved and cherished and trained, and in the end returned to Him from whom they came.

REVERENCE FOR WOMAN

We go afar into the dreary fields of lost souls and broken bodies to study the causes of human wreckage; we build up a great mass of theory to explain why men have thrown themselves away; we elaborate measures of prevention or reconstruction; and in the end we wonder what all this endless speculation is worth. In the wonderment is recognition, unacknowledged perhaps, that the cradle of all morality and civilization is the home made possible by the love and sacrifice of a mother. So long as the world has mothers who are mothers, and women who like Una, walk innocent and unafraid, our civilization is secure. But when man's reverence for woman dies, or woman's reverence for herself, when motherhood is regarded as a burden or a social crime, and to keep one's soul unspotted is thought the mark of imbecility, then the world has fallen into the ways of perversion that lead quickly and inevitably to the downfall of society.

A LOST VIRTUE

There was a time in the history of the world when all flesh had worked corruption, and it repented God that He had made man. Are we striving to reproduce that fatal period in the twentieth century? To keep society from becoming wholly vile, a latent respect for womanhood seems often to survive in hearts utterly unworthy, like embers under ashes. But how long can this feeble glow be sustained after man's lack of reverence for woman, and worse, woman's lack of reverence for herself, has become a public menace?

Consider the public's amusements, the stage and the opera; scan the pages of the books that sell, and the magazines which boast a million subscribers and six million monthly readers, and their common theme, the dishonor of woman, is readily discernible. Were a dweller in Mars to visit the most crowded theaters what conclusion could be drawn other than that in America woman is but a toy for moments of ignoble ease, a shirker of most sacred duties, a rebel against the restraints of common decency, a wrecker of homes, a mere animal, and a thing of public shame? "This is an exhibition," wrote the dramatic critic of a New York newspaper, "in which the word 'woman' is never mentioned without a sneer, a grimace, a wink or a leer." The millions who during the year return like the sow and the dog of Scripture to contemplate the "artistic triumphs" of this stage, soon lose what lingering reverence they may have cherished, not perhaps, for their mothers and sisters, but for the integrity of womanly virtue, the preservation of which is of the supremest importance for right order and right living.

MODERN LIBERTY

Against this attack on womanhood, sometimes open, sometimes insidious, sometimes made with an artistic pretense but oftener frankly indecent, none but weak and beggarly legal measures may be taken. The drunkard who throws a brick through the window of the theatrical promoter's automobile is properly jailed; the promoter himself, battening on the degradation of womanhood, will proceed unhindered by the fragments and splinters to a meeting of the Civic League, where he will discourse oilily on the ethical (and commercial) value of the drama. For we are wedded to our idols; personal liberty is our chiefest deity; the worship of Astarte in public places we hold to be a matter purely personal, of no concern to the guardians of the public weal. We trade in lubricity and call it life; we muddy the very sources of human existence and proclaim it an emancipation from the slavery of medieval marriage laws; and the very finest flower of individual liberty is freedom to think as we please, to publish what we please, and to act as we please, within the limit of lax laws indulgently interpreted. Let others care for themselves; they are of age. Meanwhile learned societies with sprats for members who talk like whales, discuss with pompous futility the prevalence of the social evil.

FALSE LEADERS

Nor can woman evade her share of the responsibility for the low plane which she is now taking in public estimation. The greater social and political movements in which she has engaged most assuredly have not increased, nor have been calculated to increase, woman's truest right, which is to be held in reverence. By self-appointed leaders much has been written and spoken on the rights of woman; very little if anything on the duties of woman, for we do not accept their grotesque and wholly unwarranted notion of what duty is. In public conventions they have prated loudly and with an abysmal ignorance of the facts of human nature, of the tremendous reforms to be wrought through the ballot and by woman's participation in the functions of government, in every phase of social, mercantile and political life. They have cuddled the factory child, they have sobbed with the downtrodden shopgirl, they have wept mightily over the harried outcast; and proposing to abolish these acknowledged enormities by votes, they rested their case.

DESTROYERS

But we do not recall a single convocation in which the advocates of Feminism either dared one word against pagan education, indecent fashions in dress, a degraded stage, race-suicide or divorce; or showed that in these vile outcroppings they recognized the least degree of danger to the State; or urged woman's peculiar fitness and duty to fight against them. On the contrary, the world has come to associate the new woman with a new and hideous code of immorality. But a few days ago, one representative of this new dispensation, announced that it was the duty of all married women to make homes impossible until such time as women were granted the vote; nor is this an isolated instance, as the pages of the metropolitan press during the last year will bear witness. When woman has reached the pass in which she has no reverence for herself and is willing to proclaim her shamelessness in the public press, we must hold up as types of womanly excellence, not our mothers, but the degraded denizens of the African West Coast.

BUILDERS

It is well for the world that so many in it "show us," in Wordsworth's fine phrase, "how divine a thing woman may be made." One thinks at once of the Sisterhoods, those guardian angels of our schools, our hospitals, our countless refuges for the friendless, for the sore and wounded in soul and body; of our wonderful Catholic mothers; of our young Catholic women who either in the home or beyond its walls, prove the salutary influence of religion in their daily lives. And there are thousands of households outside the Fold, where the noblest ideals of true womanhood are held in reverence, homes where nightly some good woman after the work of the day, bows her tired head to listen to the simple prayer that rises from the heart of a child to the Heart of Christ. Homes such as these, and only these, can keep the current of our social life clear and untainted. Without them children are lost, save by a moral miracle, to all good influences, even to that of the Church itself, and the wisest schemes for social regeneration are as the mere crackling of thorns under the pot.

REVERENCE OR DESECRATION

The only body which today as always, dares boldly rebuke the invader of the home and the desecrater of woman is the Catholic Church. May God grant that through her hallowing influence, all who believe that woman must be held "a thing ensky'd and sainted" if she is not to be regarded as something lighter than a dicer's oath, may find and spread an increase in this needed spirit of reverence for woman. Not votes for women but reverence for woman from all men, and more reverence for woman from herself, is the great want in this evil day. "Earth's noblest thing," writes Lowell, "is a woman perfected." She reaches that perfection not by arrogating functions which neither God nor society has assigned her, but by giving herself, with the full devotion of mind and soul and body, to the great work which God has put into her hand.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A collection of paintings by Father Gonzalo Carrasco, S.J., is now on exhibition at the Loyola School, 65 East Eighty-third Street, New York City. "There is a richness of color in Father Carrasco's work," writes a critic, "striking yet subdued, carrying with it a thought of glaring sun-lit squares without, and cool shaded porticoes within; a gentleness, a purity and an indescribable something that may best be defined as national temperament. Father Carrasco has strongly impressed upon his work the force of his own personality and the expression of the highest artistic ideals of his native Mexico." The artist, a man of unusual genius, who has spent his whole life in artistic and educational labors, was exiled from Mexico by the direct orders of that eminent patron of the good, the true and the beautiful, Mr. Carranza. The exhibition will remain on view at Loyola School for some weeks.

The recent defeat of a new municipal ownership proposition at the polls in Detroit is of more than passing significance. Detroit had already shown a leaning toward municipal ownership of public utilities in acquiring its own electric lighting plant. The latest proposition placed before the voters related to the municipal ownership of traction lines. The price for these was to be set by the circuit court. The management was not to be entrusted to politicians, but to three "of the biggest and most thoroughly trusted men in Detroit." One of these was James Couzens, who until lately had held no less responsible a position than that of vice-president and general-manager of the Ford Automobile Company. Yet the measure failed to receive public approval. Cleveland, Detroit and Chicago, the three cities which have greatly agitated the traction question, have all contented themselves with assuming public control or regulation of the transportation systems rather than by adopting municipal ownership of them.

In a recent study of wealth and income conditions in the United States, Dr. Willford Isbell King comes to the conclusion that wealth is distributed pretty much the same way in Great Britain, France, Prussia and our own country. "In every instance the richest two per cent of the people own considerably more property than all the rest of the population. In no instance does the poorer sixty-five per cent of the inhabitants control much more than one-twentieth part of the property." Our rich have been steadily growing richer: but it does not follow from this that the poor have become poorer. They too, are gaining in wealth, though not in the same proportion as their wealthier brethren. His general conclusion therefore is that all classes are gradually becoming richer. This can be accepted as sufficiently accurate, though it still leaves the world filled with misery and poverty. The immense fortunes of the few, moreover, and the vulgar display of money continue to arouse the envy of the poorer classes and to furnish fuel for the fire of popular discontent.

The famous Spanish Socialist and freethinker Tomas Santos Garcia was recently reconciled to the Catholic Church. His defection from the Faith of his childhood he attributes to the reading of pernicious literature. Rejecting the authority of the Church he became by degrees one of the foremost Masonic and Socialist leaders of Spain. His case may be considered as typical of almost all who pass from Catholicism into the camp of radical Socialism. Socialists themselves are best aware of this. A press campaign conducted to rob men of their loyalty to the Church and its priesthood is considered the first step towards the perversion of Catholic workingmen. Though the victims of this propaganda frequently see the true inwardness of the movement and the sham for which it stands, yet only too often they have been so tinged with the scarlet dye of class hatred and infidelity that they refuse to return to the truth they foolishly cast aside. It was the splendid Christian example of the President of the St. Vincent de Paul Society at Vigo, and the unselfishness of his practical charity, which won the heart of Señor Garcia and brought him back into the Fold. The argument of personal self-sacrifice used by Ozanam to refute the Saint Simonians has again produced its effect in the case of the modern Socialist and freethinker. "Behold how they love one another" is a test which can find its perfect application only in the Saints of God. Experience had convinced the disillusioned Garcia that ninety-five per cent of the leaders in the radical movements are merely hypocrites, serving their own pockets rather than the cause of humanity, for which they plead in such thrilling tones.

The Report of the Twelfth Annual Meeting of the Catholic Educational Association has come to hand, with its wealth of suggestive ideas and its inspiring appeals for Catholics to aim at ever higher levels of perfection in their educational institutions throughout the country. The Association has become a necessary factor in the development of Catholic activity. It unites our Catholic educators not merely for progress along educational lines, but for a solid defense of Catholic education itself which is still surrounded by dangers on every side. Constant watchfulness alone can preserve our interests in these critical times and prevent the insidious workings of anti-Catholic lobbyists. For this purpose association is necessary, no less than a high standard of individual efficiency in our teaching faculties and the heads of our many Catholic schools. These schools themselves are being better understood and more fully appreciated by the American public as the years advance. In the very opening discourse printed in the extensive Report of the Association Archbishop Ireland refers to this fact:

> Our shrinkage from contact with the secularized school was interpreted as opposition to knowledge itself, as a covert effort on the part of the Church to hold her people in the darkness of servitude. Catholic schools among the most efficient in the land, priests and people eager to uphold and multiply them, unlimited sacrifices that all our children be educated and rise high in scholarship, have made clear that the Church in America is the friend and abettor of education, from the lowest primary schoolroom to the most learned university. He who runs may read: he who still in America prattles of the Catholic Church as the fosterer of mental ignorance is incapable of seeing the sun in the splendor of its noonday ray.

It is to be desired that those interested in Catholic education who did not have the opportunity to attend the convention itself will familiarize themselves with the printed pages of its proceedings. The various papers and their discussions cannot fail of being instructive and inspiring. Non-Catholics too should be interested in learning to know at closer range that system which offers "the only considerable educational work done in this country based on the principle that religion is the foundation of all true education," a system which at the same time represents "the most important educational work carried on under free initiative without the aid of public taxes, or the revenue of large endowments."

"Slaughter in the Streets" is the expression used by the New York Times for the deplorable loss of human lives due to recklessly propelled vehicles:

> Within the city limits in the month of October forty-three persons were killed by automobiles, six by trolley cars and four by wagons. Manhattan shows the greatest increase in automobile accidents of this kind. If as many persons were killed in one month by one contagious disease, such as diphtheria or smallpox, the whole community would be aroused. Within the first nine months of this year 142 persons were killed by automobiles in the city. In the October record twenty-seven of the victims were children under seventeen years.

This slaughter can be stopped or at least lessened. Eighty-seven persons were arrested in New York City on a certain day for reckless driving. The consequence was that there were very few occasions for arrest for the days immediately following. The strict enforcement of the law and due support given to the police would rapidly reduce the evil, now unfortunately on the increase, and prevent, save for some unavoidable accidents, the "slaughter in the streets."

Protestants are calling for ever greater funds to make possible their Bible propaganda. The New York Bible Society distributed throughout New York City itself 300,000 copies of the Scriptures during the past year, besides giving 31,181 volumes to the immigrants landing at Ellis Island, and 15,702 to the seamen on vessels in the harbor of New York. The Bibles thus distributed were printed in forty-seven languages and in raised type for the blind. While the promiscuous distribution alone of the Holy Scripture is far from sufficient and the volumes thus scattered can by themselves produce but little, if any effect, the fact must not be overlooked that Pope Benedict XV has given special encouragement to the Catholic propaganda of judiciously spreading the Holy Scriptures. Attention has already been called in the Catholic press to a Roman letter, dated June 15 of this year, and addressed to Dr. Korum, Bishop of Treves. The Prelate is earnestly commended by the Holy Father for the important apostolate undertaken by him. The official letter of approbation sent to Dr. Korum from Rome says:

> The work in which your Lordship is so zealously engaged, the wide distribution of the Scriptures, has in our days become a mission of greatest charity, because of the fact that the sublime book can be used for the comfort of the war prisoners and the wounded, for which the present edition is destined. Meanwhile the Holy Father expresses words of deepest praise and encouragement to your Lordship and all those that have supported and assisted you in this holy apostolate, granting at the same time as a token of his fatherly benevolence the petitioned Apostolic Benediction.

It is to be noted, however, that it is not the mere distribution of the Bible the Holy Father approves, but the spreading of the Bible accompanied by the proper explanation. The special handy pocket edition here in question, published under the auspices of the Bishop of Treves is a translation prepared by Professor James Ecker and highly praised by the Pope not only for "the excellent language in which it is written," but likewise for "the addition of notes from the Fathers." Without the light of the Church cast upon the open pages of the Sacred Book the reader can but exclaim with the eunuch of Queen Candace in answer to Philip's question: "Thinkest thou that thou understandest what thou readest?" "And how can I, unless some man shew me?" The same Spirit of the Lord who spoke through Philip must speak to the reader of Scripture through the Church and her appointed teachers.

A recent dispatch from London announced the death of the distinguished Franciscan, Father David Fleming. Born in Killarney in 1851, he entered the Franciscan Order in 1869 and was ordained in Ghent in 1875. From that time till his last sickness his career was active and distinguished. Many and arduous duties fell to his lot, and he performed them with singular prudence and success. As professor of philosophy, superior of convents, Definitor-General of the United Franciscan Order, Vicar-General of the Order of Friars Minor, secretary to the Commission on Biblical Studies, Consultor of the Holy Office, he won the admiration and praise of all who were thrown into contact with him.——A second death of the week was that of Dr. Booker T. Washington, which took place at Tuskegee, Alabama, on the morning of November 14. In his early struggles "to make something of himself," to use his own phrase, Dr. Washington presents a rare example of pluck and perseverance. As a small child he toiled in a factory from four in the morning until late at night, but his desire for an education never left him, and the stenciled addresses on the barrels rolled into the factory formed his first primer. To find larger opportunities he walked from his home in a little West Virginia town to Hampton Institute in Virginia, where his first assignment, given by way of a combined entrance and character examination, was to sweep out the class rooms. The degree of Master of Arts was conferred upon him by Harvard in 1896, and in recognition of his work among his people, Dartmouth made him a Doctor of Laws in 1901. In sharp contrast to the visionary and somewhat revolutionary schemes proposed by others of his race, Dr. Washington's well-considered plans for the education of his people met a large measure of success.

Longmans' New Books

THE CHURCH OF CHRIST

Its Foundation and Constitution

By the Rev. PETER FINLAY, S.J.
Crown 8vo.
Pp. XII+264. $1.00 net.

THE INQUISITION

A Critical and Historical Study of the Coercive Power of the Church

By E. VACANDARD. Translated from the second edition by Bertrand L. Conway, C.S.P.

New edition. Crown 8vo.
Pp. XIV+195.
Paper Covers, $0.50 net.

Longmans, Green, & Co.
Fourth Ave. and 30th St., New York

About Fitting Feet

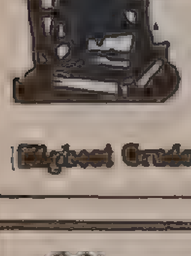
The Coward Shoe
"REG. U. S. PAT. OFF"

A great many foot troubles are caused by ill fitting shoes.

Fitting feet PROPERLY is something of an art. We have been studying that art nearly 50 years, and we believe we can fit feet just a little better than the average shoe store.

We carry the largest range of sizes and shapes in men's, women's and children's shoes in the world.

Sold Nowhere Else



James S. Coward
264-274 Greenwich St., N. Y.
(Near Warren Street)
Mail Orders Filled Send for Catalog

STUDY
Advertising - - Salesmanship and Business Methods
Send for Booklet and full particulars
Morgan's
SELLING SERVICE
7 WATER STREET BOSTON, MASS.

Sacred Heart Sanitarium
For Non-Contagious Medical Cases
St. Mary's Hill
For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

MENEELY BELL CO
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY.
BELLS

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequalled musical quality.
89 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal. Memorials.

Memorial Stained Glass Windows
Designed and Executed by Mayer & Co., of Munich
New York Office -:- 178 Madison Avenue

HIGGINS'
Drawing Inks Eternal Writing Ink
Engrossing Ink Taurine Mucilage
Photo Mounter Paste Liquid Paste
Drawing Board Paste Office Paste
Vegetable Glue, Etc.

Are the Finest and Best Inks and Adhesives

FOR SCHOOL, HOME AND BUSINESS USE

Emancipate yourself from the use of corrosive and ill-smelling inks and adhesives and adopt the Higgins' Inks and Adhesives. They will be a revelation to you, they are so sweet, clean, well put up and withal so efficient.

At Dealers Generally

CHAS. M. HIGGINS & CO., Mfrs.
271 Ninth St., Brooklyn, N. Y.
Branches - Chicago - London

SPEAK A FOREIGN LANGUAGE !!!
You can acquire Italian, Spanish, German, French for professional, social or business purposes, easily and quickly at home, during spare moments, by the LANGUAGE-PHONE METHOD and Rosenthal's Practical Linguistry
You simply listen to the living voice of a native professor pronounce the language, over and over, until you know it. Our records fit all talking machines. This method is used and recommended by leading Catholic Church dignitaries and educators. Write for free "Language Treatise," particulars of trial offer and easy payments.
The Language-Phone Method, 925 Putnam Bldg., 2 W. 45th St., N.Y.

Pipe Organs
should be works of musical art from the design made to suit architectural surroundings and the acoustic requirements of the individual church to the final tuning of the least pipe. Pipe organs
Made by ESTEY
are built by a firm of organ builders who for years have constructed the greatest variety and installed them in churches of all denominations throughout the country, with the universal opinion expressed that they Always Satisfy
Send for our book of styles and the name of the Estey church organ nearest you for reference.
ESTEY ORGAN COMPANY
Brattleboro Vermont

We can supply anything in the line of Kitchen and Bakers' Utensils
Catalogue "M" FREE upon request
French Cooking Ranges and Broilers
Cooking Equipments of Every Description
JAMES Y. WATKINS & SON
16, 18, 20 CATHERINE ST.
NEW YORK, N. Y.

ATLAS OF IRELAND

Coats of Arms of 700 Families. Write for free list and see if you are entitled to

Heraldic Honors

P. Murphy & Son, 279 Church St., N. Y.

FOR 25 CENTS

These three important pamphlets sent to any address

CATHOLIC READER'S GUIDE
Introduction to Catholic Reading

WHAT SHALL I BE?
A Chat with Young People

SHALL I BE A DAILY COMMUNICANT?

ALL THREE FOR 25 CENTS

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street NEW YORK

ADVERTISE HERE

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER"
AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
59 East 83d Street, New York City

ANY 3 FOR $1.00

ALL 6 FOR $1.50

You can't neglect this opportunity to secure a most attractive group of volumes combining pleasure, profit and instruction

SOCIALISM

A volume of ten excellent essays by foremost Catholic writers. All written in a concise and popular style.
280 Pages Price 50 cents

LORETTO

Annals of the pioneer Congregation of American Sisters of Charity.
A Book of Historical Interest.
By ANNA C. MINOGUE
300 Pages 21 Illustrations
Price 50 cents

THE NAMES OF GOD

and Meditative Summaries of the Divine Perfection
By the
Ven. LEONARD LESSIUS, S.J.
Translated by T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.
248 pages, large type, with portrait
Price 50 cents

LIFE AND LETTERS OF
HENRY VAN RENSSELAER
Priest of the Society of Jesus
By EDWARD P. SPILLANE, S.J.
An illustrated volume of 350 pages
Price 75 cents

ISAAC JOGUES
DISCOVERER OF LAKE GEORGE
By T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.
55 Pages 9 Illustrations
Price 25 cents

LIFE OF
Venerable Philippine Duchesne
Founder of the American Mission of the daughters of the Sacred Heart, and one of the intrepid pioneers in the winning of the West to the Faith.
Price 25 cents POSTAGE EXTRA

THE AMERICA PRESS

59 East 83rd Street : : : : : New York

SECOND VOLUME

READY EARLY IN DECEMBER

SECOND VOLUME

PIONEER LAYMEN OF NORTH AMERICA

BY THE

Rev. Thomas J. Campbell, S.J.

Uniform in style with the first volume
300 Pages; 15 portraits, illustrations and maps

This second volume of the series of historical sketches of Catholic pioneer laymen that have been received with such favor by the public, continues the narratives to include the careers of Le Moyne, Perrot, D'Iberville, Frontenac, La Salle, Bienville, La Verendrye, and the famous Dr. John McLoughlin, the Father of Oregon.

"Father Campbell . . . has given to the public in Pioneer Laymen of North America one of the most valuable works of his prolific career."—Catholic Columbian.

"The general treatment is as scholarly as the sketches are fascinating."—Catholic Tribune.

"Father Campbell is to be congratulated for his timely work."—Tidings.

"These studies will go far to give American history a true and proper conception of these old Catholic heroes."—Tablet.

"One of the most picturesque and fascinating periods in American history . . . is the foundation of the first volume."—Sun (New York).

"The stories are told each with the same fulness of detail as in Father Campbell's earlier work."—The Month.

"A book for Americans."—The Monitor.

"From the Catholic viewpoint also, Father Campbell continues to correct the misstatements or misinterpretations of previous writers, largely non-Catholic and frequently prejudiced."—Catholic Historical Review.

Price $1.75 Postage Extra
The Two Volumes for $3.00

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d St., New York, N.Y.

This is an Ameba, one of the Parasites found in Pyorrhea (Riggs Disease) Magnified 2500 Diameters.

Thousands Have Pyorrhea

(Riggs Disease)

and Don't Know It Till Their Teeth Have to be Pulled

Symptoms that may be Pyorrhea: Bleeding gums after brushing; loose teeth; receding, tender, inflamed or sore gums.

PYORRHEA may attack anyone, even children. It develops in your gums without ache, pain or warning.

Sozodont now contains Emetine, that new beneficent discovery, used by the science of dentistry in the treatment of Pyorrhea. Therefore Sozodont not only cleans, whitens, polishes, cools and freshens your teeth as it has done for 64 years, but Sozodont now Fights Pyorrhea.

Start your whole family on Sozodont today. Send 4c for a generous 10-day sample of Sozodont paste, powder or liquid (state which), and feel again that pure, vigorous, "arctic" sensation on your gums and teeth—which only Sozodont can give.

HALL & RUCKEL
216 Washington Street New York

SOZODONT

Paste, Powder or Liquid, 25c.

Each contains Emetine

ALTAR WINES

From the Jesuit Fathers' Novitiate Vineyards at LOS GATOS, CAL.

"MALVOISIE"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.

"VILLA JOSEPH,"
$1.10 per Gal. $4.00 per Doz.

"NOVITIATE,"
$1.50 per Gal. $5.00 per Doz.

Depot and Sole Agency
BARNSTON TEA CO.
6 Barclay Street New York

5% First Mortgage Notes

Catholic Church Property in Chicago

executed and signed by the Catholic Bishop of Chicago, by Very Reverend M. J. FitzSimmons, Administrator

These Notes are a direct obligation of the Catholic Bishop of Chicago, a Corporation Sole, created by a special act of the Legislature of Illinois, and legal title to all the property covered by these Mortgage Notes is vested in this Corporation. These Notes are secured by First Mortgage on certain and specified pieces of property. They are further secured by all the church property of the Archdiocese of Chicago. Principal and interest are absolutely secured and the Notes will be converted into cash at their face value by us at any time you may wish to realize upon them. A safe, sound, and convertible investment.

In Denominations of $500 and $1000

Maturing in one to ten years

Maturing interest coupons and principal Notes may be deposited in your own bank for collection or forwarded direct to us. Just as secure—just as safe and in every essential detail just as desirable as placing your money in the best-managed savings bank in the United States.

The Security Increases Each Year

The value of the Catholic Church property in the Chicago Archdiocese has kept step with the vigorous growth of new parishes. The real estate covered by these Notes is located in some of the choicest sections of the city of Chicago and is increasing in value. Though a certain number of the Notes are payable annually none of the security is to be released until all Notes shall have been paid. In this way the security behind this investment becomes relatively greater each year. Send today for full information, details, etc. We will be pleased to submit a full description of the Notes.

Redeemable at Face Value

These Notes will be redeemed by us at their face value if you wish to convert the Notes into cash. We will charge only a small sum for redeeming them.

Any Banker in Chicago can inform you of the character of these Notes and will also acquaint you with our standing.

We will be pleased to mail you a full description of these Notes. Send today for full information, details, etc.

Ask any Chicago Banker if he considers these Notes a safe and very desirable investment.

Cremin & O'Connor,

105 N. Clark Street Dept. 7403 Chicago, Ill.

To Teachers

Are you looking for a Text-Book of the highest efficiency that will prove an important adjunct in class life?

A rapidly increasing number of our Colleges and Schools, all over the country, are using AMERICA as supplementary reading in connection with their various courses.

Some Colleges use from Twenty-five to One Hundred Each Week

Its carefully-written pages and well-developed thought, the breadth of its articles, the timeliness of its editorials, and the clear-cut division of the Review, render it a valuable asset in forming the pupils' minds upon the great questions of the day. To the Professor of Ethics, Oratory, Political Economy, Sociology, Pedagogy, Literature, Composition, History, Apologetics and kindred branches it affords an excellent store of illustration.

Let us hear from you to-day so that no further issue of the National Catholic Weekly Review may be lost to your class. Begin immediately so that besides instructing them through the pages of AMERICA you may introduce them to the most universally quoted Catholic paper in the English Language and have the reflex benefits of its use in the School felt in the Home.

A Special Educational Rate

Applicable only to Catholic Teachers and Catholic Students in Catholic Schools

WRITE FOR DETAILS. CIRCULATION BUREAU

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d St., NEW YORK

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.

RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine

137 READE ST., NEW YORK
BETWEEN GREENWICH AND HUDSON STREETS.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

5 Cents Each
40 Cents a Dozen

Published at a nominal price, on the eighth and twenty-second of the month, the CATHOLIC MIND pamphlets supply to the militant Catholic the most effective weapons with which to meet the threatening issues of the day. There are several important articles on some current question in each number. In handy form these tracts for the times can be kept for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

5 Cents Each
40 Cents a Dozen

The Church and Peace
What Women Can Do
Homicide Excusable and Felonious
Cheap and Precious

What the Church and especially the present Pope have done to promote peace among the nations is shown in Archbishop Hanna's splendid address before the International Peace Congress at San Francisco, which is printed in the CATHOLIC MIND for November 8. What women can do to correct three great evils of the day is outlined, in the same number, in a most illuminating and convincing manner by Daniel A. Lord, S.J.; and two other timely and practical topics, "Homicide Excusable and Felonious" and Neo-Malthusianism are attractively discussed by Father Fisher and Father Blakely.

Since June, 1914, 200,000 Copies of the CATHOLIC MIND have been circulated. We want you to help us to double that number before another year passes.

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

13. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
19. Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. — Wilfrid Ward

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. — H. V. Gill, S.J.
2. Primary Education in France.

1910

4, 5, 6, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, V. — Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Halley's Comet. I, II, III.
17. Holy Communion for Children
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. — T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. — Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. — His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. — Henry J. Swift, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. — John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific. II, III. — Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M. Bishop of Christ Church
17. The People's Pope. — M. Kenny, S.J.
24. Father Algué's Barocyclonometer. — New York Tribune, Dec. 1912

1913

5. Capital Punishment. — Rev. John J. Ford, S.J.

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. — Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. — M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. — R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. — John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. — A. de F.
24. First Encyclical of Benedict XV.

1915

1. The Catholic Press. — E. Hull, S.J.
2. The "Menace" and the Mails. — Paul Bakewell
3. The Ethics of War. — Edward Masterson, S.J.
4. Sixty Historical "Don'ts." — James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.
5. The Jesuit Myth. — Robert Swickerath, S.J.
6. Fifty "Don'ts" of Science. — James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.
   Catholics in the Y. M. C. A. — Nelson Hume
7. Catholic Sociology. — Richard H. Tierney, S.J.
   Newman's Alleged "Scurrility" — Paul Bakewell
8. Was Shakespeare a Catholic? — James J. Walsh, M. D., Ph.D.
9. The Church and the Mexican Revolution. — By a Mexican Lawyer
10. Dante's 650th Birthday. — James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D., Litt.D.
    How to Reach the Medieval Mind. — Vincent McNabb, O.P.
11. Magna Charta's Centenary. — P. Guilday, Ph. D.
12. The Church and the Sex Problem. — Richard H. Tierney, S.J.
13. The War's Lesson. — Rt. Rev. Thomas O'Dwyer, D.D.
14. Catholic Schools for Catholic Youth. — Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
15. Temperance Against Prohibition. — Henry Maurice
16. The Papacy. — His Eminence Cardinal Mercier
17. The Church and the Immigrant. — Rt. Rev. Francis C. Kelley, D.D.
18. The Contemporary Drama. — James J. Daly, S.J.
19. The Catholic School. — William D. Guthrie
20. The Educative Influence of the Catholic Press. — Richard H. Tierney, S.J.

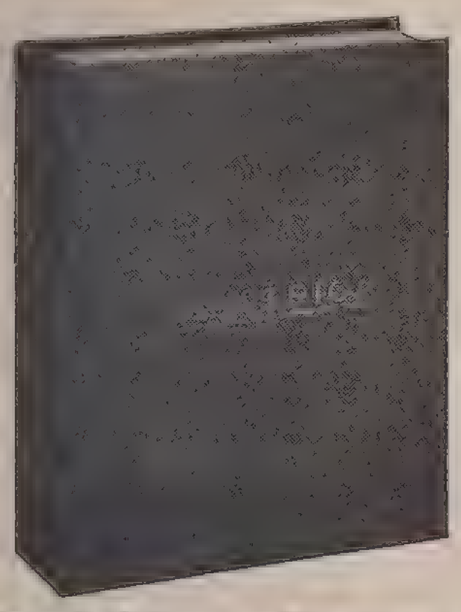
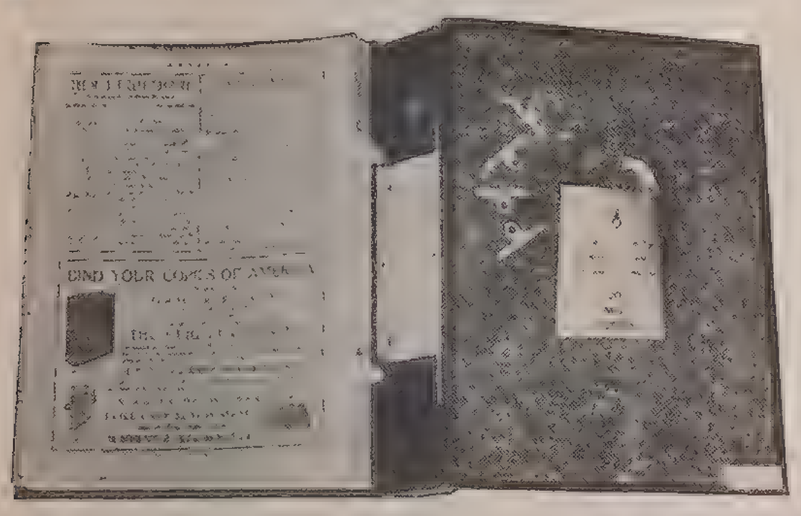
Special Rates: Pamphlets for 1908-1911, inclusive, $1.00 per hundred; for 1912-14, inclusive, $2.00 per hundred; for 1915, $3.00 per hundred.



THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name.....Street.....



City.....State.....

A Valuable Addition To Your Library

Bind Your Copies of AMERICA

A Catholic Review of the Week
In Book Form
For Future Reference

"As Easy as Filing Papers"

The "Big Ben" Binder

is handsome and durable—opens flat to any page. No trouble to insert copies—only two pen knife slits in the back of AMERICA—drop the tiepins over the binding rods—one motion locks it.

It is the Ideal Binder

Made up in Red Art Cloth, with AMERICA stamped in real gold on the back and cover.

Send in Your Order Today
Only $1.00 Postpaid

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83rd Street, New York, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one "Big Ben" Binder.

Name .....
Street .....
City .....
State .....

A SHOPPING GUIDE TO ABRAHAM & STRAUS

This store has a department organized for the purpose of supplying the convent, academy, orphan asylum or school, hospital, etc., with serges, merinos, draps d'été, linens, etc., and clothing worn by children. The contract department, as it is called, also advises and estimates on carpets, furniture, shades, etc. A representative familiar with the requirements of religious communities will call, as soon as request is sent to Contract Department.

ABRAHAM AND STRAUS

420 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, New York

Sarony

PHOTOGRAPHER
for 49 years patronized by the Clergy, who receive a special discount.
364 Fifth Ave. (Near 34th St.)
NEW YORK

What Shall I Be?

A CHAT WITH YOUNG PEOPLE

By the
Rev. Francis Cassilly, S.J.

A handy manual that presents in brief and simple form sound principles to assist the young in deciding their future course of Life. The choice of vocations is a pressing subject at this season of the year.

Cloth, 30 cents	Paper, 10 cents
12 copies, $2.70	12 copies, $1.00
50 copies, $10.00	50 copies, $4.00
100 copies, $22.50	100 copies, $7.50

Postage extra

The America Press

59 East 83d Street
New York

Schools and Colleges

NEWMAN SCHOOL

HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory
BOARDING SCHOOL
FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

VERY REV. S. W. FAY, S.T.D.
Rector.

Georgetown University

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E. St., N. W

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

Carlton Academy

UPPER SCHOOL for older boys gives thorough preparation for all colleges. Individual attention. Commercial Courses. Athletic Sports. Resident Chaplain.

LOWER SCHOOL for younger boys, with Housemother to give personal care.

SUMMIT New Jersey — Charles H. Schultz. A.M., Headmaster.

Send your boy to
MT. WASHINGTON SEMINARY
Mt. Washington, Maryland
COUNTRY SCHOOL FOR BOYS
6 TO 13 YEARS
For catalogue apply to DIRECTRESS

FOUR SPLENDID VOLUMES

Dealing with American History

For $6.00 Postage Extra

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold

Pioneer Laymen of North America

Telling the fascinating story of the adventurous Cartier, Menendez, Champlain, De La Tour, Maisonneuve, Le Moyne and Radisson.

One of the most picturesque and fascinating periods in American history, that of the exploits of the French in Canada is the foundation of the first volume "Pioneer Laymen of North America."—New York Sun.

Father Campbell has done a noted service to history and to the Church.—The Monitor.

The volume abounds in variety. — Tablet (Brooklyn).

Father Campbell has given to the public one of the most valuable books of his prolific career.—Catholic Columbian.

It is both historic and romantic.—Catholic Universe.

Father Campbell is to be congratulated for his timely work.—Tidings.

300 Pages. 16 Illustrations. Price $1.75. Postage extra.

Among the Iroquois

Volume I

An Interesting Story of the Missionaries among the Iroquois.

Father Campbell's book is one of permanent interest and value.—Evening Post (New York.)

Interesting to Protestants and Catholics alike for its historical value.—Star (Atlanta.)

333 Pages. 27 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

Among the Hurons

Volume II

Tells the Heroic Story of De Brebeuf and His Associates.

It is a story of which the Church and the Order may well feel proud.—Sun (New York.)

480 Pages. 24 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

Among the Algonquins

Volume III

The Ethnic Group that figured more extensively in Our History than any other Indian Family.

The noble history of those old French priests is excellently told by their modern confrère, and it is a history with which every intelligent American Catholic should become familiar.—Catholic Historical Review.

336 Pages. 22 Illustrations. Price $1.50. Postage extra.

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83d Street
New York

Schools and Colleges

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, and the University of Kentucky
Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers

LARGEST CATHOLIC COLLEGE IN AMERICA

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue . . . . . Prefect of Studies.

St. Joseph's College and Academy

EMMITSBURG, MARYLAND

Courses College, Commercial, Academic, Preparatory

Course in Pedagogy open to Senior and Junior College Students

Exceptional advantages in Music, Art, Domestic Science

Founded 1809. . . FREE CATALOGUE

ACADEMY OF OUR LADY

Ninety-fifth and Throop Streets
Longwood, CHICAGO, ILL.

A pure and lofty conception of life, high sense of duty, a noble type of Christian womanhood, refinement, and thorough scholarship, music and artistic culture, physical vigor and health, are the standards set for

YOUR DAUGHTER
AT THE
ACADEMY OF OUR LADY

Full range of Scientific, Classical, Literary and Historical Studies.

Catalogue sent on application.

Mt. St. Joseph's College

IRVINGTON, BALTIMORE, MD.

Courses in Classics, Sciences and Commerce, under able professors. Special facilities for Pre-Medical Students. Certificates Recognized.

Splendid health location. Spacious buildings. Extensive campus. Gymnasium. Outdoor swimming pool. Physical as well as mental training.

For Catalogue and particulars, address:

BROTHER DIRECTOR

THE FRANK MEANY CO. PRINTERS Inc.

Magazines Catalogues
Periodicals Booklets
Programmes

816-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson, 40 minutes from New York City.

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

IMMACULATA SEMINARY

MOUNT MARIAN, WASHINGTON, D. C.

High-class school for young women and girls. Situated in the Suburbs.

Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Abundant out-door exercise in beautiful suburban grounds; individual attention to character training; happy home life; thorough scholarship.

SPECIAL TWO-YEAR COURSE of COLLEGE work for high school graduates.

FULL PREPARATORY and ELECTIVE courses.

MUSIC, ART, EXPRESSION and domestic science.

All the advantages of the National Capital and sightseeing, with experienced chaperones.

For Illustrated Year Book Address

SISTER SECRETARY, DEP'T. F.

MT. ST. AGNES HIGH SCHOOL

Mt. Washington, Maryland

Day and Resident Students

High School Course of Four Years

Grammar and Primary Departments

Music, Art and Domestic Science

For Information Apply to the Directress.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in Separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

ST. FRANCIS XAVIER

COLLEGE and ACADEMY

Sisters of Mercy

4928 XAVIER PARK, CHICAGO, ILL.

The first Catholic College for women in Chicago—chartered 1912. Freshman class only in September, 1915.

Write for Prospectus

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

Seton Hill Schools

St. Joseph Academy for Girls

GREENSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA

On main line P. R. R., 30 miles from Pittsburgh
Elementary and High School Courses. University affiliation.
Two years' advanced Course for High School Graduates.
Conservatories of Music and Art.
Domestic Science. Gymnasium. Field Sports.
Address Department E

St. Mary's Annex for Small Boys

A CATHOLIC INSTITUTION FOR THE HIGHER EDUCATION OF WOMEN

College of Mount Saint Vincent On Hudson

CITY OF NEW YORK

DAY PUPILS AND BOARDERS

Location Unsurpassed for Convenience, Healthfulness and Beauty
One-half Hour from Grand Central Station

PROFESSORS OF DISTINCTION . . . . . EQUIPMENT OF THE BEST

COLLEGE—Four years' course leading to the Degrees of B. A. and B. S.

COURSE IN PEDAGOGY open for Junior and Senior Students

WRITE FOR PROSPECTUS

PREPARATORY DEPARTMENT

ACADEMY MOUNT SAINT VINCENT ON HUDSON

CITY OF NEW YORK

Mount de Sales

Academy of the Visitation

CATONSVILLE (NEAR BALTIMORE) MARYLAND

Ideal School for Young Ladies

Classic, Literary and Scientific Courses. French and German receive special attention. Departments of Music, Art and Elocution. Magnificent situation.

Ask for Illustrated Catalogue

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts, Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn.

SAINT MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

For Women . . . College and Academy . . . . For Girls

Affiliated to the Catholic University

Departments of Arts and Sciences—Four-Year Course leading to degrees A.B. and B.S.
Department of Household Economics—Courses leading to the degree B.S. Elective courses offered to all college students.
Conservatory of Music—Teachers' and Artists' Certificate Courses.
School of Expression—Teachers' Certificate Courses. Various elective courses open to all students.
School of Art—Drawing, water color, oil, keramics. Certificates issued.
Academy—Full Four-Year High School Course and Grammar Department.
75th Year. A School of Four Generations.
Students from twenty-five States. Twelve modern buildings. New College Hall, Gymnasium, Natatorium, etc. Abundant out-door exercise. 40-acre golf course. Bulletins and illustrated booklets will be sent upon request.

Address Sister Secretary, Box 70, SAINT MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

These Altar Appointments of Solid Polished Brass were made by The Gorham Company for the Paulist Novitiate, of Washington, D. C. The Gorham Company, Fifth Avenue and Thirty-Sixth Street. Makers of Church Furnishings in Gold, Silver and Bronze, of Artistic and Ecclesiastical Excellence.

The "BETSIE ROSS" Ironing Board Padded Cover

The "Betsie Ross" Ironing Board Padded Cover is the only common sense cover made—it slips on like a glove—no nails, tacks, lacing or buttons.

It is made the exact tapering shape and size of the board, and when the board is inserted full into the cover and the fastenings are tied at the top and the outer casing in place it produces a most perfect, smooth, even surface.

"Betsie Ross" Ironing Pads are made by the makers of the famous EXCELSIOR MATTRESS PROTECTORS from heavy bleached white muslin, padded with snow white padding—made to fit all sizes of boards from 3 to 6 feet.

Each cover is enclosed in a paper envelope, on which the size is marked.

Excelsior Quilting Co.

15 Laight Street - - - New York
1417 W. Jackson Blvd., Chicago, Ill.

Representatives
WANTED
NOW IS THE TIME

AMERICA
A Catholic Review of the Week
WANTS

Bright, intelligent men or women in cities and towns to handle its constantly increasing circulation.

Agents do not have to go out of their home towns to do a good business, as America is a national publication.

Write for details.

Circulation Bureau

THE AMERICA PRESS
59 East 83rd Street New York, N. Y.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIV, No. 7
WHOLE No. 346

NOVEMBER 27, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War; Bulletin, Nov. 16, p. m.-Nov. 23, a. m.—Central Serbia—Southern Serbia — Greece's Dilemma. Austria-Hungary: Reconstruction. France: War Toll of the Missions. Germany: Polish University Opened. Great Britain: Closer Coordination. India: Saving the Missions. Ireland: The New Recruiting Campaign. Mexico: Granados's Execution; Recent News.....145-148

TOPICS OF INTEREST
The Fate of Defective Babies—The Boys of Our City — A Catholic News Association — Darwin and Dickens—Madeleine the Euchite....149-155

COMMUNICATIONS
The Catholic Press—No Compromise with Heresy—Correspondence Courses in Catechism. 155-157

EDITORIALS
Pope-Baiting Still — Is Speaking the Truth "Heresy"? — The Breakfast Temper — Wisconsin's Esthetic Kine—The Catholic College's Advantages—Krishna or Christ?.....158-160

LITERATURE
XIV–St. Thomas Aquinas.
REVIEWS: The Church of Christ—A Primer of Peace and War—Over There—France at War—Belgium Neutral and Loyal—Through Terror to Triumph—Between the Lines—In the Hands of the Enemy—Historical Records and Studies—The Complete Poetical Works of Robert Browning — The Case of American Drama — A Budget of Paradoxes — The Modern Study of Literature—Sumerian Epic of Paradise.
BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The current Catholic Mind—"Scally, the Story of a Perfect Gentleman"—"Katrinka, the Story of a Russian Child"—"Thoughts of the Servant of God, Sœur Thérèse of the Child Jesus"—The October Dublin Review—"Old Delabole"—"The Bent Twig"—"Conversational French Reader"—"L'Abbé Constantin" "Six Little Ducklings"—The Wishing Fairies"—"Nixie Bunny in Holiday Land"—"The Glad Book" — "Robert Fulton" — "The Evolution of Literature."
BOOKS RECEIVED 160-165

EDUCATION
The Gary Plan: A Popish Plot.....165, 166

SOCIOLOGY
Child Legislation 166, 167

NOTE AND COMMENT
The "Stockholm System"—Catholic Schools for Adult Immigrants — The Portland Case — The American Israelite and The Outlook — An Unconstitutional Anti-Alien Law.....168

CHRONICLE

The War.—In France despite continuous artillery fire, which has been very heavy, especially on the side of the Allies, there have been no developments that have in any way altered the general situation. Between Riga and Dvinsk the advantage has been almost completely on the side of the Russians, who seem to have the situation well in hand and to have effectually blocked the German offensive. At Czartorysk and along the Strypa, the Austrians and Russians are still fighting vigorously, but with no appreciable gain of a permanent character for either side. Italy is still attacking the Austrians at Goritz, but the fall of the city is not yet in sight. The British report some slight advances in Gallipoli. No action has been taken on the recommendation of the new British Commander, Sir Charles Monro, that the campaign in the peninsula be abandoned, nor will any action be taken, according to Lord Lansdowne, until Lord Kitchener has studied the situation.

Bulletin, Nov. 16, p. m.-Nov. 23, a. m.

The subjugation of Serbia is proceeding irresistibly and with increased rapidity. The invading armies have closed in on the central Serbian forces from the north and east. The Austro-Germans have captured Novo Varos, Sjenica, and Novibazar, so that their line now runs in a southeasterly direction from Prijob to a point somewhat to the east of Mitrovica, the present capital. Here the German forces join the Bulgarians who are engaging the Serbians a little to the east of Pristina. Further south the Bulgarians have made progress to the west of Gilan, Kakanic, and Kalkandelen. The semicircle which partially envelops the Serbians is steadily narrowing, and the Serbians, whose numbers have been depleted by large losses through capture, are retiring toward the Montenegrin border, and in one place are reported to be fighting side by side with the Montenegrins in the Montenegrin mountains. The day seems not far distant when they will no longer be able to present a solid front, but must take to guerrilla warfare.

Central Serbia

The condition of the Serbians is still more desperate in southern Serbia, where they have been driven out of Krusevo, the Babuna Pass and Prilep. They are also reported to have evacuated Monastir, but for this report there is no official confirmation. That they will be obliged to retire from Monastir in the near future seems certain, unless it be true, as has been repeatedly asserted, that British troops have reinforced them at this point. In any case they are in serious danger, for the Bulgarians have apparently thrust a wedge between them and the Allies. The Allies, who are holding the line north of the Grecian border, have not made progress at any point, but have succeeded in resisting the increased pressure which the Bulgarians are bringing to bear on them. According to Paris the Allies have so strengthened their positions from Krivolac to Doiran that they cannot be dislodged by the Bulgarians. On the other hand the Bulgarians seem to be moving most of their forces to southern Serbia, and experts are of the opinion that both the Serbians and the Allies, if they are not heavily reinforced, will find it necessary to withdraw from Serbia to Greece.

Southern Serbia

That such a move is viewed as a possibility is indicated by the fact that there are persistent rumors that Greece intends, in the event of this taking place, to disarm and intern the Serbians. It is even hinted that Greece might revoke the privilege of free passage for the Allies through Grecian territory that has been granted up to the present. That some alarm is felt as the attitude that King Constantine may take is clear from the fact that Lord Kitchener, in behalf of Great Britain, and M. Denys Cochin, a French Minister without portfolio, in behalf of France, have gone to Athens to confer with the King. Nothing is known as to the result of these conferences. But the curtailment of privileges granted Greeks in the ports of the Allies and a pacific blockade of all Greek waters are taken to be the preliminaries of more vigorous action, should Greece show any pronounced signs of going over to the Central Powers. The position of Greece is very difficult, and it is hard to see how she can keep from joining one side or the other before long. The King's great desire is to preserve a benevolent neutrality, but it will need skilful diplomacy to get him safely through the present crisis. The Central Powers are said to be resolved to follow the Allies and Serbians should they retreat into Greek territory, unless Greece disarms them. On the other hand the guns of the Allied warships are ready to destroy Greece's fairest cities, if she does disarm them. It is an extremely perplexing dilemma.

Greece's Dilemma

Austria-Hungary.—The great work of reconstruction is rapidly progressing in the sections of Hungary which have suffered enormous material losses as a result of the war. Aristocrats like the Széchenyis are said to be rebuilding entire villages. Corporations, cities, and societies and taking part in the patriotic labor. The reconstructed parishes are not only supplied with churches, schools and popular libraries, but the latest hygenic methods are employed. Deep wells are being bored, channels dug for drainage, and houses are being erected on the most sanitary lines. Count Khuen-Héderváry is at the head of the movement, and the President of the Ministry, Count Tisza, has provided a commission and a commissary officer to direct the work of reconstructing the villages and to apportion the available funds. The renovation of the parishes is carried on by means of the State Aid Fund. The buildings thus erected or restored cannot be sold, rented, leased or mortgaged for ten years. After that date the Aid Fund has first claim for reimbursement. At the sale of the property the sum thus expended will be repaid into the hands of an official appointed for that purpose. In eastern Galicia and Bukowina the work of reconstruction was immediately begun by the troops themselves as soon as the land was cleared of the foe. Often the cultural work of the soldiers was carried on almost directly behind the battle lines, so that they were accomplishing a twofold task, a labor of war and of peace. Thousands of soldiers, army wagons and horses were employed in the fields, assuring the country a rich harvest. The engineer corps, too, was engaged in the building of streets, bridges and railways. The pure water question which had formerly caused such perplexity was solved by the cleaning and building of wells and old sources of epidemic were removed by general hygienic and sanitary labors which have brought great benefits to the inhabitants. Many industrial enterprises to supply the various needs of the army were, moreover, developed on a large scale under military supervision.

Reconstruction

France.—A mission journal referring to the losses sustained by the Catholic missions owing to the war gives some interesting statistics of the number of French religious of different Orders serving under the colors in various capacities. The White Fathers, the Lazarists, the Fathers of the Holy Ghost and the Lyons Mission Seminary have each furnished approximately 200 men. The Paris Mission Seminary has sacrificed even a larger number, sending 200 missionaries, 4 directors, 2 lay-brothers and 103 candidates. On September 19, 1914, only 8 candidates received Holy Orders, and only 3 new missionaries have been sent to mission fields since the war began. During the year 1914 the Seminary lost by death 36 of its apostles. The Franciscans, according to their own organ, have 182 men in the service, of whom 86 are under arms. The missionaries of the Sacred Heart of Jesus and the Marists together have 100 men serving as soldiers. It is impossible, we are told, to obtain figures from any of the other missionary Orders and Congregations, excepting the Society of Jesus, which by July 31, 1915, had 615 members in the country's service, of whom 281 were priests. The Jesuits have suffered by far the greatest losses. The cost for them of the first year of the war has been 47 dead, 18 prisoners, 7 missing, 37 wounded but on the way to recovery, and 22 whose wounds will cripple them for life. The organ of the Lyons Mission Seminary writes that there is great danger that the Seminary itself, the fruit of seventy-five years of labor and sacrifice, will be utterly ruined, since the sources of supply are failing, one after another. "The need is greater and more pressing than we can say."

War Toll of the Missions

Germany.—The official organ of the German Government comments with satisfaction upon the reopening of the Technical High School and the University of Warsaw, as Polish institutions. An ardent desire of the Poles has thus been realized. Particularly impressive were the ceremonies of the opening of the University. They began with a High Mass celebrated by Archbishop Karvosky of Warsaw, and were attended by Bishop Russkiewicz and noted Polish professors. The President of the University, Baron von Brudhinski, welcomed the Governor General von Beseler in the University hall, where the latter expressed the Emperor's wish that the youth of Poland might now "begin a new life of the spirit, freed from the tension of the battle for existence, and aim at the highest ideals of love for their fellow-man." Besides the various secular courses which have already been instituted, preparations are being made to organize a faculty of Catholic theology. The lectures are given in Polish, and the appointment of a number of Austrian and German professors is only temporary, being valid for only one year. Comparing these conditions with the University's former state the Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung writes: "Under the Russian yoke professors of Polish nationality were almost entirely excluded. The lectures were given in Russian. The students were not permitted to use any other language in recreation and were under continual police surveillance in their dwellings."

Polish University Opened

Great Britain.—The new British War Office has been striving to effect a closer coordination between the Allies. It is generally believed that lack of singleness of purpose has been largely responsible for the want of success which has characterized the campaigns in Gallipoli and in Serbia. In striking contrast to this has been the absolute unity of plan and subordination of private interests manifested between Germany and Austria and between the Central Powers and Bulgaria. To remedy this defect and to devise measures by which Greece might be brought into line with the Allies, three of the four members of the British War Office, accompanied by Sir Edward Grey and a number of naval and military experts, met representatives of France at Paris and discussed the present situation. No details of the discussion have been published. Simultaneously, however, with the meeting, commercial restrictions were put upon Greek shipping, which prohibit future loading of Greek ships in the ports of the United Kingdom, and which warn Greek ships not to sail from British waters until further notice. At the same time, seemingly in pursuance of a common policy, the Italian Government is reported to have issued an order empowering the requisition of German and Greek vessels in Italian ports and territorial waters. How great a share Great Britain is taking in the financing of the Allies' share in the war is shown by the figures published by Reginald McKenna, Chancellor of the British Exchequer. According to his statement the loans, either made or promised to other countries since the beginning of the war, amount to $2,374,125,000.

Closer Coordination

India.—In the Bombay Examiner for October 16, Father Hull tells what is being done to supply the places of the German Jesuits the British Government is sending back to Europe from the Bombay-Poona mission. All but the Archbishop of Bombay and half-a-dozen aged priests and brothers were ordered to be ready to leave about November 1. As 95 out of the 124 priests, scholastics and brothers working on the Bombay mission are Germans, Europe, India and America were appealed to for help. The German Province sent five acceptable Jesuits, four Fathers are leaving the Maryland-New York Province for Bombay, and the other Indian missions supplied secular priests and religious of various Orders to the number of twenty in all, so that now with shrewd management Father Hull believes the work of the mission can be maintained to a considerable extent. He writes:

Saving the Missions

> No better advertisement of the brotherly spirit and the principle of self-sacrifice for the general good could be exhibited than this noble list, which actually averts the immediate collapse of the Bombay-Poona Mission. But of course it is to be understood that in almost every case the men lent are men torn away from duties in their own mission which cannot well be foregone, so that each aid to the receiver is a crippling of the resources of the giver. It is a case of distributing our own local burden piecemeal over a large part of India. It is obvious that the supplies are altogether temporary, merely in order to fill in the sudden gaps and to give time for getting permanent substitutes from elsewhere. Still the main point is secured. In consequence of this accumulation of recruits the result is a happy one. It means that at the present no part of the mission enterprise falls to the ground. . . . In the schools it may be necessary to curtail the number of the boarders, orphans or pupils generally. But still it is the indomitable desire of the mission authorities not to give up any part of the work; not to abandon any mission station or close any institution.

The work of the German nuns in India will also be seriously affected, owing to the fact that the Government has interned them in their own convents.

Ireland.—Though 130,000 Irishmen, it is estimated, have been on the firing line, or are on their way thereto, Lord Wimborne, Viceroy of Ireland, is asking 35,000 more to join the army. He wants 10,000 recruits before the end of November and after that a steady flow of 1,100 volunteers a week. But the response to his appeal is far from enthusiastic. Prominent churchmen are of the opinion that Ireland has already shouldered more than her share of the imperial burden. Dr. Foley, the Bishop of Kildare, believes that: "It would not be reasonable to expect as large a proportion of the population of Ireland as from the rest of the United Kingdom. As a matter of fact this town of Carlow, especially the Nationalist portion, has furnished a fairer share in proportion to its population than most of the cities and towns in England and Scotland have done," and Dr. O'Dwyer, the Bishop of Limerick, has sent the press a trenchant letter in which he said:

The New Recruiting Campaign

> They [Irishmen] do not want to be forced into the English army and be sent to fight England's battles in some distant part of the world. They are supposed to be free men, but they are made to feel they are prisoners who may be compelled to lay down their lives for a cause that is not worth three rows of pins to them. This war may be just, or it may be unjust. Any fair-minded man will admit it is England's war and not Ireland's. Yet poor fellows who do not see the advantage of dying for such a cause are to be insulted as "shirkers and cowards." If there is to be conscription let it be enforced all around, but it seems to be unjust to leave English shirkers by the millions go free and then coerce a small remnant of the Irish race into a war which they do not understand.

Meanwhile the Government's treatment of the Irish Volunteers' organizing instructors is considered by New Ireland very severe. Desmond Fitzgerald, for example, was sentenced to six months' imprisonment for making seditious speeches and for having entered County Dublin without leave. Says our contemporary:

> The speeches for which Mr. Fitzgerald was convicted have been published in the press; and we are astonished at their moderation. Mr. Devlin or Mr. Dillon, even Mr. Redmond, have made speeches time after time which assert exactly the same principles in language quite as strong. "I say here plainly," Mr. Fitzgerald is reported as having said, "that under no circumstances whatever, or at any time whatever, or in any place whatever, will I fight for any country save Ireland, whether force is brought to bear upon me or not." Is there a genuine Irish Nationalist living who would not endorse that speech? Why else are our walls plastered with posters showing that this is "Ireland's war?" Is not every recruiting speech devoted to showing that the Irishman who joins the new armies is fighting for his own country? No other reason could lead Irishmen into the war. Why, the speeches for which Mr. Fitzgerald has been arrested contain only the platitudes of Irish Nationalism; and they no more justify his imprisonment than would Mr. Asquith's speeches on the Home Rule Bill. But the same law has long ceased to hold good equally for Irish Nationalists and for members of other political parties in Ireland.

Ireland, moreover, being an agricultural country is less able to bear taxation than is an industrial nation like England. Nevertheless, Ireland, according to Government reports, has for years been paying more than her quota of taxes, and now that the war is making still heavier demands on the country's financial resources, no one can justly charge the Irish with remissness in their duties toward the Empire, for in supplying both money and men they have been far more generous than was warranted by Ireland's wealth or population.

Mexico.—The execution of Granados for complicity in the murder of Madero has given rise to the usual amount of pamphlets and newspaper articles. "The Bureau of Revolutionary Information," issued the following circular to give legal plausibility to what was really a judicial crime:

Granados's Execution; Recent News

AN EX-MINISTER OF HUERTA, MEMBER OF THE NEFARIOUS POLITICAL "QUADRILATERAL," FELL UNDER THE UNRELENTING JUDGMENT OF REVOLUTIONARY JUSTICE.

WAS SHOT IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE LAW OF JANUARY 25, 1862.

Engineer Alberto Garcia Granados, who was a member of the Huerta Political "Quadrilateral" and who held one of the portfolios in Huerta's time, was shot today at eleven o'clock. . . . He is the first of the agents in the bloody drama of February, 1913, to pay for that crime with his life, under revolutionary justice. The court-martial that tried him did so in accordance with the law of January 25, 1862. Josè Antonio Rivera, lawyer, who testified during the process as witness for the defendant, Garcia Granados, was taken to the Belem jail because the presiding officer of the court-martial considered that he [Rivera] was responsible within the law that applied to Garcia Granados.

El Mexicano in an article entitled Apuntes de Actualidad, "Comments on Present Events," criticizes the prosecuting attorney, declaring that his arguments were weak and easily refuted by the defendant's attorney who demanded the acquittal of his client. But the sentence of death was passed. Prominent Mexicans entirely familiar with the conditions comment on the case as follows:

> (1) Granados was not a member of the so-called "Quadrilateral"; he had retired from public life before its formation: (2) It is the consensus of public opinion in Mexico that Garcia Granados had nothing to do with the assassination of Madero, and although he was one of the members of Huerta's Cabinet, he resigned from office, as did other members, after it was made more or less clear that the murder of Madero was probably due to a conspiracy; (3) It appears that Rivera will be or is being prosecuted simply because he had the courage to act like a man and take the witness stand in favor of Garcia Granados. Today more than at any other time, it is a dangerous thing in Mexico to speak against the Government's tendencies; (4) The criticism made by the Carranzista paper against the public prosecuting attorney clearly states that Sr. Garcia Granados had a good defense and that the prosecutor was not able to offset the arguments of the defense, and this is easy to understand as the prosecution had no case at all. Mention also has been made of the fact that Garcia Granados was over sixty years old and, on that account, exempt from the application of the death penalty; (5) It is most extraordinary that these Constitutionalist people who spurn the Constitution, and whose famous "First Chief" has publicly determined to continue living "his" preconstitutional period, have not as yet declared, published, announced or affirmed where, when and how Garcia Granados was a party to the murder of Madero. It is an easy thing to affirm, with the support of the most savage military force, "it is thus and so and it is I who say so." That is the stand these people have taken and that is the way one of Mexico's upright citizens has been tried and condemned to the extreme penalty by a court-martial formed by men who do not know the elementary principles of justice, except, what they may call, "revolutionary justice," and who had no jurisdiction to take cognizance of acts attributed to a civilian and former member of the Cabinet; (6) Moreover, "General Gonzales decreed an amnesty after he came into Mexico City." as was stated in a New York paper. But not long ago, it was declared, that General Obregon demanded that the decree of amnesty be revoked. If it was not revoked, then the outrage committed against Garcia Granados and, therefore, against the principles of justice, is still more flagrant.

Are the Powers that have recognized Carranza ready now to let him revenge himself on all he chooses to consider his enemies? It would seem so. Public opinion, moreover, is being made favorable to the "First Chief" by the publication of various interviews and special articles in our daily papers. He serenely assured one correspondent that there has been no "confiscation" of private property, nor will there be; and that "There has been no confiscation of railroad property either." He then added feelingly: "There has been no religious persecution and will be none." Meanwhile the usual desultory fighting has been going on, the average weekly toll of American lives is duly reported, and Villa's language grows more and more insolent. On November 16, Great Britain decided to recognize Carranza, and has so informed his agent at Washington.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Fate of Defective Babies

LAST week a baby was born in a Chicago hospital. The chief-of-staff made an examination, and came to the conclusion that unless an operation were performed, the child would die. According to reports he characterized the required operation as a simple one, and declared that by it he could undoubtedly prolong the life of the little sufferer. He refused, however, to perform it, and got the mother's consent to let the child die. So the infant was denied the aid of science and soon expired. The reason the surgeon gave for his action was not that the operation in question was difficult or belonged to a class in which mortality is very high, but that the baby, if saved, would be a mental and moral defective, and defectives, in his opinion, should not be saved, both because they would be a burden to the State, and in lucid intervals would suffer acutely themselves.

It would be profitless to discuss here how far the surgeon is morally to blame for the baby's death. His mental and moral peculiarities are of no interest to the general public. Moreover, he has already had too much of a very questionable notoriety. Then, too, he has forestalled discussion of his formal guilt by saying that he acted according to his conscience. The findings of a coroner's jury admitted his plea and exculpated him on this score. Details as to the precise nature of the operation required and regarding the child's chances of surviving the ordeal, are too meager to warrant the statement that there were no grounds that would justify omitting the operation. It may be said in general that if an operation appears ineffective for the end in view, a surgeon should not perform it. If, on the other hand, an operation offers a fair chance of life, and the patient, or the person who represents him, consents to take the chance, medical ethics demands that the surgeon should either perform the operation or yield the case to some one else. And while it is true that no patient is obliged to take extraordinary means to preserve his life, yet it should be remembered that the present efficiency of surgery no longer supports the old contention that all operations may be considered extraordinary means. But the principles concerning the employment of extraordinary means to preserve life refer to the patient only, not to the surgeon. Like any other physician, he is bound to take the surest means to preserve life, even though this means involves a difficult and dangerous operation.

From the statements of the surgeon and the medical experts who performed the autopsy on the Chicago infant, it would appear that an operation did offer the child in question a very fair chance of life. It seems clear also that the parents did not forbid the operation. If such is the case, the refusal to operate was objectively wrong. This, however, is not the main issue at present, for it is a matter of common knowledge that the surgeon in Chicago did not attempt to justify himself by declaring the operation extraordinary or useless. The grounds on which he based his refusal to act were altogether different, and offered absolutely no justification of his conduct.

With brutal frankness he declared that the child's life should not be saved because it was a defective. After this it was an easy step to the general statement that all defectives should be left to die, and for many days our ears have been ringing with the immoral thesis that infants who give no promise of being useful members of the State, should be, not actually murdered indeed, but equivalently destroyed by the refusal to offer them their one chance of life.

Should defectives be saved? This is the issue that has been raised, and the answers printed in the daily press have to a large extent been in the negative. But that answer is absolutely wrong. There is only one right answer to the query, namely: every legitimate means at the disposal of the medical profession should be used to preserve the lives of defectives. The contradictory judgment proceeds from a false view of the nature and destiny of human beings, and from a mistaken notion regarding the relations which exist between the individual and the State; moreover, it paves the way to the commission of incalculable wrongs both to society in general and to its individual members.

It was inevitable that the preaching of evolution both in medical schools and to the people at large should eventuate in such errors. If man has not an immortal soul created immediately by God, if he is merely an intricately organized animal with no higher end than to minister to the evolution of society, and no higher destiny than to mate, propagate his kind, and die, like the beasts of the field, certainly only the fittest should survive and the less fit should be discarded. Superfluous kittens we drown without a second thought. Why not babies also, if they are only a superior kind of brute? The surgeon in Chicago is logical at least, but his basic position is wholly wrong. Man has a spiritual soul, and holds his life in trust for the service of God. God has given man dominion over the lives of the merely animal portion of creation, but except in the case of capital punishment or just self-defense, God reserves to Himself all rights over human life. To destroy it, either actually or equivalently, is to usurp a prerogative that belongs to God alone. This is the first wrong the surgeon did: he violated God's right over human life.

He also violated the child's right to the use of life, and this he did under the influence of the pagan notion of the State. No one is surprised that the rejuvenation of the old Platonic ideas of society should have led moderns where it led the poet-philosopher of Athens. The State absolutism which is at the root of the error in regard to defectives with which we are dealing, brought the author of "The Republic" to precisely the same absurdity as that into which the surgeon of Chicago and those whose views he voices, have fallen. Plato declared that children are the property of the State, are at the disposal of the State, and are to be preserved or sacrificed as State interests demand. The neglect of the defective child in Chicago is simply a repetition of what was done in old pagan Greece and Rome, and of what obtains today in China and other pagan States.

To this view of society, the Christian idea is irreconcilably opposed. Man is not a chattel of the State, he does not exist primarily for the State. The contrary is true. Catholics do not and cannot admit that the State forms a moral person, which is an end to itself, and which has for its ultimate good its own preservation and continual evolution into something more perfect. We are not State idolaters, we deny that individual members of the State are only "so many links in the historical evolution of humanity." The end of society is the promotion of the common good, to be understood according to the law of God. The individuals who compose society have certain natural rights which are inalienable and others which can be forfeited only by crime. Among the latter is the right to life. As long as an individual does not by a voluntary criminal act forfeit his right to life, he cannot lawfully be deprived of life either positively or negatively, that is, he may not be executed or denied such needed succor as can be given him.

Defective babies are human beings, and they have not forfeited their right to life by any voluntary criminal act. They cannot, therefore, be lawfully exposed to death by being denied such medical or surgical aid as they may stand in need of. And this is true even where they give no present hope of ever ceasing to be defectives. To deny them such aid merely because they are likely or certain to be a burden to the State is too brutal a proposal to deserve consideration.

Someone perhaps may say: But the defective may be supposed to waive his right to life. Such a supposition is impossible, first because no one has dominion over his own life, and hence cannot be presumed to do a thing which it would be immoral for him to do. Besides no sane person's mind, much less a baby's, can be interpreted as preferring death to life. After the supernatural life of grace and the life that has its fruition in the Beatific Vision, there is no good so prized by man as his mortal life on earth. No one naturally wishes to die. Even in the midst of suffering and with the prospect of great anguish of soul and body, men cling to life. As long as there is life, there is hope of cure even apart from miracles, which are always within the range of possibility. There is therefore no rational ground for presuming that a baby, even when defective, would consent to die, when ways can be found of saving its life.

But may not parents act in the child's name in this case as in Baptism, and by declining the use of extraordinary means to preserve life, allow nature to take its course? Surely no one will deny that an adult may so act for himself. In the first place, in the present instance the means to the preservation of life have not been proved extraordinary. But granted for the sake of argument that they were such, a parent's power of acting for the child is not arbitrary and unrestricted, but a power given for the good of the child, to be exercised according to the legitimately presumed wishes of the child. Now a child's consent to Baptism as a supreme supernatural good may legitimately be presumed, whereas the almost ineradicable tenacity with which the average man clings to life forbids us to infer the child's desire to die, even if extraordinary means were required to keep it alive.

The evils resulting to the State from the principle of letting defectives die are still clearer. The principle advocated by the surgeon would lead to countless blunders which would deprive the State of many useful members. The case in Chicago is an example exactly to the point. According to the sense of the report of the expert coroner's jury, the surgeon made a wrong diagnosis. For this jury has affirmed, first that there was no evidence to show that the baby would have been defective either mentally or morally; secondly, that even its physical defects might have been in large measure corrected. In this case the surgeon who let the child die, deprived the State of one who might have been a useful member of society, for history affords countless instances of persons whose serious physical deformities did not keep them from rendering society notable services.

Nor is this liability to a wrong diagnosis a fanciful supposition. In the case under discussion, fifteen doctors, says the surgeon, saw the child and were against the operation; but now it turns out that all were mistaken. And who can assure us that, once the principle that defectives should be allowed to die is established, even fifteen physicians will be consulted? From the fact that in this case the opinion of trained nurses was gravely cited by many newspapers, may we not fear that in time to come a nurse's judgment will be considered sufficient?

Moreover, once the right of the defective baby to live be questioned, where will the discussion end? The transition from defective babies to defective adults loathsomely afflicted is easy, so too is the step to defective adults in prime health. Furthermore where is the line to be drawn, and who is to draw it, between the revolting defective and the moron? The vagaries of so many of our professional alienists make it clear that they would find no trouble in convicting most of us of defectiveness in some degree! Grant the principle of the Chicago surgeon and euthanasia is not far off. Then will come the extermination of those whom an unfeeling world considers useless, and the upshot will be that another great step will have been taken towards the elimination of the Fifth Commandment from the Decalogue.

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

The Boys of Our City

SOMEHOW or other the general idea of settlement work has not been received among Catholics as it has been elsewhere, nor has it grown and flourished as so great and important a work should have done. There are few Catholic houses, but there are Protestant houses everywhere doing that work and, by reason of our neglect of it, drawing away our children from the faith of the Saints. Not only are the boys neglected in the cities, but practically nothing along those lines has been done for any of our children. To one in the least familiar with the situation it is obvious that heavy inroads are being made among them, especially in the poorer residential sections by the influences of the Protestant houses. The apathy is marked and the prejudice against the work is as fixed and strong as it is unaccountable. Scattered everywhere these Protestant houses are doing an excellent work from their standpoint, indeed, from every standpoint except our own. From ours the prospect is distressing, for our separated brethren are slowly, and, in many localities, surely getting the children. Sometimes their task is easier because the very pastors of the flock not only object to the organization and institution of a non-parochial house within the limits of their jurisdiction, but passively and even once in a while actively, work against the general cause because it is non-parochial, and thus, foreign. This is not harsh criticism, it is not recrimination. It is simply a statement of fact, simply setting forth that there are those who differ from the supporters of settlement work. But it is none the less true, and none the less unfortunate.

Where we have settlement houses they are doing what work they can with limited facilities and scant support, but handicapped by a lack of funds; the workers, volunteers all, are often untrained, and the results obtained far below what they should be, far below what they would be were a concerted effort made in behalf of our own. Almost surrounded by various denominational houses was one Catholic house, that sought help and instruction in the so-called scientific methods from the workers there, and there was one man who came to tell us how his house managed the neighborhood boys. He was an ordained minister of the Presbyterian Church, deeply interested in his cause, thoroughly trained: an educated and ardent worker for the welfare of all the boys, Protestant and Catholic. Sitting at our table in the little upstairs room he talked to us in friendliness and in sincerity. He knew what the work was and fairly and frankly he set forth his views, the views of a well-trained worker, of all indeed who have a proper understanding of the true purposes of the settlements. The work, he said, is absolutely and necessarily and essentially religious. Who says otherwise, he declared, either knows nothing of the work, or knows nothing of religion. He said there were Protestant children a-plenty in the neighborhood, that, as we knew was true, Catholic children had been repeatedly sent away from his house and urged to attend ours; and that his house actually preferred to take care of their own. His house was better equipped in every way and far more attractive to the children than ours, and under the most favorable conditions, even with his good will, we found it hard to hold the Catholics, but with even slight opposition our task was doubly hard. At that time we were unable to take certain of the smaller boys and girls; the reason does not matter; such was the fact, and he told us with no mincing of words that while he was ready and willing to exclude Catholics in the future, as he had done in the past, yet if we could not or would not take them he could and would. We could neither criticize nor complain. It was put squarely up to us, this proposition of caring for those little children; and we could not meet it. The reason is irrelevant, but the fact is pertinent. Grown-up Catholics should know how and why children are being lost to the Faith, they should know what things are helpful to keep the little ones within the Fold; and what must be done to hold fast the men and women of tomorrow or the day after, on whom the future of Church and State will rest.

Perhaps it is well for us all to realize that this work is religious, and that it is quite as necessary and quite as efficacious as any other religious work. Foreign missions are all well and good and their need is beyond question, but it is a true saying, albeit a hard one, that charity begins at home. It is not pleasant to know that today there are Catholic children in that Protestant house under Protestant religious influence, who might be under ours, had there but been the necessary Catholic support, if our house could have continued to do that very necessary religious work. It is idle to say that such work should be done in the homes, and that the doing of it outside is a reflection on Catholic parents and Catholic home life. That may or may not be. As a theory it passes muster, but "it is a condition and not a theory that confronts us." Under the very necessities of the case there cannot, except in very exceptional and unusual circumstances, be any such work done in the homes. There can be but little religious instruction, but slight elevating and refining and purifying influence. In homes where mother and father work from dawn to dusk, or where at best the mother throughout the long day and far into the watches of the night is taken up with the cares and drudgery of household routine, where there is want and hunger, and often a complete dearth of things intellectual, where all is dreary and sordid and material, there is not and in the nature of things there can hardly be the watchful and proper care of a mother for her children. There the soil is ready for the insidious seeds spread broadcast from every quarter, there the work of the non-Catholic settlement house, there the propaganda of materialism and indifferentism begin to get their hold.

Settlement work is religious: so it must be to be properly done. The object is to refine, to elevate, to purify, to correct, to inculcate proper respect for authority, civil and religious, and that cannot be achieved without religion itself. Never has there been, never will there be, and never can there be, an ethical system binding and lasting without a sufficient sanction, and there can be no sanction without an authority, and no authority without religion, for as one is of God, so is the other. There can be no respect for the symbols of authority when the essential and compelling force is lacking. Man-made theories of the sources of law and order and government pass from day to day, and deny the prime essential of authority, and nothing based on such theories can stand. Their structures are as the house built on the sands, weak and unstable.

The godless schools and the accompanying wave of materialism have brought down untold evils on our day and generation, and the godless settlements, working in the playtime of the children, pile up the cost of the day of reckoning and make more heavy the debt which must most surely be paid. Into those houses our children will be drawn, and there deprived of their God-given gift of faith unless earnest and thorough measures are taken and taken promptly to help and save them. We have fought Socialism in the schools: why should we complacently welcome Socialism in the settlements, in the playtime of those children we have fought to save? The enemy must be met at every point, the battle must be fought along the whole line. The fight in the schools was well made and it must be taken up anew at another place, and then we can truly say that we have run the good race and fought the good fight and kept the faith. The evils of the present situation cannot be doubted; the danger stares us in the face: to him who has eyes to see it is plain. The remedy is equally so.

Baltimore. MARK O. SHRIVER, JR.

A Catholic News Association

IN a recent article in AMERICA I said there were two practical steps whereby Catholic weeklies might be radically and permanently improved. The first step would be to better their news service. The second step would be to raise the quality of their literary features. It was to the discussion of the second step that I devoted my former article, proposing the establishment of a Catholic writers' syndicate, the members of which should give at stated intervals an essay or article or editorial or story or poem without payment, such contributions to be duplicated and sold at a small figure for simultaneous publication in a large number of Catholic periodicals. It is to the discussion of a plan for the betterment of the news service of our weeklies that I propose to devote this second article.

To begin with, I shall eliminate, for the present, the consideration of local news, for that is a subject which is peculiarly the province of each individual editor of the weeklies. Upon his own "news sense" must depend the treatment of the local happenings. I do not see how any organized movement can invade these individual fields with any chance of doing good. Before, however, passing on to discuss what might be done in the wider field of international and national news, it may be well to point out that the whole subject of the news value of Catholic weeklies is debatable and complicated. A paper coming out one day in the week is at a sore disadvantage compared with the dailies so far as news is concerned, and where the dailies pay attention to church and church society events, and the events that concern prominent Catholics, as to some extent they do in all communities where Catholics are numerically important, the Catholic weekly presents rather a stale appearance. Nor can it be said that the paragraphs relating tepid facts concerning whist parties and "church dansants" and similar events irresistibly demand attention or leave behind them after reading a sense of time well spent, or of money well spent in purchasing such "news." In fact, speaking quite personally, and with all due deference to others whose experience may incline them to other views, I think that a very large amount of such "news" should be ignored, or else very briefly chronicled, for the sake of the record, and that Catholic weeklies should depend more upon their literary and editorial and general features than upon such "news." For the very essence of news is that it shall be new. Stale tidings have no power; they are a drag upon the paper printing them.

But Catholic news in the wider, more important sense is another matter indeed. I mean, to be precise, correct reports and descriptions of really important, contemporary matters, events, ceremonies, and persons connected with the world-wide, and especially the national, affairs, efforts, and progress of our Holy Church. This is Catholic news that really matters, and it is in the dispensing of this news that I think much improvement could be made, yes, and the situation calls aloud for this improvement.

A method whereby improvement could be secured is sorely needed, and I venture to suggest the following plan as a tentative platform, at least, for discussion, with the hope that something better may be proposed if this does not fill the bill. Of course the plan is in no sense mine own invention. Many such ideas are "in the air." I steal most of my thunder concerning this particular project from my friend, Rev. Charles A. Ramm, who has studied to such good purposes the methods of the Central Catholic Press Bureau of Germany. German efficiency is as marked in matters of church organization, fortunately, as in other fields, and neutral Americans as well as belligerent enemies may well learn some valuable lesson in that quarter.

What I would suggest, then, is that a Catholic News Association be formed by concerted action of the American hierarchy. Its headquarters, I think, should be in Washington, D. C., simply because that city is the national center. All the larger Catholic societies, such as the Knights of Columbus, should, of course, assist in raising the necessary funds. There should be a staff of editors and writers, both clergymen and laymen, including as a matter of course representatives of all the principal nations, or at least scholars who are thoroughly familiar not merely with foreign languages, but with the temperament and peculiarities of other nations. Until enough money becomes available to pay the expense of maintaining a regular corps of special correspondents abroad, this central staff in Washington should see to it that all the important newspapers of the world, secular and religious, and, chiefly, all newspapers opposing the Church, be secured with the utmost possible diligence, and that they be thoroughly read at once. Especially should all the chief newspapers and other periodicals of the United States, Canada, and Central and South America, be closely watched. In addition to this survey of the world-wide press, constant efforts should be maintained to collect information from well-informed individuals through private correspondence. Then, as rapidly as the attainment of funds permitted, special correspondents should be appointed in all the chief cities of the world. It should be possible, nay, it should be regarded as certain, that the apostolic spirit would manifest itself in this work as elsewhere, and that many correspondents, editors, and writers, especially clerical, would serve without payment, for the love of God. But there should be a nucleus of expert journalists who should be paid what their labor is worth in the open market.

So much, though put very briefly, for the gathering of news, and of views. Now for the utilization of this mass of material. This subject opens up into many subdivisions. First of all, the central board would of course maintain an absolutely first-class "morgue" or "graveyard," to use the newspaper slang phrase for the card-indexed collection of clippings which every important journal maintains as one of the most indispensable and useful departments of its complex organism. To this library of clippings, a vast accumulation of facts, and theories, and attacks upon the Church, and replies thereto, and of general information, the board could turn at any moment in compiling its articles; and any Catholic editor or publicist, or non-Catholic editor or publicist, could also turn to it for information. From this ever inflowing current of news matter, carefully watched by expert editors, there would be gathered all sorts of material for fresh and varied and vital articles and letters. These, together with timely reports from all the chief centers of Catholic news, should be issued simultaneously to the Catholic press, at the lowest sum possible, or, when the Association could afford to give the service, for nothing. When the time came that the Association had its foreign correspondents cabling and telegraphing, when necessary, the most immediate matters of interest, then it could not only supply the Catholic press, but—and this would be a tremendously helpful service—it could also give much of its information to the secular press, just as the National Geographic Society, and the Christian Science Church, and many another completely organized body does today. When news from Rome, for example, that obviously was false, or meant to mislead, got into print, the Association could at once correct it. The mere knowledge that there existed such an organization, keeping a diligent and most vigilant watch upon it, would render the secular press much more careful in its treatment of Catholic affairs. When a newspaper published an article, or a letter, or an editorial, either maliciously, or, which is usually the case, ignorantly, misrepresenting or attacking Catholic truth, the Association would at once prepare the adequate answer.

Space is lacking for the further discussion of this plan; but to the writer it seems certain that only along these, or similar lines of organized, efficient effort can the apostolate of the press be placed upon a solid foundation. Editors and writers today are shooting too much at random. What we mostly need is centralization and cooperation, also efficiency. I hear some say that priests should lead in the work of the Catholic press. I hear others say it is a task for laymen. In my opinion, which is that of a journalist of some twenty years' experience, it is a work for journalists, whether they be clergymen or laymen. More and more will it happen that priests will show journalistic powers. They have always been eminent as writers. Now that the times need other gifts, these gifts will be given. In the meantime, surely, priests and laymen may labor together.

MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

Darwin and Dickens

IT is a fact of no little significance that whereas of late years the genius of Charles Dickens has appealed more and more powerfully and directly to those in revolt against capitalistic society, that of another great man, for long the god of their idolatry, has receded in importance.

That man is Charles Darwin. But a decade or so ago he was regarded with fanatical, not to say religious, adoration by those who gloried in the term "advanced." He was supposed to have found out a new heaven and a new earth, and to have delivered man finally from the thraldom of superstition, and no emancipated person was complete without him. His praises were even hymned by some of the ethical societies and he was constantly quoted by Socialists, whose teachings he would have violently repudiated. In a word, his personality and his teaching had captured the imagination of three-fourths of those people who, declining to accept their conclusions ready-made from others, made an honest effort to think things out for themselves.

There was, when we come to think of it, nothing very remarkable perhaps, nothing undeserved, in this triumph. Darwin displayed during his life a quality which our race, let us hope, will always revere: tenacity. There was something heroic in his single-minded devotion to an idea. When all England was deafened by pulpit denunciations of the man and his work, he alone refused to hear, and doggedly and quietly "went on with his work," determined to complete his life's task, and caring for very little else in the world. His determination, his obvious good faith, which had been stupidly blackened and defamed, were, with his courage, quite enough to endear him to the next generation of Englishmen who, knowing very little about his conclusions, accepted them quite heartedly along with the man. But the interesting thing to note is that it was precisely during the days of the Darwinian ascendency that Dickens and the ideas that animated and inspired him fell into disrepute, while the great revival of interest in the works and teachings of the novelist mark, as was inevitable, the decay of Darwin's influence. I say this was inevitable because Dickens, first and last, was a democrat, and Darwin was the greatest anti-democratic force that the nineteenth century produced.

To prove this we have only to consider for a moment what democracy implies. It means, we know, a certain faith in the individual man, a reliance on his essential capacity and virtue, by which the real democrat will stand or fall. That faith can never really inspire any really sincere Darwinian, for the simple and sufficient reason that the goodness or badness of the individual man does not, according to him, matter a straw. Good or bad, trustworthy or unreliable, despicable or noble, he is equally the victim of a cosmic process that his will is quite powerless to affect in any degree whatever.

This was Darwinism, and it ate deep into the soul, even of those who never turned the pages of his books, or faintly sympathized with his conclusions. The ardent Socialist, for instance, haranguing the hostile street crowd used to assure them that the reform he was advocating was "inevitable," whether they liked it or not, because "Evolution" was bound to bring it about. The obvious retort that in that case his exertions were supererogatory seems never to have occurred to him.

Other results of the Darwinian superstition were less amusing and more serious. Whereas the individual became of less and less importance, the State bulked more and more largely in the minds of social reformers, who had drunk deep of mid-Victorian materialism. We know with what dreary results. We have lived to see the needy regimented, inspected and dragooned to the profit and glory of an army of officials; to watch the chronic and costly failure of practically every State-directed effort toward social amelioration; and to see the most sacred rights of the poor, their rights in their own families and in their own children trampled under foot. We might, had not the Darwinian madness been stayed, have lived to witness worse results. The compulsory break-up of the family, definitely and explicitly advocated by State megalomaniacs, the "licensing" of people who desire to marry, even the selection of partners by the municipal authorities, these are some of the blessings that the eugenists proposed for us. They have failed to secure them. But at least they may claim the cruelties and iniquities of such legislation as the English Mental Deficiency Bill as the full flower of Darwinian teaching, since even its alleged scientific basis has been challenged, not to say shattered, by the greater authorities, who have followed after the author of "The Origin of Species."

Perhaps—Heaven grant it may be!—this bill may mark the high-water mark of Darwinian achievement, for there has come with the revival of Dickens a sense of the importance of the individual, of the value of the family, together with a demand for the wider distribution of property rather than its concentration in State hands, and a hatred of puritanical restriction. No one who knows the words of the master will need to be told how and where we may trace these things in his works. There are a hundred quotations that "Junius" could give, if necessary, where Dickens exalts the homes of the poor, where he delights in their love of the family, where he protests against their Gradgrind regulators and Puritan persecutors; where he insists that they need only a chance to lead lives worthy of themselves; where he ridicules and tears to tatters the officialdom, to whose care it is proposed they should be committed. But these things are trifling compared to one other difference between him and the Darwinians and eugenists. In his own day Dickens achieved much for social reform by vigorous appeals to the conscience and compassion of his fellows. That ground is denied the Darwinian, who is driven to find refuge in the study and observation of the lower animals. In other words, Dickens reminds us that we are men; the Darwinian reminds us that we are like insects.

JUNIUS.

Madeleine the Euchite

MADELEINE, though a society belle, was much addicted to prayer. She had not always been particularly remarkable, however, for piety. Ever since her early girlhood, indeed, Madeleine had made an annual retreat, but the conclusion of the Exercises generally left her quite unscathed. But the triduum she followed last Lent proved fatal, for the Father who gave the points urged so passionately and proved so convincingly the necessity of praying always, that Madeleine was stirred to the depths of her soul. Though she had been "out" only a year, the world was already at her feet and every moment of her waking hours was crowded with social engagements of the most absorbing and momentous character. Nevertheless when Father Cyril in his concluding exhortation tearfully implored the retreatants to be instant and tireless in prayer because "the days are evil," Madeleine highly resolved to devote from that time forth ten minutes each day exclusively to prayer.

For a young lady like Madeleine such a determination smacked of the heroic, her life was already so full. Purpose however, as she knew by sad experience, is but the salve of memory, so her great concern was how to avoid forgetting to say those promised prayers. In her perplexity she sought Father Cyril, told him about the rigorous asceticism she meant to practise, and carefully explained to him the engrossing nature of her social duties. "From 11.00 a.m., my hour for rising, till 4.00 a.m., my usual bedtime," said Madeleine, "I haven't a moment, Father, I can call my own, for I am wholly occupied with yesterday's, today's or tomorrow's pressing engagements. So how can I possibly remember to say my prayers? And even if I do not forget my resolution, where in the world am I to find the time to keep it?"

When Father Cyril had recovered from the astonishment Madeleine's determination caused him, he pondered a while over the case and then offered this counsel: "I'll tell you what to do. Find an old catechism, cut from it the Our Father, the Hail Mary, the Apostles' Creed and the Act of Contrition, mount each prayer on a neat card and then place them in the corners of your mirror. For it is just possible that you may throw a morning glance into that looking glass, and the cards there will then remind you of your courageous resolution. But if you find, Madeleine, that even with the best of wills, you simply cannot spare the time to pray kneeling, just see how often you can repeat those four prayers as you stand before your mirror."

After heartily thanking Father Cyril for this sage advice, Madeleine tripped off to a series of afternoon teas, but as soon as she reached home again, hunted up an old catechism and acted on her director's suggestion. It proved a perfect success. For the very next morning Madeleine had to scurry so to keep an 11.45 appointment that she could not possibly catch a moment to kneel down, but she found, much to her amazement, that before turning away from her looking glass she was actually able to repeat those four prayers twenty-five times.

As Madeleine had heard in the retreats she made somber tales about the ruthless self-renunciation demanded of those who would lead an interior life, she was highly elated at her success in thus protracting her devotions with such little inconvenience, so she now aspired to even loftier flights of mysticism. Accordingly on her next shopping tour the young ascetic bought a Douay Bible, an English Missal, the Marquis of Bute's Roman Breviary, the Following of Christ, Cardinal Newman's "Meditations and Devotions" and half a dozen well-edited prayer books, hurried home and sternly denying herself to nine callers in succession gave the time thus saved to mastering the language of devotion. To Madeleine the volumes were a revelation. The Psalms, she discovered, were rich in soul-food; she had no idea the prayers in the Mass-book were so full of unction and beauty; the lessons of the third nocturns, particularly those taken from the writings of St. Augustine and St. Chrysostom, were in her opinion perfect little sermons; she wondered where that cloistered à Kempis got such a profound knowledge of the human heart; and the wealth and variety of the devotions in her new prayer books left Madeleine in a state of bewildered delight.

Many of the prayers our budding mystic read, however, seemed too vague and general in their character. It is altogether meet and fitting no doubt, she reflected, to pray for our enemies, for prisoners and for evil doers or to win the graces of patience, meekness and humility, but she felt the need of other prayers that would be more intimate, detailed and specific than were many of those in the manuals. So Madeleine determined to make a prayer book of her own. After heroically canceling every engagement a lady could, she devoted a month's leisure to culling from divers books of devotion the prayers and texts that particularly appealed to her. She then composed a number of petitions herself that would best meet the little needs and crises of her daily life. The prefaces that headed these fervent aspirations of Madeleine's soul were something like the explanatory notes with which the poet Wordsworth adorns many of his sonnets and were meant to facilitate the author's use of her vade-mecum. The rubric for one of Madeleine's prayers, for instance, ran as follows: "A Litany to be Repeated at a Ball When Your Card Is Not Yet Full." Another was headed: "A Prayer to be Said at the Play When Your Neighbors Are Talking Too Loud." A third caption read: "Aspirations to be Used by a Worried Hostess When the Dessert is Delayed." A fourth petition was described: "A Fervent Prayer that New Fashions May Always be Becoming to Me." Another prayer was designed "For the Use of Motorists Who Chafe Under the Speed Laws," and a sixth, which the author modestly considered a marvel of unction and precision, was to be "Said by Those Whose Names Are in the Social Register and Whose Pictures Adorn the Sunday Supplements, but Who Are Never Invited to Mrs. ——'s Week-Ends."

When Madeleine's little chef d'œuvre was completed, she joyfully ran to secure for it Father Cyril's approval. Besides she wished to consult him about another very important matter. For the month she had passed reading devotional literature and composing litanies and collects had proved such a happy and peaceful one, that she wished to ask her director's advice regarding the wisdom of retiring altogether from the world and devoting herself exclusively to prayer. "I want to be an anchoress, Father," she said. "So let me build myself a little cabin near the parish church, as did those English solitaries of the fourteenth century. I can then pray without cessation my whole life long, thus fulfilling, as far as human weakness will permit, the evangelical counsel to pray always."

Father Cyril gravely shook his head. "That would never do at all, Madeleine. I fear you are infected with the errors of the Euchites. That was the name of a fourth-century sect, you may remember, who under the pretext of praying always neglected all the duties and responsibilities of life, and soon became a set of lazy vagabonds. Anchoresses, moreover, are a little obsolete today. For some time now religious women have lived in convents rather than hermitages. Besides, Madeleine, you would find that cabin much more uncomfortable and confining than you think. You would sorely miss the distractions of the social world and, worse still, you would never have occasion to use any of those admirable prayers you have composed for neglected débutantes, impatient hostesses, fashionable playgoers or disappointed "climbers." So if I were you, Madeleine, I would give up the idea of being a twentieth-century anchoress. Become instead a really devout society leader, who is never afraid to show herself an uncompromising Catholic. Pray always by keeping all the Commandments all the while, no easy task nowadays I am told, for ladies with social ambitions. Then if you can get the Bishop's imprimatur for that admirable prayer book of yours, and if you faithfully keep your resolution of giving ten minutes daily to your devotions, you will be a highly edifying and thoroughly orthodox Euchite." Madeleine smiled meekly and promised to do her best.

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

The Catholic Press

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The bedrock of the Catholic press question is circulation. Those excellent people who begin every discussion of this question by talking of style, literary excellence, editorial ability, trained minds and the like, remind me of a very old, but very true, saying about putting the cart before the horse. Do these gentlemen imagine that the great secular journals were created overnight, and came into the hands of the public with all their present greatness thrust upon them? And if their powers of imagination can compass that, do they suppose that the class of professional journalists and the even more important class of expert business managers were the growth of a day? The press has been built, like everything else in this world, from the bottom upwards, not from the top downwards. I have to laugh when I see theorists metaphorically suspending great roof beams from aloft, dangling them from the air-ships of their fancy, and inviting us who are actually doing something practical to hook on to those swaying and uncertain structures in the air, and then build, not upwards, but downwards. The man who will take off his coat and get a dozen new subscribers for a Catholic paper, yes, even for the poorest of them all, will have done more for Catholic journalism than can ever be done by reams of idealistic aspirations.

The bedrock of the question, I have said, is circulation. Circulation of a Catholic paper means circulation of Catholic information and truth. And what other reason has any Catholic paper for its existence? It is better for a Catholic home to have the poorest Catholic paper in the world than no Catholic paper at all. Those who think that literary style is a prerequisite to evangelization or edification, or that a mistranslation of a Latin sentence disqualifies an editor from doing any good in a Catholic home, may question my statement; but I put it to the average Catholic conscience: Which is better, that a Catholic should have no Catholic paper, or that he should have a somewhat inferior one? If my first question be answered according to my views, my next proposition cannot be questioned. I assert that there is not a Catholic paper now in existence which is not worth the money asked for it, and which is not capable of doing good in any Catholic home. Now, if the friends of Catholic truth would do the thing they could easily do, and get subscribers for Catholic papers, ninety per cent of the difficulties and deficiencies of the Catholic press would disappear. Among the first of the problems that would solve themselves would be the supply of editors. Today, no young graduate, looking about for an occupation, gives a moment's thought to the Catholic journal. Can we blame these young men? A field of endeavor that is stricken with poverty is not very attractive. We shall never have a class of professional and competent Catholic journalists until we have the money to bid for their services and prospects to spread before their eyes. But this will never be until we have a greater circulation, a thing that could easily be obtained if we had zealous cooperation.

There are hundreds of thousands of Catholics who would be quite satisfied to pay the current price for the average Catholic weekly, and who, with their families, would be benefited by reading it; and who would do so if they were seriously asked to do so by those whose advice they are accustomed to take in religious matters.

Who are the people that every Catholic editor, who has a spark of enthusiasm for his noble work, wishes particularly to reach? Those who never get, those who never had, a Catholic paper. If it is not for this that we exist, then indeed we owe the world an apology for our presence. I am convinced that the way to treat this question of the Catholic press is to build up on the foundations now existing. My hope and my desire of many years would be realized if I could see the hierarchy and clergy put forth their tremendous strength along that line.

ROBERT F. PHALEN,
Editor of "The Casket."

Antigonish, N. S.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"N. Y. E." has come out of his retreat. Apparently he is not much chastened by the rebukes he has received. On the contrary in his latest contribution to your pages one detects a smugness, a spirit of self-contentedness which tells plainly that he fancies he has the better of the argument. His attempt to shelter himself behind Father Burke is truly painful. There is a marked difference between the reverend editor of the Catholic World and critics such as N. Y. E. No one objects to a sane discussion of the deficiencies of Catholic journalism, and this Father Burke has given us in your issue of Sept. 4. What we do find fault with is the snarling and barking of certain writers, who seem to imagine that entrance upon the profession of journalism dispenses one, ipso facto, from the observance of the Commandments of God. "Thou shalt not bear false witness" is still binding upon the editorial conscience.

Relying on what he considers his success in the past, N. Y. E. now proceeds to give choice bits of advice to his brethren. "Be interesting," he tells Catholic editors; "you need be neither learned nor witty, but you must be interesting." This, then, is the goal of his ambition, a Catholic press which is interesting. Learning may be discounted. Hence error of doctrine, of grammar, and so on, may be admitted freely, if only the thing is done interestingly! Hear ye, Catholic editors! Don't worry any longer about your orthodoxy. Don't fret about ignorance of any sort. Don't lie awake at night, wondering whether your bishop will approve of what you write. The journalistic sage of Gotham, whose head has gone gray in the service, and whose years hang heavily upon him, assures you that all this is needless. Porro unum est necessarium. Be interesting, and a multitude of sins shall be forgiven you. N. Y. E. finds pleasure in the thought that he has stirred things up a bit in Catholic circles. He is glad that a jolt has been given to our self-complacency. Perhaps good will come out of what he has written. This is not impossible. Divine Providence has drawn good out of evil before and may do so in this instance. It is necessary indeed that scandals should come, but woe to those by whom scandal cometh.

Spokane, Wash. J. S.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A fearless and sincere writer in AMERICA, in his very practical and definite comments on the needs of the Catholic press has laid his finger on the most obvious defect. He assures us that what we most need is writers who convey the thrill and movement of human life to their readers; that dulness in literature or art is the unpardonable sin. Our general press steers its troubled way too laboriously between currents ecclesiastical, academic, polemic or drastic. Wit and humor are too much frowned upon.

Our fiction above all, is reprehensible. We have not in the United States one novelist of great value. No Bourget, Huysmans, Bazin, Ayscough or Benson. This is a great lack, for all of these writers are vibrant with the thrill and movement of human life. We find Paul Bourget's "Démon de Midi" a more terrific arraignment of Modernism than all that our ecclesiastical reviews ever conveyed to us. In its preface, which is a letter to René Bazin the author's confrère, Bourget tells us that it is unlawful for a novelist to portray a real character under fictitious circumstances, for this would be calumny. He then openly forestalls any presumption that his audience might read into the leading character of "Le Démon de Midi" such a modernist as George Tyrrell. Yet in this powerful book we receive the thrill and movement of life, which strips bare of all sheltering foliage the hideous fruit of the tree of Modernism. One feels this thrill and movement in every page, carrying the reader on to the climax of conviction.

We yearn for such masters as Veuillot, Ozanam, Brunetière, Bishop Keppler, Windthorst and the great Spanish prose enthusiasts; whose strength is as the strength of ten because their hearts are warm. Our diocesan papers quite correctly record diocesan events; they make little or no pretense at literature. Yet in them too there could be more of the thrill and movement of diocesan activities, that would capture readers and increase circulation. We do not yet understand why the work of our best Catholic writers so seldom adorns our Catholic press, nor why all their wit, humor and vivacity are reserved for the secular press. Can it be because our editorial staffs are wholly opposed to thrill and movement, and wedded to dulness?

It would seem also that we lack sincerity. St. Paul was an incomparable writer and orator, yet when men fell down before him, he ordered them to rise, saying, "I am but a man like yourself." Refreshing confession! How many of our Catholic editors would acknowledge as much to their would-be friends desirous of improving the Catholic press? We hear on all sides what seem to be sincere regrets that our Catholic press does not command the enthusiastic admiration and eager subscription of the general reading public. We have scholarly and irreproachable ecclesiastical reviews for the clergy and students. We have zealous missionary journals that have a deep interest for souls blessed in any degree with a missionary sense. But the great, educating, broadening enriching, thrilling Catholic journal for the masses of our people is yet unborn. Not yellow journalism, God forbid! Nor yet that travesty of yellow journalism the pious "shockers," for these, being without the thrill and movement of real human life neither move nor shock. Yet when our most experienced and successful journalists respond to the call for "suggestions from our readers," they are in danger of being bitterly attacked by proud editors. Sincerity, then, which is always more full of thrill and movement than of dulness, may be regarded as imperative to journalism. E. S. CHESTER.

[This controversy is now closed.—Editor, AMERICA.]

No Compromise with Heresy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Father Fisher's article "No Compromise with Heresy" is an excellent example of the question-begging fallacy. To his statement that Our Lord "demands complete submission to His Word, an unrestricted acceptance of the whole of His revealed doctrine," we Anglicans can most fervently assent. We as Catholics have no right to pick and choose what we like out of the total deposit of the Faith and reject the rest, but must accept all without question. But when Father Fisher goes on to say that "one of the things that Christ commanded was the universal headship over the Church of Saint Peter and his successors," we demur. We do not "reject it"; we deny that Christ said or commanded any such thing. We give unwavering assent to everything that Christ taught, but we deny that He ever said, as Father Fisher and the Roman divines of medieval and modern times would have us believe, "that the Pope is the Rock, the foundation-stone on which Christianity is built." If He had said that, we could do nothing but accept His decree. Roman Catholics interpret the "Thou art Peter" to mean what Father Fisher here says it means: we deny that significance altogether, and so did some of the greatest of the Fathers. The central issue between Roman and Anglican is not, should we accept Christ's words when He said the Pope is the Rock, but, did He say that? Only the Catholic Church can authoritatively interpret Christ's words: You exclude non-Papalists from the Catholic Church; but to do this, as you do, on the ground of the Papal interpretation of the "Thou art Peter" is to beg the very question at issue between us.

Cleveland. JARED S. MOORE.

[Mr. Moore is mistaken when he says that the article, "No Compromise with Heresy," is an "example of the question-begging fallacy." This fallacy consists in taking for granted what should not under the circumstances be taken for granted. Now what may be taken for granted depends upon the convictions of the audience addressed. The article in question, as is evident from its whole tenor, was addressed to Catholics alone, and had for its purpose to set forth for the instruction of Catholics the doctrine of the Church on certain features of Anglicanism. The author therefore had a right to take for granted what every Catholic believes. He was not begging the question when he assumed that Catholics admit the Papal Supremacy, seeing that under pain of sin they must admit it, and that they cannot deny it without being excluded from communion with the Church and participation in her Sacraments. Had the article aimed at convincing Anglicans of error, had it been intended to demonstrate to Anglicans the correctness of the Papal interpretation of the text, "Thou art Peter: and upon this rock I will build my church," there would have been some foundation for Mr. Moore's remark. In no part of the article, however, does it appear that the writer had any such aim. The Anglican attitude entered into the article only so far as it was the matter of a simple exposition.

Moreover Mr. Moore's own letter shows that he and his Anglican friends are in the same boat with all other Protestants, the very point we were endeavoring to make clear. The point was that Anglicans pick and choose among the doctrines of Christ, at least to the extent of rejecting one doctrine that all Catholics do hold and must. He argues thus: we do not reject anything that Christ has revealed; we only deny the interpretation that you Papalists put upon Christ's words. But do any Protestants act otherwise? Did any, even of the wildest sectaries who have troubled the religious peace of England and the Anglican Church, ever reject anything that they admitted Christ had revealed; did they not rather reject what they claimed was the false interpretation traditionally put upon Christ's words? Did the Quakers or Shakers or Muggletonians admit that Christ taught the Real Presence, and then reject it? Did they not rather deny that this was the true teaching to be derived from the words of Our Lord? Surely the same argument, used against them by Anglicans and Catholics alike is applicable by Catholics to Anglicans in the matter of the Papal Supremacy.

Lastly, Mr. Moore says: "Roman Catholics interpret the 'Thou art Peter' to mean what Father Fisher here says it means: we deny that significance altogether, and so did some of the greatest of the Fathers." In other words Mr. Moore asserts that "some of the greatest of the Fathers" denied altogether the significance put upon these words by Roman Catholics, i. e., they deny altogether that in the words 'Thou are Peter,' Christ taught that 'the Pope is the Rock, the foundation stone on which Christianity is built.'" (AMERICA, November 6, p. 80). As a matter merely of erudition, would Mr. Moore favor us with the names of some of the greatest of the Fathers who denied this, and cite the passages in which they do so?—J. H. F.]

Correspondence Courses in Catechism

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Father Van Aken of Whitefish, Montana, suggests the establishment of a correspondence school in catechism. The idea is new but excellent. In Montana and other Western States, where the people live at great distances from the church, it would facilitate the means of giving much-needed instruction. According to the proposed scheme the children would receive each week a set of questions, which they would be required to answer and return. Catechism would thus become home work, done under the direction of the priest and under the immediate supervision of the parents. Aside from the fact that parents are always interested in the children's home work, especially if it be written, there is the additional advantage that the children would find difficulty in certain questions and would naturally consult the parents, and thus the catechism would become a home interest, constantly renewed with each new set of questions. The course, I think, should not be limited to the instructions in the Baltimore Catechism, but might profitably be extended in scope. Beauties of doctrine, mystic and symbolic meanings of the liturgy would furnish inspiration for a greater love and a truer apostolic zeal for religion.

Cut Bank, Mont. R. G. GREVEN, O. PRAEM.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN;
Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

In this issue AMERICA begins a series of papers on the condition of Catholic boys in our chief cities. The articles are written by prominent social workers, and will appear twice a month.

Pope-Baiting Still

THOSE who began to read the opening paper in the autumn Harvard Theological Review on "The Position and Prospects of the Roman Catholic Church" must have mildly wondered what made the oracular author of the article so very bitter and resentful. But if they patiently read on till they found him proclaiming in a high prophetic strain that "It is a matter of certainty that one of the results of the war now devastating the world will be a notable weakening of, and falling away from, the Roman Catholic Church," it will be clear to every fair-minded reader that the chief cause of the writer's extraordinary rancor is the fact that the Pope, being the common Father of Christendom, cannot take sides against any of his children, but must remain strictly neutral.

Another recent example of Pope-baiting is the protest a prominent Anglican preacher made against the Holy Father's alleged "silence" regarding the Armenian massacres. So far, however, was Benedict XV from keeping silence that he is the one person who did take effectual measures to save the Armenians. For his Holiness sent a letter of protest directly to the Sultan, and bade the Apostolic Delegate at Constantinople supply the Armenians with material aid. As a result of the Pope's appeal, the Ottoman Minister of the Interior ordered the deportation of the Sultan's Christian subjects to cease, and commanded that full protection should be given those already removed from their homes.

Many fiery patriots in the nations now at war are eager to have the Pope "speak," provided, of course, he takes sides with them. About the preservation of the Church's unity they care little or nothing, whereas saying or doing anything at this crisis in the world's history, that would imperil that priceless unity, is the very thing that the Father of Christendom must carefully avoid. While the present war is making havoc of Christian civilization, Satan will not let pass so good an opportunity for suggesting schism in the Church, and Pope Benedict, we may be sure, realizes this thoroughly. Every man of sense, moreover, must see that an international spiritual authority cannot consistently take sides between its fighting children of various nations.

Is Speaking the Truth "Heresy"?

"IT is a cardinal heresy against our Americanism to say that our public schools are godless." So spake the Rev. C. H. Little, Pastor of the Second Unitarian Church, of Brooklyn. Nonsense, Mr. Little! It is never heresy to speak the truth. And the truth is that the public schools are godless, not perhaps in some fanciful meaning of the term, but in its literal acceptation. Everything may be taught in the public schools except God. God alone is excluded. A cheerless home is home from which cheer has been banished, a hopeless soul is one in which hope has no place. A godless school is one that has no room in its curriculum for instruction about God. If words have any meaning this is the meaning of godless; and if facts are admitted the word godless, literally understood, characterizes accurately the condition of the public schools. Why not be honest?

Nor is it "against our Americanism to say that our public schools are godless." Rather the contrary is true. The best type of Americanism, the perfection of freedom and loyalty which we associate with our country, the ideal of Americanism contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, is an Americanism built upon the sure foundation of firm belief in the existence of God, and upon the conscientious performance of the duties demanded by the Divine law. Catholics are of the opinion that such a foundation and such a performance are best guaranteed by religious instruction in the school; but they may freely admit that such instruction cannot well be given in the public schools as at present constituted.

It is the part of loyal patriotism to recognize our public schools for what they are; to admit their essential lack as far as the religious education of the child is concerned, while not being blind to their real advantages; and to endeavor to supply the deficiency either in the school or elsewhere. It is folly and falsehood to say that the public schools are perfectly satisfactory and that they are giving the child every thing that is required for perfect citizenship. No man is or can be an ideal citizen who is not God-fearing; and it is precisely in its failure to develop the fear of God that the weakness of the public school consists. They are godless in the sense that instruction about God has no place in them. It is not "heresy against our Americanism" to face a fact:

rather it is heresy to ignore it. Only a blinded parent thinks his child perfect. We do not wish our children to grow up pagans or atheists. The public schools are not designed to prevent this. Perhaps they cannot do so under existing conditions. And in this sense certainly they are godless. A true patriot will recognize this. Conscientious parents recognize it. Mr. Little refuses to recognize it. Well, so much the worse for Mr. Little.

The Breakfast Temper

"YOU have spoken but a single word during the last twenty minutes, and that was a cross one," remarked the wife. "This morning's coffee is even worse than yesterday's," growled the husband in reply. That sort of breakfast dialogue is sometimes repeated subsequently in a divorce court. On the other hand, "They never quarreled—even at the breakfast table," could it be truthfully said of a couple, would be a strong proof that their honeymoon has had no end. For tempers are proverbially short in the early morning and many a grave matrimonial disaster has had its small beginnings at the matutinal board. There are families in which the first meal of the day is a sort of funeral feast: the bread-winner silently buries his head in the newspaper, while his helpmate soliloquizes sadly on the pleasant breakfasts she had before her marriage.

The disposition of many a man and woman is marvelously sweetened by the progress of the sun. At 7.00 a. m., the cheeriest of greetings can wring from them only a surly answer, by 10.00 their churlishness is notably less, by high noon their intimates find them fairly amiable, by 3.00 p. m. they are willing to be agreeable even to those they dislike, and by 7.00 p. m. they are veritable paragons of sweetness and urbanity. But what is much needed in this thorn-strewn, work-a-day world is a vast increase in the numbers of those who are their own sunshine makers and who can bring to the breakfast table every morning that evenness of temper and kindness of heart which is far more common at the evening meal. The likelihood will then be bright that these engaging virtues will remain in active service throughout the day, filling the home with peace, lessening the friction of industrial life and rendering all social intercourse a pleasure.

Wisconsin's Esthetic Kine

THE "Wisconsin Idea" has been extended to the farmyard. A woman member of the State Board of Agriculture, if reports are true, has discovered that the quantity and quality of a cow's milk can be wonderfully improved by keeping the animal in an esthetic and harmonious environment. "Cows," she observes, "are sensitive to their surroundings. Make the stable cheery and beautiful and the cows will respond with wonderful milk production." Accordingly this enterprising agriculturist bade her employees speak kindly and cheerily to the cows, particularly at the milking hour; she has had a music machine placed in the stable; she is meditating furnishing the barn with porcelain feed boxes and cream-colored walls, and she has requested the State Board, as the veracious press avers, to see that lace curtains are put on the windows of the stables in the Agriculture School of Wisconsin University.

All this news is so extremely interesting that the public must be eager to hear a still more detailed account of the excellent uses to which the money of Wisconsin's taxpayers is being put. Just what airs, for instance, do those music machines play? Are the preferences of individual cows consulted? Would the kine that are quartered in a stable of which the walls are painted a delicate green give a more abundant supply of milk than do the cows who ruminate in a cream-tinted environment? What alluring possibilities, too, the phonograph offers of increasing the lacteal output! A record bearing "The Sands of Dee" feelingly rendered, for example, might move an impressionable young cow to fill the milk-pail to the brim. Then to think what a marvelous revolution in the dairyman's calling might be effected by introducing a moving-picture machine into the stable at milking time. Films could be run that would stir the churlish kine to unparalleled generosity. Clearly, the Wisconsin Idea is of universal application. But if even the unimaginative cow responds so promptly to esthetic and uplifting influences, it is manifestly unjust to deprive the other denizens of the farmyard of similar opportunities for "self-realization"; that is, provided the patient taxpayer does not object.

The Catholic College's Advantages

IN a paper on "Vicarious Thinking," contributed to the New York Nation by William T. Foster, President of Reed College, he complains that nowadays too much thinking is being done for students by tutors, lecturers and writers of text-books, and the system in his opinion is producing a race of men and women devoid of all intellectual enthusiasm and without strong moral or religious convictions. He writes:

> Four hundred and thirty-seven essays on "The Essential Place of Religion in Education" have been submitted to the National Education Association in competition for a prize of one thousand dollars. As one of the judges, I have read the best of these essays, many of which were written by ministers and teachers. Nothing in them seemed to me more conspicuous than the lack of logical structure. Most of the writers used undefined terms with shifting meanings, and at times with no apparent meaning at all. Few of the writers felt the necessity of proceeding from evidence to conclusion by logical reasoning; yet all were attempting to prove a proposition. They were arguing, but with little regard for the principles of argumentation. In short, they revealed no power of sustained thinking.

Mr. Foster assigns as other causes of this intellectual stagnation of our young "students" the "alluring ease of their environment," the dominance of intercollegiate athletics, the influence of college fraternities and a lack of interest in religion. Perhaps the author of "Vicarious Thinking" is not aware that in many Catholic colleges in our land the chief defect he deplores is corrected by a two years' course in scholastic philosophy which gives those who follow it a thorough training in logical thinking. It is by no means merely a history of philosophical systems as is the case in the average non-Catholic seat of learning. As for the other enemies of intellectual enthusiasm that Mr. Foster names, the "growing tendency toward luxurious living" on the part of students is checked, as a rule, by the necessarily economical administration of Catholic colleges; the fraternity evil simply does not exist in our educational institutions; the distractions arising from intercollegiate athletics our stricter discipline reduces to a minimum; and so far are Catholic students from showing no interest in religion, that an example of the vital character of our students' Catholicism may be found in the fact that nearly half the young men in the largest strictly classical college in the land, go to Holy Communion, on their own initiative, every day, most receive weekly, and all every month.

Krishna or Christ?

MR. TAGORE is a Hindu gentleman who has attained considerable fame as a poet: but no simple person, to whom language is a vehicle of expressing thought rather than concealing it, can well deny that Mr. Tagore is a pagan. His poetry, moreover, is pagan, too, as Mr. Joyce Kilmer pointed out some time ago in these columns. But a writer in the Poetry Magazine seems to think it a cruel injustice to call Tagore a pagan. The critic graciously concedes that the Hindu poet is "not a Catholic," but remarks: "I should hesitate to call him less a Christian than many that I know; but if Mr. Tagore had been born a Catholic (whether in Brooklyn or Calcutta) would Mr. Kilmer have felt that it was unfitting to link his name with that of St. Francis or Thomas à Kempis?"

If our hesitating critic has only a scant knowledge of Christianity, he has none whatever of mysticism; nevertheless into the realms of mysticism he rushes with a fatuous disregard of consequences. Of course, it all depends upon what is meant by mysticism and mystics. I doubt very much," says the writer in the Poetry Magazine, "if the mind of the mystic recognizes any distinction between Krishna and Jesus Christ"; though Tagore's critic had charged him with substituting fatalism for hope, Nirvana for Heaven, and Krishna for Christ. The whole world teems with "mystics," from Washington Square to Mount Athos; and they are of all kinds. And the mysticism of Tagore, like that of the sighful Omar Khayyam, is but pessimism; artistically imaged, but pessimism none the less. Even such symbols as temple bells, water-jars, and the desert, which are said to express desire for the mystical union with God, can point to nothing better than a negative union, a final absorption or annihilation of personality in Nirvana.

The distinguishing mark of the true mystic is not the faculty of rare exotic imagery, but the possession of sound common sense. For your mystic who has really entered upon the way of mystical contemplation finds himself sooner or later faced with the choice between practicality or insanity. "I am come," said the Great Mystic, "that they may have life; and may have it more abundantly." And this fulness of life, translated by the burning fire of love—for the mystic is simply the supernatural lover—into sanctified common sense, is the raft that bears the Catholic mystic safely across the dangerous ocean of mysticism. For there is no doubt that they alone are true mystics whose vision of contemplation rests not upon the silent emptiness of the desert, or upon the frail earthern water-jar, but on a living Person, whom they touch and taste and handle.

But the mysticism of the moderns is a name and nothing more, and the temple bells are of all symbols the most fit, for the temple bells will tinkle to any wind that blows upon them. It is not surprising after all, that the writer in the Poetry Magazine should want to link Tagore with St. Francis or Thomas à Kempis. For this question does not turn upon being "born a Catholic," whether in Brooklyn or Calcutta, but it does turn upon so simple yet tremendous a thing as an attitude of mind which does recognize a distinction between Krishna and Christ. As this distinction, moreover appears to be of a fundamental character, the Christianity of Tagore will largely be bound up with what he thinks of Krishna, which, in a few words, is the whole Catholic objection to the Tagore craze.

LITERATURE

XIV—St. Thomas Aquinas

WITH mild, magnanimous gaiety Aquinas accepts the nickname "The Dumb Ox" fastened on his huge Falstaff frame. Indeed, with rare medieval charm he suggests, in his preface to the "Summa," that he, the great meek-eyed ox, will write a great, simple book which will be as milk for babes. Yet the age he wrote for was not a child in thought, but a man in full habit, capable of assimilating the strong meats of thinking, nor was it in extremis, that it should need milk.

But it may be questioned whether we moderns, who are children only, in our ignorance have not reached a point of ill-health, through self-indulgence, where a milk diet of thinking is absolutely imperative. Milk as the doctors assure us is not a food; but, food. I do not here speak of those man-made or man-desecrated milks which are humanized or sterilized beyond redemption. They may still be milk; but they have ceased to be food. I mean the untainted elemental milk from the udder or the breast. This thing, the property only of mammals, is a synthesis of all other foods, in such a human form divine that the young or ailing live on it when they would die on aught else.

Now, the modern mind has not yet succeeded in making a synthesis. There have been tragic efforts here and abroad; but nothing final. Spencer alone among our English-speaking thinkers undertook to synthesize knowledge. He had a bad novitiate in an engineer's office, and in the citadels of agnosticism. In the end his synthesis showed vast gaps; which he pathetically excused with the plea of ill health. France gave us the synthesis of Comte. It was almost perfect so far as it went; but it did not go over the ankle. There was no room in it for spirit; and the author of the synthesis began the undertaking by throwing himself into the Seine in a fit of madness. Germany has had a genius for syntheses. There, in fact, synthesizing is not sporadic like geological faults; but regular like a disease. Most of the syntheses quite naturally glorify Germany and quite cheerfully overlook humanity or God.

The thirteenth century entered gaily as a child into the kingdom of thought. Men like Aquinas and Dante, who is only chronologically of the fourteenth, took possession of thought, as a child entering a room takes possession of all its inmates. It was part of the humility of this precocious child among the centuries to appropriate what truths had been spoken, no matter where or by whom spoken. St. Thomas certainly believed in a Communion of Saints. But his devotion to Plato and Aristotle shows him quite as devoted a believer in the Communion of Philosophers. Indeed the pages of the "Summa" might almost leave us in doubt whether this man set more store by Augustine, Chrysostom, and the Christian Fathers than by Plato, Aristotle and the pagan thinkers.

His reverence for truth and for philosophers, the high priests of truth, has found few imitators in the philosophers of the past three centuries. Even when Aquinas refuted a philosopher he did him the honor of understanding him. It was his engaging way of worshipping truth. But the philosophers mostly dominant in Western Europe since the sixteenth century have thought the Dumb Ox of Sicily not worth understanding; even when he was worth refuting. He was set aside as barbarous, like the cathedral of Lincoln, or Chartres, or Cologne. No doubt in his exile from the appreciation of later ages he was content with his fellow-exiles.

We have said that modern philosophy does not give us a synthesis. An almost brief expression would be the naked saying, "There is no modern philosophy." So that in sheer despair the present age must save itself from shipwreck by laying hold of the last complete synthesis: the "Summa" of Aquinas. We must take it or sink, for there is no other synthesis whereby we moderns may be saved.

By his birth in the thirteenth century St. Thomas was an encyclopedist. Men in those days made a unity of all their knowledge or their craft. Everything they knew or could make was at last put into a book or a minster. If they were philosophers they wrote, like St. Thomas, a Summa; if poets they sang, like Dante, a Paradise. But in their synthesis or their song they were always children of the people. Their thought or poetry was no self-centered disdain for the thoughts and songs of men who had gone before. To break abruptly the thread of philosophy or poetry they looked upon as an insult not only to the Muses, but to humanity. To decry Plato or Homer was to lay profane hands on mankind's holy of holies. It was to deny the catholicity of truth; for even the lowliest of mankind had accepted the substance of what philosophy and poetry had bequeathed to mankind.

The first framework of the synthesis made by Aquinas is the mind of Aquinas. It is questionable whether any other mind since his days could have housed so many thoughts and facts as that of this genius who is reported to have known the Bible and the Metaphysics of Aristotle by heart. The second framework of the synthesis is the Credo and the Decalogue. It is a bold appeal to the faith of millions. It is not an insult offered to mankind in the mass. Indeed it is almost an explicit assertion that the chief function of wisdom is to coincide with mankind; and that the chief duty of philosophy is to justify our intuitions.

The great thinker pays his readers the delicate compliment of setting his thoughts before them mirrored in a flawless unimpassioned style which hides itself behind the truth revealed. It will be almost impossible for the reader of these mathematically exact reasonings to imagine their author as a poet or as a mystic. Yet the Dumb Ox wrote the "Adoro Te"; and is a canonized saint of the Catholic Church. A poet and no mean judge of his craft, Coventry Patmore, has written of "the substantial poetry of imaginative insight into the noblest reality" found in Aquinas: "Aquinas is to Dante as the tableland of Thibet is to the Peak of Teneriffe; and the first is not less essentially a poet, in the sense of a seer, because his language is even more austere and without ornament than the latter."

On his mysticism the Catholic Church, that most accredited of all critics, has passed the final judgment of canonization. With such witnesses to the supreme qualities of his mind, fancy and soul, the Dumb Ox may well find a new welcome in the mind and heart of the English-speaking peoples, who need nothing so imperatively as a fixed center for the widening circumference of their theories and thoughts. VINCENT M'NABB, O.P.

REVIEWS

The Church of Christ: Its Foundation and Constitution. By Father PETER FINLAY, S.J. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.00.

It was a priori likely that anything that Father Finlay might write on the Church would be thorough; his long experience as a lecturer in theology made this a foregone conclusion; his book is more than this: it is so persuasive that it supplies a great need. One of the most striking things about Catholics is their absolute submission to the Church's authority. With unquestioning faith they assent to her teaching and with unwavering obedience they acquiesce in her discipline. They have done so all their lives; they will do so till they die. They have one answer ready when challenged by themselves or others, they are certain that the authority of the Church is all-sufficing. So it is. But it sometimes happens that even educated Catholics do not realize that their certainty is based on other grounds than the Church's assertions, grounds that are eminently reasonable, and capable of convincing intelligent inquirers who start with no other convictions than belief in God's existence. The Church has well-authenticated credentials, founded on history and logic, for her claim to be sole accredited teacher of religion, vested with infallibility and Divine authority.

It is to meet the needs of just this class that Father Finlay's book has been designed. Its excellence lies not in any originality of matter: this would be impossible; nor in sequence of thought: others have been no less logical; but in the fact that he has avoided the two pitfalls of being too profound or too popular, or rather has succeeded in being profound without being technical, and popular without being superficial. No frightening subtleties of exegesis, no forbidding accumulation of references that cannot be verified by the ordinary reader cloud the issue; except for an occasional passage taken from the Fathers or the Councils, the citations are almost exclusively from the New Testament, considered as an historical document. Father Finlay believes that the ordinary lay mind is not easily convinced by single texts, so his argument proceeds by way of accumulation, with the result that it is very convincing.

Laymen who wish to get a more intelligent grasp of the grounds on which their submission is based will find the volume complete and satisfying, and Catholics in general will be glad to know that there is a book that for literary excellence, soundness of reasoning, clear presentation of the foundations of the Catholic position, and most of all for persuasive force, is likely to convince and certain not to offend their inquiring non-Catholic friends. The author has been able, through the generosity of a friend, to have this excellent book published at a price within the reach of slender purses. J. H. F.

A Primer of Peace and War: the Principles of International Morality. Edited for the Catholic Social Guild by CHARLES PLATER, S.J., M.A. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $0.80.

Over There: War Scenes on the Western Front. By ARNOLD BENNETT. With Drawings by Walter Hale. New York: George H. Doran Co. $1.25.

France at War: On the Frontier of Civilization. By RUDYARD KIPLING. Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday, Page & Co. $0.50.

Belgium Neutral and Loyal. By ÉMILE WAXWEILER. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25.

Through Terror to Triumph. Speeches and Pronouncements of the Right Hon. David Lloyd George, M.P., Since the Beginning of the War. Arranged by F. L. STEVENSON, B.A. (Lond.). New York: George H. Doran Co. $1.00.

Between the Lines. By BOYD CABLE. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.35.

In the Hands of the Enemy: Being the Experiences of a Prisoner of War. By BENJAMIN G. O'RORKE, M.A., Chaplain to the Forces. With Illustrations. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $0.50.

War books continue without cessation to pour from the press. So much has been written of late concerning the war and from so strictly partisan a point of view, so many authors have allowed violent sympathy to play fast and loose with principle, that it is a relief to find our first book one which builds upon reason only. The editor and his collaborators are all English it is true, and have quoted mainly from English sources, but they have laid under contribution the standard writers of all nations, and have endeavored with considerable success, to give a clear, impartial, abstract presentation of the Catholic principles that underlie international relations. The book will be valuable for all who wish to clarify their ideas on a subject that just at present is much clouded.

In order to keep those at home enthusiastic about the war it was a shrewd move to have distinguished men of letters go to the firing line and then describe what they saw. This is what Mr. Bennett and Mr. Kipling have done. The latter's six short papers of impressions at the front are preceded by the verses on "France," written a year before the present conflict began. He sings:

> From each other's throat we wrenched valor's last reward,
> That extorted word of praise gasped 'twixt lunge and guard.
> In each other's cup we poured mingled blood and tears,
> Brutal joys, unmeasured hopes, intolerable fears,
> All that soiled or salted life for a thousand years.
> Proved beyond the need of proof, matched in every clime,
> O companion, we have lived greatly through all time.

The well-known characteristics of Mr. Bennett's style make his war book particularly readable, for his scenes and men really live. The description of Reims Cathedral and of ruined Ypres is rich in striking details, and the story of his journey through the trenches is by no means dull. Neither he nor Mr. Kipling seems very fond of the Germans.

In Emile Waxweiler's well-documented and calmly-reasoned book is presented a strong brief for Belgium. He analyzes carefully the conversations and correspondence that took place among European diplomatists and ministers prior to August 9, 1914, regarding Belgian neutrality and maintains that the interpretation German writers have put on a certain clause in a document that was found in the Brussels war office is quite unwarranted. The next volume on our list contains nineteen addresses bearing on the war that England's Minister of Munitions delivered from September 19, 1914, to August 5, 1915. "Every shell a lifeguard!" is his slogan and he appeals earnestly to the taxpayer and the workman to make cheerfully every sacrifice that the proper arming of the troops at the front demands.

"Between the Lines" is a punsome title, for the author explains that the fourteen stories in the book were written on the western front, "within sound of the German guns and for the most part within shell and rifle range," and that it is meant to give those at home some idea what horrors are implied in an official report that announces, for example, that "to the right a violent artillery bombardment has been in progress," or that "a mine was successfully exploded under a section of the enemy's trenches." Mr. Cable spares the reader few details of the merciless character of trench warfare today, yet the graphic descriptions he gives of the fighting now going on in France will seem very weak and inadequate, no doubt, to those actually engaged in it. The author of our last book, notwithstanding his name, is an Anglican minister who was taken captive after the battle of Landrecies and imprisoned for a year in Germany. His manuscript was passed by the Kaiser's censors, and indeed the chaplain has few complaints to make about his treatment while "in the hands of the enemy." He likes to call the Catholic Church the "French" Church, and piously observes that in one prison "the three branches of the Catholic Church worshiped God in the same room." W. D.

Historical Records and Studies. Edited by CHARLES GEORGE HERBERMANN, LL.D. Volume VIII. June, 1915. New York: The United States Catholic Historical Society.

Dr. Herbermann continues in this number of the "Records" his most important history of the Sulpician Congregation in the United States, the present chapters dealing with the administrations of Father Nagot and Father Tessier at St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, and the progress of St. Mary's College and other subsidiaries of the seminary. In addition to an illuminating view of higher education in the first decade of the nineteenth century, the details show how loyal the Sulpicians who had come here from France were to the fundamental ideals of their founders, the illustrious Fathers Olier and Emery. Other papers making up the contents of this number of the "Records," several having illustrations, are: "Dr. John McLoughlin," Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.; "Mission Work among Colored Catholics," Thomas F. Meehan; "Two Letters of Mother Seton"; "Evils of Trusteeism," Rev. Gerald C. Treacy, S.J.; "Der Neue Welt-Bote," Charles G. Herbermann, LL.D.; "Letters of Father Adam Gilg, S.J.," with notes of Professor August Rupp; "Joseph Picot Limoëlan de la Clorivière," Pierre Marique, Ph.D.; "The Reverend Lawrence Grœssel," Henry F. Herbermann, LL.B.; "Joseph Sadoc Alemany, O.P., Archbishop of San Francisco," Gaynor Maddox; "Register of the Clergy Laboring in the Archdiocese of New York"; Book Review, Necrology. T. F. M.

The Complete Poetical Works of Robert Browning. New Edition. With Additional Poems First Published in 1914. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

This is a neat, strongly bound volume of more than 1,300 pages, edited very economically and sparingly by Augustine Birrell and containing, with other matter in the appendix a short account, by Frederic G. Kenyon, of the Browning MSS. and their dispersion at the sale of Messrs. Sotseby, Wilkinson & Hodge in May, 1913. The additional poems mentioned in the title of the volume are few and slight, with little or no biographical, critical, or historical interest. Only blind devotees of Browning may be expected to welcome them. They are printed in the appendix together with some minute criticisms of Browning's earlier poems by Elizabeth Barrett, the future Mrs. Browning. These will be read curiously by literary students. The book is a book of reference. Who will ever plough through this mountain of an industry that was wont to set itself for taskwork a poem a day for a fortnight? Literary students, who find the reading of Milton's "Paradise Lost" a difficult performance in these giddy times will balk at Browning whole. Piecemeal he will go down. It is well for him that a poet is judged by his best. His best is beyond the reach of tempus edax. But he could be bad, and his bad is horrid.

As one turns over these pages it is hard to avoid thinking that Browning, for all his long years in Italy, is the least cosmopolitan and the most insular and provincial of our great English poets. Why he should choose to live so long in a Catholic Latin country is difficult to determine, unless we suppose that he was satisfied with a genial climate and the inanimate beauties of nature and art. His Catholic ecclesiastics are all cunning; his Italian men are mostly conspirators or assassins; his Italian women are nearly all frail and picturesque. His Italy is a crude, highly colored Italy of the grand opera. Imagine the cynical moralizing of a bright, young Dissenter, reared in a strictly Methodist neighborhood, in the gallery at his first opera. That represents roughly a frame of mind from which Browning was never able entirely to shake himself free. J. J. D.

The Case of American Drama. By THOMAS H. DICKINSON. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.50.

This volume of 223 pages, by an Associate Professor of English at the University of Wisconsin, discusses the present status and future outlook of the legitimate drama in America. In common with all lovers of the great art histrionic, the author realizes that American drama, i. e., the body of plays and school of dramatic interpretation which will be so distinctly national as to be typical of the genius of free America, is, as yet, a name only and a cherished hope. But Professor Dickinson's book is by no means a Jeremiad. While admitting frankly the decadence of the American stage at the present moment, and though severe in his analysis and indictment of the sordid commercialism that has transformed a once noble art into a questionable business, the general tone of the criticism is optimistic. The author distinguishes clearly between the basic causes of the present chaotic state of affairs, and the instruments that were only factors in the process of devolution. Among the latter he includes the syndicate with its attendant evils, the lack of systematic training for young players and the mediocre talent of the great body of native playwrights. How are these evils to be met and eradicated? While attempting to answer this pertinent question, Professor Dickinson gives an instructive account of the methods by which the drama has been safeguarded in Europe from the incubus of commercialism that has proved the stage's undoing in America. But at the end of his sketch of the Comédie Française and the subsidized theaters of Germany, he wisely concludes that such forms, though suggestive and stimulating to thoughtful endeavor, could not be successfully duplicated in in America.

Despite much that is not heartening, the author already sees signs of better things in the marked development of pageantry, masques and outdoor festivals during the last few years. We are turning to our own historical background for our themes; these are the external expression of the soul of America, the internal will come next: the message. The author has delivered his own message in a simple, easy style that is devoid of the sounding pedantry that not infrequently disfigures the contributions of university professors. Without once invoking the Zeitgeist or the materialistic concept of history, and without so much as mentioning evolution or "cosmic solidarity" he presents the case of American drama in a friendly and helpful spirit, neither dogmatizing incontinently nor spinning bizarre theories based on biological analogies, but simply indicating in a practical way, the native forces that may, in the fulness of time, bring forth an American drama that will be appropriate to the event. E. A. W.

A Budget of Paradoxes. By AUGUSTUS DE MORGAN. Second Edition. Edited by DAVID EUGENE SMITH. Two Volumes. Chicago: Open Court Publishing Co. $3.50.

It is forty-three years since the first edition of De Morgan's "Paradoxes" was issued by Mrs. de Morgan. The new edition, despite the author's religious antipathies, will be welcomed by all lovers of the odd in science, literature and social life. Like Isaac Disraeli, in "Curiosities of Literature," De Morgan has left us a veritable mine of information, the result of an old-fashioned capacity for a tremendous lot of reading. The paradoxes here recorded are chiefly in the realm of mathematical and natural science. The reader may revel in anecdotes about deluded mathematicians who lived in the futile hope of squaring the circle, calculating the value of pi, and such like not-over-hilarious achievements. If De Morgan had only kept to his last! When he leaves mathematics and dabbles in religion, he shows ignorance and bigotry. Priests are an abhorrence. St. Augustine is a "freakish arguer." Milner's "The End of Religious Controversy" should be entitled "The Floor of the Bottomless Pit." The opprobrious term "Papist" is the only one fit for us; "Roman Christian" might be allowed; "Roman Catholic" is misleading. The medal given Wiseman for the defense of the Faith was entitled Pro Fide Vindicata; that meant, says De Morgan, "for the defense of a fiddle string," the Catholic idea of faith, fides, being not worth more than a fiddle string!

W. F. D.

The Modern Study of Literature. By RICHARD GREEN MOULTON. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. $2.50.

This volume is a recent product from the pen of one of the first literary scholars of the day, a man whose work in interpretation, especially among the ancient classical exemplars is above criticism, and he has brought to the writing of the present book the same cultured judgment and power of analysis, together with a style which while never trivial is never tedious. The book, though of convenient size, covers a great field. One section after nicely formulating and fully discussing the ancient problem of the distinction between poetry and prose takes up historically the evolution of the epic, the drama and the lyric. But the main purpose and flavor of the book is profoundly critico-analytical. The essence of that elusive thing called literary form is held up to an investigation which while searching is intensely sympathetic. First its varieties are exposed and expounded, then its unity, and lastly its reflection as comprised in literary taste. A long but never superfluous treatment of criticism considered as an appraising of literary effort, or as itself the vehicle of literature then follows. The consideration of literature's relation to philosophy as a "mode of thinking," and finally of literature as a mode of art is next in order. In conclusion ancient and modern methods of literary study are reviewed and compared. Altogether the book is a treasure, reflecting the most trained insight and widest culture. T. B. C.

Sumerian Epic of Paradise: the Flood and the Fall of Man. By STEPHEN LANGDON. Philadelphia: Publications of the Babylonian Section of the University of Pennsylvania.

To a translation, transliteration, transcription and photographic reproduction of a three-segment tablet, on which a Sumerian scribe has written the tradition of the end of Paradise, Mr. Langdon prefixes a synopsis of another Sumerian poem on the Creation and the Flood, a discussion of the site of Paradise, and a comparative study of cognate Babylonian, Hebrew, Egyptian and Greek traditions. With the distinguished author's purely scientific work no fault can be found. The same cannot be said for all of his deductions. There is, for instance, no solid reason for asserting that the Hebrew tradition of the history of man from his creation to the days of Terah and Abraham is a product evolved from Babylonian doctrines, or that Eve is a survival of the ancient west Semitic mother goddess, or that the Hebrew of Gen. iv, 1, ascribes to the mother of all the living the words "I have created a man with Jahweh." The basic error of all such assertions is due to a prejudice in favor of the popular theory of evolution, and the consequent desire to make facts square with theories rather than theories with facts.

J. T. L.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Ill-informed persons who believe that the cause of the present state of things below the Rio Grande is purely social and economic may find enlightenment in what a "Mexican Lawyer" has written for the current Catholic Mind. He shows that in his country there has never been real antagonism between the masses and the classes. Mexico's dreadful condition today is due, he shows, to the selfish ambitions of a few anti-Catholic bandits, who never would have been able to attain the bad eminence they now enjoy were it not for the sympathy and help they receive from over the border. E. C. Hendrix then tells how warmly the Mexican people are attached to the Church, and broadly sketches the benefits Catholicism has conferred on them. The number ends with two short papers entitled "Reflections on Mexico" and "A Query and an Answer."

"Scally, the Story of a Perfect Gentleman" ($0.75) by Ian Hay, and "America at Work ($1.00) by Joseph Husband are attractive little books that have recently come from the press of the Houghton, Mifflin Co. The first is a dog story told with great wit and humor and the other is made up of a dozen well-written papers descriptive of our great industries, the "Semaphore" and the "Skyscraper" being particularly good.——"Katrinka, the Story of a Russian Child" (Dutton, $1.25) by Helen Eggleston Haskell is the latest of "The Little Schoolmate Series," the six preceding numbers of which have already been favorably noticed in AMERICA. The heroine of this volume becomes a famous dancer and secures the recall of her parents from Siberia.

"Thoughts of the Servant of God, Sœur Thérèse of the Child Jesus" (Kenedy, $0.60) which an Irish Carmelite has translated from the French "Pensées" makes an excellent holiday book for the numberless friends of the Little Flower. Under twoscore captions are arranged short reflections of the saintly nun on hope, zeal, simplicity, etc., and the book is attractively bound and printed. "The Loneliness of Christ" by Robert Keable, (Dutton, $0.75) is a beautiful study of the isolation experienced by the Son of God in most of the phases of His mortal life and the necessity of self-discipline in those who would walk in His footsteps. In sentiment and spirit it is so generally Catholic, with not more than a few jarring notes, that one wonders how it comes to pass that the author can remain outside the Church.

As was to be expected, the Dublin Review for October is quite warlike in character. The anonymous author of a paper on "Religion in the French Army" asserts that not all the 20,000 priests, seminarians and religious who have been called to the colors are actually fighting on the firing line. Some 300 priests are acting as official or unofficial chaplains and "by far the larger number" of the remainder are employed as hospital assistants, stretcher-bearers and clerks. But all the clergy under thirty years of age and in robust health are combatants in the active forces. What kind of priests these men will be after the war is over remains to be seen. There is a good article on "The Teutonic Knights and the Kingdom of Prussia," by Mgr. Barnes; Mr. Mallock contributed a very readable "Romance of Early English Trade with Russia," and papers that should prove of special interest are W. R. Castle's "Some American Problems" and Mr. Ward's notes on Notre Dame University, Indiana. The latter's paper, however, contains errors of fact that a competent American reviser of the manuscript could have corrected.

It would be too much to expect perhaps that Mr. Eden Philpotts should write a book that would be absolutely unobjectionable from the Catholic point of view, but in his last novel, "Old Delabole" (Macmillan, $1.50), he has almost succeeded. The scene is laid in North Cornwall, and the life of the quarrymen in the little village has the air of being depicted from actual observation. It is very real, and in spite of the Methodistic hardness which characterizes most of the characters, has passages of elevated spiritual insight. There runs through the volume a thread of romance, but the author is more concerned to describe a people than to tell a love story.——Sylvia Marshall, "The Bent Twig" (Holt, $1.35) of Dorothy Canfield's latest book, became so tired of hearing her professional father citing Emerson's "What will you have, quoth God. Take it and pay for it," that she was ready "to get right up and scream." "It makes me feel," she explained, "as though somebody had banged a big door in my face and shut me up in prison." The account of how the heroine learned to apply the text to her home, school and college life in a State University town of the West is the best part of the novel

---

In studying foreign languages, now more than ever perhaps, practical drill in conversation is being urgently recommended by all school authorities. To meet this requirement, Messrs. Bierman and Frank have prepared a "Conversational French Reader" (Allyn & Bacon, $0.80), which, though a theme-book and reader, is primarily intended as a manual of conversation. This volume is well planned; the exercises are effective, on topics of timely interest, and the devices accompanying each exercise very helpful. The little work should commend itself strongly to the consideration of instructors in French. Everywhere in the book, in the preface, illustrations, selections, there is a gratifying note of cheerfulness which has been deliberately fostered by the authors.——From the same firm and typographically a fellow to the foregoing, comes a new and attractive edition of "L'Abbé Constantin," with copious notes, grammar lessons and exercises. Many learners would prefer less or nothing of the grammar lessons and more of the exercises.

"Six Little Ducklings" ($1.00), written and illustrated by Katharine Pyle, and "The Wishing Fairies" ($0.75), by Madge A. Bigham, with drawings in color by Fanny Y. Cory, are attractive books that Dodd, Mead & Co. have published for small children to read, hear read, or look at. The ducklings' adventures are very exciting, and the fairies are most generous in granting every child its favorite wish. Then if little boys and girls of the second and third grades should like to know all about "Nixie Bunny in Holiday-Land" (Berkley-Cardy Co., Chicago, $0.40), Joseph C. Sindelar's prettily illustrated "rabbit-story of the holidays" is probably just what they are looking for.——Admirers of Pollyanna, the incurable little optimist, will doubtless be interested in "The Glad Book" calendar for 1916 (Page, $1.50). Cheering words from Mrs. Porter's books are arranged on fifty-two panels, each of which is graced with a picture of Pollyanna and scenes of her home.

In the "True Stories of Great Americans" series, (Macmillan, $0.50) "Robert Fulton" by his great-granddaughter, Alice Crary Sutcliffe, is the latest contribution. As in preceding volumes comprising biographies of Captain John Smith, Benjamin Franklin and General Robert E. Lee, the aim has been to describe interestingly and vividly lives of the great men who toiled to lay strong and solid foundations for the American Republic. Miss Sutcliffe has made clear the principles that marked the life of her ancestor, and the great characteristic of hard work that displayed itself throughout his useful life. The book is written for the most part with the child's point of view in mind, though older readers may learn an immense deal about Fulton's early experiments with submarines, torpedoes and steamboats.——"The Evolution of Literature," by A. S. Mackenzie, (Crowell, $1.50) is an attempt to get at the beginnings of literature and show that there has been a gradual development according to fixed laws, from primitive beginnings to the comparatively higher types of modern times. The argument is not more convincing than that for evolution in the organic world, which, to be sure, is scant praise. Those, however, whose field is comparative literature, will find many things of interest and value in the volume.

BOOKS RECEIVED

Abingdon Press, New York:
Historic Churches in Mexico. With Some of Their Legends. By Mrs. John Wesley Butler. $1.50.

Richard G. Badger, Boston:
Clouded Amber. By Patience Warren. $1.35.

Dodd, Mead & Co., New York:
The New International Encyclopedia. Vols. XIII–XVI. Jovanovic–New Forest.

Funk & Wagnalls, New York:
How to Live. Rules for Healthful Living Based on Modern Science. By Irving Fisher and Eugene Lyman Fisk, M.D. $1.00.

Ginn & Co., Boston:
The New Hudson Shakespeare. Introduction and Notes by Henry Norman Hudson, LL.D. Edited and Revised by Ebenezer Charlton Black, LL.D. (Glasgow), with the Cooperation of Andrew Jackson George, Litt.D. (Amherst). Macbeth, King Lear, Julius Cæsar, As You Like It, A Midsummer Night's Dream, The Merchant of Venice, Much Ado About Nothing, The Comedy of Errors, Twelfth Night. $0.30 each.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
The Little Book of American Poets (1787-1900). Edited by Jessie B. Rittenhouse. $1.25; The Mexican Twins. By Lucy Fitch Perkins. $1.00; Is War Diminishing? By Frederick Adams Woods, M.D., and Alexander Baltzley. $1.00; David Penstephen. By Richard Price. $1.35.

John Lane Co., New York:
The Collected Poems of Rupert Brooke. With an Introduction by George Edward Woodberry, and a Biographical Note by Margaret Lavington, $1.25.

J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia:
Heroes and Heroines of Fiction, Classical, Mediæval, Legendary, Famous Characters and Famous Names in Novels, Romances, Poems and Dramas, Classified, Analyzed and Criticized, with Supplementary Citations from the Best Authorities. By William S. Walsh. $3.00; Universal Pronouncing Dictionary of Biography and Mythology. New Fourth Edition, Thoroughly Revised. By Joseph Thomas, M.D., LL.D. $10.00.

The Macmillan Co., New York:
The Famous Cities of Ireland. By Stephen Gwynn. $2.00.

John Jos. McVey, Philadelphia:
The Theory and Practice of Educational Gymnastics, Embracing Free Exercises, Rhythmic Steps, Track and Field Work, Games, Apparatus Work. By William A. Stecher, B.S.G. $1.50.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
The Ethics of Confucius; the Sayings of the Master and His Disciples upon the Conduct of "The Superior Man." Arranged According to the Plan of Confucius, with Running Commentary by Miles Menander Dawson. $1.50; The Golden Slipper and Other Problems for Violet Strange. By Anna Katharine Green. $1.35.

G. Arnold Shaw, New York:
Wood and Stone: a Romance. By John Cowper Powys. $1.50.

Fred'k A. Stokes Co., New York:
The Lord of Misrule and Other Poems. By Alfred Noyes. $1.60; Emma McChesney & Co. By Edna Ferber. $1.00.

Yale University Press, New Haven, Conn.:
Ethics in Service. By William Howard Taft, LL.D., D.C.L. $1.00; Sappho in Levkas and Other Poems. By William Alexander Percy. $1.00.

EDUCATION

The Gary Plan: a Popish Plot

THERE was once a lady of philosophic mind who after years of reflection announced that the source of most mundane evils was "the Pope in the Vacuum." Her name, I believe, was Eliza Jane Stafford, and she was a missionary; but whether the Eternal City ever became, as she had piously planned, a scene of her fruitful labors, I am unable to say. She lived, for the most part, within the sound of troubled waters. Unlike Mrs. Poyser, who could fall with remarkable facility "from the key of D with five sharps to the frank and genial C," this lady's career was a series of flats and discords. Giant Popery lay in wait for her at every turn of the road, and so dreadful an apprehension is quite enough to wreck the harmony of even the most blameless life. Never strong after the Syllabus of Pius IX, the Decrees of the Vatican Council were her death-blow; but before she passed to a land where Papists cease from troubling and Councils are at rest, she had gathered about her a number of zealots, some of whom survive to write to the newspapers, denouncing the Gary Plan as a popish plot.

CATHOLICS AND THE GARY PLAN

The aberrations of the human mind are as tortuous as the convolutions of a highly developed cerebellum, and much more interesting. To begin with, the Catholic Church has no deeper interest in the Gary Plan as a problem of practical pedagogy, than she has in a reconciliation of the various theories, advanced by sundry German scholars of repute, touching the original habitat of the cassowary. It is not her system, but Mr. Wirt's, or was before the cobblers began to improve it. Religious instruction, as Mr. Wirt has insisted, almost with peril to his vocal cords, forms no essential part of the Plan. Provided that the school and church authorities agree on the practical details, and provided further that parents expressly wish it, children may receive this training, but not on the school premises, nor as part of a curriculum for which scholastic credit is granted. One need not be one of Macaulay's schoolboys to see how far short of the Catholic ideal this arrangement falls. Religion is the very soul of the Catholic school; it is not something merely added to secular instruction, but a spirit which pervades, corrects and elevates the whole process of education. Mr. Wirt can hardly be blamed for presenting the non-sectarian view which allows gymnastics or shopwork to be substituted for religion. He is legislating not for Catholic but for public schools.

SOME ADVANTAGES

It is probably true that many Catholics are inclined to favor the Gary Plan precisely because it may afford the non-Catholic public school child the chance of some religious training. The problem of a coming unchurched generation, recruited from the ranks of Protestantism, does not press on the Catholic as a personal matter; nevertheless, as a citizen interested in good order, he cannot but own to a feeling of apprehension at the thought that millions of children are growing into maturity utterly without religious education or even affiliation. Newman once raised a storm when he remarked that he considered the Established Church to be an effective bulwark against errors more fundamental than her own; but the fear which today moves many Catholics to believe that some religious feeling and principle are better both for the State and the individual than utter indifference or actual hostility, will not now be taken as smacking of latitudinarianism.

NO SUBSTITUTE FOR CATHOLIC SCHOOLS

This consideration may explain why some Catholics have spoken and written in favor of the Gary Plan. Another reason affects Catholics themselves. The religious instruction period, if introduced, will give Catholic workers an opportunity to get in touch with those Catholic children who either by necessity or through the perversity of short-sighted parents, find themselves in the public school. Much good may thus be done; yet it cannot be too strongly emphasized that this is but salvage work and not what the Church understands by religious education; it is the choice of a lesser evil and in no sense a Catholic ideal. The Gary Plan, if presented as a satisfactory substitute for the parochial school, is to be absolutely rejected. What the Church wishes in the education of her children is admirably expressed by the Baltimore Council, and has been repeated in numerous Pastoral Letters. The principles and directions there laid down are, and doubtless will continue to be, the norm and plan of action for both clergy and laity.

MASKS AND DARK LANTERNS

In New York and elsewhere, the controversy over the Gary Plan has dragged the ancient and utterly impertinent question to the fore: "Are Catholics plotting to gain absolute control of the public schools?" This foolish question, or some form of it, is apparently perennial; age cannot wither it, nor custom stale. Some busybody with a nose for statistics finds that a large proportion of the public school teachers are "Papists." His creative genius immediately invests these shrinking schoolmarms with all the dark and dubious qualities of a Guy Fawkes, transposed to a feminine key. He hears that the president of the School Board is suspected of being a Catholic, either because he takes an egg for his breakfast on Friday, or because his wife's grand-aunt is reported to have had an adopted daughter who died, it is said, murdered, it is whispered, in a convent in California or maybe in Florida, probably about the year in which Mrs. O'Leary's cow succeeded in making Chicago famous. If this unfortunate president escapes the accusation of being a tool of the Jesuits, it is only because the imagination of the anti-Catholic agitator has been diverted for the moment by the more alluring details of some impropriety upon which his alleged mind has chanced.

CATHOLIC PLOTS

Abandoning the policy of answering a fool according to his folly, it should hardly be necessary in this day of newspapers and moving-pictures, to state that American Catholics are not plotting against anything, even a "yellow" press. They are too busy with legitimate interests; they would hardly know how to go about plotting. For the most part they are ordinary persons, not marked off from the common herd by any peculiarity of physiognomy or garb, who grumble about the weather and the bad street-car service, who pay their taxes, "root" for the home team, carry umbrellas when it rains, and endeavor with varying degrees of success, to be good Christians and good citizens.

Drawing upon my own experience, I should say that Catholics are as much given to plotting as Jesuits are given to "gliding," or to hissing, between clenched teeth too, "Foiled again!" when the sturdy Protestant hero refuses to unhand them; but not more. As desirable citizens who mind their own business, they may pass; but if I had any plotting to be done, I should seek assistance elsewhere. Catholics could not "gain absolute control of the public schools" even if they wished it; and they do not wish it. They have troubles enough of their own. The country may be at rest. So far as the Catholic Church is concerned, the public schools will continue to muddle happily along under the benign smile of those areopagitically sapient bodies, their respective School Boards.

STATE AID

State aid for parochial schools is, however, another matter; but Catholics do not seem half so determined to get it as non-Catholics are to keep them from getting it. Contrary to Protestant tradition, as retailed in the Protestant press, it is not "a burning question" either with clergy or laity. Once brought under discussion, however, the Catholic trait of unity in the Faith and divergence in nearly everything else, at once gives a delightful piquancy to the ensuing debate. Some Catholics, and they are probably a vast majority, hold that the system which forces a man to pay for a school to which he cannot in conscience send his children, is flagrantly unjust. But even among these, there is no commonly received opinion as to the method to be employed in removing what is felt to be a real injustice.

There are Catholics who favor a pro rata apportionment of the funds appropriated for public education, not as a gift or reward, but as a return in equity for work which many communities cannot do for themselves, and by which in any case, the State ultimately profits in an educated body of citizens. Others again, strongly oppose this plan. These believe that it is far better for the Catholic school to escape all State domination and the danger of undue State supervision, by relying for its support upon the generosity of the Catholic people.

REST FOR THE TIMOROUS

When taken up at all, these and cognate matters have been discussed by Catholics only in their private capacity. On the proposal to ask public funds for work done in the American parochial schools, neither the Church nor any body of ecclesiastics or laymen, has spoken with an authority binding the consciences and acts of Catholics. It is true that Catholics do not "approve of the system of educating youth, unconnected with the Catholic faith and the power of the Church," and would, if they could, bring about a change, not by "plotting," but by lawful means. Catholic educators are not alone in believing that the public school system, from a professional point of view, is far from perfection; and many educational leaders of the day share the Catholic conviction that the school which sharpens a boy's wits without strengthening his will by religious principles against evil, is as bad for the State as it is for the boy.

Catholics will, no doubt, continue to urge the correction of whatever they deem harmful in public education; but to ease the apprehension of the timorous, it may be stated in confidence, that there will be no "plotting." Dark-lanterns, masks, slander, dynamite and the torch, or their equivalents in the moral and physical orders, are singularly ineffective weapons with which to "gain absolute control over the public schools," or anything else. As a means of settling differences of opinion or principle, they have been eschewed by the majority of mankind, ever since our remoter ancestors crawled out of their reedy fens, and gave over the picturesque habit of painting themselves blue.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

Child Legislation

"THE century of the child" is the name which has been given to the period in which we live. The title suggests the enthusiasm of a specialist in child-welfare problems rather than the quiet judgment of an unbiased observer. So many political, social and economic movements occupy at present the foreground of the civic stage and attract public attention that it would be hazardous to single out any one of them as giving the dominant tone to the motley scene we are witnessing, or in which we ourselves are perhaps active participants. Yet no one can gainsay the fact that a vast amount of attention has been focused upon the child, for better or for worse.

Even as this article is being written, the press service of the Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor announces that State health officials of thirty-nine States have pledged their cooperation in the observance of a nation-wide "Baby Week," recently proposed by the General Federation of Women's Clubs. The Bureau's circular, we are further informed, is sent in response to inquiries from organizations in forty-five States and the District of Columbia. But the most convincing proof of the persistent agitation carried on throughout our country in favor of our little ones is the actual crystallization of the many and various welfare theories in the shape of child legislation.

EXTENT OF CHILD LEGISLATION

For those who have not closely followed the developments of this movement a survey of the laws for the benefit of children passed in a single year will offer a decided surprise. The retrospect, made possible by the report of the Children's Bureau, reveals a universal effort in the United States to deal with the various social and economic phases of the child problem by means of legislative enactments. Thus during the current year alone forty-five State and Territorial Legislatures and the Congress of the United States have passed laws affecting child welfare. The propaganda has extended even to the far distant Territories. Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico and the Philippines have all actively participated in it. A great variety of legal measures has naturally been suggested by the different conditions of the various sections. The following, according to the Children's Bureau, are some of the child problems dealt with by the various State or Territorial Legislatures.

NATURE OF THE LAWS

No fewer than twenty-seven States have during the past year amended their provisions for dependent children; eight have altered their treatment of juvenile delinquents; sixteen have strengthened their child-labor law and fourteen have legislated for the needs of the mentally defective or the feeble-minded. Public schools were opened for social-center purposes in three more States and in the District of Columbia. Nine States amended, or for the first time passed, a playground law. Four passed a vital-statistics law to assure a complete birth registration.

A few of the States are specifically selected for honorable mention by the Children's Bureau, because they have made notable advances during the past year:

> Alabama, for example, whose Legislature meets only once in four years, enacted a new child-labor law, a compulsory school attendance law, an excellent desertion and non-support law and a State-wide juvenile court law. Florida remodeled its treatment of juvenile delinquents, recognized the principle of compulsory school attendance and appointed a State commission on the need for mothers' pensions. Kansas established an industrial commission to regulate hours, wages and conditions of work for women and minors, and a division of child hygiene in the State board of health; it also enacted a playground law and a mothers' pension law. New Jersey and Wyoming passed comprehensive acts relating to the care of dependent children, and Pennsylvania carefully drafted laws relating to child labor and vocational education.

INDIRECT CHILD LEGISLATION

This surely is a formidable list of legal enactments; but it does not complete the enumeration, since there still remain various forms of indirect children's legislation now under consideration in different States. Thus commissions have been appointed in Arkansas, Florida, and Utah, to report on the needs of the feeble-minded. A commission in New Jersey is drafting a State program for the reorganization of the public care of defectives, dependents, and delinquents. In Missouri and New Hampshire commissions are preparing State assistance for the blind. Delaware has its vocational education commission, and other States have commissions at work upon minimum wage laws, mothers' pension laws, and social insurance, which is ultimately to provide for the little ones.

OUTLYING TERRITORIES

Particularly interesting, as showing how far the widening circles of this movement have reached, is the children's legislation enacted in various distant Territories. Alaska has forbidden the employment of boys under sixteen at underground labors in the mines; Hawaii has passed a curfew law applying to girls under sixteen in Honolulu; Porto Rico has introduced a modern juvenile court law; the Philippines have made provision for dental clinics in the schools and have found a public welfare board for the establishment and maintenance of social centers. There can be no doubt, therefore, of the intensity with which this movement is at present being propagated, the widespread interest it is arousing and the active support it is everywhere receiving. The evils it would combat are often only too real, and the miseries it is seeking to relieve may well arouse the sympathy of all good men. That care must be taken, however, not to give free hand to extremists and faddists is no less evident.

LEGISLATION AND CHRISTIANITY

Legislation cannot supply the place of Christianity, although the absence of Christianity, or the want of a consistent application of it, often makes legislation imperative. Were justice and charity to prevail, according to the law of Christ, there would be very little need, if any, for this multiplicity of human legislation and State interference. Under the existing conditions, however, children's legislation is not seldom of the utmost importance and a form of the truest charity.

Regarding the limits to be set to legislation of an industrial nature Pope Leo XIII writes: "The limits must be determined by the nature of the occasion which calls for the law's interference, the principle being that the law must not undertake more, nor proceed further, than is required for the remedy of the evil or the removal of the mischief." How deeply he was concerned in the welfare of the little ones is plain from the touching words with which he refers to them:

> In regard to children, great care must be taken not to place them in workshops and factories until their bodies and minds are sufficiently developed. For just as very rough weather destroys the buds of spring, so too early an experience of life's hard toil blights the young promise of a child's faculties and renders any true education impossible.

CAUTION REQUIRED

Caution, too, must be exercised in promoting or supporting the various social laws and movements purporting to be in the interest of the child. Their promoters are often men without religion and not seldom even strongly opposed to the Catholic Church. Their object is not infrequently to harm or endanger the great Catholic works of charity everywhere carried on in the interest of God's little ones. There is a tendency to secularize charity, or rather to abolish it for the sake of a commercialized social service. The faithful religious, Brothers and Sisters, doing God's work for love of Him, are looked upon as rivals by those who would centralize and bring into their own control, as a business enterprise, all the labors in which individual Christian charity is to find its noblest expression.

There are movements, likewise, ostensibly begun in favor of the child, which are meant to promote ulterior purposes not in consonance with the best interests of religion and patriotism. There is often a serpent among the flowers and Catholics must exercise careful discretion in proving the nature of every measure before they give it their support, for the world, the devil and the flesh are fighting for the possession of the child whose soul belongs to God alone.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Sweden has adopted a new and original method of dealing with the liquor problem. Its inventor is Dr. Ivan Bratt and it is known as the "Stockholm system." Its purpose is to place a limit to the amount of spirituous liquor allowed to any individual. Citizens in good standing can thus partake of such beverages within the bounds of moderation, as officially interpreted for them, but are prevented from falling into excess. Dr. Bratt, as might be expected, has been accused by some of being too moderate and by others of being too extreme in his reform. The fact is that the system is to go into effect for the entire Swedish nation after the first of January. Hitherto it has already been in operation in thirty-one of the one hundred districts into which Sweden is divided, and during the past year is said to have decreased the consumption of liquor from 5,004,542 liters to 2,979,682 liters.

Father Edmond J. Fontaine, stationed at Bartlesville, Oklahoma, is utilizing the parochial school building for English classes which he conducts for the benefit of several hundred Polish immigrants. The classes are excellently attended. Four evenings of the week, during the space of two hours, the young men who spend their day working at the zinc smelters of Bartlesville are taught by Father Fontaine the rudiments of the English language. In course of time they will likewise be instructed by him in American history and the nature of our civic institutions in order to prepare them properly for American citizenship and acquaint them with their rights, privileges and duties. The undertaking is in full harmony with the desires of our Government and affords a splendid opportunity for exercising a good moral influence over the young workingmen. There is a suggestion here which may well prove useful to others in handling the difficult immigrant problem confronting the Church in America. If pastors are not themselves familiar with the language of these immigrants or cannot spare the time to bear the entire burden, would it not be possible to have evening courses conducted in our schools under the auspices of Catholic laymen? The seed might thus be sown of a great Catholic movement.

A rather far-reaching decision bearing upon the administration of our immigration laws was made in the Portland case. A small number of immigrants in sound health and with sufficient means, arrived at New York with the intention of making their home at Portland, Oregon. They were forbidden, however, to proceed for the reason that they were "likely to prove a public charge," because labor conditions in Portland were reported to be bad and it was thought probable by the immigration board that they would not be able to find employment there. The Supreme Court decided that the board was acting beyond the sphere of its authority and had no right to judge of the actual prospects of success or failure in the case of individual immigrants and held that the excluding phrase referred to the class of persons and not to their destination. Underlying these difficulties are the conflicting demands of capital and organized labor, with often a great injection of selfishness on both sides. A better distribution of immigrants, on the other hand, would be for their own and for the country's good. Serious consideration has been given to this problem which is not easy of solution.

The Outlook not long ago nobly performed its duty, in the name of modern enlightenment, by soundly berating the Catholic Bishop of Panama for his attitude towards the Protestant "Congress for Christian Works" to be held within the Bishop's diocese, and to which the President of the Republic had generously offered the use of the National Theater. The American Israelite, however, as an impartial observer of the situation, forms its own judgment both of the Bishop and of his splenetic critic:

> If the Bishop said no more than the Outlook quotes, we can only sympathize with him. "Christian Work," as our Protestant brethren understand it, is a Protestant interpretation of Christianity with an aggressive attitude towards Roman Catholicism. The Bishop has reason to believe that at this congress views will be presented like those that we hear in our Protestant conventions in this country. The Methodist General Conference, held at Minneapolis in 1912 e. g. adopted a resolution, declaring that "the teachings and practices of Romanism pervert many of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity and foster superstitions which alienate the thinking classes." The Methodist Church has the right to teach so, but a Catholic Bishop has also the right to warn his flock against attending a convention, where they may hear such remarks. He has also the right to protest against giving the privileges of a public building to an organization which is apt, if not bound, to hurt the legitimate sensibilities of a class of citizens.

All who understand the significance of the intended Panama Congress and the spirit which animates its promoters will fully appreciate the attitude of the Catholic Bishop, and of all Catholics with regard to this question, unless, like the Outlook, they are viewing the situation through colored glasses.

The United States Supreme Court has declared unconstitutional an anti-alien law enacted by initiative and referendum in Arizona. It demanded that an employer of five or more persons must keep eighty per cent of them qualified electors or native-born citizens. Justice Hughes, in reading the court's decision, offered at the same time a statement of the reasons which prompted the condemnation of the law:

> It is sought to justify this act as an exercise of the power of the State to make reasonable classifications in legislating to promote the health, safety, morals and welfare of those within its jurisdiction. But this admitted authority, with the broad range of legislative discretion that it implies, does not go so far as to make it possible for the State to deny to lawful inhabitants, because of their race or nationality, the ordinary means of earning a livelihood. It requires no argument to show that the right to work for a living in the common occupations of the community is the very essence of the personal freedom and opportunity that it was the purpose of the amendment to secure. If this could be refused solely on the ground of race or nationality, the prohibition of the denial to any person of the equal protection of the laws would be a barren form of words. The authority to control immigration—to admit or exclude aliens—is vested solely in the Federal Government.

The question here agitated has become one of serious moment, since an entire series of discriminatory laws has already been passed. Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Arizona, Wyoming, Idaho, and to a certain extent California, expressly prohibit the employment of immigrants upon public works. The Arizona law itself had previously been submitted to a special court of three Federal judges, who likewise declared it unconstitutional. The following argument was then given by the court: "If, under guise of police regulation, a State can prohibit an employer from employing more than 20 per cent of alien labor, it can prohibit him from employing more than 5 per cent and if 5 per cent, any at all." The situation which has arisen is clearly an anomalous one. The Federal Government can throw open the gates of the country to foreigners for whose exclusion it sees no adequate reason, while the individual States could, under the Arizona provision, condemn them to starvation or reduce to a condition of unemployment those already engaged in its industries. It is evident that a better adjustment must be made. The rightful interests both of the native workman and of the alien admitted into our country should be duly consulted. Might not the Federal Government itself make reasonable provision for this wherever a real emergency arises?

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIV, No. 8
WHOLE No. 347

DECEMBER 4, 1915

PRICE 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
The War: Bulletin, Nov. 23, p. m.-Nov. 30, a. m. —Central Serbia—Southern Serbia—Greece and Roumania. France: The Catholic Institute—Clerics in the Army. Germany: German Resourcefulness. Great Britain: The Foundation at Cambridge — Conscription. Ireland: Steamship Companies and Emigrants. Mexico: Material Loss to the Church. Spain: The "Bull for the Crusades".....169-172

TOPICS OF INTEREST
Mr. Tumulty and Mexico—The Spiritual "Birth of a Nation"—The Rebel Poet—The Cave Man an Artist—Congregational Singing 173-179

COMMUNICATIONS
Woman Suffrage—The Open Shop—Less Politics —The Anglican "Branch" Theories—A Disconcerting Coincidence—A Pole and a Catholic. 179-181

EDITORIALS
Our Country's Patroness — No Persecution — Don't Be an Only Child—The Doctor's Duty—The Baker and the Baptist—In Praise of Potatoes 182-184

LITERATURE
Catholic Literature's Possibilities.

REVIEWS: The Life of Father De Smet, S.J. (1801-1873)—The Lord of Misrule and Other Poems—The Rocky Road to Dublin—The Little Book of American Poets — Sappho in Levkas and Other Poems—Memories of a Publisher, 1865-1915—Vagrant Memories—Aus dem Glauben leben! — Der Gymnasiast — The Spiritual Journal of Lucie Christine—American Ideals—Habits that Handicap—Aristocracy and Justice.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: Christmas Cards and Calendars — "Dreams and Dust" — "A Marriage Cycle"—"Talks About Poets and Poetry"—"Peg Along"—"Clouded Amber"—"Emma McChesney & Co."—"Kipling's India"—"First Principles of Chemistry"—"A Text-Book of Cooking"—"Le Livre de la Consolation"—"L'Apostolat de la Jeunesse"—Some Recent Pamphlets on Catholic Topics 184-189

EDUCATION
Civics in the Secondary School.....190

ECONOMICS
The Planning Time.....190, 191

NOTE AND COMMENT
Attendance at Jesuit Colleges and Universities—Another Lost Tribe of Israel—The Financial Burden of Catholic Free Schools — Social and Religious Evolution in New England — Christ Child Society of Chicago—Shipping Christmas Gifts — Deaths of Bishop Hedley and Cardinal Bauer 191, 192

Attention is called to the Editor's paper on "Mr. Tumulty and Mexico," which appears in this issue.

CHRONICLE

The War.—The deadlock in Flanders and France continues unmodified. Along the Dvina the situation has undergone no essential change. The Germans have made vigorous intermittent attacks, but have fallen back a short distance from Riga, and there is a noticeable slackening in their offensive against both Riga and Dvinsk. Rumors to the effect that Mitau has also been evacuated are without official confirmation. From Volhynia, Galicia, the Trentino and Gallipoli, nothing of consequence has been reported. During the week the Italians have subjected Goritz to a heavy bombardment, and much damage has been inflicted especially on the public buildings; many of the heights commanding the city are in possession of the Italians; but up to the present the Austrians have been able to hold it.

Bulletin, Nov. 23, p. m.-Nov. 30, a. m.

In central Serbia the Austrians, Bulgarians and Germans have been pressing hard on the Serbians. The Austro-German line that runs parallel to the Montenegrin boundary has moved a considerable distance to the west. The Serbians have been forced out of Prjepolje, Mitrovica, Rudnik and Pristina, but are still holding Prisrend. As this place, however, is menaced from the north, where the Germans have crossed the Sivnica, from the east, and from the south, where the Bulgarians are engaging the Serbians near Kalkendelen, its fall is imminent. These victories have given the invaders entire control of the Mitrovica-Uskub railroad. The Serbians, prevented this for a time by thrusting into the Bulgarian lines a narrow wedge, which reached in a northeasterly direction and extended as far as the Veleika plain to the south of Nish. This portion of the Serbian Army, however, was soon obliged to retreat, for Kikanic became untenable as the Germans moved south from Pristina. When the Serbians withdrew the entire railroad fell into the hands of the Central Powers, who have joined forces with the Bulgarians at Kalkandelen. German dispatches regard this part of the campaign as finished. The Serbians are retreating into the Montenegrin and Albanian mountains.

Central Serbia

In southern Serbia, there has been no marked change in the situation. The Serbians have prevented the capture of Monastir, and have also retaken Krusevo. Their efforts, however, to reach Prilep have not been successful. Neither have they been able to join forces with the French left wing. Their failure to do this is said to have been responsible for the withdrawal of the French to the eastern bank of the Cerna. For some time the French have been holding the western bank of this river and have repulsed vigorous attacks on the part of the Bulgarians, especially at its juncture with the Rajec. The retirement of the French indicates increased Bulgarian pressure along this portion of the Allies' line, but does not point to anything like a serious defeat. No other changes have been reported in southern Serbia. The Allies, to judge from dispatches, are now about to make greater efforts to help Serbia. Italy is reported to be landing troops at Avlona, and to have established communication with the Serbians through Albania. The British and French are said to be landing about 4,000 troops daily at Salonica, and Russia has promised more than 350,000 soldiers for an invasion of Bulgaria.

Southern Serbia

The diplomatic situation in Greece has not altogether cleared. Coercive measures used by the Allies, together with a joint note addressed to Greece by the Entente Powers, elicited from Greece a reply that was at first taken to be altogether satisfactory, an impression which was intensified by the fact that the pacific blockade was lifted, together with the other commercial and financial restrictions. The note is believed to have contained no demand that Greece depart from her neutral position, and to have asked for nothing more than the continuation of the privileges hitherto accorded to the Allies. It now appears, however, that the conclusions drawn about the final and altogether satisfactory nature of Greece's reply were somewhat premature. A second note and a reply have been exchanged, but neither has as yet been made known. But it is thought that Greece has proposed a joint conference with a view to settling some details of an agreement, which in its general lines is regarded as satisfactory to both sides.

Greece and Rumania

Rumania also is in difficulties. A large Russian army is concentrated along her Bessarabian frontier, demanding an undisputed passage through Rumania to Bulgaria. Against this demand it is believed Rumania will officially protest while abstaining from armed resistance. Meanwhile, Bulgarian and German troops are massing on the Danube. Rumanian diplomats are striving to maintain neutrality without giving offense to either side, an extremely difficult task.

France.—Under the presidency of Cardinal Amette, the solemn services marking the reopening of the famous Catholic Institute of Paris were held a few weeks since. When in October, 1914, the indefatigable Rector, Mgr. Baudrillart, decided to reopen the Institute, many feared that this would be found quite impossible, since nearly one-half of the professional staff and more than half the students were with the army. Nevertheless, although hampered by many difficulties, the work of the year was most satisfactory. Thirty-two diplomas were awarded in the sacred sciences, and two doctorates and eighty-six licentiates in law were conferred. In his address at the opening of schools, Mgr. Baudrillart said: "Many lessons are taught us by the present war; one is the necessity of long and careful preparation. To prepare one's self it is, first of all, necessary to understand the aim to be pursued, to have an ideal; to carry in one's self, as Pasteur said, a God." On the first day of schools, a Requiem Mass was celebrated for the repose of the souls of 112 pupils and former pupils of the Institute who have fallen in battle. During the first year of the war, the Institute paid a heavy toll to death. Thirteen Crosses of the Legion of Honor and six Military Medals have been awarded the pupils, and the names of fifty-four have found place in "the order of the day."

The Catholic Institute

In the Universe of recent date, the Rev. G. Ryan writes of the practical results of the Conscription Law in France as it affects clerics; results quite contrary to those contemplated by the anti-clerical conspirators. "Clerical conscription was designed to deprive the men of France of what it is now actually providing for them." Anti-clericalism, writes Father Ryan, is a reptile that cannot live in the trenches. The presence of priests in the army has dispelled the anti-clerical sentiments sedulously fostered in many parts of France by interested politicians. Slander cannot prevail against the noble example daily given by these clergymen.

Clerics in the Army

This change is owing to the daily post bringing letters from the front praising now the bravery of the Reverend Sergeant-Vicaire, now the abnegation of a Reverend Corporal-Curé, or the self-sacrifice of some subdeacon stretcher-bearer; and such letters are carried around the village and the glory of any fallen priest-hero is at once communicated to the resident priest (if indeed there happen to be one, which is now not always the case, the majority having been called to the front) and the "glory" of that death offered, so to say, to the priest as being "one of the cloth" whom the people are now learning to love.

One will agree with the writer that it is a pity that so many ministers of God have been called upon to sacrifice their lives upon fields of blood, and heartily share his hope that their blood may make France worthy of the sacrifice which has been offered.

Germany.—That necessity is the mother of invention has never proved more true than is the case now in Germany. To supply substitutes for necessary articles that are lacking, chemical science is doing wonders. The old saltpeter monopoly has been dealt a fatal blow by the discovery of a way of extracting nitrogen from the air and by the use of ammonia. This new saltpeter industry is capable of supplying not only the army's needs but likewise those of agriculture. To compensate for the lack of gasoline a similar product, called benzol, said to be answering all purposes to which gasoline is put, has been obtained from the residue of coke. Other chemical inventions are the production of flour from straw for feed, the utilization of sugar in the manufacture of soap, the production of different fundamental foodstuffs, principally fat, from yeast, and the invention of a substitute for rubber. The new industries which have thus arisen are not of a temporary nature, but are bound to continue and develop still more after the war, for synthetic rubber, if cheap enough, will be of incalculable value. Private letters from the front in France tell of finding German automobiles with excellent tires made of some new substitute for rubber. They are composed in part of linseed oil oxidized in some peculiar way. If this is the chief component the raw material of the new rubber will not be very costly. Two processes have been invented, it is asserted, which supply nitric acid and ammonia very cheaply. This frees Germany and will free the rest of the world from dependence on the nitrate deposits of Chili. With abundance of potash in addition to these inventions

German Resourcefulness

Germany can be supplied indefinitely with explosives and with fertilizers. The copper reserves of the country are being carefully husbanded, and steel, iron, zinc and aluminum are taking their place wherever possible.

Great Britain.—The blessing of the foundation stone of the new chapel, attached to St. Edmund's House, Cambridge, marks the continued progress of the Catholic renaissance at this ancient university, St. Edmund's was established in 1896, to provide university facilities for priests who wished to engage in undergraduate or special studies, and for ecclesiastical students. Its founder is one who for years has been in the forefront of every movement for the promotion of Catholic interests, the Duke of Norfolk; the establishment is managed by a body of clergy and laity of which his Grace is president. Thirty-two priests, residents of the house within recent years, are now teaching in various colleges and schools, and six are serving in the war as military chaplains.

The Foundation at Cambridge

In a speech before the London Stock Exchange, Lord Derby allowed himself a certain freedom of speech, justified, no doubt, by his feeling that here he was not bound by the conventions which rule in parliamentary circles. Certain members of the Upper House talked too much and their intemperate language just fell short of supplying the enemy with undue information. "Traitor" and "no gentleman," as phrases applied to Baron St. Davids, Lord Ribblesdale and others, are biting descriptions, unless, indeed, they be taken by all concerned as mere party gibes, ephemeral in nature and not seriously intended. Lord Derby said that he had not come to the Stock Exchange to recruit troops, and added a plea for patience, since England was trying to accomplish in six weeks a task that had engaged Germany for forty years. "We are going to win this war," he concluded, "whatever the cost; but there is no use in making this assertion unless everyone does his duty at this crisis." Under the Earl's direction, the volunteer system still holds the field; how long it will retain this position, no one can say. Warned by repeated breakdowns, the prophets of conscription are seeking refuge in a cautious silence. The Duke of Marlborough, a student of practical farming, fears the results of conscription upon the country's agricultural interests; others point out that "business as usual" is essential to ultimate success, and that "business as usual" requires the complete interest of many men in many peaceful avocations. All of which indicates that conscription is not the easy problem which amateur politicians on both sides of the Atlantic think it, and worse, proclaim it.

Conscription

Ireland.—During the week ending November 13 the Cunard Line refused passage to a number of young Irishmen who wished to leave the country. In imitation of the Cunard, the White Star and Anchor Lines adopted the same course of action and refused "to accept the bookings of British subjects who are fit and eligible for military service." This has aroused a storm of criticism in the Irish press. New Ireland calls it an outrage and insists that while the voluntary system remains in force, no Irishman can be compelled to join the army; and no interference with liberty whether by the Cunard Line or by employers in Dublin and elsewhere who have deprived their employees of their positions in order to compel them to join the army, is justifiable. The Weekly Independent approves of the action of the Cunard, calling the attempt to emigrate stupid, cowardly and discreditable to the country. The pages of this paper are largely given over to the incident. According to some of the testimony presented the Liverpudlians hooted the prospective emigrants, spat on them and in general treated them despitefully. It is claimed that Englishmen and Orangemen fit and eligible for military service were allowed to sail, while Irishmen from the South and West were not. One young man testified that he with 500 others, volunteered at the beginning of the war and was rejected and then he remarks whimsically enough: "My grandfather was exiled in 1851 and I don't understand the anxiety of the British to keep me in Ireland." The paper prints a letter from G. Gavan Duffy, Temple Chambers, London, protesting that the Cunard has usurped the functions of the Executive and suggesting that a fund be started to help the men to vindicate their rights. The Weekly Freeman minimizes the affair, and declares the agitation a Unionist scheme to blacken Ireland's fair name. This paper asserts, however, that before the war the average number of passports issued daily was thirty; now nearly 500 are requested each day. Shortly after Lord Derby's scheme for recruiting was outlined, 300 passports were refused in three days, and according to the Observer, 1,400 Irishmen booked passage during the week ending November 13. A trenchant letter written from Liverpool to the Weekly Freeman complains that at the very time the Irishmen were refused passage, Britishers crowded football fields and restaurants, apparently oblivious of the war. The National Volunteer says the incident has been exaggerated by "journals of Unionism and factionism," and in condemning the men who sought passage, declares that "Ireland would be none the poorer for their riddance, and America none the better for their intrusion." Mr. Redmond calls the incident "a West of Ireland affair, grossly exaggerated, due to a misapprehension on the part of a number of fellows who thought conscription had been enacted." The fear of conscription seems real, and the country is greatly agitated over it.

Steamship Companies and Emigrants

Mexico.—Some idea of the damage done to the Church in Mexico may be had from these statistics, furnished by men entirely conversant with the situation.

Material Loss to the Church

Although the figures set down, 4,399,000 American dollars, or 8,798,000 Mexican dollars, do not by any means represent the total loss, yet they show well enough one phase of the injury inflicted upon the Mexican Church:

Monterey, Nuevo Leon
Archbishop's house	$25,000
Archbishop's library	12,500
Archbishop's museum	12,500
Archbishop's pictures	5,000
Church of S. Francisco	25,000
Church of Santisima	10,000
Seminary	50,000
Christian Brothers' College	20,000
Marist Brothers' College	25,000
College in Lamparos	10,000
College in Linares	15,000
Tamaulipas
Seminary	10,000
College of Matamoras	5,000
Saltillo
Jesuit College	100,000
Seminary	10,000
Christian Brothers' College	10,000
San Luis Potosi
Bishop's house	100,000
Bishop's library	25,000
Seminary	50,000
College of the Sacred Heart	20,000
Zacatecas
Bishop's house	25,000
Leon
Bishop's house	50,000
Bishop's library	5,000
Seminary	50,000
Marist Brothers' College	25,000
Teresian Sisters' College	40,000
House of Retreats	25,000
Durango
Bishop's house	12,500
Marist Brothers' College	10,000
Guanajuato
Jesuit College	75,000
College of the Sacred Heart	50,000
Celaya
Preparatory Seminary	10,000
Queretaro
Seminary	15,000
Christian Brothers' College	25,000
Bishop's house	25,000
Franciscan Convent	15,000
Tulancingo
Bishop's house	10,000
Seminary	7,500
College	10,000
Zamora
Bishop's house	100,000
Seminary	100,000
Teresian Sisters' College	50,000
Marist Brothers' College	40,000
Guadalajara
Archbishop's house	100,000
Seminary	140,000
Preparatory Seminary	25,000
Jesuit College	50,000
Salesian Fathers' College	40,000
Normal College for Girls	25,000
A church	20,000
Toluca
Marist Fathers' College	25,000
College Larrainzar	5,000
The Brothers' College	5,000
Passionist Fathers	50,000
Puebla
Archbishop's house	250,000
Seminary	100,000
Teresian Sisters' College	50,000
Christian Brothers' College	50,000
Orizaba
Jesuit house	20,000
Convent of Carmel	10,000
Church of St. Mary	50,000
Cordoba
A church	10,000
Jalapa
Jesuit house	7,500
Jesuit church	40,000
Seminary	10,000
Vera Cruz
Redemptorist house	10,000
Campeche
Bishop's house	10,000
Chiapas
Bishop's house	5,000
Other houses	10,000
Yucatan
Archbishop's house	100,000
Seminary	50,000
Teresian Sisters' College	20,000
Brothers' College	5,000
Four schools	20,000
Jesuit house	5,000
Aguascalientes
Bishop's house	10,000
Seminary	20,000
Church of San Antonio	25,000
Ocotlán
All goods of the Church	50,000
Jacona
Marist Brothers' College	40,000
Mexico City
Sta. Brigida house	25,000
Josephite Sisters' College	25,000
Vincentian Fathers' house	30,000
Jesuit house	25,000
House of Retreats	20,000
Morelia
Archbishop's house	40,000
Seminary	100,000
Preparatory Seminary	40,000
Teresian Sisters' College	100,000
Christian Brothers' College	25,000
College of La Merced	40,000
Eight schools	50,000
Salesian Fathers' College	25,000
Four convents	75,000
Bishop of Zacatecas
Paid as tax imposed by revolutionists	7,500
Bishop of Zamora
Paid as tax	9,000
Clergy of Zacatecas
Paid as tax	50,000
Archbishop of Durango
Paid as tax	7,500
Clergy of Morelia
Paid as tax in money	85,000
In bills of exchange	165,000
Bishop of Chilapa
Paid as tax	2,500
Guadalajara
College of the Sacred Heart	50,000
Three schools	20,000
Visitation Convent	30,000
Adoratrice Convent	15,000
Houses of retreat (2)	50,000
Vestments, sacred vessels, pictures, jewelry	500,000
	$4,399,000

Next week's chronicle will contain a recently issued letter of General Alvarado, Governor of Yucatan, condemning religion.

Spain.—Yielding to the earnest desire and request of the King of Spain, the Pope has just extended for another twelve years the favors and privileges of the famous Bulla Sanctæ Cruciatæ. This extension is to date from 1916. It is a matter of history that this generous concession had its origin in those heroic days when Spain was winning back its territory, inch by inch, from the Moors. When the country was valiantly endeavoring to expel the Mohammedan intruders, the Spanish monarchs obtained from the Holy See leave that all those who took up arms against the Saracens, might share in those privileges and indulgences which were enjoyed by the Crusaders who fought the infidels in the Holy Land. The money which formerly was used to equip and supply armies in the field against the Saracens, and to serve similar purposes and needs, is now applied to the restoration of poor and needy churches, to the maintenance of religious worship, to the help and upkeep of charitable works, etc. For, though it is true that in Spain the State is bound by law to look after all these needs, it must be granted that the pittance thus applied is a poor and scanty one, and without the help and funds of the Church herself, many of the sacred edifices would fall in ruins, townships and villages would be without decent religious worship, many a work of charity would have to be abandoned. The favors and privileges contained in the Bull are these:

The "Bull for the Crusades"

(1) Those affecting the living, i. e., a number of plenary and partial indulgences granted to the Faithful under prescribed conditions; privileges with regard to the sacramental absolution of sins, and censures reserved to the Pope and the Bishops; faculties for the commutation of vows, etc. (2) Those affecting the dead, by which indulgences are granted in favor of the souls in purgatory, for whom the Bull has been taken. (3) Privileges and favors of "composition" or compromise, a favor granted by the Pope allowing individuals to licitly appropriate to themselves certain objects not theirs when it cannot be known who is the owner. (4) The Apostolic Indult authorizing the Faithful to eat flesh meat on those days when, by the general law of the Church, it is forbidden. This authorization holds good, even in Lent, Fridays excepted. Up to the present the fast-days of obligation were: every day in Lent, Sundays excepted; the vigil of these feasts: Pentecost, St. James the Greater, the National Patron Saint, Our Lady's Assumption, SS. Peter and Paul, All Saints, Christmas; the Fridays and Saturdays of Advent, and Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays in Ember weeks.

By the late Brief of our Holy Father, in virtue of which he extends the provisions of the Bull for a period of twelve years, the number of fast days for the Catholics of Spain is considerably reduced. Thus, to speak of Lent alone, only three fast days a week, namely, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday, will be henceforward of obligation. The Faithful are, moreover, allowed to eat flesh meat and fish at the same meal on the Sundays of Lent. Hitherto, in a family, every individual over seven had to petition and receive his privileges in a special Bull. Henceforward one Bull will suffice for each family, including dependents, servants, etc. The days of abstinence are also greatly reduced in number.

Many other important privileges are granted by the Bull with regard to private oratories and chapels, the recitation of the Divine Office by priests and clerics, etc.

The Bull has not yet been published in Spain. Thanks to the kindness of the Cardinal Archbishop of Toledo, Primate of Spain, and Commissary General de lá Santa Cruzada, our correspondent has been enabled to present the main features of the Bull to AMERICA.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Mr. Tumulty and Mexico

WHILE this issue of AMERICA was passing through the press, an important document reached the office. The document is a letter written by Mr. J. P. Tumulty, Secretary to the President, in answer to an inquiry about certain conditions in Mexico. The inquiry was apparently framed to give an opportunity for an answer that would make the opposition of American Catholics to the Mexican revolutionists seem unreasonable, if not factitious. This together with the circumstance that a Catholic in the White House is replying to a Catholic in New Jersey, concerning crimes committed against Catholics in Mexico, gives Mr. Tumulty's letter an importance not otherwise warranted. It is not our present intention to answer all the statements contained in the document under review. A detailed answer would obscure the main points at issue, which concern crimes against Sisters, priests and Brothers, and the attitude of the revolutionists towards religion in general and the Catholic Church in particular. In regard to the Sisters, Mr. Tumulty says: "There is no official record of a single proven case of this dastardly crime in the files of the Department of State." Proceeding, he declares that there are unsubstantiated reports which could not be verified by our Consuls or Special Agents. He then singles out crimes against Sisters reported from Zacatecas and affirms that our Agent after thorough investigation was not able to confirm the reports. The Sisters, he says, had left Zacatecas before the arrival of the Agent, (italics inserted) but they remained five months in Vera Cruz and there were thrown into contact with army officers who have stated that they never heard of a single report of outrage. This paragraph of the letter ends with the ingenuous statement that Sisters may have been ill treated as might have occurred in any other country under the conditions of wild disorder which then prevailed in Mexico, and especially when it is considered that the laws of Mexico prohibit a nun from wearing any garb or other insignia to indicate her calling so that she would be in no way distinguishable from others of her sex.

All this falls short of establishing any fact about the commission of the outrages; this evidence, like the greater part of that offered by Mr. Tumulty, is negative in nature, too negative either to render uncertain the proposition that Sisters were outraged or to prove the contradictory proposition that they were not outraged. Moreover the fact remains that there are in possession both of Mgr. Kelly, President of the Church Extension Society, and of the editor of AMERICA affidavits declaring that Sisters were outraged. And strange to say one of these was made at Vera Cruz on October 28, 1914, in the presence of an army officer who affixes his name thereto. This affidavit is also signed by the attestants, viz: six Sisters—by six witnesses, and by the notary. Should Mr. Tumulty desire the appended names, all save that of the army officer, will be sent him. The second statement about the same subject was sworn to by the Prioress of Queretaro in the presence of the Archbishop of New Orleans and Mgr. Kelly. This lady declares under oath that she conversed with Sisters who had been outraged. Such testimony not only makes Mr. Tumulty's negative evidence useless but also furnishes moral certitude, reasonable proof in other words, that the horrid crime was committed. Nor can the crime be excused on the plea that the Sisters could not be distinguished from other women by garb or other insignia. They actually wore a garb—the legality of this act is neither here nor there at present. For the rest, it is not a matter of surprise that our special agents, and others too, did not get information about the aforesaid crimes.

The second item of Mr. Tumulty's letter worthy of notice concerns Mgr. Paredes' testimony about the treatment of Sisters and priests. In order that this should be evaluated at its proper worth, it is necessary to say that Mgr. Paredes is a Carranzista who holds his present position by appointment from Carranza, and by the sufferance of the Ordinary of Mexico City who confirmed the appointment, to avoid greater trouble. Mgr. Paredes admits the murder and torture of priests, but good Carranzista that he is, he accuses the Zapatistas of the crimes. He could have given more extended information to our State Department, for two Christian Brothers were brutally murdered by the Villistas and some priests were tortured by them in a most revolting fashion, at a time when Villa and Carranza were such firm friends that one was congratulating the other on the work done. The editor of AMERICA has on file affidavits made in the regular way by two tortured priests, in the presence of Bishop Lynch of Dallas, Texas. Moreover he also has a letter from a Christian Brother announcing the foul murder of two of his companions. Finally, what would Mgr. Paredes say to this document signed by two of Mexico's most saintly archbishops?

To their Eminences the Cardinals, their Lordships, the Archbishops and Bishops of the Holy Catholic Church in the United States of America.

We, the undersigned, members of the Hierarchy of Mexico now in exile in the United States of America do declare that the statements already published by the magazine Extension and the papers AMERICA, Columbiad and Southern Messenger, of murders, tortures, outrages against the Church, the clergy and the Sisters of Mexico are, in all their general statements, true. The whole truth of the terrible persecution of the clergy and religious of Mexico has not been told even yet. But it ought to be made known for the future benefit of the many innocent sufferers.

The purpose of the men who have inflicted these injuries on us is plainly to destroy religion in Mexico (Italics inserted), to banish those whom they do not kill, to steal the property consecrated to the service of God, to desecrate what they cannot steal, and to soil as much as they can the good name of the innocent. The gravest injury has been done to the cause of God and the Church in Mexico. The latter today lies prostrate. . . . .

Prudence requires the suppression of names, but I shall furnish signed copies of the documents to Mr. Tumulty on request.

One point remains to be considered: the attitude of the revolutionists towards religion. Mr. Tumulty's letter dwells upon the promise of religious freedom made in the name of Carranza. This becomes a tactical mistake in view of the fact that only recently General Alvarado issued a circular letter in Yucatan, denouncing religion in a crude, ignorant fashion. Moreover the spoliation of convents and churches and the persecution of priests and Sisters have been going on merrily in Yucatan, the last State invaded by the Carranzistas. All this is quite in keeping with the revolutionary policy. Not since the French Revolution has the world witnessed such an orgy of murder and lust, such a general defiance of rights human and Divine. It is sad that churches were profaned, altars desecrated, chalices polluted, Brothers murdered, priests tortured and shot to death, and sacred virgins defiled—all these are inexpressibly sad, but they are but symptoms of the most monstrous of all evils, a systematic war on religion and morality carried on by gun and sword, and repressive decrees, and base calumnies; in short, by all the unspeakable methods prompted by the demon of crime and persecution. The finger of righteous scorn is pointed towards the Rio Grande; political exigencies, however, either hide this virtuous act from some eyes or else obscure its meaning.

R. H. TIERNEY, S.J.,
Editor of AMERICA.

The Spiritual "Birth of a Nation"

THE too popular film-play, "The Birth of a Nation," featuring the dark side of the negro nature, as displayed in the days immediately subsequent to the close of the Civil War, has renewed much conversation and interrogation about the status of the Afro-American. The owners of the picture disclaim any intention of offending anybody, but stoutly proclaim their right to exhibit the truth. Accordingly they set it forth with a truly Dixon glare, and, incidentally, have the pleasant task of hanging in their ticket-office windows the "S. R. O." sign. The scenario is well executed, which is equivalent to observing that its objectionableness is all the greater; antipathy to the negro, which it can arouse in impressionistic spectators, is doubly possible and dangerous.

As a sop to the indignation of the colored people over this flagrant exposé of an unspeakable part of their story, the producers of the picture paste a few yards of respectable film onto the reels. This incommensurate addition shows the colored man of today, industrious, thrifty, educated; in a word, more wholesome and clean by a generation's sweep. In its flattering character, the film may mislead. Whereas the body of the film would give one the impression that the negro of war times was incapable of improvement, the complimentary close would furnish the idea, if the mind be not already too poisoned to receive it, that the present-day negro needs no improvement. Both notions are ultra. The colored people in general of the last generation were hardly so contemptible as the photo-play, by revealing them in peculiar circumstances, leads the viewer to think; nor are those of the present as a class quite so cultured. Just as the picture exploits a few salacious incidents which seem to suggest a general condition of baseness, so does it use a few choice ones which might indicate a universal state of elevation. No; half a century has done much, but also left much to be done. The problem is still with us, only partially solved. Our dealing with the colored man was not ended when we unbound his hands, presented him with a grammar, and bade him go ahead. Appreciating this, our scholars have been sinking their thoughts in the Southland for long. And while mighty discussion has been going on about the wisdom of this and the folly of that, with regard to the welfare and future of "our brother in black," the problem was and is being gradually solved without any discussion whatsoever. Practical Christianity is unostentatiously doing what books and speeches failed even to begin to do: that is, reaching deep down into the negro heart, plucking out the faults which retard a people's true development, and plentifully planting the seeds of racial success.

The country has given the black man excellent chances, even as many as 156 high schools, with 566 teachers; but these give him more mentality than morality, and would let his character go bent but for the supplement of erective Christian forces. Citizens, even black-skinned, have a right to full education: head cultivation is only half. Catholics have been trying to perform a part of the country's neglected duty out of their own private purses. Naturally their bounty is not so great as it would be, if the importance of this charity were more realized, and if our $30,000,000 a year school system were a less heavy burden. But it is sufficient to finance modestly both the endeavors of one society exclusively devoted to the colored folk, and those of other priests belonging to other Orders. The community mentioned arose, a few decades ago, under the sanctified touch of Herbert Cardinal Vaughan. It was originally English, but Cardinals Gibbons and Vaughan early saw the advisability of a distinct American institution for Southern work; consequently, they allowed the American branch to be lopped off from the parental tree across the Atlantic.

The Franciscan Sisters from Mill Hill who have a mother-house in Baltimore, also labor exclusively among colored people. Their work is beyond praise, but unfortunately it is badly handicapped by the lack of Sisters and is not so well known to Catholics as it deserves to be. A little notice from the North would enlarge its sphere of influence appreciably.

The Josephite Fathers, as well as the others engaged in negro work, do not busy themselves with theory. Theirs is not the pleasure of psychologically establishing whether the negro can walk or must be carried; whether his hands should be trained, or his head, or both; whether he can ever attain to the white man's station or surpass it; whether he is a menace to, or an asset of, the commonwealth. Such questions are more pleasurable to the economist and sociologist than profitable to the people about whom they are proposed. Their solution does not solve the problem. The fact remains that Uncle Sam has ten million negroes on his hands, who cannot well be dropped off, and who, if they stay on, ought to be molded into fruitful citizenship. And while he does some of his duty by injecting letters and numbers into the Ethiopian brain, missionaries, Protestant and Catholic, lay a deeper foundation by improving the negro heart. This work, being largely below the surface, is mostly obscure. Since even many religious people realize only in the vaguest way that it is going on at all, it is not surprising that Federal authorities seem absolutely unaware of it.

But, if the Catholic Church's work in the South thus far has not been so great as we could wish, it would be well to remember that, through no fault of hers, she was rather late in entering the field, while Protestants held it from the start. Members of our Faith have always been few in the South. Ours, too, has not been the moneyed class. Until recent years, our trials have outnumbered our triumphs. Besides, the American Church grew faster than its native clergy. The needs of the Catholic North for ministers of the Word were so great that the colored South had to be temporarily forgotten. And even when it began to be remembered, apostolic souls and means were still too far from plentiful to win plentiful success.

Fortunately, aspirants to the work of negro evangelization, male and female, are appearing just as fast as the work is becoming better known. Perchance, vocations would be even more numerously realized, if the Fathers of the North would encourage, or at least not discourage, fervent young men and women whose heart whispers "South." Conditions below the Mason-Dixon line are not to be identified with those that obtain in Africa. One Northern dominie who, it is to be hoped, does not represent a type, evidently thinks that they are not a thousand degrees different: recently, on hearing a youth of his flock express a desire to study for the negroes of the South, he exclaimed, "What! do you want to get your name in the Roman Martyrology!" Of course the good man did not say precisely what he meant or mean precisely what he said; but, even so, he conveyed a sentiment which turned a right intention into a wrong direction. The loss of one missionary means much to a cause that will never have too many or even enough. The pity is that similarly conditioned losses are seemingly not too rare.

Neither from a monetary view-point should the missions of the South be compared to those of the Dark Continent. There, where people and customs are primitive, efficient work may sometimes be carried on by comparatively slender incomes. But, here in America, stipends and rhetoric are insufficient to construct the schools, churches, and parish-houses that civilization demands. Catholic charity has begun to show that it can maintain a corps of missionaries in the Southern field; when it has succeeded in demonstrating this more fully, the corps of missionaries will appreciably increase.

Religion has found its way into about 4,300,000 negro hearts; but not the Catholic religion. Methodists and Baptists have abundantly won what might have been gained by means of Catholic truth. But half of the colored South is still virgin soil for the Catholic missionary; his zeal will triumph, if the Catholic North continues to complement it with spiritual and material aid.

Twenty years ago, Catholic school attendance in the colored South was negligible, while the enrollment in Baptist and Methodist institutions of learning together approximated four and a half thousand. Today the story is a bit different: we can boast a conquest of almost 250,000 souls, and a colored school attendance of nearly 6,000. But the disparity between Protestant showing and ours is still great. We have a moral duty that it should not be so, especially now when prosperity is shining upon our class. We number over sixteen millions: certainly there are enough of us for a few with religious vocations to give ourselves to the cause; for many of us without them to afford a donation in excess of the yearly Negro-Indian collection; and for all of us to furnish sufficient interest to keep the enthusiasm of the missionaries aglow.

The Catholic Church has everything to attract and improve the negro. Its music, candles, pictures, statues and vestments, so unlike the cold and colorless conditions of other creeds, captivate his lively senses and hence win a sure way to his heart through which solid virtue may be effectually transmitted. He needs only to know the Church well to enter it fervently. It is our task to make it known to him. If Catholic enterprise during the present generation will only equal that of the Protestants during the past, we shall have the satisfaction and edification of witnessing the spiritual birth of a nation: an event which will mark the practical close of the negro problem. For when our dusky brothers have all been taught the salient lessons of Christian life, they will be as well qualified for fruitful citizenship as we are; and we shall be the better qualified, by having uplifted them.

EDWARD F. MURPHY.

The Rebel Poet

"I HAVE my own religion and I don't need any help!" shrieked the "Hobo Poet," Joseph Hillstrom, rejecting the spiritual aid offered him on the eve of his execution. He was the author of the marching song of the Industrial Workers of the World, the blustering and fighting vanguard of the great army of revolution. Its title is characteristic of the moral elevation of its sentiment: "Alleluia, I'm a bum."

A few hours before facing the firing squad, to meet his death in the form he himself had chosen, Hillstrom sent a last message to the woman whom in his verse he had called "our own dear rebel girl," Elizabeth Gurley Flynn. "I have lived like a rebel," he wrote, "and I shall die like a rebel." Miss Flynn and her four-year-old boy "Buster" had found a place in the doomed man's heart. Human affection, even when polluted at its source, must still exercise its natural power in a society where the morals of the Decalogue are swept aside in the same spirit of defiance that rejects the laws of man.

As a final hysterical protest against the authority of the State he savagely attacked the guards: "I'll die fighting, not like a coward!" Even with the rifles aimed at his breast, as he sat bound to the chair of execution, he anticipated the officer's word of command. Theatrically revolutionary to the end, he shouted the order, "Fire!" and the bullets pierced his heart. He had passed from earth to the Judgment Seat. Another sentence had been spoken which could never be recalled.

Were his hands red with the blood of the victims for whose murder he was legally tried and convicted? The question does not concern us here. Was he fully responsible for his mad life and the greater madness of his creed? The answer belongs to God alone. We are concerned only with his argument for revolt, the argument long familiar to the Industrial Workers of the World and accepted by Socialists in general. It is thus summed up, with the usual coloring and passion, in one of Hillstrom's last songs:

Workers of the World, awaken.
Break your chains. Demand your rights.
All the wealth you make is taken
By exploiting parasites.
Shall ye kneel in deep submission
From your cradles to your graves?
Is the height of your ambition
To be good and willing slaves?

Arise, ye prisoners of starvation,
Fight for your emancipation,
Unite, ye slaves of every nation
In One Union Grand.
Our little ones for bread are crying,
And millions are from hunger dying.
The end the means is justifying:
'Tis a final stand.

The blending of half truths with falsehoods in such appeals gives to them their strength, particularly when the hearers themselves are actually suffering from injustice. The spirit of rebellion and pride, however, which animates the revolutionary agitators is wholly from the spirit of evil. Men of sane judgment must perceive that the workers are not universally nor even generally enslaved, in spite of the existence of industrial oppression in various places. The underlying Socialistic proposition, above all, that the relation between master and man must forever be banished from society, is expressly condemned in the fundamental regulations for social popular action laid down by Pope Pius X. Industrial unionism under the control of the I. W. W., in fine, is the meaning of the "One Union Grand," mentioned above. This is to be the first step towards the general strike, of whose feasibility Socialists are not convinced, though they champion its morality, if the strike can be made successful. Everything is good and moral for the "ultra-reds," that can bring about revolution—arson, murder, and insurrection not excluded.

It is clear that public officials have the duty to put an end by every just and reasonable means to the incendiary propaganda openly carried on under cover of "free speech," and not seldom defended in that name by a popular press which, with its loss of Christianity, has lost all sense of right and duty. Inflammatory street speaking, as the Governor of Utah bravely declared, must be stopped. It is a spark to ignite the powder barrel whose explosion will destroy innocent and guilty alike in one common ruin. This is a menace which cannot be tolerated.

But to attempt to stamp out this spark by sheer violence is folly. This truth should be taken to heart by those in particular to whom Our Lord addressed His solemn warning: "Woe to you that are rich: for you have your consolation." He does not indiscriminately condemn capitalism and the men of means, as Socialism does, but only the unconscionable and grasping rich, the men of wealth who have flagrantly failed to realize their duty of stewardship. To the "poor in spirit," though rich, perhaps, in fact, Christ does not deny His friendship. The temptation indeed for such men is great, and Christ Himself chose to be numbered among the poor. It is important, therefore, for the rich to bear well in mind the injunctions laid down for them by Saint Paul in his directions to Timothy:

> Charge the rich of this world not to be high-minded, nor to trust in the uncertainty of riches, but in the living God (who giveth us abundantly all things to enjoy),
>
> To do good, to be rich in good works, to give easily, to communicate to others,
>
> To lay up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on the true life. (I Tim. vi: 17-19.)

Here, therefore, is the beginning of that reconciliation by which all mankind can be made one, by which the struggle of the classes can be abolished, by which the argument of revolt can be taken from the lips of the revolutionist and the peace of God brought back to earth. The good will of the rich must then be met by the good will of the poor, and both must be united in one love of Christ. Thus can be realized, in a sense far other than the poet dreamed, the "One Union Grand," not the class union of Socialists, but the union of all classes in Christ.

It was the vision of a great revolt which the rebel versifier beheld in common with his fellows, an industrial unionism in preparation for a general strike, to culminate in universal revolution, violent and bloody if necessary, as indeed would be the case. The guilty class among the capitalists did not scruple about the means to attain its end, and the godless revolutionary class of labor has learned the lesson and will not scruple any more: "The end the means is justifying." The words with which this article begins are the key to the entire situation. They have been on the lips of the godless rich and of the godless poor: "I have my own religion and I don't need any help!" Governments and nations have repeated them, and both have now learned to know what they can accomplish by themselves. The pillars of civilization are trembling and the vast edifice threatens to collapse into ruin. It is high time that men acknowledge once more the authority of that Church which Christ has given, and own, in becoming humility, the need of God's helping hand.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

The Cave Man an Artist

STUDIES in the very oldest remains of man that are to be found in Europe have in recent years been very sadly disturbing to the idea that man began low down in the scale of being with no interests except those of his body, no incentives except those which came from the need for food and the continuation of the species, and without art-sense of any kind. The more that has been learned about the so-called paleolithic man, that is, of the race of men who used the ruder stone implements and had not as yet come to the idea of fashioning anything out of metal, the stronger has grown the realization that, far from being only a little above the brute, he had all the higher qualities of man as we know him at the present time. Even before he had learned to build houses for himself he was fashioning objects of art, decorating his weapons and utensils of various kinds, and even painting pictures on the walls of the cave in which he lived, though often this home was so dark that he could only see the pictures by means of artificial light.

This is such a contradiction of ordinary impressions, and above all of the confident declaration of men who spoke of the cave man as typically brutish in his interests, as to be rather startling and worthy of serious thought. The Irish poet, Mr. Yeats, in bidding good-by to a group of Americans who had given him a dinner in New York, declared that "no nation could possibly think of itself as cultured until the very utensils in the kitchen were beautiful as well as useful." This seemed a rather distant ideal for our utilitarian age. How surprising it is, then, to find that it is exemplified in the cave man. This earlier European ancestor of our race with whom we have become rather well acquainted, not by theory but by the actual study of the remains in several hundred caves, evidently took to heart this idea of the necessity for the combination of the beautiful and the useful. He engraved pictures of various kinds on his weapons and his drinking horns and practically everything else that he handled, and then capped the climax by wall paintings of the animals that he hunted that are marvelously vivid and charmingly artistic. This oldest European man is well worth knowing something about. He was an artist before he was a carpenter, or a farmer, or a blacksmith, or had in any other way sought his own convenience.

During last summer a series of hitherto unexplored caves of the paleolithic period were opened in the Pyrenees region, and these contained not only confirmation but even extension of the idea that these oldest European men were artists in every sense of the word. Professor George Grant MacCurdy, of Yale University, has a note in Science for May 28, 1915, on the explorations made during last July of the Caverne des Trois Frères. This cave is named after the three sons of Count Begouen who accompanied him in his expedition into this superb cavern, which had not been entered probably for many thousands of years. The Count reported the results of his investigation in a note read at the French Institute, the substance of which he sent by a private letter to Professor MacCurdy. Unfortunately, within two weeks after the investigation began, the Count's two oldest sons were called to the colors in defense of their native country and the third one has since followed them. They were not able to complete their investigation then, but the results of their first visits were of such a nature as to foretell an abundant harvest whenever they may be able to resume their work of exploration.

The contrast between the cave man as here shown and the man of our generation is so striking that it deserves to be noted. Cave men are usually supposed to have been interested only in hunting for a living and in fighting with their fellows. The favorite figure of the evolutionist is the cave man with his utter lack of anything like civilization and the unfavorable comparison that he suggests with modern civilized man, interested in art, literature, education and the ways of peace. Here, however, is a little family party engaged in exploring some of the habitations of the cave man, in which they find magnificent remains of real art work, and while engaged in this unearthing of the artistic past they are suddenly called away from the study of art and of history to the tasks of war. Whether any of the young men are to be back or not to continue their work is in the hands of Providence. The destruction of art objects that this war necessarily entails contrasted with the fact that the cave man was engaged in the creation of objects of art is thought-provoking. It is possible that modern man may have progressed far beyond his paleolithic ancestor, but certainly these incidents would not seem to make the demonstration of that fact easy.

The art objects found in the caves in this region of France, the Dordogne, and in Altamira, across the Pyrenees in the neighboring region of Spain, are divided by Professor MacCurdy under two heads, the portable and the stationary. The portable class includes in part carved tools, weapons and ceremonial objects, such as poniards, spear throwers, batons, engraved pebbles, carved fragments of stone, bone, ivory and the horns of stag and reindeer; in fact, almost anything that could be seized upon to satisfy the seemingly exuberant demands of the cave man's artistic impulse.

Stationary art embellishes the walls and ceilings of caverns and rock shelters. In rare instances the fine clay of the cavern floor was utilized for sketching and modeling purposes. The scientific world has been more or less familiar with the portable class of troglodyte art, as it is called, for more than half a century. Our acquaintance with the stationary art is of more recent date. The first discovery of this kind was made by Sautuola, in 1879, at the cavern of Altamira, in northern Spain. The scientific world, however, did not grasp the real significance of Sautuola's discovery until similar finds had been made in France, twenty years later.

It might be thought that these objects made by paleolithic artists would give little evidence of early man's artistic ability, and that they would be at most crude representations of animals like those which small children make. They prove, however, to be finished drawings, real engravings of the animals that these men hunted in order to get a livelihood. According to the report there were more than 200 admirably engraved figures of animals on the walls of this Caverne des Trois Frères. The mammoth, the huge hairy elephant, the skeletons of which are found in this country, and some earlier specimens of which have been discovered entire in the frozen north of Russia, preserved in nature's cold storage, was a contemporary of this cave man and is pictured with striking fidelity to nature. A form of buffalo or bison very nearly resembling our American buffalo is also common among the pictures. The bear, lion, wolf, deer, reindeer, wild goat, horse and chamois are also common representations. For the first time in these caverns of the Pyrenees the rhinoceros is pictured on the walls of the Caverne des Trois Frères. There is besides a curious anthropomorphic figure, which would seem to be a human being wearing a mask, for it has a head surmounted by a reindeer horn. Whether this means that the cave men and women had a dramatic sense also and acted out certain scenes cannot as yet be determined.

The quality of this art much more than the objects it represents is the subject of interest for the scientist. Most of the mural art in the Caverne des Trois Frères is "admirably done." "A small panel with reindeer at rest, evidently enjoying themselves, has been declared by a good authority to be like a page from an album." From the view-point of the engravings this cavern is certainly the richest and the most beautiful thus far known. It contains besides, however, some art objects hitherto not found in these caves, in the shape of figures modeled in clay. There are two very striking figures of the bison modeled in the clay of the cavern floor. They owe their preservation in the very friable material of which they are composed to the accidental sealing up of the gallery ages ago by the stalagmite pillars. "They are excellent examples of plastic art." The man who did them saw with a sculptor's real vision and reproduced just what he saw. In view of their excellence, Professor MacCurdy declares that it is probable that they are not unique examples and doubtless other similar figures less fortunately situated have been destroyed because the artist did not know how to temper and fire his product.

As Professor MacCurdy is so enthusiastic about these recent discoveries, he has made special studies of the cave man as artist, and in an article in the Century Magazine not long since, he reproduced some of these pictures of animals that had been made by these oldest European men of whom we have any record. There is a picture of a bison or buffalo at bay, that has been declared by competent artists to be a magnificent example of the portraiture of tense muscular action suppressed for the moment. A well-known artist in New York declared, after seeing it, that he did not think that there was an artist in New York City in the present day who could have made such a vivid picture with such simple materials. There is a picture of a charging boar, all intense activity, that is equally vivid and marvelously artistic. These were done in colored chalks of bright burnt sepia tints or of warm sepia made still warmer with reddish chalk and are very striking. Apparently not all the drawings on any wall are by a single artist, but a number of the dwellers in the caves tried their hand at art work, and some of the results are quite indifferent, but others are marvelously effective and interesting.

Here, then, is the story of the oldest man of whom we have any record. He lived in caves, dressed in clothing made with needles, obtained food by hunting, and decorated his habitation by pictures of the animals that he hunted. Evidently his cavern had to be lighted in some artificial way, but his sense of beauty would not allow him to leave it undecorated. Stone lamps, not unlike those in use today among the Eskimo, have been found, but almost needless to say, the illumination provided by them must have been very inadequate. This cave man also decorated the utensils and the weapons that he used. Some of his art work compares very favorably with the best that is being done at the present time. This is not the savage, undeveloped man that the world has been taught to think of as the cave man, but a human being like ourselves, only that he has not the advantage of the accumulation of man's material conveniences and comforts that anyone may now command, though it must not be forgotten that the possession of them does not assure that their possessor will have any taste or artistic ability, and these are the qualities of man that count. All the vaunted progress vanishes when we know enough about the terms of comparison.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., Ph.D.

Congregational Singing

IT was a solemn Tre Ore service on Good Friday. The choir had sung with thrilling power the first chorus from Dubois' Seven Last Words. The preacher with the delicacy and strength of deep conviction had delivered his opening address, and the congregation caught up by the intensity of his appeal brushed its eyes and looked up toward the great Crucifix fixed near the altar rail. Then there was a pause. The organ boomed in the loft above; boomed, and like the guns of a victorious battery heard nothing but its own echo. Then a plaintive voice far back in a side-aisle hummed furtively; a second voice badly out of tune but valiantly courageous, sang with sublime disregard for the conception of the composer or the direction of the organist. Here and there a voice was raised for a moment only to sink into abashed silence. Another splendid devotional service of the Church had been shattered by wretched congregational singing.

What is the matter with our congregational singing? As a boy, I remember congregational singing as an hebdomadal source of domestic friction. We children always sang at the children's Mass; but being a boy, I dared not venture among my companions to join with the girls who sang loyally if laggingly. And when the hour came when my soprano voice cracked, I blessed a merciful Providence that had freed me from the duty of further congregational singing. Now, whenever I listen to congregational singing the conviction is forced upon me that the fear of my youth must be a fear common to men as well; and that the breaking of one's voice must mean a break with all idea of further congregational singing.

For the churches in which congregational singing is a matter for parochial pride could be counted, I am sure, without the aid of the simplest adding machine. During a mission, those of the congregation who know the words sing, those who do not, hum "Holy God," and then lapse into a silence that is broken only when next the missionaries visit their parish. At that, the chances are ten to one that the congregation singing "Holy God" will be divided between two schools each clinging to a variant translation from the German. So while one school sings: "Holy God, we praise thy name;" the other with equal vehemence proclaim "Holy God, we sing thy praise." Though the Person addressed is sure to make sense out of the musical mêlée, few other listeners can.

Of congregational singing continued throughout the year at Benediction and Mass, there is next to nothing. A loyal and usually overtaxed choir sings at one or at most two Masses on Sunday morning. For Benediction there is a soloist or two, with perhaps an occasional alto trailing a faithful third below. But what of that strong volume of sound coming from full hearts of a crowd that sings in perfect unison? Catholic congregations are rapidly forgetting the once-familiar practice of congregational singing.

Yet there are few things more distinctly Catholic. In the Holy Sacrifice the priest who offers up the Sacrifice and the people who kneel beyond the sanctuary rail are both concerned. Under ideal circumstances, when the priest turns to the people and says: "Pray, my brethren, that your Sacrifice and mine may be pleasing," the congregation would answer: "May the Lord receive the Sacrifice from your hands." In the same way, at a High Mass, the ideal condition would be one in which the priest would intone the Gloria and the Credo, and the whole congregation as one moral person would take up the Et in terra pax, and the Patrem omnipotentem.

Such ideal conditions did in fact once prevail. In the Ages of Faith when one creed was the creed of Europe and one musical form, the Gregorian, was the accepted music of the Church's ritual, great cathedrals echoed to the voices of vast assemblies as they sang the Mass in response to the celebrating priest or bishop. But with the passing of Gregorian and the substitution of Masses infinitely varied in worth and number, congregations gradually left the interpretation of the new and more difficult Masses to a selected choir, and contented themselves with simple hymns sung at Low Mass and Benediction.

In our time, even the simple hymns are largely forgotten. It is a national disgrace that our people are never able to do more than mumble after the first lines of "The Star Spangled Banner"; and it is almost a religious disgrace that the simplest hymns to Our Saviour and Our Lady have never been given room in the memory of large numbers of Catholics. The "O Salutaris," the "Tantum Ergo," the "Laudate," the "Ave Maris Stella" should be as familiar as the Creed and the Confiteor. If they were, and a dozen more hymns besides, the congregation would feel a new sense of participation in the Divine services, and the possibilities of distraction would be largely diminished.

To secure the unison and accuracy without which congregational singing is a dismal horror there must be thorough cooperation between priest and people. Both must be intensely and sincerely interested in congregational singing. I have heard of one priest who, despite a very, very mediocre voice, actually leads a congregation of a thousand men in hymns worth going miles to hear. He has no technical knowledge of music; in fact he loved to tell how many months it took him to distinguish three-fourths from common time; but he had what was better, enthusiasm and a belief in the possibility and utility of congregational singing. Cards with the words of the hymns are in every pew. Every man knows in advance just what hymn is going to be sung, with the result that the tragedy of false starts is eliminated. And as the priest walks up and down the aisle, he lets it be known that his eye singles out any man who shirks his share of the singing.

Such exotics are possible but not likely until systematic work is done to promote congregational singing. The parochial school is the first college of congregational music; and the training must begin so early that the boys have not learned to be afraid of their own voices. Otherwise the congregational singing of the future will be all in the soprano or alto register, with an occasional male voice committing that atrocity known as singing an octave below.

In secondary schools and academies the tendency has been to neglect congregational singing in favor of special choirs. I am not deaf to the superior artistic worth of music rendered by trained voices; as an accompaniment for occasions of special solemnity, by all means let the special choir sing with the perfect finish that can only be imparted to small bodies of trained singers. But the staple music of the school and academy, and there should be plenty of it, ought to be rendered by the entire body of the students.

To neglect the mass of mediocre singers for a few with splendid voices is to sign the death warrant of all future congregational singing. The mediocre singers who are vastly in the majority will never dare to sing if they have not been accustomed to singing at school; while the trained singers will not deign to sing except in a choir of acknowledged ability. The school or college that sends its pupils through ignorant of the simple hymns of the Church should be put by a standing committee in educational Class C.

That deadly vocal paralysis which afflicts the normal adult in church can only be overcome with time. Once convinced of the beauty and appropriateness of congregational singing, the congregation must be given every possible material help. Only through absolute uniformity of music and words used in the hymns; through constant repetition and practice; if necessary, through the actual employment of standard hymnals by the people, can the sense of surety necessary for successful congregational singing be engendered.

In the "Biography of Cardinal Vaughan" mention is made of a great pilgrimage that sailed from England for Paray-le-Monial. And as the ship drew off from land, from the entire body of pilgrims went up a mighty voice singing the Gregorian Credo. To the hearers it must have sounded like an echo from past ages, when every man knew the hymns of his Church.

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words

Woman Suffrage

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Every argument that Martha Moore Avery uses against the enfranchisement of women, has been used in times past against giving the vote to the different classes of men, and, indeed, among aristocratic circles and their paid dependents, anti-suffrage is really anti-democracy. The men who signed the Declaration of Independence were denounced by the Martha Moore Averys of that day as atheists, Jacobins and anarchists with as little regard for truth as the lady who regards all suffragists as Socialists, Feminists and free-lovers. The woman-suffrage movement is the logical sequence of endowing women with immortal souls. Woman's moral right to the franchise was settled two thousand years ago, when the great Spokesman for the New Law declared that before God there "is neither male nor female." Woman's legal right to the franchise was proclaimed when government of, for and by the people was instituted on this planet. "Shall then, the forces of evil work greater havoc to our national stability with never a stouter battle in its defense? Shall the cry for an impossible political equality, economic equality and for sex freedom drown out the voice of right reason?"

The national stability of America, which has given women a larger amount of freedom than any other country, seems to compare favorably with some of the countries of Europe where "women, cats and stoves" are admonished never to leave the kitchen. As for economic equality, Martha Moore Avery's quarrel in this case is with the power loom, the spinning jenny, the cotton gin, the sewing machine, the telephone, the telegraph, the typewriter and the thousand-and-one inventions that have followed in the wake of steam and electricity. As for sex freedom, there is nothing in the propaganda of the suffragists on sex morality that is not taken literally from the Ten Commandments. So eminent a thinker as Father Hudson says: "The entire movement is profoundly religious. The suffragists are clamoring for moral reforms which in reality are incompatible with the rejection of dogma. The closer we examine, the plainer does it appear that what is fallaciously termed 'Feminism' is in reality a powerful impulse toward Catholic ideals and a Catholic code of morality."

The theory that it is man's function to provide and woman's function to be sheltered is an antiquated lie, as millions of women wage-earners will testify. The woman who "is the head of a home" today may be working in a factory tomorrow. That political equality has been a protection to women in industry no fair-minded person with a knowledge of facts will deny. Moreover, all the fears expressed by the great and good that suffrage for women will disrupt society and destroy the home have no foundation in fact. Mrs. Avery seems to be unaware of the fact that women are voting in nearly every civilized country in the world today, especially in those countries which have the strongest claims to civilization. The countries in northern Europe that have not entered the war, have granted to women a larger measure of political power than the autocratic central empires. In the light of history, anti-suffragists in America are deprived of every argument intelligent persons can use who believe in democratic institutions. Ambiguous sentences about "male and female structures," "the rule of right reason," the "laws of nature," etc., may be profound and edifying, but they are far from convincing to anyone who knows how woman suffrage works where tried.

New York. SARA MCPIKE.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The question of woman's suffrage is no longer confined to the realm of the academic. It is an actuality. Twelve States have already placed it on their statute books and many others contemplate similar legislation. This shows that the agitation is not merely a fad, as some style it, but a movement progressing with unprecedented rapidity. If suffrage is granted to women, it will be given on the grounds of expediency only. The question of natural rights and woman's place in the home are a bit trite and hackneyed. Suffrage, whether it be woman's or man's, is not a natural right, but a civic or territorial right. The ballot, if granted to women, is by no means likely to revolutionize the home. It is not thread-bare arguments but cold facts that we face today. Nine million women have left the sacred precincts of the home and are now the slaves of industrialism. Will these women be able to better their conditions through the medium of the ballot? This is the question on which the whole matter hinges. These conditions are grave and need attention, for they are daily growing more extensive and intensive. Organization would somewhat reduce the intensity of these economic inequalities and in no small degree would right these industrial wrongs. Women seek the ballot chiefly for the purpose of ameliorating these inequalities and wrongs. Will the franchise be effective for this purpose? Men have been afflicted with equally acute and even more deplorable conditions. If the ballot can work such wonders for the redressing of wrong, why has it not redressed men's many social evils?

St. Paul, Minn. J. J. R.

The Open Shop

To the Editor of AMERICA:

AMERICA of November 13 publised a letter from Mr. T. J. Neacy of Milwaukee, which substantiates more forcefully than any direct argument, the truth of the proposition already advanced in this department that the viewpoint of most Catholic employers in this country is not Christian but pagan. Mr. Neacy takes special pride in the fact that he was the first to be called upon for an expression of opinion during the meeting of employers in Detroit in 1906 and he "declared absolutely for the open shop." This council of war was held to devise ways and means for crushing the strike of the core-makers and molders in 130 of the big machine shops in Detroit and vicinity. The core-makers demanded the extravagant sum of $2.75 for a nine-hour day, which comes to $16.50 a week, or $851.00 a year, if they worked every day in the year except Sundays. The result of the successful fight of the iron-masters against the human rights of their employees is thus summed up by Mr. Neacy: "The strike cost the plants affected many millions and it took two years to peter out, but the peace that has been the portion of employers and employees ever since was cheap at the purchase price"

It is the un-Christian attitude of so many Catholic employers here so baldly expressed that is so discouraging to Catholic workingmen and workingwomen and to those who would make their lot as industrial workers more endurable. One would think from the way this Catholic employer writes that a core-maker had no right to life, much less a right to marry and replenish the earth, and incidentally that machine-shop labor is nature's and nature's God's command. We assume that Mr. Neacy is an employer of high standing and considerable influence since he "was the first man to be asked for an opinion" in a meeting representing 130 of the largest machine shops of his section. Mr. Neacy had a magnificent opportunity to give evidence of the faith that should have been in him. He might, by expressing himself in accordance with Catholic doctrine, have given a peaceful turn to the warlike spirit of his fellow-employers, and have brought about a compromise that would have prevented God only knows how much suffering, bitterness and strife during the two years when the core-makers' strike was "petering out."

Mr. Neacy and a great many like him, perhaps do not know that there is in existence what might be called a Catechism of Industrial Duties and Rights. The name of this document is the Encyclical on Labor by Pope Leo XIII. In addition to this, at least one member of the American Hierarchy has issued a pastoral on the Labor Question. We would suggest that Mr. Neacy secure a copy of Cardinal O'Connell's letter to his clergy and people and read it carefully. The time will, and must come, when Catholic employers will see themselves as Catholic philosophy sees them: "Merely one of the agents in production, only one of the intermediaries between the raw material and the consumer. They are not even the ultimate pay-masters, who are the consumers who pay the price" (Abbot Snow's Christian Aspects of the Labor Question, page 17). On this point it seems to many that the cause of Christian social and individual progress would be immensely promoted if those whose mission it is to instruct the rich as well as the poor were to institute social study clubs for Catholic employers to teach them their duties to those who work.

New Orleans. V. N. DASPLIT.

Less Politics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"Catholic Landmarks of Boston," from the pen of Denis A. McCarthy, Associate Editor of the Sacred Heart Review, which appeared in AMERICA of November 18, was instructive, interesting and illuminating. It seemed to me a pity that such a splendid epitome of the history of Catholicism in Boston, should have concluded with extended mention of our progress in one field, the political, and meager notice of the other fields of activity. I regretted to notice that the writer had given scant attention to all but the field of political office, and I fear that the wrong interpretation will be placed on his thoughts, especially since he seems to have gaged our growth and progress by what we have accomplished along political lines. There are those, solid and substantial citizens, who thoroughly believe that the glory of the past has been too often dimmed by bringing unnecessarily to the front, the not too creditable fondness of the Irish Catholic for political place and preferment. It is not hard to imagine the reverse of the picture, had the lessons offered by circumstances and environment been learned and practised rather than avoided.

The splendid ideals and teachings of the Church, which are too often neglected, are in the main responsible for the progress which Mr. McCarthy has narrated in his splendid story. Other races, though bound with the Irish, by common ties, to the same Mother Church, have by their correspondence to the teachings of that Church, practised economy and thrift, and by so doing, have brought luster and renown to the period which Mr. McCarthy has described. The sober-minded, observant man, of Celtic blood, in Boston today, finds no cause for rejoicing in the record of the political achievement of his ancestors. On the contrary, facts as he finds them cause him to deplore the steadfast devotion to politics which unnecessarily marked the records of other days, and if I am not mistaken, this regret is rather universal. Comparatively few, outside the professional politician, point with anything resembling pride, to our possession of the major offices of the State and the city, as indicative of real, genuine, racial and religious progress. The talents of the Celt and his descendants have, for generations, been prostituted to the acquirement of place and power in matters political, to the apparent and deplorable sacrifice of advancement in more productive fields. We now realize that it is our shame and not our glory that we have been parading, and the best minds of the race are in accord on this point.

The columns of AMERICA clearly show that the present generation is reaching out for its own. Hundreds of capable young men of Celtic blood are entering business, and are meeting, as would be expected, with success. Hundreds more are to follow them. It is to such, with their superior talents and education that the Boston of the future is to look for the safe custody of high ideals and moral practices, and when the age of political supremacy shall have been forgotten, the descendants of the Celtic immigrant will be the safe and sane guardians of religious, civic and commercial interests in St. Botolph's town. I venture this kindly criticism of Mr. McCarthy's excellent article because it seems to be the marked duty of every intelligent and generous Catholic layman to warn the rising generation of our young men, and particularly the products of our Catholic colleges, against the folly of a political career, and to call to their attention the evident profit of entering into business life, where there is a demand for talents and ability. It is certainly high time for the race to begin the salutary and necessary work of teaching the individual to capitalize himself, and to put an end to the practice of allowing the individual to suffer exploitation for the benefit and profit of the few. The way is clear and defined; and already a start has been made in this city. To facilitate the progress of the movement I suggest that it would be well to allow our political achievements of the past to slumber in the cemetery of oblivion, to the end that when the second centenary of Catholicism in New England is celebrated, the historian may be able to pen a story not only Ad Majorem Dei Gloriam, but also Ad Majorem Catholicorum Gloriam.

Dorchester, Mass. JAMES D. RUSSELL.

The Anglican "Branch" Theories

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have no desire "discreetly" or otherwise to ignore any important point brought up by my opponents, so will answer "E. I. F.'s" questions as clearly as I can. (1) I have already acknowledged quite frankly and confessed with shame the fact that false doctrines are taught by Anglican authorities. This fact Anglo-Catholics deplore as heartily as any ardent defender of the historic Faith could wish. I did not say that the Anglican Church must be Catholic because it teaches Catholic doctrine; but that, the Anglican Church being Catholic by virtue of its continuity with the Apostolic Church, the "true doctrine" of the Anglican Church must be what the Catholic Church at large teaches, notwithstanding the false teaching of some of her clergy. The Anglican Church as Catholic does "teach its own members," and in so teaching condemns the traitors within its fold. (2) I did not say that the One Church "has split up into branches." When a tree develops two branches, this does not split the tree, it remains just as much one afterwards as it was before. No branch of the Church damns or repudiates another, or should do so, but only the diseased protuberances which the other branch may put forth without the authority of the One Trunk. (3) Just a word as to my opponent's reference to the "Supreme Head" idea: Henry's Act of Supremacy declared the King to be, "so far as is allowed by the law of Christ the supreme head" of the English Church as of the realm of England. Elizabeth's act substituted the term "supreme governor." But the title is now a dead one so far as England is concerned, and was never even born in the American Church.

(4) To declare, as our overrated and unauthoritative Articles do, that the Homilies "contain a godly and wholesome doctrine, and necessary for the times" (i. e., the sixteenth century) is not to say that they are infallible in their teaching, and that their teaching has any permanent or twentieth-century value. To say as the Homily quoted does, that Christendom was steeped in idolatry for 800 years is just one of those very Protestant notions that you and I equally and unsparingly condemn. I do not excuse our Anglican authorities for teaching such doctrines (those, I mean who do teach them). I condemn them for it. (5) I must confess I have difficulty in quite grasping E. I. F.'s last point. Certainly "both Anglican and Roman are true branches of the Catholic Church," and if passing from the former to the latter meant merely "exchanging truth for truth" there could be no sin in the change. The sin comes when one who "believes in the Catholicity of the Anglican Church" conforms to another branch of the Catholic Church which compels him to renounce what, in the premises, he still believes to be the sacramental graces he has received from God through the ministry of the Anglican Church.

Cleveland. JARED S. MOORE.

A Disconcerting Coincidence

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I rise to remark that if you give the modern sociologist rope enough, he is sure to verify the adage. It is worthy of note that precisely those of the tribe who would confer on the State the right to execute innocent defectives loudly deny the right of the State to execute depraved criminals.

New York. JOHN WILTBYE.

A Pole and a Catholic

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It was with great pleasure and no little national pride that I read in a recent issue of AMERICA Mr. Michael Williams' appreciation of Joseph Conrad. This great Catholic artist, as is so well said, owes his profound Catholic spirit to the fact that he belongs to the nation which for many years stood as "the bulwark of Christendom," and has been the cradle of some of the world's most eminent scientists, artists, musicians and heroes. Mr. Conrad is a Pole. The novelist and dramatist, Joseph Korzeniowski, was his grandfather. Readers of AMERICA will be pleased to know that his explicit credo, like that of every true Pole, for to us to be a Pole is to be a Catholic, is that of the Catholic Church.

New York. S. F.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

Contributions for the Mexican fund may be sent direct to AMERICA.

Our Country's Patroness

AMONG the ceiling decorations of a certain well-known church is painted the shield of the United States, but above the E Pluribus Unum is inscribed another device, and among the State stars are to be found twelve others, woven into the field of blue. The legend is Mater Admirabilis, and the twelve stars are the stars in the crown of Heaven's Queen. For just as St. George is the patron of England, St. Denis of France, St. Boniface of Germany, St. Patrick of Ireland, and St. James of Spain; so by the mercy of God is the Blessed Mother the patron of our land. This title she holds, moreover, not merely by virtue of the fact that Our Lady presides over the destinies of all Christian peoples, but she has won it by a special claim, for the Catholics of this country have chosen as their ambassador at the court of heaven and as their country's guardian no less a person than Our Saviour's own Mother. According to an old tradition, however, the special title under which we honor our patroness is that of the Immaculate Conception. As long ago as 1760, the Spanish colonies in America called Mary Conceived without Sin their special patroness; under the same title the Sixth Provincial Council of Baltimore chose Mary as the patroness of the United States, and later the decree was officially confirmed at Rome. Finally the Eighth Council of Baltimore began its deliberations by recording the joy that the Fathers felt at the recent definition of Our Lady's Immaculate Conception.

It is eminently fitting that she who was always free from every stain and blemish should be chosen as the guardian of all that is best in American civilization. The fact that every worthy aspiration of our countrymen will be favored in heaven by so strong an advocate as Mary should make us confident that the springs of our national life will be kept pure. To us, however, it belongs to see that our aims and ambitions as Americans shall always be those our Immaculate Patroness can further.

No Persecution

THERE has been no religious persecution in Mexico. Venustiano Carranza has said so, and there the matter rests. More than 4,399,000 American dollars' worth of Church property has been confiscated or destroyed; there has been no religious persecution in Mexico; Carranza has said so, and he is an honorable man, beloved of America. Churches have been desecrated, altars polluted, sacred vessels and vestments profaned; there has been no religious persecution in Mexico; the "First Chief" swears it and the First Chief is a man without guile. Priests have been tortured, Sisters have been dishonored; there has been no religious persecution in Mexico; Venustiano insists on this, and Venustiano has too much at stake to lie. Brothers and priests have been murdered, bishops, priests, and Sisters have been driven from their native land—innocent and penniless; there has been no religious persecution in Mexico; the great Liberator has asserted this twice and the great Liberator is too much of an idealist to lie twice in quick succession about the same topic. Decrees have been issued denying God's existence, closing churches, forbidding the administration of the Sacraments; there has been no religious persecution in Mexico. Venustiano Carranza, First Chief, Liberator, Apostle of Liberty, Fraternity and Equality, Philosopher and Idealist, has changed the definition of persecution. The word now means the omission of any deed, howsoever violent and base, against the persons of Catholic bishops, priests, and Sisters, and failure to deny God's existence and to destroy, mutilate or profane property dedicated to the service of God. This definition meets all exigencies and has been accepted by the American press. Catholics should learn the definition, so as to be able to acquit Carranza of untruthfulness and the press of low ideals.

Don't Be an Only Child

"IN a home where the parental attention can be concentrated on a single child, better results should be attained than when the work of training involves a division of the attention among several children," is a thesis that the modern advocates of small families consider self-evident. Yet according to an alarming array of statistics prepared by the psychological department of Clark University, a writer in the December Century finds that out of 400 "only children," four-fifths of whom were of American parentage, only 100 were in good health, about one-third were "nervous," most of them were very dull, only eighty are described as "normal" in their social relations, "while 134 out of a total of 269 got along badly with other children, usually because they were unwilling or did not know how to make concessions, and were stubbornly set on having their own way." "Only" boys, as a rule, are "sissies" and "only" girls, selfish dolls. Children, moreover, we are assured, who are allowed to "develop excessive occupation with thoughts of self," who are humored, petted and coddled out of all reason, are almost certain to grow up selfish, conceited and neurasthenic, and to be badly handicapped in life owing to their lack of initiative and self-reliance.

On the other hand, the child who is fortunate enough to be born into a family where he has, or will have, numerous brothers and sisters, and where he cannot enjoy an excess of creature comforts, must learn from his earliest years the highly useful art of giving and taking; he will realize feelingly that there are other children in the world besides himself, that there are some things he must not do, and many things he cannot have. Just as marbles are made smooth and round by being shaken together, so boys and girls who are brought up in the same household help one another to get rid of unamiable traits that would be serious hindrances to success in after life; and the little acts of self-denial, that are constantly demanded of six or seven children who are reared together under the watchful eyes of their parents, provide the best course in character-training there is. It is certainly an entertaining thought that one of the chief tenets in the creed of the modern Malthusian is now being attacked by hard-headed statisticians. For the cult of the "only child" instead of heightening, as is piously believed, the quality of tomorrow's men and women, is the very thing that is sure to make them in body, mind and soul, inferior to the generation of yesterday.

The Doctor's Duty

SOON after the press had given wide publicity to the defective baby case of last month, certain doctors who seemed to be envious of the notoriety achieved by the Chicago surgeon, began to grant interviews to reporters, and in several instances expressed views in substantial agreement with those advanced by their fellow-practitioner of the Middle West. Worse still, a New York father, influenced, no doubt, by the evil example of those Chicago parents was for a time at least, "insistent" that his crippled child should "be permitted to die." Such occurrences indicate that mistaken opinions regarding the duties of physicians and the rights of parents are common nowadays.

Physicians and surgeons who desire to live up to the moral obligations of their craft, should remember that their profession is for healing, that their duty is to preserve life by every means in their power, and that once they have assumed charge of a case they are in strict justice bound to avert death if they can. That a surgeon, therefore, who has it in his power to save a life, should freely assume toward his patient an attitude of passivity owing to which death is certain to result is a line of conduct utterly indefensible. To act thus is to usurp the function of God and to make oneself master of life and death; it is to violate the trust of the State, which grants a license for the saving, not the undoing, of its members; it is to outrage the primary rights of the invalid by condemning him unheard to death.

Obviously the Chicago case and the discussion thereon have this lesson for Catholics, that they should make certain of the moral standards of the hospital and the physician, no matter how well equipped and eminent, into whose keeping they commend their own lives and the lives of their children. Otherwise they are apt, albeit unknowingly, to play fast and loose with the most fundamental, if not absolutely, the most precious of the gifts of God.

The Baker and the Baptist

HE had a white cap perched rakishly on his head, and because he was off duty for the moment, a large black cigar in his mouth. This bobbed up and down like a crazy semaphore at night, for the baker was talking and the baker was angry.

"Look here," he said in broken accents, for he is a native of Bessarabia or some such place. "It's a shame we should have to put up with this." "This," was a newspaper account of a speech delivered by a "patriot," in Albany on the preceding night. The "patriot" was a Baptist clergyman; but let that pass. All Baptist clergymen are not like him. "Just listen to this," continued the master of dough:

> There are in our midst bitter, crafty, dangerous enemies of our flag. They are not the Baptists, they are not the Presbyterians, they are not the Methodists, they are not the Jews. I will not here say who these enemies of our flag are. But this is a meeting for Protestants, and I hope there are no Romanists here.

"Have you been long in this country?" I asked the baker. "Because if you have, you won't worry much about the ravings of these filbert-brained patriots."

"Thirty years," rejoined the maker of buns. "But say; when they asked for soldiers in the Spanish War, I went. I thought it was my duty, because I am no longer a Bessarabian; I am an American. But I didn't see this 'patriot' in any camp. And my two uncles who came over from the old country in the 'fifties, they both went to the war. They didn't come back either. They stayed down at Gettysburg. They were Americans; and it makes me hot to hear this fellow saying that they were not, and that I am not. Say, where does this 'patriot' come from?" And he frothed over, like a pint of his own yeast.

Perhaps that genial philosopher, Mr. Dooley, can supply the answer. The professional "patriot" you may remember, was objecting to the erection of a monument in Chicago to the Confederate dead. "Where were you, me brave man?" asks Clancy, late of Mulligan's brigade,

"where were you whin the draft wint round? Where were you whin Mulligan died down there in Kintucky? Hidin' in the cellar of Harrigan's grocery store. Be off wid ye."

Does Mr. Dooley's answer suffice? Few anti-Catholic agitators have civil or military records to be proud of. In insulting the Catholics of Albany this Baptist clergyman is surely not adding to his reputation as a desirable citizen. Rather he is taking a place with the heroic and patriotic reserves of the cellar. The Bessarabian baker is an American. What is the Albany minister?

In Praise of Potatoes

THE worthy Dr. Stanjak, a German scientist, has been begging his countrymen to give due honor to the potato. "You have sung hymns to heroes," says the Doctor. "On the field of battle you have called down the wrath of God upon our enemies. You have composed poems in honor of our guns, our fleet and other things which have helped us in the war, but you have ignored the potato." As the Solanum Tuberosum, in Dr. Stanjak's opinion, will unquestionably prove the savior of the Fatherland, he suggests that a national hymn should now be composed, not of hate, but of thanksgiving for the potato: "Sing with me the triumphal song of the potato plant," is the line beginning the pæan of praise which he has submitted for consideration. The hymn's noble opening whets expectation and fills the reader with a violent longing for the remaining lines, but our daily press, it seems, did not publish them, and the omission, no doubt, will be widely regretted.

We like to think, nevertheless, that the poet's lyric flight was evenly sustained to the very end of the ode and that all the potato's serviceable qualities were melodiously hymned. For many other necessary foods the resourceful Germans have invented chemical substitutes. But nothing could easily be found to take the place of the potato. Without question that vegetable richly deserves the recognition it is receiving, for in the past, no less than now, it has supported entire nations. But besides its high nutritive value, America's gift to the Old World possesses rare moral beauty. For example: notwithstanding its numerous eyes the potato is a lover of retirement and shuns the garish day, and though belonging to the night shades, a family of evil fame, the potato has not suffered itself to be contaminated by its relatives' wickedness. It is true that when the poets sing about the "rathe primrose" the "pale jessamine," and other plants of no economic value whatever, they never so much as mention the potato blossom. Nevertheless it richly deserves a sacred bard; for when the potato flowers' brief life is ended—And there's pathos for you!—the vines soon wither away but leave concealed at their roots enough farinaceous tubers to feed a warring nation. All honor, then, to Dr. Stanjak, the Homer of the incomparable potato!

LITERATURE

Catholic Literature's Possibilities

THE possibilities of Catholic literature may be considered under various aspects: as to the audience it commands, the influence it exerts, and as it is in itself; a circumscribed audience, an influence immeasurable, and the sweetness and splendor of all truth and all beauty.

Catholic literature is read by Catholics only: a rule with many and notable exceptions. There are men sufficiently broadminded to read both sides of historical questions, and searchers after truth who ponder our controversial works. Moreover, there are books great and beautiful enough to triumph over all religious differences; for instance, classics, such as Dante's works, and Calderon's, hold their own among students everywhere; and Thomas à Kempis, at least in his best-known book, has long been admired and loved by Protestants, and he is accepted as a counselor no less than as a friend. The charm of a fine style is always alluring, a siren-voice for the cultivated. Men who read Renan and Huxley for the beauty of their style are bewitched also by Newman, Alice Meynell and Agnes Repplier. Even their most Catholic work finds an audience like Arthur Christopher Benson's and Augustine Birrell's. Lionel Johnson wins friends everywhere and Coventry Patmore gains admirers. To multiply examples: Francis Thompson popularized heroic sanctity, as shown forth in St. Ignatius, bringing it within the ken of the literary world by making the most of every appealing, human trait and presenting it through the medium of a style which makes of the Life a work of art in the strict sense of a cruelly abused phrase.

As to the influence of Catholic literature, it is not easy to say much that is satisfactory. Influence is never easy to gage. One fact is palpable and significant: everywhere, men who are eager to promote a cause use literature as their most potent weapon. Of recent years this and other countries have been deluged with socialistic books and pamphlets. For those who will never read Strauss, Renan, or Ingersoll, unbelievers constantly supply novels which are able teachers of a sad explanation of life's meaning. For any who have forgotten the Kingsleys of yesterday, today's scoffers and bigots work diligently to make nonsense of miracles, schemers of Jesuits, and fools of saints. "Marie Claire," for instance, all simplicity and sweetness, was sent over the world, and heralded as a masterpiece, just to cast reproach upon the exiled, devoted nuns for whom France was to mourn in her day of need. Always and everywhere, men have followed the written word. History bears witness to the fact, as do movements rising or falling around us and events happening before our eyes. The children of this world are indeed wise.

If prejudice is to be dispelled, if truth is to make its way, the work must largely be done by Catholic literature. Through it all may learn what the Church really is. True, many ask with Pilate, "What is truth?" and like him do not wait to hear an answer. Others go for information concerning the Church and Catholics to enemies of both, a precedent they would not follow if they were investigating, for instance, a scientific hypothesis. But it is not always so. Denifle's "Luther" is said to have had immense influence among the Lutheran scholars of Germany; Lingard's "History" opened the unwilling eyes of many an English Protestant. A very different work, Henry Harland's "A Cardinal's Snuff-box," artistic from the first chapter to the last, has made Catholics of some whom heavier works never would have reached. Its logic, tenderly human or candy-coated with delicate wit, is unanswerable. Mgr. Benson's historical novels must lessen the prejudice of a class to whom their own Gairdner is unknown; and there is no better exposure of Spiritualism than his "The Necromancer," nor a better apology for contemplatives, who are popularly supposed to need one sadly, than "The Conventionalists," nor a more beautiful picture of mysticism, which is so much admired, so little understood in literary circles, than that given in "Richard Raynal," a book considered by many, himself included, as the author's best piece of work.

"The Hound of Heaven" serves instead of a retreat for hundreds who would shudder at the thought of making the Spiritual Exercises. "San Celestino" was to the world at large a fanatic or a fool, and to many Catholics incomprehensible, until "John Ayscough" tenderly, reverently, and with consummate skill, showed how gentle, wise, loving and heroic that Pope was, and how his sanctity, bred in solitude, unfitted him for the honors and responsibilities thrust upon him.

And certain it is, in the words of Father John Burke, "If we are to make ourselves truly Catholic in our character, our aims, our principles, then we must be readers of Catholic literature." Catholic books and periodicals are staple food for Catholic minds which without them inevitably show signs of weakness and disease. A large portion of the daily press, many of the popular magazines, plays presented everywhere, lectures and books lauded on all sides, even much work done along sociological lines with sincerest good will, all these are infected with the poison which, broadly, may be called materialism under its various aspects, whether we call it worldliness, humanitarianism, Socialism, pragmatism, New Thought, or, perhaps, the higher criticism. Against this formidable army is Catholic literature pitted. Our minds cannot serve God and mammon; they can serve but one of the two, and their choice depends largely on whether they accept guidance from the Church or from the world, from Catholic literature, or from Ibsen, Maeterlinck, Bergson and Tagore.

It is obvious, too, that no mind and heart can be chivalrously loyal to a cause of whose poets and leaders and heroes, of whose history, whose interests at home and abroad he knows, nor cares to know, very little. The spirit which inspired such men as Windthorst, Lamoricière, Veuillot, the Comte de Mun, could not have taken possession of hearts nourished on no nobler food than the daily paper, the popular magazine and the latest philosophic venture. Catholic literature had steeped them, mind and heart and soul, with Catholic ideals; it strengthened their arm to fight, their courage to endure, having taught them so to love God's cause that for it they gladly gave their all.

Considering Catholic literature in itself, its possibilities are wonderful and worthy of very special study, for upon its own essence necessarily depends its influence, and of this is born its beauty. It reflects life within the one true Fold. It is a song sung by His children under the eye of the Heavenly Father. Its breadth is limited only by human error, its depth by man's littleness, its beauty by the power of our dim eyes. For even the clean of heart do not see God clearly: the promise is that they shall see Him.

Catholic literature came into being with the New Testament, when St. Matthew wrote the first Gospel, when St. John's great, loving heart set down the glories of the Word and his tender memories of what Christ had said concerning the Holy Eucharist; when St. Luke wrote the first pages of Church history and other Apostles gave exhortations to the people. Soon poets, chanting their faith and love, gave the world the first Christian hymns. Other singers followed after, and then came chroniclers with strange tales to tell, and commentators upon Holy Writ, and philosophers to safeguard the Faith. St. Thomas came, and Dante and Calderon; Racine and Crashaw; Bossuet and Fénelon; Lingard, Montalembert, Chateaubriand, Donoso Cortés, Newman, Ward, Allies: great names in every field. Today, in all lands, there are Catholic writers and in none is there a lack of high talent, though genius may sometimes be wanting. And all these writers have, and have ever had, the same fundamental principles, the same ideals, the same hopes, for with Catholics time or race makes no difference.

Adequately to appreciate the possibilities of Catholic literature it would be necessary to understand the value of human souls, God-loved and God-redeemed; the preciousness, the sacredness of truth, remembering, who He was who said, "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life"; the beauty of Jesus, the All-Beautiful, of whose loveliness the beauty of every flower and tree and stream, the glory of every sunset, the sweetness of every bird's song, every high deed, every noble life are but a reflection. For these things, eternal Love, eternal Truth, eternal Beauty, does Catholic literature yearn; of them is it an echo, a reflection or an interpretation.

FLORENCE GILMORE.

REVIEWS

The Life of Father De Smet, S.J. (1801-1873). By E. LAVEILLE, S.J. Authorized Translation by MARIAN LINDSAY. Preface by CHARLES COPPENS, S.J. Illustrated. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $2.75.

Father De Smet is one of the conspicuous figures in the history of the Catholic Church in the United States. This new "Life," by one of his fellow-countrymen, will help to emphasize this fact, while it will perhaps fill in some of the gaps about the spirituality of the great missionary, which naturally could not be dealt with, at any length, in the four splendid volumes published some years ago by Chittenden and Richardson. It is somewhat discouraging to hear in certain quarters disparaging remarks about De Smet, and even accusations charging him with conveying absolutely false impressions about the missions he was establishing. Indeed, flat denials are made that he was the great man he is credited with being. Such a charge, it is unnecessary to say, is based on an absolute ignorance of facts. One of his biographers writes:

> His prodigious labors, his travels, hardships and perils must be placed on the front rank of similar exploits. In his first seven years, he had traveled by the slow methods of the time, a distance equal to more than twice the circumference of the earth. He had traveled in almost every clime and by every sort of conveyance. From the burning summer of the equator, he had passed to the frozen winters of 50° 34′ north. He had traveled by sailing vessel, by river barge and by canoe; by dog-sled and snow-shoe; on horseback and on wagon, and many a long mile on foot. He had endured hardships that seem to us almost impossible, and which were undoubtedly the foundation of the ills he afterwards suffered. It was the period of 1844-46, that he referred to, in a letter to a fellow-missionary who was in a complaining mood: "I have been for years a wanderer in the desert. I was for three years without receiving a letter from any quarter. I was two years on the mountains, without tasting bread, salt, coffee, tea or sugar. I was for years without a roof, without a bed. I have been six months without a shirt on my back, and often have I passed whole days and nights without a morsel to eat." The same authority tells us that the distances covered by him during his whole missionary career run up to the astounding figure of 180,000 miles. He had crossed the Atlantic nineteen times and once made the perilous journey around Cape Horn, completing it by an equally perilous entrance into the yet uncharted Columbia River in Oregon, escaping shipwreck half a dozen times on that single journey.

Archbishop Purcell wrote of him in 1847: "Never, since the days of Xavier, Brébeuf, Marquette and Lalemant, has there been a missionary more clearly pointed out and sent for this great work than Father De Smet." Thurlow Weed introduced him to President Lincoln as "my friend, Father De Smet," and Lincoln talked to him by the hour. Thomas H. Benton, whose son he baptized, wrote in 1852, that "More could be done by Father De Smet for the welfare of the Indians, by keeping them at peace and friendship with the United States, than an army with banners."

In 1851 Father De Smet assisted at the great Indian Council near Fort Laramie. In 1858 and '59 he accompanied General Harney on the Utah and Oregon expedition, as intermediary with the Indians. In 1864 he was sent by the Government to pacify the savages of the Upper Missouri, and again on a similar errand in 1867. In 1868 it was solely through his influence that the devastating war with the Sioux, which had spread through the whole region of the Upper Missouri and Yellowstone valleys, was arrested and a treaty of peace arranged. The man who could achieve the peaceful conquest of Sitting Bull, among whose maddened warriors he walked holding a banner of the Blessed Virgin in his hand and pleading with the Indians to forgive and forget the past; and then could lead them down into the very midst of the United States troops and induce 50,000 of them, in spite of the outrages of which they had been the victims, to make a treaty of peace, entitles him to a place of honor among the great men of the country.

This new book will be a welcome addition to the knowledge of the early days of the Church in the West, especially as Father Laveille has added many valuable notes about the various personages who appear in the course of the narrative. We especially welcome the testimony of Father Cataldo about De Smet's accuracy in describing conditions as he found them, not only the ideal Christianity of the Flatheads in Oregon—which disappeared, however, as soon as the American immigration set in, a fact which seemed to give the lie to De Smet's description—but also the indescribable loathsomeness that had to be faced almost everywhere else. Both pictures were given clearly and distinctly. As Father Cataldo's authority in Indian matters is supreme, we hope that the misunderstandings about the great De Smet will forever disappear. T. J. C.

The Lord of Misrule and Other Poems. By ALFRED NOYES. New York: The Frederick A. Stokes Co. $1.60.

The Rocky Road to Dublin; the Adventures of Seumas Beg. By JAMES STEPHENS. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.00.

The Little Book of American Poets. Edited by JESSIE B. RITTENHOUSE. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.00.

Sappho in Levkas and Other Poems. By WILLIAM ALEXANDER PERCY. New Haven: Yale University Press. $1.00

A very definite message for the reverence and maintenance of the "Law" reads clearly from this new book of poems by Mr. Noyes.

> Trumpeter, sound for the splendor of God!
> Sound the music whose name is law, is, in substance, reiterated in many of the vigorous ballads and odes of this book. In other volumes Mr. Noyes has exhibited his artistic skill in the handling of "larger themes." Who will forget, for instance, the rich imagery and splendid rhythm investing the "Tales of the Mermaid Tavern" and the underlying symbolism in "Sherwood"? But here he invokes no symbolism "that half conceals" the motif of his song. Those who follow contemporaneous literature readily admit that the present European war has, at least, purified the tone and strengthened the touch of today's literature. Mr. Noyes bears witness to this, for his latest volume is a revealing of the direction hearts of serious-minded men are taking. "The Trumpet of the Law," in particular, is a noble, Christian ode, with a message of courage, hope, and abiding peace, breathing from the Nativity and the Crucifixion.

There is a talent in Irish poets which the critics call, for want of a more definite phrase, "Celtic in-ness," the power to catch and then express the scintillating lights and shadows of nature, the beat of fairy feet, the tune of every wind, and the voices behind every feature of the universe. Mr. Stephens has long since proved that he possesses the talent. Both sections of his new book contain charming snatches of that kind of song which is his unique artistry. The little songs and ballads, with their impish play and droll surprises, are representative of an Irish mood.

In her new anthology of American poetry Jesse B. Rittenhouse has kept close to standards that have ruled other anthologists in the same field. It is well said of Longfellow and Lowell that no unclean line can be found in their poetry; and in this "Little Book of American Poets" a sense and a regard for morality and Christian ethics are clearly in evidence. An artistic eye has likewise governed the selections. One could wish, however, that, in addition to the poetical and ethical discernment, the editor had chosen, in certain instances, poems which would afford a revelation of the poet's character as well as of his literary technique.

Accurate gesture, so to speak, marks Mr. Percy's exercise of his poetic gift; he has academic precision ad unguem in the structure and rhythm of his odes, and a cool temperament in elaborating what he very properly calls the psychology and ethics of passion. The ascetic development of Sappho's character is, as it had to be, pagan, but Christian and Catholic themes have a sympathetic appeal for this young poet's muse. Fragrant as a perfect roadside flower is "A Page's Road Song" of the thirteenth century; and the long ode, "St. Francis to the Birds," might well have been selected for the initial poem. In so many pages of carefully elaborated versification one may well overlook the defective ending to the sonnet, "Failure." E. L.

Memories of a Publisher, 1865-1915. By GEORGE HAVEN PUTNAM, Litt.D. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.00.

Vagrant Memories. Being Some Personal Recollections. By WILLIAM WINTER. New York: George H. Doran Co. $3.00.

For future historians of the past half-century these two volumes preserve a wide range of valuable material. Major Putnam's contribution is a continuation of the memories of his youth included in a previous book and reviewed in AMERICA June 20, 1914. He gives an account of his personal undertakings and interests and of the many eminent persons on both sides of the Atlantic with whom he became acquainted, and comments upon the events which during the same period served to make current history. One of the distinguished men he met was the British general now so largely in the public eye, Lord Kitchener, who was his fellow-passenger across the Atlantic in 1910. "I found," he says, "the general modest enough in his utterances on matters in which he was an accepted authority, but disposed to be "cocky" in his conclusions on things of which he knew little or nothing."

If the great "K. of K." would condescend to make a tu quoque retort to a brevet major of volunteers, he might intimate how aptly this description fits the writer of the eulogy of Père Hyacinthe and the Modernists of our own day, on pages 63 and 64 of the "Memories," as well as of the account, on page 415, of how "the heavy hand of the Church had interfered with the production and distribution of literature" in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. He might also wonder at the curious code of ethics that, on page 331, excuses the bookseller vending an immoral book because he was not its publisher and because there was a public demand for its circulation. Major Putnam had lived in one of the greatest Catholic communities in the world for nigh on three-quarters of a century. In his busy life he had met in business, socially and in public affairs thousands of his Catholic fellow-citizens, yet he deliberately prints, on page 306 of his book this comment on his success in a libel suit in which he was the defendant: "The jury was fortunately made up largely of Hebrews. If they had been Catholics it would have been difficult to secure a verdict against one of the managers of a great Catholic Society."

Mr. Winter's book is also a sequel to a previous volume of the same character, and deals with the golden age of the New York stage. It is a period inseparably linked with the names of the Booths, the Wallacks, Barrett, Jefferson, Montague, James Lewis, Augustin Daly, Laura Keene, Clara Morris, Ada Rehan, Mrs. Gilbert, and others with whom he lived in friendship and whose acting he carefully observed. He gives essential details of biography and social estimates of achievement as a help to deepen in the minds of his readers "a conviction of the vital importance of a rightly-conducted theater," one appealing to the highest intelligence and the finest feelings of the public. How sadly the stage has departed from this ideal it is unnecessary to detail here. Mr. Winter, long honored as the dean of critics, has protested without ceasing against the vile plays that are offered the public nowadays. He reiterates his belief in the critic's duty and urges an earnest and persistent crusade on the part of the clean-minded, self-respecting public against the degradation of our stage. T. F. M.

Aus dem Glauben leben! Eine Anleitung zur Selbsterziehung für die katholische weibliche Jugend. Von A. HEINEN. 80 Pf.

Der Gymnasiast. Freundesworte an unsere Studenten. Von P. INGBERT NAAB, O.M.Cap. M. 1, 60. M. Gladbach: Volkesvereins-Verlag.

Here are two books for the young and for those who wish to be helpful to them. The first deals with Catholic girlhood. It is filled with the fruit of rich experience and instinct with a spirit of quickening faith. High and sane ideals are held before the growing girl which will prevent her from indulging in vain day-dreams and empty ambitions. The author's purpose is to make of her a useful member of the community and a joy in the household of which she is a part or over which she may in time be called to rule as its queen. The girls of the laboring classes of Germany have evidently been mainly in the mind of the writer, but there are many excellent lessons for all classes, since almost every phase of woman's life is touched upon. The chapter on religious vocation may seem to counsel too long a delay before the final step is taken, though only a single instance is given by way of illustration. The social conditions of Germany are, of course, reflected in the book, but the principles laid down are in general as Catholic as the faith which inspires the author.

The second book is confined to the student world, as its title indicates. In seventy-four short chapters the writer deals with the moods and thoughts reflected in student life. Every trial, danger, aspiration and duty of those years of preparation are passed over in review. Father Naab speaks out of the fulness of experience. His advice is always given in the warmest tone of friendliness and sympathy. "The great questions," he says, "are burning upon your lips, and often you have no one in whom you can confide, no one who can completely understand you. God grant that you may find their solution in this volume, and above all that, with a more perfect knowledge, peace may enter your heart." The statement that comparatively few are called to practise the Evangelical Counsels in community life is too rigorous. "To embrace the Evangelical mode of life is the privilege of every one," St. Basil writes, and this is likewise the doctrine of St. Thomas. Certain obstacles may, of course, prevent the call being followed. J. H.

The Spiritual Journal of Lucie Christine. Edited by the REV. A. POULAIN, S.J. Translated from the French. St. Louis: B. Herder.

It is always consoling to find extraordinary graces and special gifts of prayer bestowed upon a soul whose sanctity is attained in the common state of life, and that, too, under the conditions of our own times. The narrative of such a life, however exalted in matter, if only its style be simple and straightforward, may be a means of grace to many who are not called so high. For what the poet is to the loftier emotions of his fellows, that the mystic is to their spiritual consciousness, being its interpreter. We read of experiences to whose sublimity indeed we ourselves are strangers, yet now and then we can realize, perhaps, that "a local habitation and a name" is given to some principle of God's dealing which in its humbler forms is not quite unknown to us. Such a purpose may be well served by a volume like the present one. It is the spiritual autobiography of one who was wife, mother, widow, a constant sufferer, and through all a most devoted servant of God. Scarcely anything is told us of the natural side of this interesting life. The narrative consists almost exclusively of illuminations and consolations received in prayer, in which sacred art the author was deeply versed.

The book possesses certain striking advantages over some other literature of its kind. Both Lucie's confessor, at whose direction she wrote the record, and also the editor of her narrative, have scrupulously observed her right to tell her story in her own way, with only an occasional foot-note for the reader's assistance. Thus the story preserves a completeness and a progressive coherence of its own. In order, however, to make the actual steps in the progress more evident to the ordinary reader, the editor's knowledge of mystical theology is employed in pointing out the salient feature of each experience which makes it a link in the entire chain, and which is emphasized by the simple device of heavy-faced type. W. H. McC.

American Ideals. By CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER. Garden City: Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.00.

It is no small task to determine the nature of a people's ideals; and, if we are to judge by the confusing and contradictory opinions that have been advanced from time to time, the task of estimating aright the ideals of the American people would seem to be as yet impossible of achievement. The reason, no doubt, is due to the composite character of our people; a fusion of traits and tendencies inherited from other lands, and gradually cohering and uniting into a more or less symmetrical whole.

Mr. Cooper's study has led him to conclusions with which the Catholic reader may or may not agree. He may justly regret, for instance, that the author has failed to appraise the influence which the Catholic Church has wielded in ennobling the ideals of millions of our fellow-citizens. And this regret will prompt him to modify the statement that "where the men of the last generation said 'doctrine' we say 'service.'" To Catholics doctrine and social service are not antipodal. The reader may well wonder, too, why "our Pilgrim sires" should be credited with having given such a vital impulse to American education, and with having fashioned so largely its ideals; as if here, too, the Catholic Church, with her network of parish schools, academies, high schools and colleges spread over the country, had not merited a generous notice. The educational ideals she espouses are as thoroughly American as any ever conceived in the New England of two centuries ago.

Omissions such as these will lead the critical to think that the writer has not taken into consideration all the factors of the problem he would solve. Still his observations are suggestive. The absence of the spirit of patient and exacting reflection, so widely manifested, does not speak well for the solidity and enduring value of American present-day literature. It is timely, too, to insist, as the author does, that true reform must begin with the individual, not with social bodies. Life and death are from within: a clean heart in the individual can alone ensure corporate godliness. Perhaps the chapter that will be read with greatest interest is that which deals with American ideals as seen by Americans themselves. J. A. C.

Habits That Handicap. By CHARLES B. TOWNS. New York: The Century Co. $1.20.

Recent legislation against the traffic in habit-forming drugs has brought to light startling facts about the prevalence of addiction to drugs. In the volume under review, Mr. Towns, who claims a large experience in the study and treatment of the victims of opium, alcohol and tobacco, points out clearly the gigantic proportions of the menace, and the measures to be adopted for safeguarding the public. That the drug habit is widespread may be common knowledge, but it will be news to many to learn that, through the unnecessary administration of opiates in regular medical treatment, or through the use of patent medicines, many have become enslaved unconsciously. Mr. Towns maintains that the sale of opiates and their compounds should be forbidden except on prescription; this would place the responsibility on the physician, who in turn should be obliged to give to the civil authorities an exact account of all drugs dispensed. The author's insistence on the value and need of will-power in drug cases is gratifying, and if he had only included the supernatural help to be obtained through prayer and the Sacraments, his suggestions would be complete. Mr. Towns counsels the sterilization of those who are beyond cure; here we beg leave to differ from him, since we consider such teaching ethically unsound. D. J. C.

Aristocracy and Justice. By PAUL ELMER MORE. Shelburne Essays, Ninth Series. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.25.

Mr. More's book might well be characterized as an attempt to institute a searching examination of the social conscience. As such it will be sure to approve itself to any thoughtful reader whose optimism has not already blinded him to the evils of the times. Modern education in the main and the tendencies of modern morality are both indicted and both justly condemned: the first on the score of not educating, the second on account of its love-born, Narcissus-like humanitarianism. But it is only as a diagnostician that Mr. More can claim to be trustworthy. He cannot prescribe a remedy for the simple reason that he has lost his grasp on the fundamental principles of Christianity. For him the latter has become so diluted as to furnish little more than a mere coloring for his thought. Moreover, before he again commits himself to the assertion that he would be "ready to lay iconoclastic hands on the whole fabric of the Middle Ages and sweep it away altogether, with all its good and all its evil," we would suggest that he study more carefully the real foundations of all that is best in modern civilization and trust less to such distorting mediums as H. O. Taylor's one-sided "Medieval Mind." M. I. X. M.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Those who have justly complained in recent years that the Catholic Christmas cards were not artistic and the artistic ones were not Catholic will be glad to know that the Catholic Art Publishing Co., of 17 Madison Avenue, New York, have ready an unusually varied and attractive assortment of holiday cards, booklets and calendars which were printed especially for Catholic patrons. The reproductions we have received of the great Nativity paintings are particularly tasteful, as are also the private greeting cards which are now fashionable. The firm's catalogue offers intending purchasers a wide choice of Yule-tide pictures and cards.——Paul Elder & Co., of San Francisco, have out "The Peace Calendar and Diary, 1916, by Dr. John J. Mullowney" ($1.00). On a metal stand are arranged for each day of the year thoughts on peace which are taken from the utterances of living men, including Pope Benedict XV, and from the writings of great authors.

The first poem in "Dreams and Dust" (Harper, $1.20), Don Marquis's new volume is entitled "This is Another Day," contains a fine thought fitted with lyric wings and dress, and justly recommends the entire collection. Don Marquis, besides being the witty "colyum" maker of the Evening Sun, is nothing short of a master of lyric diction and movement, and these poems are specimens of his best work.——In "A Marriage Cycle" (Houghton, $1.25) Mr. George Herbert Palmer, a Harvard professor, edits and contributes a preface to the poems of his wife, Alice Freeman Palmer, thirteen years after her death. The poems have a certain unity, for they were all written for her husband, and from that point of view present a touching picture of wifely love and duty. Under three headings, "The Approach," "Together," and "The Parting," are collected the poet's emotions and longings before and after marriage. They are not great poems, neither are they presented as such, but they do say many beautiful things with true and delicate expression.

"Talks About Poets and Poetry" (W. P. Linehan, Melbourne, 2 shillings), by the Rev. J. J. Malone, is a fine bit of intensive literary criticism. Readers of the little book will learn what Father Malone thinks of the works of two Australian poets: Adam Lindsay Gordon and Henry Kendall. The essay on Oliver Goldsmith is a new presentation of an old subject, for the Irish side of Goldsmith's character is brought out with the sure hand of a sympathetic critic. The last essay "Anthologies of Irish Verse," deals largely with a just appreciation of the Irish character and of the world's indebtedness to the Celtic race.——"Peg Along," by George L. Walton, M.D., (Lippincott, $1.00) is full of advice for the would-be worldly-wise. The author has the gift of vivifying flat platitudes with catchy phrases and of telling stories. Attributing much of our ill humor and bad spirit to "crankiness" and querulousness, the remedy he suggests is the cultivation of a calm, cheerful state of mind, of a persevering effort to "peg along."

"Clouded Amber" (Badger, $1.35) is a tale of the stage life and "heart throbs" of a beautiful, talented and, best of all, innocent child of a Canadian village. Zoé, under the guidance of the manager of the Neversink Theatrical Company, a certain Mr.. Fothergill, and under the motherlike guardianship of the seasoned actress, Aunt Liddy, reaches the highest pinnacle of histrionic fame as childlike and stainless as when she bade farewell to good Father Le Blanc, but chastened withal by a bitter struggle against the demon of jealousy. The battle, however, is fought and won. Robert Pryor, a good son of a good mother, and himself a victim of misplaced love, gains the affection of a heart that was once given with all the trust of a child to the scheming, debonnair Fothergill. Patience Warren, the author, is to be congratulated on having given us a novel that is at once pleasing and good.—— In "Emma McChesney & Co." (Stokes, $1.00) the redoubtable and lovable Emma McChesney is once more presented by Edna Ferber in a book of seven chapters, which originally appeared as short stories in a magazine. Because of this the thread of the narrative is rather thin, but all the wholesome good nature, the expressive slang, sharp business sense and keen insight of the militant traveling saleslady are still here. Some familiar characters, "Fat Ed" Meyers, "T. A." and the rest are still here, too, and Emma marries one of them. A wholesome book, with laughter and tears. The story of Emma's encounter with the "uplift movers" is amusing and true.

"W'ot do they understand?" So wailed Tommy in London's streets, with the charm and allure of India fresh on him. And "What do I understand?" the reader of Kipling must have said to himself time and time again. The indictment may have been uttered as one stood laughing with Mulvaney just outside the Prithi-Devi temple in Benares, or it may have been quietly whispered as one watched Dinah Shadd lay her infant away far off in the little station beyond Umballa. And the charge was true, whether distinctly framed or merely felt as one sat vacant-eyed on the Mandalay Hill with the aforesaid Tommy, listening to the "tinkling temple bells" and just dreaming. Dr. Asley Munson must have felt these self-accusations of those untraveled in the Orient, and so she has given us "Kipling's India" (Doubleday, $1.50). The book is a glorified Baedeker, or rather, it is a personally-conducted trip through India with Dr. Munson as a sort of super-guide, with Terence Mulvaney, Strickland of the Police, Mrs. Hauksbee, Miss Youghal, Wee Willie Winkie, and a host of other charming companions to point the routes, show the places of interest, take photographs, which are here reproduced, and beguile the way with bits of reminiscences.

"First Principles of Chemistry" (Allyn and Bacon, $1.25), by Messrs. Brownlee, Fuller, Hancock, Sohon and Whitsit, is a revised edition of a good elementary text-book. Aiming principally at producing a text that will satisfy the requirements for examinations set by the New York State Board of Regents, the authors have ably acquitted themselves of their task. In this revised edition, many changes have been made for the better, and new chapters have been added on chemical equilibrium and on radioactivity.——"A Text-Book of Cooking" (Allyn & Bacon, $1.25), by Carlotta C. Greer, is intended for use in classes of domestic science. It is made up of two principal parts: the cooking of foods, and the planning and serving of meals. In the first part there are seventeen subdivisions, dealing as well with the nutritive value of all kinds of foods, as with how to cook them. Numerous experiments and questions on the text are not wanting, and the recipes given may well take the place of the old-time "cook book." Both volumes are fully illustrated.

Every day brings new evidences of the way in which war is coloring all the thoughts of the nations in conflict. In France, in particular, not the France that has been persecuting the Church, but the real France that has done so much for God, ascetic literature is deeply tinged with gloom. Dom Hebard, O.S.B., has written a book, that has few parallels for sadness. It is addressed to the women of France, and has for title "Le Livre de la Consolation" (Paris: Gabriel Beauchesne, 2 fr. 75). It proceeds on the assumption that there is not a woman in France that has not been sorely stricken in affection. The author writes out of a full heart, having himself been through the wine press. Knowing from his own personal experience how desolate the victims of the war have left those who mourn at home, he strives to lift their thoughts to the Divine Consoler. Supernatural motives, supernatural means of strength, the spiritualizing of painful duties, and the sublimity of courageous sacrifice and patience and resignation are the burden of some three hundred pages. The book is primarily meant for the war's French widows and daughters and mothers, but it has a message for all hearts plunged in the speechless sorrow of helpless bereavement. "L'Apostolat de la Jeunesse" (Paris: Pierre Téqui, 2 fr.) is scarcely less sad, and is even more French in its appeal. Incidents of the war are made the text for a series of familiar instructions which have for their purpose to bring into relief for children the great laws of honor and justice, and to set up the men of France as examples of fidelity to God and country, and as an inspiration to dream and to do like deeds of courage.

Once upon a time there lived a zealous woman who never entered a street car or train without having in her hand a Catholic paper or pamphlet, which she invariably left behind at her journey's end. As these publications were promptly seized and read by acquisitive or curious fellow-passengers to the great profit of their souls, her studied forgetfulness proved quite apostolic. Those who would like to acquire that woman's amiable habit will find very useful the following list of recent pamphlets, which the pressure on our space will only permit naming:

Australian Catholic Truth Society, Melbourne: "Personal Prohibition Needed: Not National," by Rev. W. J. Lockington, S.J. One penny. The Catholic Truth Society, Pittsburgh: "Creeds and Dogmas," "Why I Am a Catholic," "Sociology or Catholicity—Which?" all by Thomas F. Coakley, D.D.; "Christian Manhood," by Rt. Rev. J. F. Regis Canevin, D.D. Five cents each. The International Catholic Truth Society, Brooklyn: "Luther's Claim to a Divine Mission," by Rev. Lucian Johnston; "Meditations for Advent," by Richard F. Clarke, S.J. Five cents each. Office of the Irish Messenger, Dublin: "A Boy's Choice, a Dialogue on Vocations," by Rev. Henry Davis, S.J.; "The Devotion of the First Fridays," by Rev. Joseph McDonnell, S.J.; "Help for the Holy Souls," by Rev. Thos. MacDonald, C.C.; "Our Lady of Lourdes," by E. Leahy; "The Women of France and the War," by the Comtesse de Courson; "St. Columbanus Centenary Life," by Rev. Myles V. Ronan, C.C. One penny each. The Paulist Press, New York: "Mexico for the Mexicans," by Dudley G. Wooten; "Is the Catholic Church a Menace?" by Dudley G. Wooten; "The Authorized Interpreter of Holy Scripture," by William H. Sloan; "My Home-Coming," by Ingeborg Magnussen; "Martyrs According to Bernard Shaw," by Daniel A. Lord, S.J.; "St. Elizabeth of Hungary, Patroness of the Poor," by Thomas B. Reilly; "The Conventual Life," by Rt. Rev. Bishop Ullathorne. Five cents each. Frederick Pustet & Co., New York: "Novena to St. Rita and Visits to the Blessed Sacrament," by Rev. Andrew Klarmann, A.M.; "Matrimonial Primer, a Handbook for Bride and Groom," by Rev. Andrew Klarmann, A.M. Ten cents each. Rev. R. J. Sorin, De Lisle, Miss.: "Our Blessed Mother: Protestant Praise in Prose and Poetry," by Nelius Downing. $0.10. Central Bureau of the G. R. C. Central Verein, Temple Bldg., St. Louis: "The Fall of the House of Pedagogues," by Rev. Francis O'Neill, O.P., Ph.D. $0.10. And from Gonzaga University, Spokane, Washington: "Education and Character," by Rev. John J. Ford, S.J. $0.10.

The International Catholic Truth Society of 407 Bergen Street, Brooklyn, is doubtless ready to supply with the foregoing pamphlets those who cannot conveniently get them from the publishers. The large and varied list of booklets brought out by the London Catholic Truth Society and by the America Press should also be kept in mind.

EDUCATION

Civics in the Secondary School

IT is the vox populi which elects our Federal and State senators and representatives, and it is, presumably, in obedience to that voice that these officials deal with expenditures of millions of public funds for public purposes. Yet it is a fact, that in innumerable instances public funds are expended with little or no regard for the tax payer, and with scant attention to the business motto "value received." Public funds have been classified as "everybody's money" and therefore "nobody's concern," and in the administration of governmental matters it is surprising that even more waste and extravagance have not prevailed.

PRESENT STATUS

The suggestion has been made that the efficiency training of public officials be undertaken by our high schools and colleges and in the department of instruction in civil government. The suggestion is worthy of careful consideration, but if it is to prove effective, the nature and extent of instruction now accorded students in these institutions must undergo an essential change. Theoretical training in civil government in vogue for many years in our schools and colleges, has provided an outline of governmental matters. As a rule, however, these courses give very little supplementary work of a practical nature, and therefore have not done much to equip the graduate who subsequently enters the field of politics and practical government.

Effective service as a member of a legislative body requires considerable skill and involves a multiplicity of duties which can be met only by a thorough training in theory and practice. This is especially true in the lower Houses where money appropriations originate. Bills and petitions for legislation are many in number and varied in nature, and the sessions of committees to which such matters are referred are limited. In effect this means that a knowledge of financial matters connected with the government is necessary for the member; so too is skill in interpreting the various financial reports issued by the different state departments relative to matters submitted to committees for consideration. In the present condition of affairs it happens all too frequently that bills and petitions have been sent through committees and have been subsequently enacted into law, which, if carefully considered from the start, would have been reported by the investigating committee as unnecessary and unworthy "to pass."

SUGGESTED METHODS

Aside from the skill required in committee, the member should be trained to debate readily on the floor of the House or Senate. By such skill in debate should be understood knowledge of reports pertinent to the question under consideration and ability to use the knowledge. Many a bill, if properly handled on the floor of the House or Senate would have met with decisive defeat or passage, if opposed or championed by members properly equipped to debate the proposed measure.

It is obvious therefore that the practical phase of public governmental service must be emphasized in the courses now given in our schools and colleges in civil government. State reports should be a part, and a useful part, of the reference equipment of a department of civil government in any school where the subject is attempted. Parliamentary procedure and regulations should be mastered as well as the rules of the legislative body of the particular State within the limits of which the school is located.

The methods by which the Federal or State finances are handled should be discussed in a practical manner, and in such study the nature of sinking funds, serial bond issues and the like should be considered. By this I do not mean that students of civil government should be equipped as accountants or attorneys, but their equipment should include the fundamental principles upon which such matters are based.

EMPHASIZE THE PRACTICAL

Class discussions and "moot sessions" of a school legislature should be a part of the program followed by the class in civil government, in order to familiarize the student with the usual forms of procedure before the committee and on the floor of the legislative body itself. Where the school is located in the capital of the State there should be periodical visits made to committee hearings and to sessions of the legislative body for the purpose of acquainting the student with the routine order of business before such committees or legislative bodies.

At present one seldom discovers even an instructor in civil government in attendance before committees or at the sessions of the legislative bodies. Teachers rarely appear in the capitol while the legislature is in session save to advocate or oppose some measure destined to affect the status of a teacher as such, never in the interests of the pupils, enrolled in the class of civil government. Just as long as this indifference to practical governmental work is sustained by teachers of civil government, just so long will there continue unchanged the wholesale lack of proper equipment of the graduate who later, and in a representative capacity, enters the service of the State.

But practical instruction in civil government will be helpful, whether or not the student subsequently enters the political field. Such instruction tends to stimulate an abiding interest in matters which annually come before the legislature, and makes it possible for one so trained to argue intelligently before committees investigating measures of public concern.

The general apathy of the public to matters affecting the common good is traceable to many causes. One of these causes is the general lack of the knowledge necessary if one wishes to argue successfully before a committee. "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure." Knowledge of and interest in matters of public weal, if utilized before committees by public and private citizens and before legislative bodies, would prevent much of the discontent which follows the enactment of undesirable laws. Improved school and college methods in the practical training of the student of civil government would go far to make more efficient governmental officials.

LESTER B. DONOHUE.

ECONOMICS

The Planning Time

SO far as we can see today, and that is not far, the greatest industrial revolution in the history of the United States will take place soon after the close of the European war. Prophetic facts are few, but grimly significant.

First of all we have the fact of present industrial inflation. Hundreds of men are employed now in the munitions factories of New England and other Eastern States who must be dropped from the regular pay-roll the instant peace is assured. This spells revolutionary seeding ground.

I am not one of those who look for a financial panic at the end of the war. Already a survey of stock market records is enough to show that surplus capital made in munitions manufacture is being slowly and sanely invested in sounder issues. Much needed improvements are being made in such conservative interests as the United States Steel Corporation, whose non-munitions business is taking a new lease of life. Railroads are being rejuvenated and expanded. Agricultural and industrial enterprises with a safe domestic market are finding new capital. By this sane reinvestment of new capital a real panic will probably be avoided.

INFLATION

Still, the spectacular munitions industries are in important industrial centers. They encourage sympathetic movements. Only a few days ago, I heard a woman labor organizer speak of the present situation as the most valuable tool given to labor in several generations. The munitions employees can demand wages far above normal, and the mere fact of their prosperity leads to similar emphatic demands from neighboring industries.

This is the inflated situation. The labor demands are abnormal to match abnormal profits. Remove the profits, and the slump in labor prosperity will be so sudden and disastrous as to reach genuine poverty and want. Capital may be fluid, and will quickly readjust itself; but labor is not fluid. Men establish homes, and have sizeable families. They cannot move in a night. Today they are virtually building temporary cities in the munitions centers. They cannot desert these cities by signing a stock certificate.

SOCIALISM

I do not mean to take any side on the question of munitions manufacture. It may be a justifiable assistance to nations that were unprepared; it may be an immoral assistance to carnage. Both views are rampant now. I deal only with the facts, large facts that neither theory nor wish can change. Labor is booming, and when the last echoes of the boom have died away, the giant of Socialism is going to appear.

Socialism has been a political pigmy so far. I think its growth in the immediate future will be astounding. It will grow, however, not as a fanatic theory, but as a monster protest. The protest vote has made Socialism in France and Germany. It will make it here, make it into a political party of prominence, and very likely of ability. It will produce men like Briand, of France. Briand typifies the relentless audacity and purpose of French radicalism modified and dignified by the responsibility of office. I venture it as a mild prophecy that the decline of Socialism as a dangerous moral and political force will date from the day that an able Socialist leader holds a high office in the Federal Government.

PERILS OF PROSPERITY

But there is another danger. It springs from the immediate conditions of today. Capitalists are fairly generous in times of superabundance. They will be the first to cry wolf when the disarrangement comes. There may be no financial panic, but there may easily be a distinct industrial panic. It took acute men of finance over a year to discount the prosperity which the war necessarily brought to us. It may take them over a year to discount the solid, peaceful prosperity that ought to come after the war is over. During that year they may be guilty of gross injustices, reckless elimination of labor, and unjustifiable cutting of salaries. Instead of inspiring a vote merely of moderate protest, they may stir up the genuinely revolutionary elements of Socialism.

This is the supreme warning I wish to hold out. The time for definite planning is now. We must plan (and by we I mean those who have the sound principles of Catholic thought to guide them) to exert all our influence, when the declaration of peace comes, to prevent just such blind injustices as the almost certain panic of some capitalists will prompt them to commit. Injustice never saved a lost cause. And without implying any analogy, injustice will never prevent a moderate Socialist growth from becoming the fanatical wave that once glutted France, and that might, with little urging, overwhelm our own country.

RICHARD DANA SKINNER.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The registration figures for the colleges and universities of the Society of Jesus in the United States and Canada are encouraging for Catholic education. The grand total of students in these Jesuit colleges for the present year is 15,873, to which must be added the enrolment in the Jesuit universities of 5,793 students. Thus the entire number of pupils enjoying the benefit of a higher education in these institutions alone is 21,666. Here surely a noble and important work is being accomplished for the Catholic Church in America. The following is the division of students according to the Jesuit Provinces: The number of students in the Maryland-New York Province is 6,945 in the college and 1,846 in the university departments; in the Missouri Province, 4,938 in the college and 3,507 in the university studies; in the New Orleans Province, 998 in the college and 165 in the university branches; in California, 1,564 in the college and 275 in the university studies. The Colorado-New Mexico Mission counts 173 students at its Denver college and the Canadian Province has 1,250 students.

The loss of another tribe of Israel, or more than its equivalent, and that in the United States during the course of the past Jewish year, has troubled the Yiddish Amerikaner. It has been girding at the more high-toned classes of Jewry by reflecting upon the panic which this sensational discovery will create among them. According to the statistics quoted there has been a loss of more than half a million Jews in our country between the Jewish New Year 5675 and the New Year 5676, a fall from 2,900,000 to 2,349,754 in the Jewish population of the United States. The American Israelite is not, however, inclined to take the matter very seriously. "They were not killed on the battlefield," it says, "nor did they succumb to the sufferings of exile and epidemic, but they went astray in the American Jewish Yearbook." The fact is, we are told, that no reliable statistics exist as a definite basis for either figure. The desire is expressed that some national representative body might engage to give "as exact statistics as can be obtained without the apparatus and the legal authority of the Federal Census Bureau."

In his address delivered at the Catholic Educational Convention and now published in the printed report of the meetings, Reverend Francis T. Moran, D.D., of Cleveland, shows in a clear and business-like way the enormous burden assumed by the pastors in the support of the Catholic schools:

> According to the last "Catholic Directory," there were in the United States 1,456,206 children in the schools. Allowing one hundred dollars for each pupil, for buildings and property, there would be now in investment $145,620,600.00. Again, allowing eight per cent for interest, depreciation and physical maintenance, there would be a current yearly charge of $11,649,648.00. These figures are very moderate. A country-wide average annual per capita expenditure for education is $30.55. For easy figuring change this to $30.00 for expenditure and 1,500,000 for children. Multiplying the number of children by the per capita expenditure we have an annual tuition expense of $45,000,000.00. If to this be added the eight per cent item above for depreciation, etc., it would mean that at the present moment, after property, building and equipment have been provided, there would be an annual expense account of $56,649,648.00.

This sum of approximately sixty million dollars for each school year is actually taken from the public expenditure, and the equivalent in education is given to Catholic children by the Catholic Church in the United States. That the self-sacrificing service of the religious teachers reduces the vast total by almost two-thirds does not alter these figures. In the members of religious communities we possess a body of teachers who have made it possible for us, as Dr. Moran points out, to conduct a Catholic school at the average per capita expenditure of $10.00 in place of the $30.55 demanded by the public school. In other words, for every $335,000.00 expended for Catholic primary education, the State would have been called upon to pay $1,000,000.00. "Our religious", says Dr. Moran, "have been shamefully underpaid if salaries are to be measured by dollars and cents." But they have sought for a higher reward and they have the supreme gratification of knowing that without their sacrifice religious education would have been impossible in our country. It will be well for Catholics and non-Catholics to bear in mind the figures here quoted. They may help the former to a deeper appreciation of the services rendered by the religious to the Catholic laity, and enable others to form a more just estimate of the country's indebtedness to the Catholic school, even from a purely financial point of view.

A writer in the Pacific gives his impressions of the momentous transition through which New England has passed, a change which he considers to be no less than a social and religious revolution. This, however, is hardly the right word to use. It is a replacement rather than a revolution which has taken place. The writer himself states that marriage has decreased among the old New England stock to an absolutely unprecedented degree. "And the birthrate among the same classes has declined to a point unknown before." Immigration, in the meantime, numbering over one million yearly, has had its effects in these small States. The results are thus summed up:

> Congregationalists are still the most numerous of the Protestant bodies, but Roman Catholics are now in the majority in all these States. Plymouth, where the Pilgrims first landed on the rock, has become in recent years a Portuguese town. The French from Canada now control scores of townships. The Poles are fleeing from their home land by thousands annually to occupy the farms of New England. Boston is ruled by the Irish. One-third, almost, of the population of New Haven, the home of Yale University, is Italian. The Jews already control entire industries where a generation ago these people were unknown.

The writer expresses the hopeful view that the old seed has been scattered over the continent, since the people of the ancient New England stock have traveled far westward and southward, "carrying with them their energy and faith." But if that energy and faith can lead to no better results than the decline of the birthrate "to a point unknown before," we shall not feel inclined to mourn even its total loss. "One thing is assured in New England at least, socially, racially, the yesterdays are gone."

The eighth year book of the Christ Child Society of Chicago tells of the disbursement of $4,777.55 among "the most innocent and helpless of God's poor, the little children." If to the cost of the material purchased the value of the work done by the sewing circles is added, the sum disbursed will be increased by two thousand dollars. The society's income is solely from dues and contributions. Gentlemen become associate members by contributing five dollars, the sum required for a complete outfit for a child. Ladies become regular members by adding moreover one dollar in dues to meet the society's expenses. The list of articles comprised in a child's outfit is most complete. Caps and shoes, suits, sweaters and underwear, mittens or gloves, and everything else that is required to clothe the little ones warmly and neatly are given each child Even a toy is added and a booklet: "The Story of Bethlehem" or "The Story of the Christ-Child." Surely a sweet charity at this blessed season! During the last year 336 complete outfits were given to boys and 277 to girls, while 520 boys and 836 girls received partial outfits. The total number of children benefited was therefore 1,969. Besides this, 107 infants' layettes were given to poor mothers. The Society likewise receives and distributes discarded clothes for children or adults. Yet with all this good work accomplished there were over a hundred children whose cases were investigated and reported worthy, to whom nothing could be given, and hundreds of other cases were not investigated for the same reason. The charity of the Society is mainly distributed at the Christmas season.

Owing to the preparations made at present for the international tours of Santa Claus the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has issued directions for the shippers of Christmas gifts. It is apparently flooded at this period with letters relating to the tariff to be paid in the various foreign countries to which presents are sent.

> Many persons in the past have asked what method should be adopted in order that the tariff charge might be paid at the point of shipment in this country, by the giver of the gift. All such queries have been answered uniformly with the statement that there is no direct way in which the import duty charged by another country can be paid here, but if the package is placed in the charge of an express company, provision can be made for payment of duty by the express agent abroad. Although there is no exemption from customcharges for Christmas gifts, there are some conditions under which certain gifts going from country to country may escape payment. Some governments rule that wedding presents brought in by subjects shall not be taxed. Some also exempt possessions that are part of an inheritance. But the season of universal giving is not on the tariff calendar as one when the pathways between the nations shall be cleared of obstructions.

All inquiries of this nature must eventually be answered by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, no matter to what other department they may originally have been sent. It is well likewise to note that the kinds of articles are to be definitely specified, since it is not possible for the Bureau to forward an entire tariff schedule in answer to every letter.

The name of Bishop Hedley is familiar to American readers. His death will therefore be felt by many as a personal loss. They may have heard little of his life and influence at home, but they have read his volumes and have received help and inspiration from them. Born at Morpeth, April 15, 1837, he was sent at an early age to the Benedictine school at Ampleforth, where at the completion of his course he entered the monastery in 1854. Known within his Order for his ecclesiastical studies, his literary ability and musical skill, his reputation gradually extended beyond the monastery walls. By successive promotions he rose to the position of Auxiliary to Bishop Brown of Newport and Menevia and was finally chosen his successor in 1881. A new division of diocesan territory occurred later, in 1896, and he thenceforth bore the simple title of Bishop of Newport. He was an example to his religious brethren, a model for his flock as pastor of the faithful, and a recognized leader and spokesman among his peers. Keenly alert to the changing educational interests of his time, he was chosen in 1896 for the Presidency of the Catholic University Board, a position which he occupied until his death. He was noted as a preacher, though his carefully prepared sermons were habitually read by him. For a time in his earlier career he held the editorship of the Dublin Review. His well-known books are "Our Divine Saviour," "The Light of Life," "The Christian Inheritance," "The Bishop and His Flock," "The Holy Eucharist," "Lex Levitarum," and the "Retreat."—Another loss the Church Militant has suffered is that of Franz Cardinal Bauer, Prince Archbishop of Olmütz, who died November 26 at the age of seventy-four. Early in October the Pope had sent him the last blessing, since death seemed imminent at that time. He was ordained in 1863 and celebrated his silver jubilee as bishop in 1907. He began his scholastic career as professor of Biblical studies, and later was made head of the seminary at the University of Prague. He was consecrated Bishop of Brünn in 1882, and in 1912 was raised to the archiepiscopal see of Olmütz.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIV, No. 9
WHOLE No. 348

DECEMBER 11, 1915

PRICE, 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

The War: Bulletin, Nov. 30, p. m.-Dec. 7, a. m.—Central Serbia and Montenegro — Southern Serbia—Other Items. Austria-Hungary: Important Events. Canada: Canada's First War Loan. Germany: Questions Before the Reichstag. Great Britain: Labor Difficulties — The Brighter Side. Ireland: War Echoes. Rome: The Six New Cardinals.....193-196

TOPICS OF INTEREST

A Letter Reanswered—The Boys of New York—Capital Punishment—War Time in a London Suburb—Books and Men, I.....197-204

COMMUNICATIONS

Woman Suffrage.....204, 205

EDITORIALS

What the Judge Said — Have Journalists No "Professional Conscience"?—Mr. Taft on Public Education—White is Black—The Law and the Lawless—Charity or Philanthropy?.....206-208

LITERATURE

XV—Dante Alighieri.

REVIEWS: Heart of Europe—Fountains of Papal Rome—Plashers Mead—The Spell of Belgium—Memories of India—John Bannister Tabb.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The current Catholic Mind—October's "Best Sellers"—Books for Christmas Presents — The Messenger of the Sacred Heart — Scribner's Christmas Number — "In Christmas Candles"—"Great Authors in Their Youth"—"Beltane the Smith"—"These Twain"—"The Lost Prince" — "Field Afar Tales" — "St. Monica."

BOOKS RECEIVED 208-212

EDUCATION

Fractious Johnny 213, 214

SOCIOLOGY

Heaven on Earth.....214, 215

NOTE AND COMMENT

Convention of the International Federation of Catholic Alumnæ — Anti-Catholic Use of the Railroads—Vacant Sees Filled—Splendid Work of the Catholic Extension Society — A State Prison Labor Board—Centenary of the Birth of the Venerable Dom Bosco.....215, 216

Attention is called to the Editor's paper, "A Letter Reanswered," which appears in this issue.

CHRONICLE

The War.—Nowhere except in Serbia have military developments of an important character taken place. Even Goritz, which for several weeks has seemed to be near its fall, is still holding out. From Mesopotamia comes the news of a defeat suffered at the hands of the Turks by the British, and attributed to the treachery of the Arabs. The engagement, which resulted in the loss of 5,000 British, has halted the advance on Bagdad.

Bulletin, Nov. 30, p. m.-Dec. 7, a. m.

The capture of Prisrend by the Bulgarians has completed the campaign in central Serbia, all of which together with northern Serbia is now held by the Bulgarians and Central Powers. The Austrians are now concentrating their attention on the invasion of Montenegro. An Austrian army operating along the Drina in southern Bosnia, after having made a considerable advance, was checked by the Montenegrins at Foca, but is again moving south. On the eastern border of Montenegro, the Austrians have been more successful. Advancing in a southwesterly direction from Priboj and Prjepolje, they have crossed the Lim River, entered Montenegrin territory, and taken Boljanio, Plevlje and Jabunka. Less progress has been made by the Austrians, who are moving west from Mitrovica, for Ipek, though threatened, is still in Montenegrin hands. Further south, the Bulgarians are pursuing the Serbians near Djakova.

Central Serbia and Montenegro

With the fall of Monastir, which the Bulgarians captured after having taken Krusevo and crossed the upper Cerna, the Serbian resistance in southern Serbia has practically come to an end. The Serbians evacuated the city without a battle, and retreated across the Greek frontier, where they are said to have been given a demonstation of welcome. They were not disarmed. The fall of Monastir increases the difficulties of the Anglo-French forces, that extend northeast along the southern bank of the Cerna to Krivolak, and from that point southeast along the Vardar to Doiran. Engagements on both of these fronts have taken place, especially south of Strumnitsa, but without appreciable results. The presence of the Bulgarians on the Anglo-French left wing, together with the fact that the Bulgarians far outnumber their opponents, has given rise to the impression that the Allies must soon retreat.

Southern Serbia

Greece's dilatoriness in making a definite reply to the demands of the Allies has been followed by a partial resumption of the commercial restrictions which were enforced some time ago and then lifted by the Allies. Greece's proposal that the terms of the agreement be discussed by a joint committee, made up of representatives of both sides, has met with disfavor, and the Allies are pressing for immediate assurances. The Bulgarians seem to be striving to avoid a disagreement with Greece, for they have not pursued the Serbians across the Greek border, and they are said to have hoisted, not their own, but the Austrian flag over the captured city of Monastir.

Other Items

The American Government has demanded the recall of Captain Boy-Ed, and Captain von Papen, the naval and military attachés of the German Embassy at Washington. The grounds on which our Government bases its action are briefly set forth in the following statement, made by Secretary Lansing: "On account of what this Government considers their improper activities in military and naval matters, this Government has requested the immediate recall of Captain Boy-Ed and Captain von Papen, as they are no longer acceptable to this Government." In reply to this demand Germany has asked specific reasons for the recall. Secretary Lansing, it is said, regards such a request as without precedent, and is not disposed to grant it. Rumania's final attitude is still a matter of speculation. Her decree, closing Rumanian ports to foreign ships and empowering the requisition of all vessels in Rumanian waters, has been interpreted as a step toward entrance into hostilities, but beyond this, there is no indication that she intends to depart from a position of neutrality.

Austria-Hungary.—Public attention has again been centered on the Dual Monarchy. The visit paid to Emperor Francis Joseph at the Castle of Schönbrunn by the German Emperor has given occasion to various unfounded speculations. Authoritative circles at the Austrian capital declare the visit to have been without any special political significance. The event called forth manifestations of great enthusiasm for the German Emperor in Vienna, both at his arrival and on his departure. He was hailed by the Austrian press as "our beloved, honored and faithful friend and ally." Following upon this visit, but not therefore to be connected with it, came the resignation of three Austrian Ministers, who are not to be confounded with those of the Dual Monarchy. The Ministers whose resignation was accepted by the Emperor are Dr. Karl Baron Heinold, Minister of the Interior; Dr. Rudolph Schuster, Minister of Commerce; and Baron Engel, Minister of Finance. They are succeeded by financial experts such as the time demands: the President of the Supreme Court of Accounts, the Director of the Kredit Anstalt, and the Governor of the Postal Savings Bank. There is no question, therefore, as has been suggested, of any protest against the war program, but rather an attempt to carry out the program with the greatest efficiency. Immediately upon these events followed the celebration throughout all Austria-Hungary of the sixty-seventh anniversary of the accession of Emperor Francis Joseph to the Austrian throne, December 2, 1848. His coronation as King of Hungary followed many years later, on June 8, 1867.

Important Events

Canada.—The Canadian troops have borne a distinguished part in the military operations of the mother country, and it is now announced that the Dominion's first venture in her own fields of war-finance has been highly successful. The fifty million dollar war-loan proposed towards the end of November was quickly oversubscribed by nearly sixty millions. The number of individual subscribers is more than twenty-five thousand, and applications were received from all sections of the country; facts which bear witness not only to the patriotism of the Canadians but to their practical belief that success will in the end crown their great struggle. According to the Canadian Minister of Finance, the payments will be made in installments extending over a period of six months, and the total proceeds of the loan will be spent in Canada for the purpose of equipping and forwarding Canadian troops. This announcement is in keeping with the adopted policy; more than eighty per cent of all war expenditures up to the present have been made in the country itself. In the Minister's opinion, this practice will eliminate any danger to the ordinary financial operations of business, which might otherwise find place; all moneys, moreover, to be made in payment will be retained until actually called for, in the several banks of deposit, credited to the Minister of Finance. Many Canadian bankers, it is said, encouraged by the success of the first venture, are now urging the Minister of Finance to extend the loan in excess of the sum originally proposed. To date, the Canadian Government has advanced a total of nearly fifty-eight million dollars in temporary advances to the Imperial Government, to pay for orders placed in Canada. From time to time these advances have been repaid by the Imperial Government, and at an advance, owing to the adverse rate of exchange. It is believed, therefore, that the Dominion will seek to establish a credit on behalf of Great Britain for contracts placed in Canada, and that the financial operations now successfully inaugurated will be widely extended as the occasion is offered or found.

Canada's First War-Loan

Germany.—The Reichstag met November 30 for its sixth war session. Many of the members were present in their grey field uniforms, and not a few wore the Iron Cross they had won at the front. The opening was marked by the address of welcome, delivered by the President, Dr. Kaempf. The enemies of Germany, he said, had permitted themselves to be deceived regarding the country's financial strength now manifested to them by the astonishing results of the war loans. They are similarly deceived, he held, concerning Germany's economic strength:

Questions Before the Reichstag

> All our enemies have recognized that we are invincible on the battlefield, hence they cling the more eagerly to the hope of destroying us economically, of conquering us by hunger. . . . We have grain for bread. Potatoes, a most important food of the people, are abundant. If in other things there may be scarcity, as cannot be disputed, yet the hardships thus caused to a majority of the poorer population will be surmounted by the organization of the provision market.

At the same session the Secretary of the Imperial Treasury introduced a bill requiring companies, corporations and juridical persons to set aside fifty per cent of their extra profits during the war years to cover their ultimate taxation. The question of peace terms, it is thought, may be put before the House by the Socialists at the next session of the Reichstag. The Berlin Tageblatt sees no reason why such a question should not be directed now to the Chancellor: "The British place no such restrictions on themselves and care little what constructions are placed on this or that word." The "unusually favorable military situation," the paper thinks, should make an announcement of the imperial policy still more opportune. "It should be reiterated," it adds as a warning to the foreign press, "that there is not a trace of weakness in the German. Should any one abroad be foolish enough so to misconstrue the Social Democratic interpellation, the facts will prove to him how mistaken he is."

Great Britain.—Recent events alternately brought the dark and the bright side of Great Britain's position to the consideration of the world. The dark side is undoubtedly suggested by the condition of labor. Much in the fashion of the United States, Great Britain has been viewing the labor question, which is, concretely, the workingman's struggle to keep himself and his family from starvation, from two customary attitudes. The first attitude has been to refuse to acknowledge its existence. The second has been to tinker with it by the passage of repressive, innocuous, tyrannical or "grandmotherly" legislation. The repressive and tyrannical laws have suffered from a fatal inconvenience—they are inoperative. The innocuous legislation died of inanition on the pages of the statute-book, and the "grandmotherly" variety encouraged all parties to the quarrel to nurse their wrath to keep it warm. The Munitions of War Act is now said to be giving "satisfaction"; it would have given greater satisfaction, perhaps would have been unnecessary, had the tangles in which industrial England of the last century has involved herself been straightened out by patient perseverance as they occurred. But the Act began with a fiasco. The strike of the Welsh miners rendered them liable to a collective fine of thirty million dollars; a fine that will never be paid because it was never imposed. What happened was that Lloyd George with three of the Cabinet went to Wales "to confer" with the two hundred thousand strikers. The outcome was "a victory for the Government"; that is, the miners went back to work, but not before they had received nearly every concession asked for. The strength of numbers counted; for when smaller bodies and individuals tried the same tactics, they found that what could not be enforced against a whole region could be and was enforced against a weaker opposition. Since it is an Englishman's inalienable right to express in the face of the sun his opinion on every subject under the sun, this left-handed justice came in for its share of comment; the continual exercise of this right, however, deprives it, even on its native heath, of any particular significance which it might otherwise bear. In the past week, Mr. McKenna, Mr. Lloyd George, and even the Premier, were subjected to some very incisive "heckling" on the relations of the labor of the man who works in the munition factories, with the personal profits of the man who does not work but only serves his country by owning the factory. It may be that this gentleman is not growing rich, but the populace seems to think that he is, and so long as the populace is obsessed with this conviction, appeals to the worker's sense of justice, loyalty, frugality, economy and patriotism, are likely to be received with certain reserves. The Premier's reference at a London labor meeting to increased wages was neatly countered by cries of "increased cost of living," so that the Premier "was forced to turn aside."

Labor Difficulties

So much for the dark side of the problem. The happier aspect is recalled by reviewing what Great Britain has actually done to fulfill her obligations, natural or assumed. To begin with, she can discount much of the criticism she is receiving at home, because she is fully aware that criticism is an Anglo-Saxon characteristic, which does not argue but rather infers a true love of country. Great Britain by her loans of nearly two and a quarter billions of dollars to the Allies, has supplied the not least necessary sinew of war. Her navy has swept the German merchant marine and commerce raider from the sea, has isolated the German colonies from all intercourse with the Fatherland, has transported thousands of troops with a remarkably small casualty list, has "maintained business as usual" at home and to an extent on the Continent; and finally, by bottling up a splendid fleet, has made the German navy as idle as a painted ship upon a painted ocean. The battle flag of England now floats over regiments in France, Belgium, the Dardanelles, Egypt, East and Southwest Africa, the Cameroons and in countries adjacent to the Persian Gulf. The men who write that England is "lethargic" have not dipped their pens in knowledge. Her actual achievements are great; what she will do is answered by consulting not a prophet but staid history.

The Brighter Side

Ireland.—The treatment of the Irish emigrants who were refused passage at Liverpool is still agitating the Irish press. New Ireland declares that when for seventy years famine drove multitudes from the country "there was no cry of protest from those who would now forcibly detain, in order that they may assist England in her need, the Irishmen who are following the normal tendency to emigrate at this time of year." Sir John Simon in answer to an interpellation in Parliament "admitted that emigration was not confined to any one part of the United Kingdom." The Evening News declares that "many hundreds of young Englishmen have attempted to emigrate," and different papers declare "that emigrants from England are booking their passages for Holland on the way to America."

War Echoes

The Weekly Freeman prints a communication from Mr. John Dillon on the subject. He declares the men had a perfect right to emigrate and that "in view of the past history of their country and their race they cannot be taunted as cowards." The real blame for the incidents he puts on the newspapers and individuals who have striven "to destroy the faith of these young men in the counsel and leadership of the Irish Party." "See what you have brought upon yourselves by flouting the advice of Mr. Redmond and the members of the Party listening to the craven counsels of irresponsible men!" he exclaims. The able Bishop of Limerick, Dr. O'Dwyer, addressed a letter to the Munster News on the matter. Though quoted before in AMERICA, this part is worth requoting:

> The treatment which the poor Irish emigrant lads have received at Liverpool is enough to make any Irishman's blood boil with anger and indignation. What wrong have they done to deserve insults and outrage at the hands of a brutal British mob? They do not want to be forced into the British army and sent to fight English battles in some part of the world. Is not that within their right? They are supposed to be free men, but they are made to feel that they are prisoners who may be compelled to lay down their lives for a cause that is not worth "three rows of pins" to them. It is very probable that these poor Connaught peasants know little or nothing of the meaning of the war. Their blood is not stirred by the memories of Kossovo, and they have no burning desire to die for Serbia. They would much prefer to be allowed to till their own potato gardens in peace in Connemara. Small nationalities, and the wrongs of Belgium and Reims Cathedral, and all the other cosmopolitan considerations that rouse the enthusiasm of the Irish Party, but do not get enough recruits in England, are far too high-flying for uneducated peasants, and it seems a cruel wrong to attack them because they cannot rise to the level of the disinterested Imperialism of Mr. T. P. O'Connor and the rest of the New Brigade. But in all the shame and humiliation of this disgraceful episode what angers one most is that there is no one, not even one of their own countrymen, to stand up and defend them. Their crime is that they are not ready to die for England. Why should they? This war may be just or unjust, but any fair-minded man will admit that it is England's war, not Ireland's. When it is over if England wins she will hold a dominant power in this world and her manufactures and her commerce will increase by leaps and bounds. Win or lose, Ireland will go on, in our old round of misgovernment, intensified by a grinding poverty which will make life intolerable. Yet the poor fellows who do not see the advantage of dying for such a cause are to be insulted as "shirkers" and "cowards."

Meantime the Irish Times is threatening the Irish people with conscription. Mr. Dillon is denouncing conscription, and New Ireland is pointing out once again that compulsory service will result in "the economic scandal of draining the land of its laborers and sacrificing the food supply to the demand for more soldiers."

The Six New Cardinals

Rome.—The new cardinals are Monsignor Giulio Tonti, Titular Archbishop of Ancyra, Apostolic Nuncio to Portugal; Monsignor Alfonso Maria Mistrangelo, Archbishop of Florence; Monsignor Giovanni Cagliero, Titular Archbishop of Sebaste, Apostolic Delegate and Envoy Extraordinary to the Republics of Costa Rica, Nicaragua and Honduras; Monsignor Andreas Frühwirth, Titular Archbishop of Heraclea, Apostolic Nuncio to Bavaria; Monsignor Raffaele Scapinelli di Leguigno, Titular Archbishop of Laodicea, Apostolic Nuncio to Austria-Hungary; and Monsignor Giorgio Gusmini, Archbishop of Bologna. All, with the exception of Mgr. Frühwirth, are Italian by birth. The number of Italian Cardinals is thus raised to twenty-nine, while the Foreign Cardinals, including Cardinal Falconio, as "International," are thirty-two. Three of the new Cardinals are religious. "A summary glance at the names," says Rome, "will reveal this as a 'Diplomatic' Consistory." Mgr. Tonti was born in Rome, 1844, and studied at the Pontifical Roman Seminary. He entered the diplomatic career and after various appointments as Titular Bishop of Samos, Titular Archbishop of Sardis, Archbishop of Port au Prince, and Titular Archbishop of Ancyra, was sent as Apostolic Nuncio to Brazil, in 1902, and as Nuncio to Portugal in 1906. After the outbreak of the revolution he retired to Rome. Mgr. Mistrangelo is a member of the Congregation of the Scolopians, Clerics Regular of the Pious Schools. He was created Bishop of Pontremoli in 1895, and later promoted to the Archbishopric of Florence. Mgr. Cagliero is a Salesian, and one of Dom Bosco's first pupils. He has been conspicuous for his zeal and diplomatic skill. He was born in 1838, and sailed as one of the first missionaries to Patagonia, in 1875. Returning to Italy, after a two years' stay there, he was made Vicar Apostolic of Patagonia in 1884, and since that time has always been in South or Central America. In 1908 he was appointed Delegate Apostolic to Costa Rica, Honduras and Nicaragua. Mgr. Frühwirth is a Dominican, born in Austria, 1845. He completed his studies at Rome, was made Provincial of the Austro-Hungarian Province, and finally Master General of the Order in 1891. He was appointed Nuncio to Bavaria, and created Titular Archbishop of Heraclea in 1907. His services have been highly appreciated in Bavaria. With him the Dominican Order has given eighty-one Cardinals to the Church. Mgr. Scapinelli has likewise been most successful in diplomatic offices. He was born at Modena in 1858, and was successively Secretary of the Nunciature at Lisbon, Auditor at the Hague, Cameriere Segreto Participante to Leo XIII, and Secretary for Foreign Ecclesiastical Affairs, besides holding other important offices. In 1912 he was created Titular Archbishop of Laodicea and was likewise appointed Apostolic Nuncio to Vienna. Lastly Mgr. Gusmini was born at Vertova, 1855. He was created Bishop of Bergamo in 1910, and promoted to the Archiepiscopal See of Bologna five days after it had been vacated by the former Cardinal Della Chiesa, now Pope Benedict XV. The youngest of the new Cardinals is Mgr. Scapinelli, 57; the oldest, Mgr. Cagliero, 77. Mgr. Gusmini is 60; Mgr. Mistrangelo, 63; Mgr. Frühwirth, 70; and Mgr. Tonti, 71.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

A Letter Reanswered

THE letter is Mr. Tumulty's; the reason for this second reply is that the first was incomplete, purposely so for fear that the great issue between decent Americans and the Mexican revolutionists might be obscured. That issue was not obscure; on the contrary, it is clearer today than ever before. Moreover, the issue was never more widely known than now. Everybody is at last cognizant of the facts that in Mexico priests were tortured and murdered, Brothers shot to death, Sisters outraged, churches desecrated, altars and sacred vessels polluted, vestments defiled, God mocked by decree, by spoken word, by act. Everybody realizes that in Mexico liberty is stifled, rights, human and Divine, scorned, while bandits with bloody fists uplifted in defiance of God, ride to triumph over the souls of little girls, in whose eyes heaven was once reflected, over the broken hearts of maidens and of consecrated virgins, and of mothers, God's choicest gift to earth. All this is common knowledge now; it is well that it should be. For this issue is neither personal nor political; it is not between man and man, or party and party, it is between brutality and humanitarianism, between deviltry and righteousness, a naked question of principles that pertain exclusively to no creed or sect or group, but to the human race, precisely because the race is human and not brutal.

There is no official record of the dastardly crime against Sisters on file in the State Department, declares Mr. Tumulty. What then? Does the absence of such a record disprove the crime? To ask the question is to answer it. Again, was there ever such a record there? If so, what has become of it? If it was not there, why not? The crimes were committed several times; authentic records of them are on file in other offices. Have similar records been withheld from the State Department? An officer of our Army puts his signature to an affidavit, in Vera Cruz, attesting the crimes; the State Department remains ignorant of them, and Mr. Tumulty declares "that the officers of our Army in Vera Cruz have stated that they never heard of a single report of outrage." Strange! Stranger still that on his return from Vera Cruz an officer of our Navy should call on me unsolicited and state with reiterated emphasis that Mr. ——, American Consul at ——, Mexico, told him that he had informed our State Department of the crimes against Sisters. Did this officer lie gratuitously? Or did the report come by wire and then by telephone to a State Department official, who neglected to record it? If the report came in manuscript, where is it? Answer or no answer, this much is clear, some officers of the Army and Navy heard the report at Vera Cruz.

The State Department is without official record. Why? But here a doubt arises. What word or phrase in the sentence: "There is no official record of a single proven case of this dastardly crime in the files of the State Department," does Mr. Tumulty wish to stress? "Official"? If so, are no records of value except those submitted by officials, friends, in several cases, of Villa and Carranza? Is the stress to be placed on "proven"? What kind of certitude does Mr. Tumulty demand? Will not moral certitude suffice, that furnished by the sworn testimony of God-fearing people? Where, I ask again, is the stress to be placed? On the phrase, "in the files of the State Department"? Good; then, the old query recurs: Why are not the records there?

Ah, but there's Father Paredes! Quite true, there's Father Paredes, an appointee of Carranza; there he is, jumping from cassock to a Carranzista uniform and offering evidence that is as far from the point at issue as disloyalty to duty is from loyalty thereto. Traitors are scarcely competent to testify for the institution they betray. And what does he say? (1) No Sisters were maltreated in the archdiocese of Mexico City. (2) I could not confirm reports that maltreated Sisters arrived here from other places.

Neglecting the character of the witness, the first item would be good evidence if the Republic of Mexico were conterminous with the archdiocese of Mexico City. The former, however, contains approximately 765,000 square miles, the latter less than 17,000 square miles. The second item of evidence is worthless from every point of view. Even though the witness were a competent investigator, the evidence adduced is entirely negative. Moreover, that injured people did not arrive in Mexico City, does not prove they were not injured. Whether they actually arrived at the capital, is not in question just now. Father Paredes and his testimony may now be dismissed, with that gentleman's significant reference to his accession to power: "I . . . have had occasions to personally interest myself in all the religious matters of the Archdiocese since August 8, 1914, the date of the entry of the Constitutional forces into the city."

Just here the question of freedom of worship appears. Mr. Tumulty stresses this, quoting the promise made by Carranza's official agent on October 8, 1915. The agent's words are fair, but facts render them ridiculous. Not only have the repressive decrees issued prior to October 8 not been recalled, but the warfare against religion—note, I say, against religion, not against Catholicism—was never more savage than it is today. Morelia and Yucatan and the city of Leon are being devastated. Alvarado, military governor of Yucatan, is denouncing religion and the ministers thereof savagely, he is closing Catholic schools and colleges, exiling the teachers and confiscating the property, he is alienating churches from their proper use, converting them into halls, he is in short destroying every vestige of religious liberty.

Was there ever a more telling parallel than this?

On October 14, 1915, the Department of State gave to the press the following statement in relation to religious freedom in Mexico:

"For the information of those who have made inquiries of the Department concerning religious freedom in Mexico there is given below the substance of a communication addressed to the Department of State on October 8, 1915, by Eliseo Arredondo, the Washington representative of Gen. Carranza:

" 'I have the honor to say that inasmuch as the reestablishment of peace within order and law is the purpose of the Government of Venustiano Carranza, to the end that all the inhabitants of Mexico without exception, whether nationals or foreigners, may equally enjoy the benefits of true justice, and hence take interest in cooperating to the support of the Government, the laws of reform, which guarantee individual freedom of worship according to every one's conscience, shall be strictly observed. Therefore the Constitutionalist Government will respect everybody's life, property and religious beliefs, without other limitation than the preservation of public order and the observance of the institutions in accordance with the laws in force and the Constitution of the Republic.' " (Extract from the letter of Mr. Tumulty, President Wilson's Sec'y, to Dr. James J. Maguire, of Trenton, N. J.)

This is "religious liberty"! This is "respect for religious beliefs without other limitation than the preservation of public order"! This is Carranzista sincerity toying with American ingenuousness! But there is more yet. La Vox de la Revolucion published at Merida, Yucatan, is a Carranzista organ. Carranzista generals, governors, mayors, and so forth, speak through its columns. These are their sentiments:

(1.) The people should understand that the clergy have always been their external (sic) enemies and that they (the clergy) and they alone have brought on bloody and fratricidal war, in order to enrich themselves and enjoy worldly goods and pleasures without work, while the people starve and await death in sorrow, believing that they will then begin to enjoy Divine glory. See to it that the reform laws which are wise be observed throughout the whole country, that the people "be not fanaticized" and exploited, that the workmen be not robbed of their wages (Extract from the speech of the Mayor of Tekax. "La Vox," November 18, 1915, p. 4.)

(2.) OFFICIAL ANNOUNCEMENTS OF THE MILITARY COMMANDER OF MERIDA. THE CATHOLIC CHURCH OF A TOWN TURNED INTO A SCHOOL. . . . Then they passed to the Catholic Church which is large, clean and well ventilated. The Commandant ordered the Commissary to strip the church, make firewood of the confessional and establish the civil school for girls there. . . . ("La Vox," November 18, 1915, pp. 1, 2.)

The State must be "defanaticized." The mighty effort undertaken by false apostles of religion who, greedy and insatiable of blood, money and power have ever since the days of the conquest been forging in our country, link by link, the most frightful chain of crimes, misfortunes and treasons, by their lies, by the web of sophistries which they have woven, has, I say, kept the country in a state of brutal servitude and disorganization. The overthrow of these men is at hand. Let them flee, terrified and ashamed, hiding themselves in oblivion, ignorance and reaction, their only companions, while the Constitutionalist revolution remains the symbol of the beneficial light of science. Let us remember that religion is ignorance and that as the revolution triumphs God goes down. To conclude: It is necessary . . . to do away with everything that savors of fanaticism, everything that is a check to progress, everything that trammels education, that is an obstacle to science and liberty and that tends to keep in darkness and to brutalize the representative of the Maya race. (Manifesto of General Alvarado, military commander of the State of Yucatan, published over his name and that of the provisional secretary, General Rafael Aguerre in the "Diario Oficial del Gobierno Constitucionalista del Estado de Yucatan" for November 1, 1915, pp. 4179, 4180, 4181).

(3.) A HOUSE OF SUPERSTITION [i. e. a Church] CONVERTED INTO A CONFERENCE HALL FOR RURAL TEACHERS. Telegram from Motul to Merida, November 12, 1915. (There follows an announcement of the conversion of the church into an assembly hall for rural teachers. ("La Vox," November 14, 1915, p. 9.)

(4.) THE MUCH-DISCUSSED AFFAIR OF THE AYALA BENEFACTION. (A long account of the sequestration of a fund left for charitable purposes. ("La Vox," November 20, 1915, p. 2.)

Here are a few passages chosen at random from the account of this confiscation:

Apropos of this (sequestration) it is time that public authority should pay attention to the exploitation, with which daily, and indeed with shameless and fetid immorality, these tonsured men speculate in the hour of death (sic) in order to obtain other people's property. This mystical exploitation at the verge of the grave has become a school (sic). The dying person is for the immense majority of these gentlemen priests, a Divine source of speculation and theft. . . . This vampireism must cease; this sore must be cauterized whatever it costs. Public authority cannot cross its arms in the presence of such iniquitous exploitation of affliction and ignorance. If to punish such exploiters it be necessary to break laws then let them be broken, but let corruption, vice and theft be corrected. . . .

It is indisputable that the Revolution will not compromise with the exploiters of fanaticism . . . trafficking clergy who always conceal their booty in the dark lest restitution be demanded, etc.

All this occurred in November, 1915; Carranzista's promise was made in October, 1915. Here then are the respect for religious belief, the liberty of conscience, the freedom of worship guaranteed by the First Chief. That respect, liberty, and freedom consist in blasphemy, expulsion of priests, conversion of churches into halls and schools, denial of the consolation of religion to the people. Americans had thought that those words bore a different signification; some have changed their minds.

Mr. Tumulty remarks that it is interesting to note that Catholic nations joined in the recognition of Carranza. It might be more interesting, were the minutes of the conference published. Let that pass. This is interesting too: Italy is also called a Catholic country; would Mr. Tumulty approve of all the acts of the Italian Government towards the Catholic Church? Portugal is called a Catholic country; France is called a Catholic country; would Mr. Tumulty approve of the acts of the Portuguese and French Governments towards the Church? Why, Mr. Tumulty, the religious significance of the "Pan-American Conference" was appreciated by Catholics the very day the Conference was announced. They smiled then, they laugh now.

A few items remain, as follows: First, I have not imputed and do not impute to Mr. Tumulty bad faith, suppression of facts or anything else of the kind. My concern is with the moral and religious aspects of his letter as it stands. Secondly, some men who seem to think that they were baptized politicians and not Christians, are declaring that they are fearful "I may not have the facts." These people mistake the object of their fear: they do not fear that "I may not have the facts": they fear the facts. Let them not worry; splints for spines and rubber holders for knees, will prevent their bodies from wobbling. Their souls? Ah, that is another question. Lastly, Dr. James J. McGuire asked "what the situation is" in Mexico. He did not get an answer. I shall answer him. It is plain hell, just plain hell ruled by demons of cruelty and bestiality; and it will remain plain hell until the hand of God smites the demons who have devastated unfortunate Mexico, the land of weeping children and maltreated women. Meantime Americans can thank God that this fair country is likely to remain free from strife, for peace is a blessing.

R. H. TIERNEY, S.J.,
Editor of AMERICA.

The Boys of New York

IT is more or less in keeping with our modern tendency to mistake quantity for quality and to aim for what is merely large, confusing it with what is worthy, so that many of our important problems have remained unsolved because they have appeared too simple to be worth the solving. Possibly in this way may be explained why for so long a time we have failed to give proper care and attention to the Catholic boys of New York. The opportunity for helping them has always been present. Perhaps it has been so near at hand that we have never seen it.

The situation as it exists, particularly in the poorer sections of the city, may be readily explained. The boy, a peculiarly human person, has a natural and healthy desire for amusement and for companions, a desire that must in some manner be met. These wants of his cannot be satisfied within the narrow and unwholesome confines of his tenement home. Hence out into the streets he must go. The streets! What a place in which to make his friends; what a place in which to find his pleasure!

There are plenty of street corners where he may stand and talk and meet choice companions; plenty of pool-rooms where he may gamble. Splendid pleasures these for our growing boys, the coming manhood of our nation! You may say that he can play games in the street, innocent boyish games. Verily! But woe betide him if he fails to evade the passing trucks and street-cars; or worse still, if he violates the dignity and majesty of a single city ordinance and renders himself amenable to the mighty arm of the law. If he meets with an accident, a hospital is ready to shelter him. But if he commits that deadly crime of being mischievous, he may be sent to the institution, paradoxically termed a reformatory. Splendid playgrounds these, the streets of New York!

Then consider what friends the boy may meet there: the street-corner "lounger"; the pool-room habitué, the crap-shooter, and now the cocaine fiend, and heroin snuffer. Is it any wonder that the typical product of the New York streets is the gangster, the gunman? The situation is not exaggerated. Perhaps if we realized how many of these gangsters there are in the making; how many incipient gunmen there are among our growing boys, above all if we realized how many of these are Catholics, we might pause and ponder. The real problem of caring for the boys of New York is not to cure them after they have gone wrong. The question is how best to prevent them from going wrong. This work of prevention is a mighty task and a task peculiarly suited to the layman.

It may be well to mention here that a boy ceases to be a boy in the eyes of the law at the age of sixteen. Up to that age, he is considered a child, and if arrested, is brought before the Children's Court. After that age, he is considered a man, and in the event of his arrest, is brought before the Magistrate's Court or the Criminal Courts of higher jurisdiction, as his offense warrants. Fortunately this work of prevention is now being done in New York, and done well. Some actual incidents may illustrate the situation.

Last spring, a Catholic boy of sixteen was arrested, charged with the felony of carrying a revolver. The pistol was loaded at the time, which served to enhance the offense. The boy was an orphan and lived with two brothers who were typical products of our streets. He fell into bad company and suffered the consequences. The boy had once been a member of one of the Ozanam Clubs of this city, and the Ozanam Association was notified by the boy's employer of what had occurred. An active member of the association then took the matter in hand, with the following results: the boy was induced to confess his guilt, though at first he stoutly asserted his innocence; he pleaded guilty and his case was assigned to the Catholic probation officer, working under the Catholic Protective Society; the latter investigated the case and found that the boy was a first offender, that he had changed his home and was now living in better surroundings, that his employer had generously agreed to keep him in his employ and look after him. Under these circumstances, the Society recommended that the boy be paroled. Accordingly, sentence was suspended. The boy is now on parole and reports steadily to the probation officer. The Catholic Protective Society keeps an eye on him and sees that he avoids bad company. Instead of being sent to prison and emerging tainted as a felon, embittered and hardened to crime, the boy has been taught a sufficient lesson and at the same time is better off than before. His career has not been ruined. And all because a few Catholic laymen were willing to spend a little time, a little effort, in his behalf, and because there was a Catholic Protective Society to care for him.

Another case may serve to illustrate the other side of the picture. A boy, playing on the streets, ran against a glass show-case standing on the sidewalk and broke it. He was accordingly arrested, charged with disorderly conduct. He had no friends; no one to vouch for his good character; no one to assure the magistrate that he would be looked after in the future. Accordingly, for the "dastardly" crime of breaking a window he was sent to the reformatory for six months. When he is released, he may possibly come forth, resolved never to run again on the streets and never, never to break a glass show-case. But rather, in all probability, he will emerge hardened by association with others worse than he, and embittered because of the injustice of his plight. His next offense against the law will be a real one.

In concrete terms, therefore, the work of caring for the boys of New York consists in providing for them places of wholesome recreation and legitimate pleasure in order to keep them from the evils and temptations of street life and night life in this city. And if they are arrested, then the next step is to see to it that their interests are looked after and if possible and advisable, that they receive another chance. The work is obviously beyond the efforts of the priests alone. It is the laity who must help, and the laymen of New York are helping today through the Ozanam Association and the Catholic Protective Society.

The work of these organizations can be sketched only briefly in this article. The Ozanam Association has established throughout the city seven club houses, open every night of the year, where boys may congregate, play, exercise, and where, above all, they may keep away from the evil influences of the streets. The clubs contain libraries and gymnasiums, and service classes are held and debating societies formed. The religious welfare of the boys is looked after as much as possible. Twice yearly, at Christmas time and Easter, the boys of each club attend Mass and receive Holy Communion in a body.

When the boy or young man goes wrong and is arrested, then the Catholic Protective Society, formed to care for all Catholic offenders against the law, is waiting to look after his interests. His case is investigated; his home conditions are examined and incidentally, in about one-third of the cases, it has been found that the parents are the real persons at fault. If the culprit is a first offender, a suspended sentence is generally sought and obtained. If he is placed on probation or on parole, then the Society looks after him and sees to it that he remains straight.

Thus, then, have the Catholics of New York sought to care for the boys. Much has been done, but very much more can be done. Many more Ozanam club-houses are needed; the field is not nearly covered; more workers are needed in the clubs that already exist. More voluntary workers in the Catholic Protective Society and the Catholic Boys' Protective League are needed. There should be a voluntary representative in every Court in the city.

The work of caring for the boys of New York must, above all, be continued; it must be broadened and extended. The task is for the Catholic laymen, and above all the Catholic college graduate. To care for the boys is to conserve the manhood of our nation. The boys of today are the men of tomorrow. Are they not then worth caring for?

LOUIS C. HAGGERTY.

Capital Punishment

WE suffer much in these days from social reformers. If the pain were physical only and the reform a clear moral gain, we should not object. There are evils long established and firmly fixed, to root out which implies, at least, discomfort. What distresses right thinking people is the contempt of the moral order, of which reformers are guilty so often in the exercise of their usurped functions. Any reform, however just or desirable, is bought too dearly, when obtained at such a price. But not a few are neither just nor desirable because they contain within themselves the violation of the first principles of natural morality. Such is the abolition of capital punishment, that many are agitating so strenuously.

That public authority has not only the right but the obligation also of inflicting capital punishment, has been the universal conviction of mankind. This alone would suffice for the ordinary man. Unless all human certitude is to go by the board, we must hold the universal judgments of mankind to be true. The modern reformer will not admit this. He is individually wiser and more enlightened than all the wise and enlightened together; this does not help to change the ordinary man's opinion of his reforms. However, universal judgments must rest on a rational basis; and so, let us see what is the basis of the universal consent of men in the righteousness of capital punishment.

The reformer lays down this principle, that the end of punishment is the protection of society and the reform of the criminal. The ordinary man begins at once to ask: Why then is it called punishment? He does not deny that these two things come into the adequate idea of punishment; but he does suspect that they are not its chief, still less its exclusive elements. The reason is because, when a specific name is drawn from one of the elements composing a thing, it should be taken from the principal one. If then the reformer be right, the act of civil authority, with regard to one it puts in prison, should be called protection, or correction, or, perhaps, "cor-protection"; but punishment is clearly a misnomer. Between the latter notion and the two former the difference is as great as any difference can be. If the name is right, the chief element in its idea is neither protection nor correction, but something altogether different, which the reformer ignores, or conceals very sedulously. The ordinary man will agree with us, no doubt; for his common sense tells him that to punish crime, to protect society, to correct an individual, are three things absolutely distinct.

Whatever may be in the heads of reformers, this is fixed in the intelligence of all sane men, that the undergoing of punishment by a criminal is, not figuratively but really, the paying of a debt he contracted in the commission of his crime. "He pays the penalty," is the common expression. The Romans expressed this very distinctly. With them "to give penalties" did not mean, to inflict them, but to undergo them. Public authority demanded and received the penalties of crime, just as a creditor demands and receives a debt: the criminal gave them to public authority, just as the debtor pays his creditor. The Greeks were still clearer. The criminal "gave justice": public authority "took it." The same idea is in our expression: "to satisfy justice."

This, then, is the primary end of punishment, to satisfy justice. It constitutes its very essence. The protection of society, the reform of the criminal are secondary ends only, and by no means essential. The case is quite possible in which society is not imperiled by a crime, and is quite frequent in which the criminal refuses to be corrected. Nevertheless he must be punished. His debt to justice alone gives the title to public authority to inflict the penalty. But it does more. It imposes on public authority the obligation of punishing; for the procuring of justice is a function public authority cannot divest itself of. It goes further yet. It makes the protection of society and the culprit's reform possible by depriving him definitely and efficaciously of his liberty. Apart from violated justice, neither the protection of others, nor the reform of an offender could give the right to imprison. The same is true of the correction of delinquency. The title to imprison must be found in a previous crime; and the more one looks the clearer one sees that it can have no other foundation than that we have explained. Otherwise our social order would be mere utilitarianism, which is but a species of the tyranny of brute force.

But what has all this to do with capital punishment? We answer that it was necessary to establish the true theory of crime and its punishment, since upon false ideas in this matter the whole argument against capital punishment rests. Crime is an exterior deliberate act violating moral order inasmuch as this is under the care of public authority. The primary and essential end of punishment is to procure the restoration of that order. This is not the same as the reparation of material injury. One who steals a thousand dollars repairs the material injury when he returns the money, but he does not restore the violated moral order. Such reparation, when possible, is necessary, that the restoration of order may be complete. But it does not follow that if it cannot be made, the restoration of order is impossible. Hence we draw, in passing, two conclusions: first, the fallacy of a common argument against the death penalty, that the execution of a murderer does not restore his victims to life; second, this truth, that the preventive end of punishment must consist in the guarding against future violations of the moral order, rather than in the mere procuring that individuals may possess life and property securely. By the former the latter is obtained most efficaciously: if public authority cannot rise above the view of the latter, society cannot escape from the rule of mere force. Another important remark. As man is a rational animal, his moral reformation consists essentially in the correcting of his will, from which will follow correction of his exterior actions when occasion offers. The correcting of the will consists in procuring its conformity with that moral order it has violated. When this is obtained the criminal is reformed essentially, even though he should die the next moment: when it is not obtained there is no real reformation, no matter how correct the exterior deportment may be. Hence two more conclusions: first, capital punishment does not exclude the reform of the criminal; second, in procuring the restoration of moral order, punishment obtains efficaciously its threefold end.

The satisfaction of justice and the restoration of order are clearly the same thing under two aspects. In what does it consist? It is not physical in itself. It does not pretend to undo the fact of the crime. It is something moral, as the order in question is moral, dealing with human wills. The observance of moral order is the subjection of the will to the dictates of this order. Its violation takes place by the revolt of the will. Its restoration is not merely a resumption of its observance ignoring the violation: it is, first of all, the making satisfaction for its violation. When this violation proceeds to external acts, the satisfaction should be external; and when those acts are such as come under the cognizance of public authority, public authority must enforce that exterior satisfaction. Hence, there must be a due proportion between the crime and its punishment; and in all criminal law the penalties are so graded. There are violations of the moral order so grievous that no adequate satisfaction can be made otherwise than by the offender's life. This is the certain conclusion of sound reason. It is the intimate conviction of the human race. The opponents of capital punishment cannot refute it. To avoid its urgency, they have recourse to a simple but very irrational expedient. They put the moral order out of court altogether. They build up a flimsy argument on the false foundation that punishment has no other end than to protect society and to reform the criminal in his outward conduct.

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

War Time in a London Suburb

THE place was once a Thames-side village among fields and orchards. It is now an outlying suburb, for London has stretched itself out for miles along the western roads. But it is just far enough to escape being buried in the spreading tide of bricks and mortar. It keeps much of its old country aspect. On one side the fields are near it; on another the orchards stretch for a mile, and the park of an old ducal mansion on the site of a convent suppressed in Reformation times protects it on a third. Its fourth front is the river. The place has kept its old-world aspects and is more like a little country town than a London suburb. For one point all the people seem to know each other, while in London proper one seldom knows one's next door neighbor.

A year of war has brought with it many changes in the place and many unexpected experiences. There was a feeling of a plunge into the unknown on the August morning when the newspapers told us that England had declared war on Germany in defense of Belgium, and the notices were posted calling up the reserves of the army. Two days before we had sent away a few naval reservists mostly stokers and engineers, but the mobilization of the fleet did not greatly affect the place. For we had few naval reservists in our village, and the fleet mobilization was regarded as a precaution that did not necessarily mean war. I think we sent about ten men to the navy, two of these lost their lives, when the three cruisers were sunk by a German submarine off the Dutch coast.

But the mobilization of the army was a different business. Not only were the reserves called out, but for the first time in its existence of more than fifty years, the old volunteer force, now known as the Territorial Army, was called up for service. The order was issued late on August 4. The post offices were open all night to keep the telephones available, and to enable reservists to cash the orders for their traveling expenses. The tram cars that run up to London were crowded with men in khaki uniforms; motor cars came and went, each conveying an army staff officer, and a policeman. They were requisitioning horses and carts, motor cars and wagons for the service of the army. Wild rumors circulated of the activity of German agents, all of them untrue. We were told that a neighboring railway bridge had been blown up in the night, and that the police had seized stores of explosives at a local rubber factory, belonging to a German, and at a boys' school run by a German schoolmaster. In the village itself on the second day of the war there was a startling sensation. An armed party in khaki uniform drew up before one of the old timbered houses. When they tried to enter it, they were fired upon, but after a good deal of firing they penetrated into the house and brought out a rascally-looking individual in a fur cap. It was the "capture of a German spy," but in front of the house a photographic operator was turning the handle of a big camera. The whole scene was only the production of a sensational cinematograph film.

There was a scare about food prices, which led to some of the local shops being almost cleared out by alarmed purchasers. But on the second day this was all over, for the Government announced that prices would be regulated by fixing a maximum. On the whole, people took the declaration of war more calmly than had been expected. Before the week was over, there was little change in the normal life of the place. This calmness, which was not peculiar to our suburb, was all the more remarkable because the situation was so completely beyond the experience of English life for several generations. It was a hundred years since we had been at war with a neighboring Continental State. It was the first war that had ever affected the interests of the whole population.

For three weeks no one knew what was happening. The press censorship forbade any reference to the movements of troops and even any allusion to the preparations that were being made for the reception of the wounded, who would presently arrive from abroad. In those first weeks of the war there was absolute confidence in immediate victory. One Sunday evening there was excitement at the news of a great French success in Alsace. The telegram was read from some of the local pulpits. But what everyone was waiting for was news of a great British victory in Belgium. The popular idea was that our troops were somewhere side by side with the Belgian army. The war was three weeks old when the censorship allowed us to know that the British force was actually in touch with the enemy on the French left in Belgium, and the first reports led everyone to believe that it had scored a success. But in a few days it was evident that the Allied armies were everywhere in retreat.

Then came the first unexpected result of the war. The fugitives from Belgium were arriving in thousands, and we were asked to cooperate in giving them hospitality. A local committee was formed, and there was an appeal for help in goods, money and personal service. There was a wonderfully generous response. Few of our people are really well off. The population is made up largely of field workers and factory hands, but even the workers agreed to subscribe something each week to the refugee fund. When some empty houses were taken to be furnished for them, in every home in the place people looked round to see what furniture they could spare as contributions to the good work. Between two and three hundred Belgians arrived in the course of a fortnight. The Belgian refugees in England represented every class of the population, and included some of its less reputable elements. In fact among the refugees from Antwerp there were the inmates of a local labor colony for tramps. But we were lucky in our Belgian colony of refugees. They were all good people, and among them were a number of wounded soldiers and officers of the army. At the Sunday Mass our little Catholic Church was almost overcrowded, and there was the new sensation of hearing the announcements of the weekly services given out from the pulpit, first in English, and then in French. The preacher at the last Mass often added a few words in French to his sermon, and on the Monday afternoon there was Benediction with a French sermon especially for the refugees. One heard French and Flemish spoken in the streets. The near reality of the war was brought home to one by seeing the convalescent wounded soldiers arrive at the church, conveyed in motor-cars from the hospital for one of the Sunday Masses. One saw the unfamiliar blue uniforms, and men on crutches or with bandaged heads, or with arms in a sling. After a while our Belgian colony began to diminish in numbers. Some of the men went back to the fighting line, others went away to find work at various places in England, but a remnant remained, and are still with us.

After the first defeats and the retreat on Paris, everyone realized that the war was going to be a long one. There came appeal after appeal for new recruits. On walls and hoardings there appeared the pictorial posters issued by the recruiting committee. Week after week one heard that this or that man had enlisted. As the limit of age was raised, old soldiers were able to go back to the service. As week-end leave was freely given from the training camps one always saw on the Sunday morning officers and soldiers in their khaki uniforms in the church. Some of them were men whom we had known as village shopkeepers or workmen, others were men from a distance, who came from some of the nearest camps. In a large park about a mile away, there was a training station for the Army Service Corps, the transport department of the army. The men were mostly from the north of England, fifty or sixty of them were marched to our church every Sunday for Mass, for in the British Army attendance at public worship on Sunday is a duty, and counts as a parade.

Before the war there had been a good deal of real poverty in the place. The general expectation was that the new state of things would make life harder for the poorer people but there was another surprise, though there was a rise in the price of food of nearly every kind, there was practically no poverty, for to those who stayed at home war work gave plenty of employment. For instance, the rubber works, which had been started on a small scale just before the war, received large orders from the Government for motor tires, and soon more than 200 men were being employed on the work. In the same way, the huge steam-driven flour mills by the river-bank have been busy day and night. The mill once belonged to the old abbey which was suppressed at the Reformation, and in those days was driven by a single water wheel. It has gradually developed into one of the largest mills in the south of England, with a gigantic grain elevator towering on the river-bank. In the first month of the war the Government took control of it, and it has never been busier, so there is plenty of employment and besides this, very liberal allowances are made by the Government to the families of all soldiers who are either at the front or in the training camps. For the time being there is no poverty in the district. In fact, there was never more money in circulation among the workers. Instead of hardships, the war has brought them an unexpected prosperity.

But if there is no poverty there is trouble of another kind. The suburb has sent a very large proportion of its men to the army. The Catholic primary school alone has more than 150 of its former pupils at the front. There are few households in the place, which have not one or more relatives in the army, and in the year of war many of these have been killed or wounded. After every great battle we watch the casualty list anxiously for the names of those we know.

At the north end of the place on the London road, there is a huge workhouse, the English name for the refuge for the poor supported by local taxation. It provides for the poor of any of the neighboring districts, in fact for a considerable part of the County of Middlesex. Attached to it there was a large school for the workhouse children. But in the year before the war a new and wise legislation decided that these huge workhouse schools should be abolished, that the children should be boarded out in approved households and attend the local primary schools of their district, so that they would have the educating influence of normal family life, as well as that of the school. The large school buildings were therefore, in any case, to be vacated in the summer of the present year. It was decided to convert them into temporary military hospitals. The necessary funds for equipping the new hospital, about £3,000, were provided by a local subscription which included all the adjoining districts, and a month ago the first hundred wounded men arrived. There will soon be 300 beds ready for occupation, the staff is provided by the Government supplying two military surgeons and the local doctors volunteering their services. The thirty army nurses, several of them Canadians, are assisted by a volunteer staff of the ladies of the district. The wounded, who have so far arrived, are mostly Australians from the Dardanelles. Many of them are in the convalescent stage, and once more we have a new feature introduced by the war into our congregation at the Sunday Mass, for the convalescents from the hospital arrive in their blue hospital uniform.

The Government's statement of casualties in the war up to the first week of October show that in all more than 300,000 men had been wounded, mostly in the fighting on the western front. The war on this front is very near us. In southeastern England, in the county of Kent, on the days of the great battles in Flanders, the sound of the guns has been faintly heard even far inland.

In another respect, it is nearer than any other war on record, for our quiet suburb has more than once received a warning to be prepared for a Zeppelin bombardment. On these occasions, the fire brigade wait beside their engine, and stretcher parties are kept ready at the local hospital to fetch the wounded.

A. HILLIARD ATTERIDGE.

Books and Men

I

IT seems to be one of the perversities or sanities of human conceit that everybody who has read more than two or three hundred books believes he has won the privilege of talking about them. Their presence on the shelves of his library or in the recesses of his memory seems to confer that knighthood of teaching which in days of old a master's degree conferred on the scholar at Bologna or Paris. We can understand the university accolade; it was a logical and consistent thing. And a famous master was a famous book; and he spoke for himself, as a good book should. But why one should talk about books today any more than one should wonder that the cataract at Lodore obeys the laws of gravity or rejoice that one's toast at breakfast bears a close resemblance to its cousin of yesterday, we are sometimes at a loss to know. It surely cannot be that much has not been said about books. Nay, too much; and too much is surely enough, if one remembers one's mathematics at all. Far wiser might it be if from now until the end of time no one raised his voice, save it be a monstrous little one, about books or their makers, except by way of condemnation. But then, perhaps I am too obdurate; perhaps I fail to make a just concession to the love of talking for its own sake, a malady to which so many of us seem to have fallen heirs; and I forget for the moment that with so much love, much forgiveness must there be. And so, if books continue to bear the burden of an infinity of discreet and foolish sentences before infinity itself really takes up its own burden in earnest, let us smile and smile in a properly righteous egoism, and strive to "live our own lives" as unvillainously as we can.

It is so easy to write of books; so much easier, you will agree, than to omit the preposition from the aforesaid platitude or untruth, and say a credo to the remnant result. To go no further, one may write of the uses of books, if one is very patient. For they have so many more uses than the mere making of a full man. For instance, they may serve to decorate a room called a library; they are very handy things in which to press letters or flowers; they can be given to a lady we admire, when we wish to vary the monotony of the three or four other tokens of esteem which convention prescribes; they can marvelously do the work of holding up a recalcitrant window; they can render trunks heavy enough to make a baggage man forget the tablets of Sinai; they may serve as exceedingly desirable missiles for rude people to toss unlovingly at each other; they will help to kill time which otherwise might die with a more natural hesitancy; they oft-times make money for those who are conscienceless enough to write them for the undiscriminating millions; not infrequently they win fame for those who are gifted enough to write them for the conscionable handful; and one might mention ever so many more uses. But outside of being adapted to these purposes, named and unnamed, books for the most part are useless things, unless one wishes to read them; and I suppose we must be orthodox enough to admit that their availability for those who have learned to read is their main function in a world that looks for functions and motivations.

"Unless one wishes to read them." So many learned men and women have had just this sympathetic and hopeful view of their fellow-wayfarers that the advice about the magical properties of books is nigh completed; there really can be little more to add; perhaps, rather, a little to subtract. One philosopher will divide books into those that delight and those that instruct; another will chant the Iliad of the books of youth, the volumes of middle life, and the written pages due to the years of otium cum dignitate; Doctor Johnson will, with an eighteenth century finality, tell you that a book should teach you either to enjoy life or to endure it. It is so hard to make those nice distinctions. Who will tell me that the Imitation of Christ, which makes me gladder to endure life, will not make you find a keener zest in living as a fine art? I am sure that I shall find a happiness in "Treasure Island" long after I am a superannuated wooer of leisure. I am certain that Cinderella and the Prince and the gracious slipper enchant me still, the grace of the dear dead days of childhood haunting me rarely like a smile of unforgettable sweetness. Then, too, it seems to me that those who enjoy reading at all will take a delight in being instructed as well as a delight in being delighted, even if the joy is different both in kind and in degree.

I have sometimes wondered with what meticulously painstaking ease certain learned gentlemen can dogmatise on the right books to read. Not the right books for the right reader: the program is not so simple as that. But our intellectual mentors lay down the rules with a definitiveness that brooks no negation that everyone must read every volume on the approved list or be classed as a very Pariah in the world of culture. They would bulk us together in an unsplendid slavery to their Olympian wills. No allowance is made for the fact that a woman is a different type of being from a man, her soul gifted with different susceptibilities and requiring a distinctive training for its development;—I am aware of leaving myself open to an accusation of ante-bellum old-fashionedness. No reckoning is made of the fact that a certain biography, for instance, may have a desirable, stimulating effect on the inertia of one youth, and serve only as a window to an engulfing Weltschmerz for another; and there is too often a complete blinking of the fact that a chronicle of life's meaner ways and devious whitherings may work havoc in the unsearched souls of youths and maidens. Is a man to believe that his individuality is his own, and to feel that his life is a personal possession, or must everyone cringe and compromise when some more or less irresponsible person gives the signal? It would be just as reasonable to ask if I should be keenly anxious to die of pneumonia because my friend across the square chose that eminently respectable manner for his taking off; or if I should prefer to enjoy the linked sweetness of unburdened life to the lot of the hopeless ones of Molokai. Not every green patch of lawn should crave for a sundial or a hedge border, and it would be a decidedly ill-informed Louis Seize apartment that would beg for Victorian habiliments.

So it is with literature. Of course, there are certain books that have such a universality of appeal that they touch everyone closely; but there are many others, classics, too, that are not for all. And I believe that we should hold that not every famed book, whether a Molière wrote it, or a Shakespeare, should be deemed essential to a particular individual's culture. Moreover, just as every one should not necessarily read the same books, no one, at least no one to whom books are not a profession, should read an unworthy one. In this connection I have a very pleasant remembrance of a certain European lady I used to know. We were discussing one day things of common interest, and finally, through no fault of either of us, I hope, we reached the subject of books. She had a catholic taste, and an exquisitely choice one. Once upon a time, she told me, an acquaintance of hers lent her a book, and she sat down to read it upon the first opportunity, hoping to find it good. But it was not good; it was tainted, as so many books are. "And I closed it, and flung it across the room," she said. Even now, after the lapse of seven or eight years, I can recall with distinctness the flash in her eyes as she voiced her treatment of the book that offended the dignity of her womanhood. I sometimes wonder how many women would do likewise; all, I hope; very many, I am sure. But once in a while, not often, I am glad to say, I hear a college girl speak, not without a certain intellectual vanity, of having read such a book and such a play; and I feel it a great pity that someone has so misguided her. It is on an occasion like this that one can think most lovingly of that genial soul who knew the beauty of life and life's meaning; who loved true literature and despised the ugly counterfeits that pass as classics; and if Sidney Lanier should never be remembered for aught else than his condemnation of the vulgar and the coarse and the unclean, his life was not a fruitless toiling, nor his voice a wasted word.

JOSEPH FRANCIS WICKHAM.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words

Woman Suffrage

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The "indignant protest" of my critic, Agnes Hull Prendergast, is quite misplaced. It should be directed against what is defended, namely, the suffragist propaganda. The fifth article in my series treating of woman suffrage rehearses some well-known phenomena within our body politic; and it was pointed out that votes-for-women could not cure these social disorders, as they do not properly fall within the scope of political activity. Besides not a few of these disorders—as divorce, birth control, etc., etc., are to the Socialist-Feminist-Suffragist signs of coming social health. Consequently it were absurd to expect that those who believe vice is virtue in the making will assist in the cure of society. No one with a keen Catholic training would suggest something worse as a cure for something bad, as the radicals do. So notwithstanding their self-election as the saviors of the world, and the vast volume of heyday words employed, the Socialist-Feminist-Suffragists are competent to make no change for the better, but only from bad to worse. Alas, so well grooved in the false philosophy of monkeydom is the popular mind, that these women born and bred to false concepts of things human may well be excused as being more sinned against than sinning. But at least Catholic women may be expected to retain their faith in the Sacrament of Marriage.

Three years have, evidently, proved too short a period for my over-warm critic to become acquainted with the genesis and the aim of the so-called progressive, or emancipated woman. Her "plain proposition" is as bereft of the facts in the case as is her understanding of suffrage phenomena bereft of that light which reveals darkness. The woman who wants the ballot because she is a tax-payer should inform herself of the simple fact that a property qualification is not now the basis of manhood suffrage. Even a poll tax as a prerequisite for voting is a thing of the past. Moreover, the party which is out does not vote the appropriations. Consequently the party which is in spends the taxes of its opponents at the polls. Everyone knows the old campaign story which helped to correct the notion that money should speak upon election day. Once upon a time in New Jersey a countryman went up to town to register. Official: "What property have you?" Citizen: "Wall I've an old mule and a cart." That being sufficient, the man voted. Next year the countryman appeared at the registrar's desk and the same question was asked: "What property have you?" Citizen: "Wall I haint got none. My old mule died and my cart broke down." The verdict was "You cannot vote." Ben Franklin would tell the story and then leave it to his audience whether the man or the mule voted.

The shop girl who wants the vote because she is discriminated against by "man-made" laws had better cease her moan for the ballot and study facts in the case, which prove that there is discrimination in her favor; and there should be and may be more benefits added to the list. The United States Department of Labor reports (Dec. 15, 1914) that the State of New York had just passed a law reducing by six the hours of labor per week in the mercantile establishments, while without an appeal to the State the labor of thousands of women working in the skirt industry has been reduced to fifty hours per week with an increase of pay. Moreover, in a practical measure of this nature we may trust to the American Federation of Labor to view rightly the real interest of wage-earners. At its convention, a few days ago, in San Francisco this great body reasserted its opposition to the regulation of the hours of labor by law. These men have, by long years of practical experience and by study, learned that the hours of labor should be regulated upon the commercial, not upon the political field. Certainly Catholics should hark back to the days of "Merrie England" when the working day was eight hours, to those Catholic days when there were more holydays than Sundays in the year for moral and mental as well as physical refreshment.

Two instances will suffice to represent the attitude of the leading suffragists in their advocacy of evil principles and vile practices, though both names and measures could be added indefinitely. On Nov. 22, 1915, the daily papers of Boston announced the "marriage" of the editor of The Woman's Journal. The one-time Catholic "persisted in her ideas on suffrage," deciding that she would not sacrifice "those many things" that go with a "formal ceremony." Neither would she give up independence; nor "submerge her identity" in marriage. So the lady drafted her own ritual, keeping her own name as did Lucy Stone two generations ago. Consequently the wedding of the suffrage editor and her male assistant was as free as the mating of the birds of the air and as morally binding. The second instance is the fact that Socialist-Suffragists are without shame exploiting Helen Keller. This blind and deaf girl is, in the interest of animalistic philosophy, made to declare for "birth-control" and for the elimination of defectives. God pity them! for justice meted out were past all expressing.

Boston. MARTHA MOORE AVERY.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In reading carefully the rather obscure article in AMERICA entitled "Right Reason the Cure" it is noticeable that amid all the high sounding phrases in which the author sets forth her objections to woman suffrage, the real basis of the demand is not even glanced at, possibly because it is not understood. The reason for the demand is exceedingly simple. Women are merely asking a voice in the government of themselves, a voice in the election of those who make laws that govern women as well as men and which women must obey. If the American theory of government is correct, that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed" then as women are governed they should give their consent through the ballot, which is the designated method in our Republic. Naturally, however, this fact appeals only to those who believe in a democratic form of government, "a government of the people, for the people, by the people." To those who believe in an aristocracy or an oligarchy, whether it be of sex or any other line of distinction, this fundamental and cardinal principle is not likely to have weight. To those on the other hand, who are sufficiently democratic to believe in a representative form of government the statement is an irrefutable argument.

The objections against woman suffrage when sifted down are in reality objections against suffrage in itself, though the opponents who so often take a superficial view of the question are not always logical enough to see it. There is scant time for replying to the article in AMERICA, but a most curious assertion may be noticed, namely, "votes for women is a plank in rebellion's platform made by those who scorn Rome and contemn the moral order by presuming an independence of the sexes which right reason cannot tolerate!" "Scorn Rome!" That is a grave charge! Perhaps some kind friend will supply the author of this arraignment with a few of the woman suffrage leaflets in which Catholic bishops and priests have plainly and unhesitatingly set forth their advocacy of the cause of woman suffrage. Surely the author of "Right Reason the Cure" would not assert that they "Scorn Rome" by so doing. It may not be out of place to quote an "opinion" from one of our Catholic leaflets, given by the pastor of a prominent church in Pittsburgh, Pa. "I hope to see the day when every woman in my congregation will have the right to vote and exercise it." It may well be doubted if this well-known clergyman imagines that his hope for "Votes for women" is a "plank in rebellion's platform." Perhaps if the author would take a trip to some of our Western States where women vote, and no upheaval of the home or of the moral law has taken place, or out to New Zealand, where the late Cardinal Moran was an enthusiastic believer in the good results that had followed the granting of the franchise to women, she might possibly find her obscured vision wonderfully cleared.

Another statement in this certainly unique article may be noticed. "God put man at the head of the family and woman at the head of the home." No one dreams of contradicting the assertion that "woman is the head of the home," though in these days of fierce strife for a living, it must often be added, "if she has a home"; for it may not be irrelevant to ask what of the vast armies of women who have been forced out of the home by economic conditions? The time is passed when women's work was entirely in the home. It is there no longer and women have had to follow it, and the working woman outside of the home in the factory or store needs the ballot just as surely as does the working man, and for precisely the same reason, for her own protection.

The curious phrase, "the Socialist-Feminist-Suffragist leaders" may next be discussed. Now is it possible that the writer knows so little of the equal suffrage movement as to think all suffrage leaders are Socialists? If she does think so, she is amazingly ignorant of the matter and can know very few leaders of the movement. And suppose they are Socialists and in favor of equal political rights for women and men, what would that have to do with the justice of the cause? We do not condemn Christianity because some of its professors have held erroneous opinions. Feminist is a word which happens to be the favorite fad of the hour, but as with all other fads, both the fad and all it may happen to stand for will die the natural death of all such vagaries and do no harm to suffragists. It may be stated, however, that the great body of suffragists throughout the country are too earnest in their active work, for securing the ballot to pay any heed whatever to the so-called elusive Feminist movement, whatever it may be.

Voting is not a question of sex. Women stockholders have a voice in the organizations in which they hold stock, and if they chance by good fortune to be Catholic women, it may be doubted if they are thereby invading "the political integrity of families." Women, even Catholic women vote in their clubs, their charitable organizations but do they in consequence "contemn the moral order"? "Truth crushed to earth will rise again" and the advocates of an equal franchise for men and women, though they may be defeated at first, will triumph in the end, for the demand for the ballot is only a part of the great wave of democracy which is gradually sweeping over the world.

Philadelphia. JANE CAMPBELL.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

What the Judge Said

WHO has not felt the tenderness of Ruth's appeal to Noemi, "in the way to return to the land of Juda"? "Whithersoever thou shalt go, I will go," she sobs, clinging to Noemi. "Where thou shalt dwell, I also will dwell. Thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God. The land that shall receive thee dying, in the same will I die; and there will I be buried. The Lord do so and so to me and add more also, if aught but death part me and thee."

The heart readily understands the sweetness of a word, a glance, a token of affection; but the love of the chosen soul for God, transcending the deepest love of child for parent, the tenderest transports of the lover for his beloved, is too often held utter folly. A young girl hears the voice of Christ, bidding her leave all things for His dear sake. Parting from all that her innocent heart has loved most, she goes out from her father's house, to be made a dweller in a strange land. She prays, loves, adores; she ministers to His least brethren, seeing Him in the poor, the sick, the ignorant; she asks for nothing but to be allowed to serve Him; nothing does she call her own but poverty and sacrifice. The world is not worthy of her, and by the world that can never understand the love of God, she must bear to be called a fool; while her sister, the bond-slave of petty conventionality, who gladly pays her life for a cap and bells, is the favored child of a world that loves its own and hates Christ.

So has it been from the day when Christ bade those who would be perfect to give up all and follow Him. It is the true Catholic instinct that makes a mother smile through her tears when Christ calls a son or daughter to serve Him in the Way of the Counsels. The love that binds them is not broken by the parting; she knows that in the flame of the higher love of God, it is purified of all dross and made a bond unbreakable between soul and soul. It was the blurring of this Catholic instinct, doubtless, which recently led a mother to ask a New York court to remove her daughter from the novitiate of a religious congregation. In open court the novice herself protested that she wished nothing but to be allowed to follow her vocation. "Tell your client," remarked Judge Giegerich, as he refused action, "that I think she should feel proud to have her daughter enter the convent and give herself to God, when many other young women of her age and attractiveness are giving themselves to seeking pleasure."

A short charge, but full of wisdom; may it be pondered deeply by all worldly mothers. Many a foolish woman now bitterly bewails the day on which she turned the heart of her daughter from the love of Christ to the love of the world and its ways.

Have Journalists No "Professional Conscience"?

"IS the object of your paper the furthering of the public good?" the Physician asked the Editor.

"Of course," answered the latter lightly.

"Then stop the discussion in your columns of this disgraceful surgical case. Instead of securing the opinions of 'prominent doctors' on the question, say nothing about it. The controversy is doing incalculable harm. It is causing readers of your paper to meditate the commission of crimes they never would have thought of, unless the suggestion came from what you have been printing."

"If I took your advice," rejoined the Editor, "no one would read my paper. After all, I must live. A modern journalist cannot well afford a tender 'professional conscience' like that of doctors and lawyers! My position depends on my ability to gather and publish the news, and the owners of my paper determine to a large extent what the quality and quantity of that news shall be."

The foregoing conversation is not wholly "imaginary." Professor Richard Greene Moulton, moreover, in his excellent book, "The Modern Study of Literature," published not long ago, traces the worst characteristics of the press today to this same lack of a wholesome "professional feeling" among newspaper men. He writes:

> For a great part of a newspaper no individual can be made responsible; what some newspapers print no decent man would put his name to. Thus by the rise of journalism a place is found in literature for what is morally outrageous; more serious still is the removal of every barrier against looseness of statement and unverified information. Worst of all is the consideration that by periodical literature a pecuniary premium is put upon unreliability and insinuation; it is the sensational headline that sells the extra, the spicy rumor that gives the society journal its vogue. And this seems to be a public wrong without a remedy. It is a very small part of the evils of life that can be corrected by the machinery of justice. We need more spiritual and subtle restraints; among these one of the most potent is professional spirit. . . . If journalists are to be seen uniting in cooperative efforts only for the promotion of newspaper enterprise, and not for effort toward the restraint of abuses, journalism would seem to be a profession without a professional conscience.

The best way of developing this highly desirable professional conscience would be, of course, to have editors and reporters receive a thorough training in Christian ethics.

Mr. Taft on Public Education

ONE of the sanest thinkers of this generation is ex-President Taft. Whenever this distinguished gentleman chooses to address the public, the public is sure to listen to a discourse which will set it thinking. The outcome may not be complete agreement with the speaker, but the thought-process will have thrown new light on some old and valuable but forgotten principle.

Mr. Taft's Rochester speech, delivered at the convention of the State Teachers' Association, is an example in point. With its deeper import, few educators will be found to disagree. The first step to the betterment of American public education is to recognize its shortcomings. The present incisive and often unjust criticism of the American school is the natural and, on the whole, beneficial reaction following the fulsome praise lavished upon it for generations. Mr. Taft does not hesitate to express his dissatisfaction with the present product of this school. Boys in England, Germany and France receive an obviously superior training. This, to be sure, must not be taken to mean that the methods suitable to these countries would be equally successful in America; yet we may well adopt the principles which secure the discipline, and thoroughness of mental training, by which these schools are in general characterized. Laxness of discipline and want of thoroughness, largely attributable to the overcrowded curriculum, are, in Mr. Taft's opinion, the most striking faults of the American school.

Reform in these matters must come from the recognition by the school itself of the importance of its mission. The wisdom of conferring larger powers on the Bureau of Education is open to serious objection. As Mr. Taft himself observes:

> Under the Constitution, the Federal Government has not direct supervisory power over the educational system of the States. That is a matter which the States themselves absolutely control.

States, like men, are too apt to throw their burdens on a willing substitute. The final outcome of Federal supervision will be Federal control. States are, and should be, within their proper spheres, self-governing communities, and not mere geographical divisions.

White is Black

THE undiscerning citizen who, without questioning, takes his information from the newspapers, probably experienced some sentiment of surprise on reading that the Knights of Columbus "had perfected a plan to unite their organization with the Masons." AMERICA holds no brief to speak for the Knights, nor in the present case is any special authorization necessary. It is obvious that these reports were written by men whose love of the startling occasionally overcomes their regard for the sober facts in the case. No Knight of Columbus can become a Mason, for the simple and immediate reason that such action is forbidden by the Church; nor can any Catholic declare that "there is nothing in Masonry irreconcilable with the teaching of the Catholic Church," for the further simple and immediate reason that the Church has declared Masonry and Catholicism irreconcilable. The Knights are doing an excellent work by their numerous lecture bureaus; and none know better than they that the strength of their cause depends upon their absolute fidelity to Catholic sentiment and principle.

Here the matter may rest. Any movement, public or private, which brings about a better understanding between all members of the community will be welcomed by Catholics as by all good citizens. One provision, however, must be noted. Catholics will not, cannot, have part in any "movement" which involves the compromise or abandonment of a fundamental principle. Once admit that two plus two make five, or that white is black, and the reign of reason has come to an end. The "better understanding" that is based on a falsehood can only lead to confusion worse confounded.

The Law and the Lawless

THE excellently advertised Paterson "trial of free speech," in which the I. W. W. assumed a leading rôle, has ended with the judicial declaration that the State was unable to prove its case. The trial, as all acquainted with the facts are aware, was singularly misnamed. In no sense was the right of free speech called in question. The defendant had been indicted not for the use but for the abuse of a constitutional right. The indictment alleged that the defendant had publicly incited to disorder and riot. If free speech confers this privilege, the sooner the State revokes the constitutional clause upon which it is based, the longer will be the term of civilization.

One point worthy of note is the insistence with which the lawless, when brought to book, are wont to urge their "lawful" rights. The I. W. W. now announces, through an official, that it "will get injunctions restraining the police from interfering so long as we are within our legal rights." An excellent plan; but it will hardly swell the membership of this benevolent institution. To the "wild and woolly" existing in all large communities, as well as to the misguided who would speed the law by taking its execution into their own hands, this cheaply picturesque organization has always offered a certain degree of attractiveness. Cramped and confined within the bounds of legal restraint, it will become as innocuous as an Old Ladies' Sewing Circle. One may now look to see the I. W. W. engaged in real constructive work for the amelioration of the poor, by allying itself with a Conference of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, or the Associated Charities.

Charity or Philanthropy?

CHRISTMAS is fast approaching. The Christ Child stands knocking at the door of our heart. We shall doubtless wish to remember Him in His poor. "As long as you did it to one of these my least brethren, you did it to me." But our alms must be given according to piety and prudence, not after the prudence of the world, but after the wisdom of Christ. Where, therefore, we do not ourselves directly dispose of our offerings, they should be distributed through Catholic organizations established for this purpose. There are many reasons for insistence upon this principle. In the first place, money thus given will not be absorbed by an army of salaried officials who often receive the lion's share of alms given to "scientific" philanthropic societies. Philanthropy is a business with these people. They have prior claim, though the poor should receive only the leavings. The proposed condition that the cost of administration for such organizations should not exceed sixty per cent is made by a social writer as a conservative demand. Some social workers are, in fact, mere parasites. Catholics, on the other hand, have for their excellent almoners the St. Vincent de Paul councils of their own parishes, the local Christ Child Society, and other parish or diocesan organizations and institutions. Practically every cent given will thus reach the poor, instead of making a short circuit into the pockets of a legion of paid officials.

It must also be remembered that the mere offering of a gift is the smallest good accomplished by Catholic charity. There is likewise a spiritual benefit to be attained both on the part of the giver and of the recipient of the favor. The Vincentian investigator and the Christ Child visitor bring into the homes of the poor far more than mere wealth can bestow. The love of God is the sole motive that inspires these devoted men and women, as likewise the Brothers and Sisters who sacrifice their lives for Catholic charity. To communicate this same love to others in the greatest richness is their first and ultimate purpose. Here, then, is the essential distinction between Christian charity and secular philanthropy.

There is a third reason why Catholics should distribute their alms through Catholic agents. Our own people will not be discriminated against, as is likely to be the case, in particular, where donations are sent to a great distance. In urging this consideration the Ave Maria recalls to mind the Armenian collections made some years ago in England and the United States, when Catholic Armenians were almost entirely excluded from any share in the alms. It would be easy to quote similar instances nearer home or of more recent date.

The Church has ever been the great almoner of the world. It is out of her hands that our Catholic charities should be distributed where they are not personally given. It is thus they will reach farthest, will accomplish a two-fold good, and will bring due assistance to those most intimately dependent upon us. We have our poor at home; our poor afar, as in distressed Poland; and our poor in the starving Catholic missions praying for help lest they perish. Those without the fold are not overlooked, but Catholic charity will wisely remember in all things what is right and proper and well pleasing in the sight of our common Father.

LITERATURE

XV—Dante Alighieri

ALIGHERIUS noster est: "Dante belongs to us." When our Holy Father Pope Benedict XV wrote these words last spring in his letter to the Archbishop of Ravenna formally sanctioning the celebration of the six hundred and fiftieth anniversary of Dante's birth, he proclaimed to the world at large that the Catholic Church claims Dante Alighieri as its very own. And well it may! No man ever expounded the Faith of the Church more certainly, no man ever pinned his hopes to the Church with more confidence, no man ever loved the Church more passionately than Dante.

None but a Catholic can appreciate Dante. This in spite of the many non-Catholics who have commentated or translated his works. I can hear some of his most devoted admirers in England and America protest indignantly against this assertion. They protest quite honestly, for it is impossible for them to know how much of Dante they miss through their ignorance of the Catholic Faith. Really to know Dante involves intimate knowledge of the doctrines, the history, the traditions, the language, the art and the ritual of the Catholic Church. Really to love Dante one must love the Catholic Church as he loved it. The non-Catholic may admire; he cannot love. To the devout and educated Catholic Dante's works can easily become a book of devotion, second only to the Bible.

To appreciate Dante as a poet one must know Italian, for such verse as his cannot be translated without losing its music. The very best of the translations do but give the kind of shadow of its beauty that a fine engraving gives of the Sistine Madonna: the form and the lines are there, but all the color is gone. Yet it is better to have an engraving than never to have seen the picture at all. So it is better to read Dante in a translation than never to read him at all. This from the esthetic standpoint. Dante, however, is far more than a poet, and if one lose the music of his unequaled verses when reading them in English, one may still be overwhelmed by the majesty of his thought; fascinated by the wealth of lore he brings to the story of that most romantic of centuries, the thirteenth; one may still admire the clean-cut cameos in which he presents the host of actors in that tremendous moving-picture of this world and the world beyond the grave; one may still learn the secrets of the human soul from this great psychologist, keen metaphysician, severely orthodox theologian. I venture to say that never was theology presented to mankind more lucidly and in more attractive form than by Dante. Often from a few lines of the "Purgatorio" or the "Paradiso" one gets a clearer understanding of the truths of the Christian Faith than one could get by reading many tomes by the Doctors of the Church.

Ignorance of the teaching of the Church has led well-meaning men into the strangest of wanderings and flounderings. Some of them have wrenched certain passages of the "Divina Commedia" away from their context and twisted them into arguments to show that Dante was a rebel against the Church, a sort of John the Baptist to Luther and Calvin. Non-Catholic commentators are fond, for example, of pointing to his terrible pictures of the damned souls of men who in life had sat in Peter's chair as arguments against the infallibility of the Pope, thereby merely advertising their ignorance of the dogma of infallibility. And they derive a malicious delight from quoting Dante's anathemas against corrupt cardinals, monks and priests, thereby proving that they have never read the lives of Gregory VII and St. Peter Damian.

The Catholic who knows and loves his Faith shudders as he reads such passages as these. Dante meant that he should shudder. As the poet brings home to him the terrors of the tempests through which the bark of St. Peter was passing in Dante's days, it makes him realize, if he never realized it before, that this bark could not have weathered such storms and come in safety to the calmer seas of today if it had not been that the Divine Captain kept his post upon the bridge, as He had promised at her launching: "Behold I am with you all days even unto the consummation of the world."

But the works of Dante are to be read and interpreted as a whole, not in or by isolated passages torn from their context. To read Dante aright and get the meaning of the allegory that he develops, one must begin with the "Vita Nuova." I scarcely dare suggest that the average reader continue with the "Convito," for this is hard reading even to the devotee, but he should at least read a synopsis of it, which can be done in a couple of hours. And he should read also the letter to Can Grande della Scala. Then he can go on to complete enjoyment of the glories of the "Divina Commedia."

The Catholic needs but a hint to see the allegorical meaning of it all and to interpret it along the lines that Dante indicates in the letter to Can Grande. The poet is giving us a symbolic picture of the human soul. In the "Vita Nuova" we see it in a state of innocence, as it came pure and fresh from the hands of God. In the "Convito" we see it wandering away from the right path, losing itself in the dark wood of strange philosophies and pseudo-scientific speculation. The "Inferno" shows it to us in all the hideous horror of the state of sin and terrified at its own ugliness. The "Purgatorio" places it before us contrite and purging itself from the stains of sin. And in the "Paradiso" we have the apotheosis of the soul redeemed and blessed and glorified.

Dante himself personifies the human soul. Virgil is the light of human wisdom; Beatrice is Divine Grace. Divine Grace moves human wisdom to show man the ugliness of sin and to lead him to repentance. Having done this, human wisdom can go no further, and Divine Grace takes man by the hand and leads him on to the knowledge and love of God. This is a sketchy outline of the allegory of Dante's works, the noblest allegory ever penned by man.

And with it all is the love story, the romance, the idyl! With a pure devotion that was the inspiration of his life and his works, Dante adored the lovely maiden who was torn from him so early by death. And never did poet or lover exalt his lady as Beatrice was exalted by Dante. Others have idealized their ladies; Dante made of his not merely an ideal, but the Ideal, and finally sang her as the personification of Divine Grace, the handmaid of Mary. Other poets have gone into raptures over their ladies' eyes; Dante makes Beatrice's eyes the mirror of heaven itself, into which he gazes to see the reflection of God's face. Verily he "said of her what had never been said of woman."

A great Italian critic has laid it down that Dante was a poet but not an artist. In this he was wrong, and one need not know Italian to perceive the consummate art with which the poet weaves his plots and designs his pictures. Only a great artist could paint such tremendous portraits with so few strokes. I think that Dante rises to his highest as an artist in telling us how he saw God. Other poets have described God; Milton, for instance. But Milton's God is nothing more than a great Indian chief. I thank Dr. Condé Pallen for that apt simile! Dante sees God as a point, an infinite point; but the whole universe revolves around this point; from it the heavens and earth receive their light. And we, as we gaze with him in awe at that dazzling point, feel the utter insignificance of everything else in the universe.

Dante, like Homer, rarely describes. He shows us an action; he flashes an apt simile upon the screen; he quotes what is said. With these methods he makes us see and hear and feel. One cannot read him rapidly; he is so concise and so suggestive that every line rouses a train of thought. And if this be not art I know not what art may be.

The Catholic trying to explain to inquiring Protestants such ill-understood dogmas as purgatory, the honor paid to the Blessed Virgin Mary and the Saints, prayers for the dead, confession and absolution, to say nothing of such matters as faith, hope and charity, can point to passages in the "Divine Comedy" that will make them clearer to the mind honestly desirous to understand than any other writings I know. And Dante's theology is that of St. Thomas Aquinas, pure and unadulterated. For these reasons I should place the works of Dante not on the Catholic's bookshelf but rather upon his parlor table.

ARTHUR BENINGTON.

REVIEWS

Heart of Europe. By RALPH ADAMS CRAM, Litt.D., LL.D. Illustrated. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

Fountains of Papal Rome. By MRS. CHARLES MACVEAGH. Illustrations Drawn and Engraved on Wood by RUDOLPH RUZICKA. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

Here are two volumes that will appeal to lovers of Catholic art. The "Heart of Europe," according to Dr. Cram, is a region extending 350 miles from the Alps to the sea, and about 250 miles from the Seine at Paris to the Rhine at Cologne. It is a district only half the size of Texas, but in it "more history was made and recorded in old monuments full of grace and grandeur than in almost any other region of the world." About Flanders in particular, which has played so prominent a part in Europe's long drama, the author writes with infectious enthusiasm. He entertains no illusions regarding the "darkness" of the Middle Ages. "The Renaissance and the Reformation," he writes, "together had extinguished both civilization and culture over the greater part of Europe," and, in his opinion,

> The great and triumphal progress from Jumièges through Noyon, Senlis, St. Denis, Laon, Paris, Amiens, to its final achievement at Reims, was a complete and visible record of the greatest and most headlong advance toward the real things in Christian civilization by means of the real things in Christian civilization history has ever recorded.

The Cathedral of Reims Dr. Cram considered the noblest church in Christendom, and the Cloth Hall of Ypres perhaps the finest secular building, so his grief at their destruction is intense. The tribute he pays Margaret of Malines and the Catholic spirit of her times, the glowing description he gives of Hubert Van Eyck's "Adoration of the Lamb," "which very well may be the greatest picture in the world," and the pages he writes about tapestries are among the best portions of the book. Dr. Cram's admiration for Jesuits, whom he regards as "the first incarnation of that 'efficiency' that in the end became the obsession of the world and the root of the war," is very moderate. He seems to think the Pope should have taken sides in the present conflict, and in one place he speaks of the "sacrament of the mass," a curious expression for a Ritualist. The "Heart of Europe" is a beautiful, finely illustrated book which no one could have written unless he loved and appreciated the Middle Ages as much as does Dr. Cram.

For those visitors to the Eternal City whose delicate health forbids their haunting galleries, churches and catacombs, the author of "Fountains of Papal Rome" has arranged an art-lover's pilgrimage in the open air and in the broad sunshine. She describes carefully a score of the beautiful fountains with which the Popes adorned their capital and as she walks along favors her readers with a vast deal of court gossip about the Renaissance Popes and their immediate successors, some of which may be true and some of which should be prudently doubted. Mrs. Macveagh is a better authority, no doubt, on what is admirable in a fifteenth-century Roman fountain than she is regarding the private life, say, of Paul III. W. D.

Plashers Mead. By COMPTON MACKENZIE. New York: Harper and Bros. $1.35.

Amid the welter of latter-day books and their makers we have before this hailed with delight the appearance of one maker of literature in the person of Mr. Compton Mackenzie. His earlier productions we have been obliged, for obvious reasons, to accept with some qualification. "Plashers Mead," however, stands free of all objectionable features, and we may speak its praises freely. Out of the pages of "Sinister Street" the author has taken his student-poet Guy Hazelwood, and has woven around him the delectable story of youth and love; not the tortuous ardors of his other books, but the love of freshness and innocence. For Guy and Pauline are precisely etherialized children, moving and meeting together in the rich halo created by their own unspoilt imaginations. This is the whole story. There is no action, unless in Aristotle's sense of the word. It is not a romance, but an idyl, as splendid in its haze of fancy as if the very "Thalousia," of Theocritus were its prototype. This indeed is the distinctive charm of all Mr. Mackenzie's books. He succeeds in wrapping every detail and every incident in a golden and glorified mist where life seems stilled as if by a mirage or enchantment. It was so in the Oxford scenes in "Sinister Street;" it is the same color intensified and laid on with a surer stroke in "Plashers Mead." The white December scene in the snowy fields near Wychford Abbey where "the robin still sang his rather pensive tune; and from a high ash-bough, a missel-thrush, wearing full ermine, saluted the vestal day," is an instance of this idealizing imagination that clings in the mind of the reader. Surely if there is any sense of pure literature left in the world, if we have not all grown to be mere devotees of "efficiency," or mere rhetoricians, Mr. Mackenzie should win a conspicuous place on our bookshelves among the creators of fiction of our times. C. F.

The Spell of Belgium. By ISABEL ANDERSON. Boston: The Page Company. $2.50.

Memories of India. By Sir ROBERT BADEN-POWELL, K.C.B. Philadelphia: David McKay. $3.50.

Belgium for centuries in one way or another has held the interest of the world. Rubens and Van Eyck have spoken gloriously, and with them their country has spoken too, casting its spell over the world. Since the Great War hearts have gone out to Belgium, and Mrs. Anderson's book will find many eager readers. For it is both a history and an appreciation. The historical part is thoroughly done in a pleasing style, while the appreciation is a sincere tribute from one who lived among the Belgians long enough to learn their characteristics well. There is scarcely a phase of national life that the author has not treated. Her chapter on the system of voting and her version of the legends of Antwerp form a very attractive section in the story. The closing chapter, entitled a "Last Word," brings the reader up to the present bitter hour in Belgium's history. There is a map of Belgium in the beginning, and more than fifty excellent illustrations are scattered throughout the volume.

Going to India as a young subaltern, the present British General sent back to his mother, in letter after letter, his impressions of the land of sun and sorrow. This fine volume is built upon those letters, which the writer modestly asserts only a mother would have saved. The "Memories" are replete with interest, vividly painting events of a few decades ago, set down in writing just as they occurred, retelling anecdotes of camp-fire and mess-hall, recalling the pleasures of the sportsman and the sufferings of the soldier. The General's story of the Afghan War in 1880 is especially well told. It was his first touch with the firing line and his introduction to the Ghazis, who dress in white and refuse to take food or cut their hair until they have killed the pale-face unbeliever. How the Berkshire Regiment perished to a man in covering the retreat of the outnumbered British forces is described as only a soldier could put it:

> They made their last stand at a long, low, mud wall. It was at this spot that one of the men waved his hand cheerily to the horse artillery getting their guns away, and cried that historic farewell: "Good luck to you. It's all up with the bally old Berkshires!" They were all killed here and the shortest way of burying them was to throw down the wall on top of them.

Hunting the wild boar, big-game shooting, polo, regimental, theatrical and social functions follow along in interesting procession through these pages. Then comes the sterner phase of army life when the tribes are out and the excitement of war is upon the land. For in India "every star pales before the sun of war." The volume is enriched with twenty-four illustrations in color and 100 in black and white by the author. G. C. T.

John Bannister Tabb. By M. S. PINE. Washington: Georgetown Visitation Convent: New York: Munder-Thomson Co. $1.10.

This little book is a delicate appreciation of one whose work and value are a thing apart, unshadowed by rival or even parallel achievement. Father Tabb was preeminently a jeweller in verse. Each of his productions shines with a light all its own. And only when the last line has fallen does the delight of his tiny marvels of structure and lyric dawn upon us. This is made clear in the volume under review. The poet's life work is carefully sketched and the quotation of many of his best quatrains with a discerning commentary gives an excellent prospectus of his genius and the resources of his fancy. That the tense-faced priest could indulge in humor we discover in the dedication of his synopsis of grammar "To My Pupils, Active and Passive, Perfect and Imperfect, Past, Present, and Future." Yet the same writer wonderfully epitomizes the Divine condescension in the redemption by picturing the Child Christ seeking the round earth as a ball which had been lost. There is concentration of thought and expression in the poem which pictures the trees whispering to each other as Christ passes cross-laden to Calvary:

> Behold the Gardener is He
> Of Eden and Gethsemane.

Not the least delightful feature in the little work is the biography which is, indeed, carried through the whole volume taking us from early adventurous days of Confederate service of capture and imprisonment up to the melancholy but brave years of blindness which crowned and closed Father Tabb's life.

T. B. C.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Those who followed the six well-reasoned papers that Mrs. Martha Moore Avery recently contributed to AMERICA will doubtless be interested to learn that the articles have been gathered into the current number of the Catholic Mind, and "E. C.'s" pertinent questions to the Catholic suffragist are added. This issue of the little fortnightly is a well-stored arsenal of arguments against Feminism.

The Bookman's list of the six novels most in demand during October names these: "Michael O'Halloran," "Felix O'Day," "K," "The Money Master," "The Heart of the Sunset" and "The Story of Julia Page." All but the fifth have already been noticed in AMERICA: the first two with commendation, the third and fourth with faint praise, and the last with a good word for much of the book, but with the expressed hope that Kathleen Norris would leave "uplift" and "single standard" themes to others. Regarding "The Heart of the Sunset," Rex Beach's "latest," its central figure is one of those Texas rangers who are now infesting "best sellers" so fiercely. Besides the usual descriptions of "gun-play" there is a sympathetic account of a married woman with two suitors, one of whom she accepts some time before her husband is conveniently murdered. The obliging Father O'Malley doubtless had a batch of dispensations for the marriage he performed. No matter how demoralizing is the trash this author writes, he can be sure, apparently, that it will be eagerly read by thousands.

"What shall I get Mildred for a present?" "Why not give her a book?" "She has a book already." That dialogue may express the perplexity just now of many a Christmas shopper. If it is thought, however, that Mildred or her friends and relatives could stand at least one book more, the question at once arises: What shall I buy them? Perhaps it would not be safe to offer anyone nowadays copies of the "good old books," for a work to be acceptable must not be more than a year old. In that case, we need only run back through the literary pages of AMERICA, where a wide choice of excellent books for Catholic readers may be found. For instance:

In poetry: Books by Mr. Kilmer, Father Hill, Dr. Pallen, Mr. Walsh, Katherine Tynan, Mr. Chesterton and Mr. Johnson's Dante. In biography and history: Lady Moreton's "A Playmate of Philip II," Father Campbell's two volumes of "Pioneer Laymen," Dr. Emmet's "Thomas Addis Emmet," Father Grisar's "Luther," Dr. Mann's "Innocent III," Father Laveille's "Life of Father De Smet," E. G. Smith's "St. Clare of Assisi," Cunninghame Graham's "Bernal Diaz de Castillo," H. Belloc's "Lingard" and his "High Lights of the French Revolution," Father McCaffrey's "History of the Catholic Church from the Renaissance to the French Revolution," Father O'Neil's "Legenda Aurea," Dr. Walsh's "The Popes and Science," Father Engelhardt's "Missions and Missionaries of California," and Mr. Winter's "Memories." In travel: F. D. Little's "Sketches in Poland," Mrs. Fraser's "Storied Italy," H. Belloc's "The Path to Rome," E. N. Vose's "Spell of Flanders," C. A. Mason's "The Spell of Southern Shores," "The Vatican: Its History and Treasures," E. W. Rose's "Cathedrals and Cloisters of Northern France." In fiction: the lastest novels of John Ayscough, Mgr. Benson, Canon Sheehan, H. S. Harrison, Leslie Moore, Christian Reid, and F. Hopkinson Smith. In asceticism and apologetics: Father Hill's "The Catholic's Ready Answer," Father Maturin's works, Father Finlay's "The Church of Christ," Jane Erskine Stuart's "The Society of the Sacred Heart," Father Kane's "From Fetters to Freedom," E. T. Watkin's "Catholic Apologetics," Father Phelan's "The Straight Path," and Father Martindale's "The Goddess of Ghosts." To the foregoing might be added Henri Fabre's excellent studies of bees, Professor Moultons's "Modern Study of Literature," "The Library of Irish Literature," "Russian Fairy Tales," "Hero Tales of Serbia," and other books that have been favorably noticed during the past year in AMERICA.

A perusal of "Books and Authors" and "Books Received" in the present and in preceding numbers of this paper may also show the proper book to give a relative or friend. The children's books that have appeared during the past year are too numerous to name. Many of these volumes were not needed at all. It is better that boys and girls who are old enough should read the standard authors of the last century: Dickens, Thackeray, Tennyson, Ruskin, Lamb, etc., than the predigested books of today.

The January issue of the Messenger of the Sacred Heart, which has recently appeared, is both the Christmas and the Jubilee number, for in 1916 the magazine will observe its fiftieth birthday. The present number, of which 315,000 copies will be circulated, is bright with new pictures in color and contains, besides its usual features, a sketch of "The Messenger's Fifty Years" and a letter of congratulation from the Cardinal Secretary of State who writes in the name of the Holy Father.——Scribner's for December has more of a Catholic aroma about it than is usual nowadays with secular magazines. The author of "Mary Shepherdess," the verses that open the number, sings:

When the heron's in the high wood and the last long furrow's sown,
With the herded cloud before her and and her sea-sweet raiment blown,
Comes Mary, Mary Shepherdess, a-seeking for her own.

Saint James he calls the righteous folk, Saint John he calls the kind,
Saint Peter calls the valiant men all to loose or bind.
But Mary seeks the little souls that are so hard to find. . . .

If I had a little maid to turn my tears away,
If I had a little lad to lead me when I'm gray,
All to Mary Shepherdess they'd fold their hands and pray.

"M. le Curé's Lunch-Party" is a sympathetic study of a French priest, and "Jeanne, the Maid," "The First-Born," and "The Medicine Ship" are good stories, but Edith Wharton's sage remark in "Coming Home" that "Convents do not educate for character" will hardly be accepted as final. The creator of Undine Spragg cannot speak with authority on the shortcomings of Catholic education.

"In Christmas Candles," (Holt, $1.50) Elsie Hobart Carter has given us an excellent collection of twelve short plays with which to fill a night or two of the Christmas holidays. Both the little children and the older are set entertaining their parents and other spectators, and the effects of Christian principles are well brought out. The little ones teach charity, obedience, the joy of a large family, and the wealthy man's duty towards the poor. Perhaps this book contains the very play the Catholic teacher is looking for.——A book like "Great Authors in their Youth," (Holt, $1.25) by Maude Morrison Frank, is very welcome these days, when every effort should be made to bring back to the young reader's table such writers as Dickens, Scott, Thackeray, Stevenson, Tennyson, and Ruskin.

Jeffrey Farnol's "Beltane the Smith" (Little, Brown, $1.35), is just the story we might expect from the author of "The Broad Highway." It has the same delicacy of expression, the same scrupulous care of detail, the same fondness for the things of nature, and the same disregard for ordinary conventions. Beltane is a knight fit for the round table of Arthur, and the story is the record of his struggle to cope with evil and to right wrong and of the searing of his heart and its final healing through a great and pure love. Perhaps it is too long and overladen with incidents; the undertone of lustfulness, although always as a thing to be detested and at last visited with condign punishment, has too great a prominence. It is a book, however, that holds wickedness up to scorn, and in so far is to be praised.——In "These Twain" (Doran, $1.50) the concluding volume of the Clayhanger trilogy, Arnold Bennett describes through 543 leisurely pages the early married life of Edwin and Hilda, which consisted of a succession of quarrels and reconciliations. As this author is most at home when he is writing about the little details, sordid and otherwise, of life in the Five Towns, "These Twain" is a thoroughly characteristic novel.

Those who read years ago Frances Hodgson Burnett's discerning memory of the mind of a child, "The One I Knew the Best of All," (Scribner's, $1.25) will gladly learn that a new edition for which the author has written a foreword has just been issued. If the reader will recall that choice bit of autobiography he will appreciate the peculiar fitness of Mrs. Burnett to write just such a story as "The Lost Prince," (Century, $1.35) her newest work. For the romantic realism of her own childhood's joys and hardships have made her realistically romantic in her charming tale of the Prince of Samavia, who one day left his native country, singing in the morning sunshine. The story of an interesting five hundred years until the day the Prince is restored in the person of one of his descendants is all told with a delicacy of imagination, an appeal to the feelings, a simplicity of language that have become associated with Mrs. Burnett's name. One of her delights must be that she can write stories for the young that only the old can fully understand. Either of the present books should prove an attractive and welcome Christmas gift, either for a child, or for the grown-up who has vivid recollections of childhood's days.

The Catholic Foreign Missionary Society of America, Maryknoll, Ossining, N. Y., has out a new volume of "Field Afar Tales" ($0.60) gathered from that bright little monthly. The two score stories in the book were, for the most part, written by Father John Wakefield, or by "a Teresian of Maryknoll," and bear more or less on the life or vocation of the Catholic missionary. The book with its sixteen interesting pictures, if placed in the proper hands, might make some new aspirants to Maryknoll.——"St. Monica" (Herder, $0.30) is the latest volume to appear of F. A. Forbes' "Standard-Bearers of the Faith" series, former numbers of which have been favorably noticed in AMERICA. The story of the renowned mother who thought she had lost her son forever when he went to Rome, though the issue of that journey was what really restored him to her, is engagingly told by the author, but the little book's three pictures do not illustrate the text very well.

BOOKS RECEIVED

American Publishing Co., Chicago:
Socialism, Feminism, and Suffragism, the Terrible Triplets. By B. V. Hubbard. $1.25.

The Ave Maria, Notre Dame:
The Secret Bequest. By Christian Reid. $1.25.

Benziger Brothers, New York:
The Little Office of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Conformable to the Recent Pontifical Decrees. And the Office of the Dead, in Latin and English. $0.75; The Camp by Copper River. By Rev. Henry S. Spalding, S.J. $0.85; The New Missal in English. By Rev. F. X. Lasance. $1.50 to $3.25.

Gabriel Beauchesne, Paris:
Dictionaire Apologetique de la Foi Catholique. Fascicule XI. Jesuites-Juifs. Quatrième Edition entièrement refondue. Sous la Direction de A. d'Ales.

Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Washington:
For Better Relations with Our Latin American Neighbors: a Journey to South America. By Robert Bacon.

The Cameo Press, New York:
The Cup of Comus: Fact and Fancy. By Madison Cawein.

At The Clarendon Press, Oxford:
Louvain (891-1914). Par L. Noël. Three shillings, six pence.

George H. Doran Co., New York:
Kings, Queens and Pawns. By Mary Roberts Rinehart. $1.50.

Doubleday, Page & Co., Garden City:
The Drama League Series of Plays. Vol. XII. The Trail of the Torch. By Paul Hervieu. Translated by John Alan Haughton; Vol. XIII. A Woman's Way. By Thompson Buchanan. $0.75 each; "The American Books." Cost of Living. By Fabian Franklin. $1.00.

E. P. Dutton & Co., New York:
The Undying Story. By W. Douglas Newton. $1.35; The Log of the Ark. By Noah. $1.00; Aladore. By Henry Newbolt. $1.50.

Duffield & Co., New York:
The Moral Obligation to Be Intelligent. By John Erskine, Ph.D. $1.00.

Diederich-Schaefer Co., Milwaukee:
Max of the North. By Magnus A. Bruce. $1.25.

Harper & Brothers, New York:
Around Old Chester. By Margaret Deland. $1.35.

B. Herder, St. Louis:
The New Pelagianism. By J. Herbert Williams. $0.70; The Life of St. Monica. By F. A. Forbes. $0.30; A Short History of Germany: from the Earliest Times to the Year 1913. By Francis M. Schirp, Ph.D. $1.00; A Study in Socialism. By Benedict Elder. $1.00; Homilies on All the Sunday Gospels of the Ecclesiastical Year. By the Rev. Gaetano Finco. Translated from the Second Italian Edition. By Edmund M. Dunne, D.D. $1.00; Is Schism Lawful? A Study in Primitive Ecclesiology with Special Reference to the Question of Schism. By Rev. Edward Maguire. $1.80; The Roman Index of Forbidden Books. Fourth Edition Enlarged. By Francis S. Betten, S.J. $0.35; The Catholic Faith. By Rev. Ferreol Girardey, C.SS.R. $0.15.

Houghton, Mifflin Co., Boston:
Christianity and Politics. By William Cunningham, D.D., F.B.A. $1.50; Battleground Adventures. The Stories of Dwellers on the Scenes of Conflict in Some of the Most Notable Battles of the Civil War. Collected in Personal Interviews. By Clifton Johnson. $2.00; Reminiscences. By Lyman Abbott. $3.50; India and Its Faiths: A Traveler's Record. By James Bissett Pratt, Ph.D. $4.00; Travels in Alaska. By John Muir. $2.50.

Henry Holt & Co., New York:
Christmas Candles: Plays for Boys and Girls. By Elsie Hobart Carter. $1.50; Great Authors in Their Youth. By Maude Morrison Frank. $1.25.

H. L. Kilner & Co., Philadelphia:
The Little Ambassadors. By Henriette Eugenie Delamare. $0.75.

Longmans, Green & Co., New York:
The Sequel to Catholic Emancipation. (1830-1850.) Vols. I and II. By Rt. Rev. Mgr. Bernard Ward. $6.00; The Book of the Thin Red Line. By Sir Henry Newbolt. $1.50; The Sweet Miracle. By Eca de Queiroz. Translated by Edgar Prestage. $0.40.

The Little Company of Mary, Chicago:
The Path of Mary. Sixth Edition. "Our Lady's Little Library Series."

John Lane Co., New York:
The Dream of Gerontius. By John Henry Cardinal Newman. $1.25.

Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Co., Boston:
Christmas in Legend and Story: A Book for Boys and Girls. Compiled by the Misses Elva S. Smith and Alice I. Hazeltine. $1.50; The Story-Teller. By Maud Lindsay. $1.00.

Moffat, Yard & Co., New York:
Drink and Be Sober. By Vance Thompson. $1.00.

G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York:
Spindrift: Salt from the Ocean of English Prose. Edited by Geoffrey Callender, M.A. $1.00.

Reilly & Britton Co., Chicago:
Darby O'Gill and the Good People. By Herminie Templeton Kavanagh. $1.25.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York:
The Meaning of Education: Contributions to a Philosophy of Education. By Nicholas Murray Butler. $1.50; Fighting France. By Edith Wharton. $1.00.

Frederick A. Stokes Co., New York:
Medieval Italy During a Thousand Years (305-1313). By H. B. Cotterill. $2.50.

Sturgis & Walton Co., New York:
Joyful Star: Indian Stories for Camp Fire Girls. By Emelyn Newcomb Partridge. $1.25.

University of California Press, Berkeley:
Notes sur le Voyage de Chateaubriand en Amérique (Juillet-Décembre, 1791). Par Gilbert Chinard. $0.80.

Joseph F. Wagner Co., New York:
A Manual of Apologetics. By the Rev. F. J. Koch. Translated from the Revised German Edition by A. M. Buchanan, M.A. (London.) Revised and Edited by Rev. Charles Bruehl, D.D. $0.75.

World Book Co., Yonkers-on-Hudson:
Government and Politics of the German Empire. By Fritz-Konrad Kruger, M.A. $1.20.

EDUCATION

Fractious Johnny

ON page 938 of the twenty-seventh volume of his monumental work, "The Child and His Ways" (Braunschweig: Leipzig, 1911), Bunscheider remarks that "the modern school child is fractious." As his best friends must allow, Bunscheider too often speaks in a tone of voice and from a point of view; but in the present instance, the noted scholar has based his conclusion upon a foundation of solid, very solid, fact, laid down with precision in the preceding volumes of his opus magnum. The objectivity of Bunscheider's work has never, to my knowledge, been called in question. As a diligent, discerning seeker and recorder of facts, he has no peer; yet in tracing facts to their origin, it can hardly be said that he has won the success by which his labors in the particular field which he has made his own have been crowned.

A COMMON SENSE DIAGNOSIS

Bunscheider recognizes that this "fractiousness" may be due to many and varied causes; causes that are physical and causes which on psychiatric analysis may be found rooted in a past or present psychogenesis. Rightly, however, does the eminent German enlarge on the futility of seeking, within the remoter psychologic areas the genesis of a fractiousness which obviously hangs upon physical causality. Apart from the fact that strife must form part of the life of every normal child, since every child, by a biologic law, must reproduce the life-history of the race, Bunscheider with a common-sense as rare in the specialist as it is refreshing, insists that the most patent elements of causality are often the last to be noted.

PSYCHIC CAUSES

Thus, for instance, a very common cause of fractiousness may be found in the fact that the pupil is shedding his milk-teeth; a phenomenon often accompanied by a rise in temperature and a corresponding failure to coordinate self and non-self. Again, adenoids, acting directly upon the pneumogastric nerve will set up disorders which may readily and almost unconsciously be translated into the sphere of an outward anti-social conduct. With these canons of common-sense premised, Bunscheider proceeds to place the most frequent cause of fractiousness in school children in "the presence of any psychic constitutional infirmity." After discussing Koch's Psychopathische Minderwertigkeiten and the valuable monograph of Rittershaus Zur psychologischen Differentialdiagnose der einzelnen Epilepsieformen, Bunscheider formulates a description of this condition, which, although he has approached the question from a totally different angle, almost coincides with the description given by Kahlbaum, Bonhoeffer and Healy.

> Psychic constitutional inferiority may be recognized by chronic abnormal social and mental reactions to the ordinary conditions of life on the part of one who cannot be classed in any of the groups of the insanities, neuroses, or mental defectives. The individual generally shows physical anomalies either structural or functional.

"Chronic abnormal social and mental reactions to the ordinary conditions of life." The happy line describes our fractious Johnny, Johnny throwing a spit-ball, Johnny dropping his books with a sharp thud, Johnny in general disorder, to an ultimate eyelash. Truly, in his insistence upon due regard for the physical causality of fractiousness, Bunscheider utters a needed protest against the animistic school whose nebulous vagaries have given an almost fatal turn to many modern discussions of this very practical subject.

TWO NEGLECTED CAUSES

Yet for all his twenty-seven volumes, our learned author has strangely overlooked two factors which, in the United States at least, may be classed as palmary causes of the increase of fractiousness among school children. The first of these factors is "the fool curriculum"; the second is "the fool parent." If the epithet of the second phrase offends, "fond" may be substituted; in modern acceptance, it is a fair synonym. The matter is not weighty; for "the fond parent" shall have no place in this discussion. Space, despite Kant, has limits; we do not care to imitate Bunscheider and his perilous example of twenty-seven volumes. Let us then examine the matter of Johnny and the "fool curriculum" and fractiousness.

Johnny goes to school to work; such at least is the popular presumption, and it is so often verified that it may be considered as an hypothesis, albeit somewhat totty. From this totty hypothesis then, let us draw a few philosophical conclusions. When the performance of what seems an impossible task is imposed under penalty, one of many states of mind (and consequent action) may result. If you are strong enough to defy authority, you laugh and pass on; thus affording the ever-present observer gifted with a genius for the obvious, a heaven-sent opportunity for remarking that here discipline has gone by the board. If you are not strong enough, you will impotently rebel or you will despair, and in either case, you will look about for a handy excuse to shirk. This is what you do, and it is precisely what Johnny-at-school does, for he also is of the genus homo sapiens. Zinkenheimer details other possible states of mind, which may be disregarded. Indeed Zinkenheimer is suspect, being a gross materialist who deals out mind-stuff precisely as he would dispense so many pounds of sausage.

CURRICULUM-MAKERS

Now Johnny's curriculum-makers have proposed, under penalty, what seems to Johnny an impossible task. These learned gentlemen have decided that the school must prepare Johnny, "to take his place in life," and that the process must begin at once. An excellent principle but not easily applied. What do they mean by "prepare"? Is Johnny's mental receptacle to be stuffed like that vacation trunk on which you had to sit before the lid would close? If Johnny refuses to chew this mental pabulum, is he to be fed with a mental stomach-pump like suffragettes on a hunger strike? And what do they mean by "taking his place in life"? Review mentally the tremendous activity, indicative of a thousand trades, avocations and professions, that swirls about Forty-second Street and Broadway or rushes through Chicago's "Loop," and concluding the review, tell me how any school can prophesy, with the accuracy sufficient to warrant a special curriculum, what part Johnny is "fitted" to take in this bedlam?

THE OLD AND THE NEW

Prepare we must; but we must also know what we are preparing for, and what is the process of a rational preparation. Once it was thought that if we taught Johnny to sit up straight and respect his elders; to love God and hate the devil; to form a reasonable acquaintance with Ray's Arithmetic, McGuffey's Readers, the Universal Speller and Mitchell's Geography, we were doing quite well by Johnny. We aimed at making him a man of good principles and a man who would know how to use his mind. We were quite aware that Johnny was dolefully ignorant of shoes and ships and sealing wax, with a quantity of other things. But we also tried to impress upon Johnny the primal fact of his ignorance.

All this is now changed. The curriculum of the high school and even of some grammar schools of today has many points in common with the finding list of an encyclopedia. Plumbing has been added to the list of studies that prepare for life; steam-fitting is a polite accomplishment taught in some communities where labor unions are weak; and Cincinnati, the modern municipal exponent of freak schools, has surpassed her own glorious record by offering to instruct Johnny in the noble art of base-ball umpiring. Nor have subjects and sub-subjects, more directly cultural or informing in content, been allowed to slip through the sieve of the curriculum-maker. The curriculum has changed vastly, in response, no doubt, "to the immense widening and deepening of human interests" as Dr. Eliot used to say.

A MATHEMATICAL CALCULATION

I doubt, however, if Johnny has changed pari passu, if the phrase be allowed, to meet the exigencies of the curriculum. The curriculum was formerly made to develop Johnny; nowadays Johnny is a kind of entity which develops curriculums; another modern change which proves how much better we are than our forebears. Let us treat the matter mathematically. Rating the mental capacity of Johnny of thirty years ago as one pint, let us postulate a teacher, whom for the avoidance of partiality we denominate "X," endeavoring to fill the pint-capacity of Johnny. Let us further admit, that owing to some subtle change in the constitution of the human mind since that time, the mental capacity of a modern Johnny is a pint and a half. Very good. But it seems to me that the amount of learning which the modern curriculum would pour into this pint and a half is comparable to nothing less than the yearly flow over Niagara. I have an idea too, that a pint-pot (or a pint and a half, as in the premises) subjected to this deluge would become somewhat amorphous. So is Johnny's mind when some schools have finished developing their curriculums upon it.

THE OLD COMPLAINT

Where there is a smoke that dims the sun there must be some fire. I have never met a teacher who did not complain, with reason in most cases, that he or she had "too much matter to cover." And the matter must be covered, regardless of results. Lovers of Bulfinch will at once offer the well-known bed of Procrustes as a basis of comparison. But there is something comfortable about the analogy of a bed, and as I own to a truculent mood, I shall instance the rack wherewith our Elizabethan ancestors endeavored to persuade our Catholic ancestors to acknowledge the spiritual supremacy of that most benign and clement monarch. Stretch Johnny on the rack of four or five subjects, and the resultant growl is but a healthy normal reaction. Spin the wheel to the hole of the seventh, eighth, or ninth topic, and Johnny's cries will fracture the welkin. I have a vague suspicion that these figures are becoming somewhat mixed as well as indecorous, but, to carry the thing to the end, it seems to me that after one or two such ultimate stretchings, Johnny will be mentally dead. But if released otherwise than by death, I think that Johnny will shirk the rack when he can, rebel against it always, and, if occasion offers, will change the rack's substantial form by the application of a torch.

THE REMOTE GUILLOTINE

After all, I have followed the immortal Bunscheider in arriving at my conclusion only on page 980 of the twenty-seventh volume. The point I have been trying to expound and expose is the connection between an overcrowded curriculum and Johnny's fractiousness. If an attempt is made to enforce such a curriculum, Johnny's calm of mind will suffer shipwreck. His coordination of self with non-self becomes defective. His mental attitude, as Wassermeier sagely observes, readily and almost unconsciously translates itself into exterior acts of an anti-social character. Briefly, as Bunscheider concludes, Johnny becomes fractious. If the curriculum is not followed, our by-stander, gifted with a genius for the obvious, readily diagnoses the situation. "It is better," elucidates this wight, "to have a few laws well observed than many laws which are not enforced."

So there you are, and there you are likely to remain. O, for a Reign of Terror to cart our curriculum-makers to the guillotine!

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

Heaven on Earth

WHEN a certain minister of St. Louis, whose name has had already more than its share of advertising, waved a fond adieu to his congregation, busy reporters were on hand to snap him in the act. So the recently-reverend gentleman with his hand on his heart and his eye on the cameras, told them in strictest confidence how it all came about. (His confidences covered a full page, Sunday magazine section.) His tone was that of the sphinx solving the riddle of the ages; his solution was couched in platitudes, hoary and venerable with the dust of time. Heterodoxy, one sometimes is forced to think, is horribly unoriginal. He had some truly cutting things to say about the obsolete sulphur baths once promised to unrepentant high-livers. The omission of quotation marks, no doubt, caused Voltaire and Ingersoll a pang of just resentment, but fortunately they were not in a position to charge plagiarism. Orthodoxy, meaning rigid, dogma-bound Methodist-Episcopalianism, was impaled on the once-reverend gentleman's walking stick. It had cramped the departing minister's soul. It had fallen crumbling before the trumpet blasts of science. The victories of science over orthodoxy sound suspiciously like the censored war reports from Senegambia.

And finally he climaxed: "I care not one snap of my fingers to bring men to heaven or save them from hell, so long as I can make this earth more like the former and less like the latter." With that gem fresh dropped from his lips, he hastened on his way to advise St. Louis suffragettes to imitate the tactics of Mrs. Pankhurst.

WHAT DOES GOD KNOW?

Making heaven of earth, despite the eureka tone of the formerly-reverend gentleman, is a feat that antedates in its first attempt the initial experiments in perpetual motion, the quest for the fountain of youth, and the original expedition in search of the golden fleece. Faint recollections of Eden have drawn men of every generation to think that they might succeed in plotting out a neat little terrestrial Paradise of their own, with choice lots selling at so much a front foot. They have plotted and paved and put in electric lights, and for safety's sake, installed a police and fire system; when somehow, the new dwellers in Paradise Subdivision began quarreling among themselves. And the Subdivision suffered an emphatic change of name.

If the original agent of the Subdivision was an unselfish, right-intentioned man, he gripped his aching head in two sweaty palms, and wondered how it all came about. If he was not, the United States Secret Service men were given traveling expenses to Morocco. For invariably these builders of terrestrial heavens, like the last man to take over the contract, begin by discharging anyone who might know anything about planning heavens; and then burn all the books bearing on the subject. What experience has God had building heavens that His advice should be worth consulting? What do prophets and saints for all their raptures into the third heaven, know of twentieth century Paradises, with every modern improvement?

CLEARING THE GROUND

So the Genesis directions on Paradise building, the ten brief rules given to Moses and the eight definite hints offered to prospective builders of abodes of the blessed by Our Saviour on the Mount, are carefully locked away in a library with tractates on astrology, natural histories based on a personal study of dodos and rocs, and treatises on the medicinal properties of gems. Then these prospective plotters of heavens on earth, call in a scientist, a sociologist, a retired college president, a poet and a physician, and what they do not know about heaven building is not to be found in that font of all knowledge, the public library reference room. But this is an exasperatingly topsy-turvy world of ours. The more they plan merely for earth, the less satisfactory earth becomes. They teach men to preserve the race from the ravages of plagues, and men invent race-suicide. The splendid achievements of mechanical genius, while creating a luxury beside which the luxury of the Arabian Nights is unhygienic squalor, bring on a veritable economic war. We bottle up the forces of nature more effectively than Solomon bottled the genie in the fisherman's vase, and they serve to smite down regiments where once fell single soldiers.

Paradoxically enough, it is only by teaching men to gain heaven and avoid hell that earth becomes more like the former and less like the latter. The very things that make us fit citizens of the heaven to come, purity, honesty, charity, make us acceptable citizens of the earth that is. Throw over the hope of heaven and the fear of hell, and paganism is the inevitable result. And paganism is a polite name for selfishness, pessimism, immorality and despair.

BROTHERHOOD OF MAN

For after all, what feature of the bliss of heaven strikes most appealingly upon our souls? Certainly we do not look there for mechanical inventions. Men have never ceased to laugh at Milton for introducing cannon into heaven. Mere knowledge and intellectual gratification does not attract the heart. When we note, sick at soul, the bitterness of man's hatred for his fellow-men, the wars, the labor antagonism, the domestic strife that follow upon man's turning from God, we look up with an insatiable longing for the love that is the dominant virtue of the Saints. It is love, love for God and love for one's fellows among the blessed that alone seems capable of satisfying our affection-craving hearts.

Conscious of this, and desiring to make their heaven more closely counterfeit the genuine, our builders of earthly Paradises talk largely and loosely about the brotherhood of man. That is thunder stolen from Christian forges. No one ever dreamed of brotherly love until Christ taught it as the great means through which, by gaining heaven and avoiding hell, men could make earth more like the former and less like the latter. There has never been but one true brotherhood of men, the brotherhood in Christ. There has been and is community of interest, similarity of tastes, societies purely utilitarian; there is but one Christian brotherhood.

CHARITY AND PHILANTHROPY

Before Christ, brotherly love was swallowed up in a universal slave system that only centuries of Christian charity could finally destroy. Fancy Pericles feeling a brotherly love for the Persian slave that spaded his garden. Fancy Cato, whose cataloguing of slaves with domestic animals and implements is a matter of proverb, going like St. Peter Claver to drag out his life for the salvation of the tribes of Africa whence his grooms were drawn. Philanthropy, which is the modern though inexact synonym for brotherly love, may make me spend my money for my fellow-men, but this is often a matter of prudent foresight; brotherly love alone with its supernatural view of man's dignity and destiny, can make me spend myself. And if mutual love has anything to do with the constitution of the heaven of this last of the Paradise builders, he made a radical mistake when he parted company with Christianity.

THE TEN COMMANDMENTS

Perhaps in the once-reverend gentleman's collegiate days, some professor of antiquities and flippancy smashed to bits in his presence the justly celebrated Mosaic tables of stone. That was an unfortunate beginning for the career of a builder of an earthly heaven. Those tablets contained some delightfully lucid advice on how, by gaining heaven and avoiding hell, one can make earth more like the former and less like the latter. Anyone who has any just appreciation of the temporal consequences of sin, will have a very high esteem for the sociological value of the Ten Commandments.

Suppose instead of dwelling on the mechanical genesis of the labor question, the hitherto-reverend gentleman had expounded to the laborers in his congregation that all-important duty implied in the Seventh Commandment; while he made quite clear to his capitalistic parishioner that in grinding the flesh of his employees, he was guilty in God's sight of theft that cried to Heaven for vengeance. Though he had never hinted at the economic and mutually stimulating influence of cooperation nor spoken energetically on the benefits of arbitration, he would have gone far on the road toward solving for those he could influence the antagonism that is breeding hatred in their hearts.

THE ONLY CODE

For the construction of earthly Paradises, no code of rules ever remotely approached the Ten Commandments. They are more economic than all the labor legislation in the world. They are more sociological than playgrounds or settlements or field workers. The basis of all true human improvement rests on the pithy synopsis made by Our Lord when He told us to love God above all things and our neighbor as ourselves for the love of God. When all the fine-spun theories of modern utopians are sifted, all the gold that assays from their weave will be found to have been mined from Mount Sinai and the hills of Judea.

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Second Annual Convention of the International Federation of Catholic Alumnæ was held in Chicago on November 27, 28, and 29. Representatives were present from every State in the Union and from Canada. With the exception of one article the Constitution, drawn up during the past year, was adopted. The directors, instead of being appointed by the officers, will be elected by vote of the organization itself. There are still some hesitant souls, perhaps, who question the advantages of an Alumnæ Federation. Briefly and in general, the prime advantage is that which results from the union in one organization of the many forces which previously operated alone. The Federation brings together a large number of educated Catholic women; united they form a powerful barrier against the forces which have been marshaled not only against the Catholic Church, but against all religion and morality. The next meeting of the Federation will be held in Baltimore.

The national secretary of the American Federation of Catholic Societies has brought to the notice of the head officials of various railroad companies an abuse said to have been practised by railroad employees including guardians of railroad crossings. Complaints had reached the Federation that slanderous publications against the Church and her priests and religious Orders were being circulated by certain of these employees while on duty. Bundles of such papers are said to have been thrown off near Catholic colleges and institutions. In answer to the Federation's letter requesting that such practices should be discontinued if they existed upon the roads, replies were sent by all the railway companies excepting three: the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern, the Texas and Pacific, and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul lines. In all other cases the companies either affirmed that no such practice existed upon their roads, or that they would make the proper investigations, if not already made, and promptly suppress all distribution of anti-Catholic literature. One company alludes in particular to an offensive sign, written in conspicuous places in the vicinity of stations, upon cars and bridges. It would be difficult, as the company implies, to trace the originators of such abuses who are likely to be "unknown persons."

Word has been received from Rome of three important appointments to vacant Sees in the United States. Right Reverend George W. Mundelein, Auxiliary Bishop of Brooklyn, has been made Archbishop of Chicago, to succeed the late Archbishop Quigley. Bishop Denis J. Dougherty has been transferred from the diocese of Jaro, in the Philippine Islands to the diocese of Buffalo, N. Y., and the Very Rev. Ferdinand Brossart has been appointed Bishop of the diocese of Covington, Ky. Bishop Mundelein was born in New York forty-three years ago. He studied at the Propaganda in Rome and was ordained there in 1895. He was made Chancellor of the Brooklyn diocese in 1898, was elevated to the office of Domestic Prelate by Pope Pius X and later became the recipient of signal distinctions, being the first American honored with membership in the Ancient Academy of the Arcadi. Bishop Dougherty was born in Girardville, Pa., 1865 and studied at the American College at Rome. On his return to the United States he was stationed at St. Charles' Seminary, Overbrook, Pa. In 1903 he was consecrated Bishop of Nueva Segovia and was thence transferred to Jaro in 1908. Very Reverend Ferdinand Brossart was born in Bavaria, in 1849. Two years later his parents emigrated to Cincinnati. He studied at Mt. Saint Mary's Seminary and completed his course at Louvain. In 1888 he was made Vicar General of the diocese of Covington, and rector of the Cathedral. During the vacancy of the episcopal see he acted as Administrator of the diocese.

An account of the splendid work accomplished by the Catholic Church Extension Society during the past decade of years is given in the Tenth Anniversary Number of the Extension Magazine. Within less than fully ten years the Society has helped to build 1,097 chapels in seventy-seven dioceses. The amount generally given in these cases has been $500.00, a sum which was meant to serve at least as a nucleus for a building fund, while the additional few hundred dollars were ordinarily raised by the congregation itself. Larger sums were likewise donated, but all gifts were made exclusively to poor places and to missions in dire need. The generosity of the Faithful has made possible these marvelous results.

> Hundreds of persons have sent in five hundred dollars; some have sent in thousands. One good Catholic woman sent a check for $12,500.00 for the building of twenty-five chapels in the Baker City (Ore.) diocese. . . . One man in the East, in memory of his dead children, has built a number of chapels, besides giving assistance to many schools —chapels and schools totaling sixty-eight. And who will say that such monuments are not more enduring, and more pleasing to God than shafts of marble or columns of granite, or an expensive mausoleum?

Hundreds of applications for similar aid are on file and Catholics have an opportunity to further still more this noble work. The equipment of poor churches, likewise undertaken by the Society, is also a task of the greatest importance. To select only a few instances, the Society has given away 392 altars, 536 chalices, 1,943 sets of vestments, and 459 missals and stands. It has in addition to all this, furnished the country with three chapel cars and two motor chapels, and is at present paying for the education of twenty-four young students who are preparing to take up missionary work after their ordination. The total cash donations received during the fiscal year just closing reached the sum of $332,854.58. The object of the Society is to assist in the upbuilding of the Church in the United States: it has likewise brought help to Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, as connected with our country and has inaugurated a special campaign inspired by the sad conditions in Mexico. Its sphere is the home mission field and it has accomplished wonders within a short time by skilful management no less than by the generous contributions of the Faithful on whom it depends for its support.

A State prison labor board has been created in Pennsylvania to supervise the work of prisoners in State penal and reform institutions. An appropriation of $75,000.00 was set aside under the law for the purchase of machinery and supplies and for the establishment of the new system. Prisoners are to be paid from ten to fifty cents a day. Three-fourths of the earnings go to the dependents of the prisoners. Where there are no dependents all the money is credited to the prisoner, who will receive one-third when discharged, one-third three months later, and one-third six months later. The supplies are to be sold only to State institutions. The arrangement seems to meet with the approval of organized labor, which hopes that this plan will be extended, "thereby solving the convict labor problem." The office of the State prison labor board will be in Philadelphia.

The centenary celebrations of the birth of the Venerable Dom Bosco still continue. The zeal of the saintly man first displayed itself in the teaching of catechism to boys. Soon there followed the establishment by him in Italy and elsewhere of festival oratories, day and evening schools, homes for poor children, schools of arts and trades, churches, institutions for emigrants and missions for the conversion of the heathen. He is the Founder of the Society of St. Francis of Sales or the Salesian Fathers, of the Institute of the Sisters of Mary Help of Christians and of the Association of Salesian Cooperators who assist by prayers and alms in all the undertakings of the Salesians. Rome thus recounts the work accomplished by them in North and South America within the short space of forty years:

> In Buenos Aires the Salesians have over 5,000 pupils and eight public churches in their two huge parishes of over 200,000 souls. In the Argentine there are 46 Salesian colleges, with public churches attached, containing over 15,000 pupils. Uruguay, Paraguay, Brazil, Chili, Bolivia, Peru, Ecuador, Colombia, Venezuela, Panama, Costa Rica, San Salvador, Mexico and the United States have witnessed their fruitful work. There are 360 institutions of Salesians and 250 Institutes of the Sisters of Mary Help of Christians across the seas, mainly occupied with work for emigrants. There are churches, oratories for festivals, elementary schools, secondary and professional schools, containing 100,000 boy pupils and 80,000 girls. There are 20 printing offices, 25 farm colonies, 200 clubs for old pupils, 120 secretariates for immigration, 80 committees of direction, and for the future of the work 30 novitiates and training schools for new directors and teachers. Salesian cooperators in all these works number over 200,000. And this in 40 years!

In 1903 the Salesians opened their first college in the United States with the principal object of fostering vocations for the priesthood. It is now located at Hawthorne, N. Y. There are Salesian establishments in New York City, Paterson, N. J., Port Chester, N. Y., Philadelphia and Ramsey, N. J.

This is an Ameba, one of the Parasites found in Pyorrhea (Riggs Disease) Magnified 2500 Diameters.

Thousands Have Pyorrhea

(Riggs Disease)

and Don't Know It Till Their Teeth Have to be Pulled

Symptoms that may be Pyorrhea: Bleeding gums after brushing; loose teeth; receding, tender, inflamed or sore gums.

PYORRHEA may attack anyone, even children. It develops in your gums without ache, pain or warning.

Sozodont now contains Emetine, that new beneficent discovery, used by the science of dentistry in the treatment of Pyorrhea. Therefore Sozodont not only cleans, whitens, polishes, cools and freshens your teeth as it has done for 64 years, but Sozodont now Fights Pyorrhea.

Start your whole family on Sozodont today. Send 4c for a generous 10-day sample of Sozodont paste, powder or liquid (state which), and feel again that pure, vigorous, "arctic" sensation on your gums and teeth—which only Sozodont can give.

HALL & RUCKEL
216 Washington Street New York

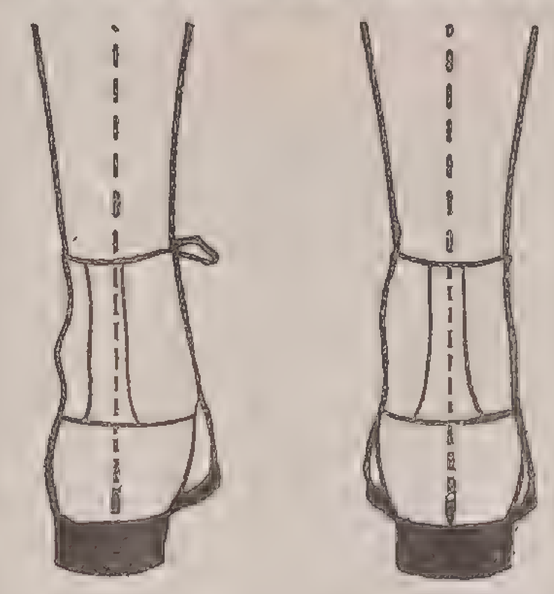
SOZODONT

Paste, Powder or Liquid, 25c.

Each contains Emetine

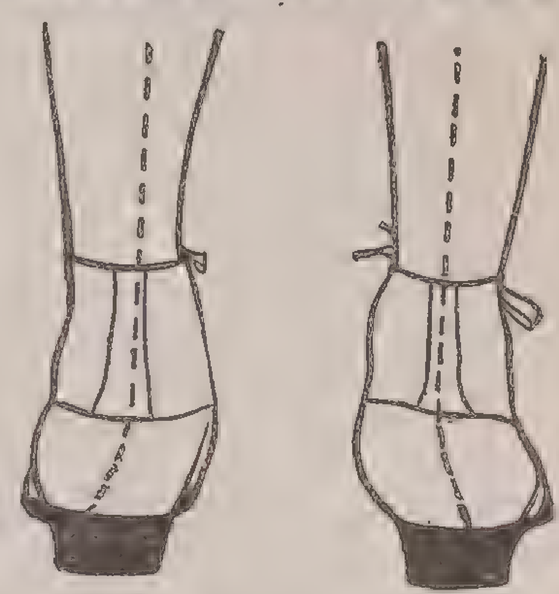
The Right Christmas Gift

COLLECTED POEMS OF Condé B. Pallen



"There is something anthem-like and monumental about our poet's verse; it is more than the light playing on the wings of fancy; it is thought made ductile in the fire of imagination and wrought into shapes of beauty and things of joy."

Am. Ecclesiastical Review.



$1.25 net. Postpaid $1.38

P. J. KENEDY & SONS
44 Barclay Street New York City

WATCH YOUR CHILD'S FEET

Sagging ankle and arch properly supported by Coward Arch Support Shoe.

Sagging ankle and arch without support of the Coward Arch Support Shoe.

The Coward Shoe

"REG. U. S. PAT. OFF"

Foot troubles usually begin young. Every mother should see that her child wears proper shoes.

The Coward Shoe for children trains the child's feet to be natural, healthy and symmetrical. It gives helpful support to the arch and ankle and prevents foot troubles.

Sold Nowhere Else

James S. Coward

264-274 Greenwich Street, New York
(Near Warren Street)

Mail Orders Filled Send for Catalog

FOR XMAS - A PEACE CALENDAR

"A unique and extraordinary piece of work—a 'Peace Calendar and Diary for 1916.'" A practical desk-memoranda calendar, 744 pages on fine-quality paper. On each of 366 pages is a pungent thought on peace by some illustrious Man or Woman. On each facing page is the date and space for the day's memoranda. Price, postpaid, $1.00. Every Peace Calendar distributed will be a daily reminder of the crime and folly of war, and will help promote the cause of peace.

10 per cent. discount to the clergy.

Address J. J. MULLOWNEY, Paxtang, Penna.

Sacred Heart Sanitarium

For Non-Contagious Medical Cases

St. Mary's Hill

For Nervous, Mental and Drug Cases
Address Dr. Stack or Sister Superior
Milwaukee, Wis., for literature

FINE ARTS

Beautiful New Mezzotints and Etchings, Suitable for Holiday Gifts

FRAMING AND RESTORING OF PAINTINGS

C. KLACKNER

7 West 28th Street

Between Broadway and Fifth Avenue

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER" AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week 59 East 83d Street, New York City

Telephones
261 Worth
262 Worth
263 Worth

W. S. DOUGLASS & CO.

RECEIVERS AND DISTRIBUTORS OF HIGH GRADE

Butter, Cheese, Eggs, Lard and Oleomargarine

137 READE ST., NEW YORK

BETWEEN GREENWICH AND HUDSON STREETS.

Special Attention to Hotel, Club, Restaurant, Steamship and Institution Trade a Specialty.

CHRISTMAS BOOK OFFER

OFFER I: AMERICA, The National Catholic Weekly, 5 Yearly Subscriptions $10.00, with Presentation Card to your friend. The best gift is the one that brings the greatest happiness and largest share of good cheer. It is a XMAS to XMAS remembrance that renews the Xmas cheer each week. It lasts longer than any gift and means more.

OFFER II: Pioneer Priests of North America, 3 volumes, by Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J. Pioneer Laymen of North America, 2 volumes, by Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
Isaac Jogues, Discoverer of Lake George, by Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
The Names of God, by Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J.
Loretto, Annals of the Century, by Anna C. Minogue
Socialism, Ten Excellent Essays by Foremost Catholic Writers
Life and Letters of Henry Van Rensselaer, S.J., by Rev. E. P. Spillane, S.J.
The Church and Social Problems, by Rev. Joseph Husslein, S.J.
Venerable Mother Duchesne, by a Religious of the Sacred Heart
What Shall I Be? By Rev. Francis Cassilly, S.J.
Shall I Be A Daily Communicant? By Rev. Francis Cassilly, S.J.
The Catholic Reader's Guide, by Rev. J. Havens Richards, S.J.
Bound Volume of AMERICA. Any one Volume from Vol. 1 to Vol. 13, excepting VOLUME 2, out of print.

One set of these excellent and instructive books, cloth bound, 16 in all, would cost $15.40, but we offer them as CHRISTMAS BOOKS for the month of DECEMBER, all 16, for $12.00
Average cost per volume 92c.

OFFER III: Pioneer Priests of North America — Pioneer Laymen of North America
Among the Iroquois, Vol. 1 — Volume 1
Among the Hurons, Vol. 2 — Volume 2
Among the Algonquins, Vol. 3
Regular price of these 5 Volumes $8.00
Special Xmas price $7.25

OFFER IV: The Names of God, by Father Campbell, S.J.
The Church and Social Problems, by Father Husslein, S.J.
Socialism, by Foremost Catholic Writers
Regular price $2.00
Special Xmas price 1.00

OFFER V: The Names of God — Mother Duchesne
Socialism — Isaac Jogues, Leatherette edition
Loretto — Henry Van Rensselaer
Regular price $2.75
Special Xmas price 1.50

OFFER VI: Loretto — The Names of God
Mother Duchesne — What Shall I Be?
Regular price $1.50
Special Xmas price .75

OFFER VII: Father Campbell's Books:
Pioneer Priests of North America, 3 Volumes
Pioneer Laymen of North America 2 Volumes
The Names of God — Isaac Jogues, edition de luxe
Regular price for 7 Volumes $9.50
Special Xmas price 8.00

OFFER VIII: Bound Volumes of AMERICA, 12 Volumes
Volume 1 to 13, excepting Volume 2, out of print
Regular price $24.00
Special Xmas price 18.00

OFFER IX: Isaac Jogues, green silk cloth — What Shall I Be? paper
Shall I Be a Daily Communicant? paper — The Catholic Reader's Guide [paper]
Regular price 80c.
Special Xmas price 60c.

OFFER X: ONE YEAR Subscription to AMERICA
ONE YEAR Subscription to CATHOLIC MIND
Regular price $4.00
Special Xmas price 3.25
This Offer refers to NEW Subscriptions only.

Take advantage of these offers to present valuable, useful and timely books at a reasonable cost for Christmas-tide. Specify by number the offer you desire. Carriage extra.

THE AMERICA PRESS

59 EAST 83rd STREET — NEW YORK CITY, N. Y.

Monsignor Robert Hugh BENSON

died a year ago, October 19th, 1914, but his Memorial is not yet completed. England has given 3,500 dollars, but is crippled by the war.

WILL AMERICA HELP?

Especially his New York friends? His Perpetual Memorial is to be the Completion and Endowment of his "parish Church" at Buntingford.

Please send a donation now to the "Mgr. Benson Memorial Fund," c/o Lloyds' Bank, 33 Belgrave Road, London, England. Booklet with pictures of R. H. B. sent to all subscribers.

The Cardinal-Archbishop of Westminster blesses the appeal.

Send an Anniversary donation.

5% First Mortgage Notes

Executed and signed by the Catholic Bishop of Chicago,

By Very Reverend M. J. FitzSimmons,

Administrator

Catholic Church Property in Chicago

This ideal investment is a direct obligation of the Catholic Bishop of Chicago and these Notes are secured by First Mortgage on certain pieces of property in Chicago and further secured by all the church property of the Archdiocese of Chicago.

Denominations of $500 and $1000

Maturing in one to ten years. Maturing interest coupons and principal Notes may be deposited in your own bank for collection or forwarded direct to us. This investment is just as safe in every essential detail as placing your money in the best managed savings banks in this country.

Redeemable at Face Value

If you wish to convert these Notes into cash, we will redeem them at face value, charging only a small sum for doing so.

Any Banker in Chicago will tell you that these Notes are desirable and also can acquaint you with our standing.

Not Affected by War Conditions

Cannot be weakened in value by periods of business depression, war conditions abroad or other causes that have lessened the market value of a great quantity of industrial and railroad securities.

Send to-day for full information, details, etc. We will be pleased to submit a full description of the Notes. Send the coupon.

CREMIN & O'CONNOR

105 N. Clark Street
Dept. 7404
Chicago Ill.

COUPON

Cremin & O'Connor,
105 N. Clark St., Dept. 7404
Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen: Please send me full information, details, etc., concerning these First Mortgage Notes.

*Name*_____

*Address*_____

THE BEST PRESENT IS A GOOD BOOK

Published Nov. 22nd

Thoughts of Soeur Thérèse

Selected from the writings of "The Little Flower of Jesus," by an Irish Carmelite. 16mo. Attractively printed and bound, with three photogravures. Cloth. 60c. net. (Postpaid, 66c.) Flexible leather, gilt top, boxed. $1.00 net. (Postpaid, $1.10.)

The selections will be considered the essence of the writings of this beautiful character who has expressed her faith and love of God in simple and delightful sentences.

Chaff and Wheat

A Few Gentle Flailings. By Francis P. Donnelly, S.J. 16mo. Cloth. 60c. net. (Postpaid, 66c.)

This companion to "Mustard Seed" sparkles with stimulating spiritual tonics and delightful literary epigrams.

The Red Circle

By Gerald A. Reynolds. 12mo. Cloth. 75c.

A dramatic story of the Boxer uprising in China, excellently written, and giving a vivid picture of heroic missionary life.

Sermons:

Doctrinal and Moral. By Rt. Rev. Monsignor Thaddeus Hogan, M.R. 8vo. Cloth. $1.50 net (Postpaid, $1.70.)

Fundamental Catholic truths are presented with clear, convincing logic, and in simple, beautiful language in these scholarly and practical discourses.

The Burden of Honor

By Christine Faber. 12mo. Cloth. 75c.

One of the author's best stories—the plot well conceived, the action abundant, character drawing forceful, and the religious tone uniformly adequate.

Men, Not Angels

By Katharine Tynan. 12mo. Cloth, illustrated. $1.10 net. (Postpaid, $1.20.)

Twelve excellent short stories that make enjoyable reading, for the versatile author introduces us to a variety of winsome characters, and her themes are sweet and ennobling.

The Goddess of Ghosts

By C. C. Martindale, S.J. 12mo. Cloth. $1.00 net. (Postpaid, $1.10.)

Stories and sketches from the Greek classics, with an occasional curious interweaving of modern life. Readers will find everywhere grace, charm, fancy and, of course, learning in rich abundance.

Collected Poems

By Condé B. Pallen. 12mo. Superbly printed on fine paper, uncut edges, and handsomely bound in boards. $1.25 net. (Postpaid, $1.38.)

Mr. Pallen's place in literature is a distinguished one, the due meed of his achievements. A sound critical sense finding expression in a facile style.

Published Dec. 6th

The Life of Father De Smet, S.J.

By E. Laveille, S.J. Authorized translation by Marian Lindsay. Introduction by Charles Coppens, S.J. 8vo. Cloth, gilt top, illustrated, boxed, $2.75 net. (Postpaid, $2.95.)

The most important Catholic contribution to American history that has been published in a decade. An intensely interesting and valuable work.

Strength of Will

By E. Boyd Barrett, S.J. 12mo. Cloth. $1.25 net. (Postpaid, $1.38.) Contents: General Notions about Will-Training; Religion and Will-Training; Things About the Will; The Awakening of the Will; Three Introspections of Will-Contests; The Will and the Intellect; The Sick-Will; Causes of Will-Maladies; Methods of Will-Training; A New Method Explained; The Technique of the New Method; A Tentative Scheme of Exercises; The Will and Habit; The Will and Sensuality; Further Facts About the Will.

These papers will not only interest the teacher and the student but everyone will find here practical guidance in the formation of character.

Moondyne Joe

By John Boyle O'Reilly. 12mo. Cloth. 75c.

A thrilling tale of bravery and adventure during the days of the penal camps in Australia.

A Primer of Peace and War

The Principles of International Morality. Edited by C. Plater, S.J., M.A. 16mo. Cloth. 80c net. (Postpaid, 86c.)

This is the only work in English which surveys the entire field of international relationship from the Catholic standpoint, and establishes, on the basis of Christian tradition, the whole morality of the mutual dealings of Sovereign States, in times both of War and Peace.

The War and the Prophets

Notes on certain popular predictions current in this latter age. By Herbert Thurston, S.J. 12mo. Cloth. $1.00 net. (Postpaid, $1.10.)

The historico-critical ability of the Rev. Herbert Thurston, S.J., has a fine field for exercise in "The War and the Prophets" in which the author examines certain popular predictions of these latter times, with special reference to their fulfilment in the present war.

Poems

By Mgr. Benson. 16mo. Cloth, gilt top. 75c. net. (Postpaid, 80c.)

The poems are largely auto-biographical, and show the writer's profound faith and earnest sincerity of purpose. There is something strongly inspiring in the intimate cry of some of the verses, which give expression to the soul of one who lived and suffered and was not afraid to die.

Send for Free Catalogue of Catholic Books

P. J. KENEDY & SONS, 44 Barclay Street, New York

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

5 Cents Each
40 Cents a Dozen

Published at a nominal price, on the eighth and twenty-second of the month, the CATHOLIC MIND pamphlets supply to the militant Catholic the most effective weapons with which to meet the threatening issues of the day. There are several important articles on some current question in each number. In handy form these tracts for the times can be kept for frequent reading and reference.

FOR YOUR BOOK RACK $3.00 PER HUNDRED

5 Cents Each
40 Cents a Dozen

Woman Suffrage
Should Catholic Women Vote?

The much debated question of extending the franchise to women still agitates the community. Those opposed to the idea, as well as those who favor it, will find much interesting material in the six papers on "Woman Suffrage" by Mrs. Martha Moore Avery, and the answer to the query "Should Catholic Women Vote?" that make up the contents of the CATHOLIC MIND for December 8. The destructive social results of Feminism are forcefully presented.

Since June, 1914, 210,000 Copies of the CATHOLIC MIND have been circulated. We want you to help us to double that number before another year passes.

THE FOLLOWING ARTICLES ARE STILL OBTAINABLE:

1908

13. Mr. Birrell's University Bill.
19. Genius of Cardinal Wiseman. — Wilfrid Ward

1909

1. Lord Kelvin and the Existence of God. — H. V. Gill, S.J.
3. Primary Education in France.

1910

4, 5, 6, 8. Catholic Missions. I, II, III, V. — Hilarion Gil
11, 12, 13. Calistus III and Halley's Comet. I, II, III.
17. Holy Communion for Children
19. The Holy Eucharist in Early Canada. — T. J. Campbell, S.J.
20, 21. Pius X on Recent Manifestations of Modernism.

1911

11, 12. Cardinal Gibbons' Jubilee.
14. Protests of Pius X and Bishops of Portugal.
17. English Economics and Catholic Ethics. — Michael Maher, S.J.
18. Catholicism at Home and Abroad.
20, 21. Scotland in Penal Days. — His Eminence Francis Aidan Cardinal Gasquet
23, 24. The Sacred College of Cardinals. — Henry J. Swift, S.J.

1912

4. Doctor Lingard. — John Gerard, S.J.
6, 7. Horrors of Portuguese Prisons.
11, 12. Marist Missions in the Pacific. II, III. — Rt. Rev. John J. Grimes, S.M. Bishop of Christ Church
17. The People's Pope. — M. Kenny, S.J.
24. Father Algué's Barocyclonometer. — New York Tribune, Dec. 1912

1913

5. Capital Punishment. — Rev. John J. Ford, S.J.

1914

5. Liberty of Conscience. — Rt. Rev. John E. Gunn, D.D.
14. Tercentenary of St. Teresa.
15. Freemasonry and Catholicism in America. — M. Kenny, S.J.
19. Justice to Mexico.
21. The Needy Family and Institutions. — R. H. Tierney, S.J.
22. The Architect's Plan. — John A. Cotter, S.J.
23. Mexican Liberalism. — A. de P.
24. First Encyclical of Benedict XV.

1915

1. The Catholic Press. — E. Hull, S.J.
2. The "Menace" and the Mails. — Paul Bakewell
3. The Ethics of War. — Edward Masterson, S.J.
4. Sixty Historical "Don'ts." — James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.B.
5. The Jesuit Myth. — Robert Swickerath, S.J.
6. Fifty "Don'ts" of Science. — James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D.
   Catholics in the Y. M. C. A. — Nelson Hume
7. Catholic Sociology. — Richard H. Tierney, S.J.
   Newman's Alleged "Scurrility" — Paul Bakewell
8. Was Shakespeare a Catholic? — James J. Walsh, M. D., Ph.D.
9. The Church and the Mexican Revolution. — By a Mexican Lawyer
10. Dante's 650th Birthday. — James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D., Litt.D.
    How to Reach the Medieval Mind. — Vincent McNabb, O.P.
11. Magna Charta's Centenary. — P. Guilday, Ph. D.
12. The Church and the Sex Problem. — Richard H. Tierney, S.J.
13. The War's Lesson. — Rt. Rev. Thomas O'Dwyer, D.D.
14. Catholic Schools for Catholic Youth. — Most Rev. John Ireland, D.D.
15. Temperance Against Prohibition. — Henry Maurice
16. The Papacy. — His Eminence Cardinal Mercier
17. The Church and the Immigrant. — Rt. Rev. Francis C. Kelley, D.D.
18. The Contemporary Drama. — James J. Daly, S.J.
19. The Catholic School. — William D. Guthrie
20. The Educative Influence of the Catholic Press. — Richard H. Tierney, S.J.
21. The Church and Peace. — Most Rev. E. J. Hanna, D.D.
22. Mexico's Social Problem. — By a Mexican Lawyer

Special Rates: Pamphlets for 1908-1911, inclusive, $1.00 per hundred; for 1912-14, inclusive, $2.00 per hundred; for 1915, $3.00 per hundred.

THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 EAST 83d STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

I enclose herewith $1.00 for one year's subscription to THE CATHOLIC MIND.

Name..... Street.....

City..... State.....

OR

MANS PLACE IN VISIBLE CREATION

A Splendid Christmas Gift

SECOND EDITION

"Father Houck's book deserves a wide circulation."—The Fortnightly Review.

"An excellent little book."—The Outlook.

"The book should be found in every private and public library."—Federation Bulletin.

"This book is very likely to effect a world of good."—Catholic Book News.

"'Our Palace Wonderful' is, on the whole, well written, well made, and neatly adorned."—American Ecclesiastical Review.

"Father Houck weaves together into a pleasant narrative the great thoughts of all times."—Catholic Educational Review.

"The book pursues the 'argument from design' and embodies a charmingly clear condensation of scientific and natural knowledge."—Scientific American Supplement.

"'Our Palace Wonderful' is timely, the style lucid, and the exposition logical."—The Josephinum Weekly.

PRICE $1.25. TO PRIESTS AND RELIGIOUS, 1.00. Postage 10 cents extra.

To be had from all booksellers. Also from

REV. F. A. HOUCK, 1120 Horace Street, Toledo, Ohio

TINDALE MUSIC CABINETS

An Ideal Christmas Present

An ideal Christmas present. Music kept so that you can find any piece instantly, the music held straight and orderly and protected from damage. Sizes holding 200 to 1,200 pieces or more. Oak or Mahogany—handsome pieces of furniture. Send for book of styles No. 100. Used in many Catholic Schools throughout the country.

Also, Tindale Cabinets for Talking Machine Records; a separate container for each record, records found easily and quickly, records protected from scratches, no albums, no mechanism; a simple device that will serve you perfectly and give satisfaction.

TINDALE CABINET CO., 8 East 34th St., NEW YORK

Burnham & Morrill Fish Flakes

10c—Sizes—15c
(Except in Far West)

THE firm, white meat of freshly caught cod and haddock—cooked and mildly salted—packed in parchment-lined tins—ready for instant use, without boning, picking or soaking. No waste—no spoilage. Very economical—most convenient. B. & M. Fish Flakes make delicious

Codfish Balls Fish Hash
Fish Soufflé Fish Chowder

For breakfast or lunch, just try

Creamed Codfish

on toast.

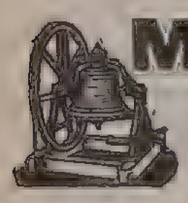
Many other appetizing dishes easily made, with little time and no bother—with B. & M. Fish Flakes, the new and better kind of codfish.

Sold by most grocers. If not at yours, send his name and 10c. for regular size tin. Our recipe booklet "Good Eating" free for the asking.

Burnham & Morrill Co.
12 Water Street, Portland, Me.

THE FRANK MEANY CO. PRINTERS Inc.

Magazines Catalogues
Periodicals Booklets
Programmes



216-220 West 18th Street, New York
Near 7th Avenue

Books Make the Best Presents!

BOOKSELLERS TO THE WORLD

Any book herein mentioned can be obtained from

BRENTANO'S
Fifth Avenue New York

MENEELY & CO.
Watervliet (West Troy), N. Y.
Chimes, Peals, Church, School and other Bells. Unequalled musical quality.
89 years' experience
Highest Grade Genuine Bell Metal. Memorials,

MENEELY BELL CO.
TROY, N.Y. AND
177 BROADWAY, N.Y. CITY
BELLS

Sarony

PHOTOGRAPHER

for 49 years patronized by the Clergy, who receive a special discount.

364 Fifth Ave. (Near 34th St.)
NEW YORK

THE FALLACIES OF A.P.A.-ISM

Now running monthly in

BRANN'S ICONOCLAST

Every lover of Truth, every hater of Bigotry, should read this great series of articles by Editor C. A. Windle. He is the man whose reply to Tom Watson's attack upon the Catholic Church attracted world-wide attention.

If you miss these articles, you miss the strongest arguments against A. P. A.ism ever published.

Subscription $1.00 a year. Single copies ten cents. Newsdealers can obtain copies with return privileges.

BRANN'S ICONOCLAST
1171 Transportation Building CHICAGO, ILL

ATLAS OF IRELAND

Coats of Arms of 700 Families. Write for free list and see if you are entitled to

Heraldic Honors

P. Murphy & Son, 279 Church St., N. Y.

Please write to Advertisers and mention AMERICA

FOR CHRISTMAS GIVING

A New Historical Study by
REV. T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J.

Pioneer Laymen of North America

Telling the fascinating story of the adventurous Cartier, Menendez, Champlain, De La Tour, Maisonneuve, Le Moyne, Radission, Le Moyne de Longueuil, Perrot, Le Moyne d'Iberville, Frontenac, La Salle, Le Moyne de Bienville, De La Vérendrye, and Dr. John McLoughlin.

Volume I
300 Pages 16 Illustrations
Price $1.75 Postage extra

Volume II
340 Pages 14 Illustrations
Price $1.75 Postage extra

THESE TWO SPLENDID VOLUMES
For $3.00 Postage Extra

BY THE SAME AUTHOR
The Popular History of Pioneer Priests of North America

Among The Iroquois

STORY OF THE MISSIONARIES AMONG THE IROQUOIS
333 Pages 27 Illustrations
$1.50 Postage extra

Among the Hurons

TELLS THE HEROIC RECORDS OF DE BRÉBEUF AND HIS ASSOCIATES
480 Pages 24 Illustrations
$1.50 Postage extra

Among the Algonquins

THE ETHNIC GROUP THAT FIGURED MORE EXTENSIVELY IN OUR HISTORY THAN ANY OTHER INDIAN FAMILIES
336 Pages 22 Illustrations
$1.50 Postage extra

THESE THREE SPLENDID VOLUMES
For $4.25 Postage Extra

The set is handsomely bound in pale green and gold, profusely illustrated, and has over 1,000 pages.

SPECIAL
The above Five Volumes
For $7.25 Postage Extra

The America Press
59 East 83d Street, New York

Schools and Colleges

NAZARETH ACADEMY, Nazareth, Kentucky

Conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, and the University of Kentucky
Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

Seton Hill Schools

St. Joseph Academy for Girls

GREENSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA
On main line P. R. R., 30 miles from Pittsburgh
Elementary and High School Courses. University affiliation.
Two years' advanced Course for High School Graduates.
Conservatories of Music and Art.
Domestic Science. Gymnasium. Field Sports.
Address Department E

St. Mary's Annex for Small Boys

College of Saint Teresa

Standard Degree Courses in Arts, Science, Music. Vocational Elective Courses in Music, Art and Home Economics. Catalogue and course announcements mailed on application.

Winona, Minn

Carlton Academy

UPPER SCHOOL for older boys gives thorough preparation for all colleges. Individual attention. Commercial Courses. Athletic Sports. Resident Chaplain.

LOWER SCHOOL for younger boys, with Housemother to give personal care.

SUMMIT Charles H. Schultz. A.M.,
New Jersey Headmaster.

Mount de Sales
Academy of the Visitation

CATONSVILLE (NEAR BALTIMORE) MARYLAND
Ideal School for Young Ladies

Classic, Literary and Scientific Courses. French and German receive special attention. Departments of Music, Art and Elocution. Magnificent situation.

Ask for Illustrated Catalogue

An Opportunity for Schools and Colleges

For advertising rates, address "MANAGER"
AMERICA, a Catholic Review of the Week
59 East 83d Street, New York City

3,000 PASTORS

have OUR SUNDAY VISITOR distributed either at the church door, or through the school, or through the officers of Catholic societies.

We send bundles of OUR SUNDAY VISITOR to every corner of the United States, to Porto Rico, the Panama Zone, to the Philippines, India, to England, Ireland, Australia and South Africa.

Ours is the POPULAR National Weekly. A Penny Paper

It is not a newspaper, and therefore does not trespass on the field of the Diocesan weeklies. Its aim is to instruct in a popular way, to undo the influence of anti-Catholic propaganda, and to hold up the Catholic Church favorably to the non-Catholic.

OUR SUNDAY VISITOR readers become enthusiastic Catholics; they are made at the very low cost of 50 cents a year

SUBSCRIPTIONS POSTPAID

Single Subscriptions 50 cents the year; bundle orders 68 cents per 100

OUR SUNDAY VISITOR
Huntington, Indiana

Schools and Colleges

Schools and Colleges

MARYMOUNT

Tarrytown-on-Hudson, New York

HIGH CLASS SCHOOL FOR YOUNG LADIES

Conducted by the

Religious of the Sacred Heart of Mary

Magnificently situated on the Hudson, 40 minutes from New York City.

PREPARATORY, ACADEMIC AND TWO YEARS' COLLEGIATE COURSES

European Advantages. French Conversation with Native Teachers. Gymnasium, Physical Culture, Tennis, Skating, Riding.

For Catalogue Address The Reverend Mother

Mount St. Joseph Collegiate Institute

For Girls and Young Ladies

Charmingly situated on the romantic Wissahickon. Elementary—Intermediate—Commercial—College Preparatory. Collegiate Classes for Academic Graduates. Special Courses in Art, Music and Domestic Science. Gymnasium under expert instructor. Campus forty-five acres. Department for little boys. Classes for Day Pupils.

Chestnut Hill Fifty-Fourth Year—Send for Catalogue Philadelphia, Pa.

IMMACULATA SEMINARY

MOUNT MARIAN, WASHINGTON, D. C.

High-class school for young women and girls. Situated in the Suburbs.

Conducted by the Sisters of Providence of Saint Mary-of-the-Woods

Abundant out-door exercise in beautiful suburban grounds; individual attention to character training; happy home life; thorough scholarship.

SPECIAL TWO-YEAR COURSE of COLLEGE work for high school graduates.

FULL PREPARATORY and ELECTIVE courses.

MUSIC, ART, EXPRESSION and domestic science.

All the advantages of the National Capital and sightseeing, with experienced chaperones.

For Illustrated Year Book Address

SISTER SECRETARY, DEP'T. F.

NEWMAN SCHOOL

HACKENSACK, N. J.

A College-preparatory

BOARDING SCHOOL

FOR SIXTY BOYS

Small Classes
Individual Attention
Resident Chaplain

FIFTEENTH YEAR

VERY REV. S. W. FAY, S.T.D.
Rector.

Georgetown University

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Pioneer Jesuit University

The College (Graduates and Undergraduates Schools)
The Dean, Georgetown University

The School of Medicine
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The Training School for Nurses
Georgetown University Hospital

The School of Dentistry
The Dean, 920 H St., N. W.

The School of Law
The Dean, 506 E. St., N. W

The Astronomical Observatory
The Director, Georgetown University

The Seismic Observatories
The Director, Georgetown University

Rev. Alphonsus J. Donlon, S.J., Pres.

Mt. St. Joseph's College

IRVINGTON, BALTIMORE, MD.

Courses in Classics, Sciences and Commerce, under able professors. Special facilities for Pre-Medical Students. Certificates Recognized.

Splendid health location. Spacious buildings. Extensive campus. Gymnasium. Outdoor swimming pool. Physical as well as mental training.

For Catalogue and particulars, address:

BROTHER DIRECTOR

HOLY CROSS COLLEGE WORCESTER MASS.

Conducted by the Jesuit Fathers

LARGEST CATHOLIC COLLEGE IN AMERICA

Extensive grounds and exceedingly healthy location. New buildings, large gymnasium, indoor running track, hot and cold baths, modern conveniences. Easily reached on main line from Albany or New York to Boston via Springfield. Board, tuition, washing and mending, use of gymnasium, library and reading room, physical instruction and medical attendance, $280 a year. Furnished room and attendance extra.

Send for catalogue . . . . . Prefect of Studies.

Academy of Saint Joseph

IN-THE-PINES

Brentwood, N. Y.

Boarding School for Young Ladies, affiliated with the State University

PREPARATORY COLLEGIATE

Academic and Elementary departments in Separate buildings

Special courses in art, vocal and instrumental music

A large fireproof building, recently constructed, affords accommodation for 150 extra students. Address MOTHER SUPERIOR

SAINT MARY-OF-THE-WOODS

For Women . . . College and Academy . . . . For Girls

Affiliated to the Catholic University

Departments of Arts and Sciences—Four-Year Course leading to degrees A.B. and B.S.
Department of Household Economics—Courses leading to the degree B.S. Elective courses offered to all college students.
Conservatory of Music—Teachers' and Artists' Certificate Courses.
School of Expression—Teachers' Certificate Courses. Various elective courses open to all students.
School of Art—Drawing, water color, oil, keramics. Certificates issued.
Academy—Full Four-Year High School Course and Grammar Department.
75th Year. A School of Four Generations.
Students from twenty-five States. Twelve modern buildings. New College Hall, Gymnasium, Natatorium, etc. Abundant out-door exercise. 40-acre golf course. Bulletins and illustrated booklets will be sent upon request.

Address Sister Secretary, Box 70, SAINT MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, INDIANA

ST. FRANCIS XAVIER

COLLEGE and ACADEMY

Sisters of Mercy

4928 XAVIER PARK, CHICAGO, ILL.

The first Catholic College for women in Chicago—chartered 1912. Freshman class only in September, 1915.

Write for Prospectus

Life is too short for reading inferior books—Bryce.

Books are nothing, but a GOOD BOOK IS EVERYTHING

An ideal present to yourself or others—to mind and heart—is a good book. The Devin-Adair imprint is restricted absolutely to works of unusual merit—a fact attested by thousands of readers the world over.

Yourself and the Neighbours

By Seumas MacManus

This new book, MacManus' best by far, is redolent of Ireland, its love and laughter, its poetry, pathos and romance. The author has put into these pages the priest and the schoolmaster, the tinker and the tailor, the lovable, the quaint, and the humorous Neighbours—all limned with the pen of love. We here witness the courting and the match-making, the wedding and the wake—we share the happiness of the fireside, the fun of the dance, and the frolic of the fair. It is a book whose freshness and joyfulness may lighten many a heavy heart.

Archbishop Prendergast: "It is the most delightful book of its kind I ever read, and it should be in the home of every one of our race the world over."

Archbishop Ireland: "It is wonderfully beautiful, both in sentiment and in diction."

James Whitcomb Riley: "I read it with avidity, as I read every line of MacManus."

Hudson Maxim: "MacManus is a genius. He makes Irish lore and memory live again. I like this book immensely."

President, Notre Dame University, Rev. John Cavanaugh: "It is the noblest and most beautiful book ever written about Ireland."

Ella Wheeler Wilcox: "It is delightful—full of the best MacManus charm."

David Belasco: "It's delightful. I smiled and laughed and gulped, 'all in one breath.'"

Chief Justice of Canada, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick: "It gave me a key to the mystical, the tragic, the charming, in Irish nature."

Price $1.25: Postpaid $1.40

Foreword by Henry Garrity

"My Unknown Chum" (Aguecheek)

"Unquestionably the Best Book in the English Language."

Fulfills to the letter the Roseberry definition of a good book—to furnish information---literature---recreation

The World War adds to the charm of this remarkable book. Once read "My Unknown Chum" will be your Chum.

"I cannot too strongly express the pleasure and companionship I found in this excellent book It is all that is claimed for it—even more. It is not only a companion but a friend."

This is what Governor Walsh of Massachusetts writes about "My Unknown Chum." No book ever issued has brought forth so many expressions of appreciation from prominent personages as this remarkable volume.

Cardinal Gasquet:
"I have read 'MY UNKNOWN CHUM' with the greatest possible pleasure. The account of one of our Benedictine Fathers at Douai is most interesting. I wonder who it can have been?"

Canon Sheehan, Author of "My New Curate," Etc.:
"I have read it with great interest. You deserve the thanks of the reading public for this book."

Price $1.50; Postpaid $1.65

GOVERNOR DAVID I. WALSH

T. A. DALY, the well-known poet, in The Standard and Times (Philadelphia):

"To Mr. Garrity personally the reading public is indebted for an achievement worthy of general applause—the offering of a handsome book, 'MY UNKNOWN CHUM—Aguecheek.' It is a lovable book. We heartily commend 'MY UNKNOWN CHUM' to young and old."

Dr. J. C. MONAGHAN, the widely known Lecturer and Educator:

"Almost from the first to the last page it seemed as if some one had said what I have been wanting to say for a long, long time. When I get a good book I read it more than once, and this is one of the books that I want to read again and again. It is one of the most wholesome, one of the most fascinating books—the best book of the kind I have ever seen, and should be selling as fast as hot cakes at a country fair."

Rt. Rev. Monsignor CHARLES A. CASSIDY, Traveler and Lecturer on Art and Literature:

"I could read it a hundred times. It is a great book. Its fine humor, its depth, its simplicity and high ideals commend it to all, especially the highly educated—the scholar."

"The most difficult of all tasks is to think."—Emerson.

Do you fail in clearness of thought and of expression, especially in conversation?

Do you want to give straight to the point advice to your children, your friends, your employees and YOURSELF?

Do you as host, hostess or guest, want a spur to cleverness of thought, wit and repartee?

Do you want a companion for the home, the office, the Rectory, the Convent—a travel chum, too—that will respond to your every mood—serious, humorous, wise, witty?

THEN READ

"Keystones of Thought"

By Austin O'Malley, M.D., Ph.D., LL.D.

Special gift book edition, in suede leather, full gold edges; a very useful ornament for drawing room, den or social correspondence desk. Delivered to any address in the world for $1.90. Cloth binding, $1.00; postpaid $1.15.

25 Years Reminiscences

By Katharine Tynan

This "Notable Book" is Strikingly Opportune Because of Home Rule Status and Present Conditions in Ireland and England.

No book of recent years given so much space and praise by the leading literary papers of the world.

History, Autobiography, Anecdote and delightful tales of celebrities by the master poet-novelist who knew intimately most of the prominent men and women of an interesting and eventful period—Redmond, Lord Russell, Parnell, Gladstone, Father Russell, Lady Wilde, Oscar Wilde, T. D. Sullivan, Louise Imogen Guiney, John Boyle O'Reilly, The Rossettis, The Meynells and many others. Fifty pictures of World Notables. Photogravure frontispiece from the painting by J. B. Yeats, R.H.A., in the Dublin Art Gallery.

Price $3.50; postpaid $3.65

Order by letter, post card, telegram or phone. Remit by money order, express or check. On request we will send any or all books direct to your friends with your Christmas Greeting or message written in book. We guarantee delivery to all parts of the world. If your bookseller isn't supplied order from us.

THE DEVIN-ADAIR CO., Publishers, 437 Fifth Ave., New York, U. S. A.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIV, No. 10
WHOLE No. 349

DECEMBER 18, 1915

PRICE, 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE

Home News: The President's Message. The War: Bulletin, Dec. 7, p. m.-Dec. 14, a. m.—Montenegro — Southern Serbia — Other Items. Germany: Peace Discussion in Reichstag. Great Britain: Recruiting. Ireland: The Irish Party and War Problems. Mexico: Religion and Morality 217-220

TOPICS OF INTEREST

For Christmas Day — XLIV–The Young Man and Farming—Capital Punishment and Moral Order—Mexico's Plight—Invention and Progress 221-227

COMMUNICATIONS

Rational Athletics — Woman Suffrage — Mr. Moore and Transubstantiation—The Open Shop —Mr. Moore and Anglican Claims—The Celt and Politics.....227-229

EDITORIALS

The Bond of Peace—The Angel of Riverside Drive—Additions to the "White List"—Treated Like a Dog!—The Supreme Preparedness—Caught at Last!.....230-232

LITERATURE

The Makers of Images.

REVIEWS: Pioneer Laymen of North America—The Sequel to Catholic Emancipation—The Famous Cities of Ireland—The Collected Poems of Rupert Brooke—The Wondrous Childhood of the Mother of God—The Social Principle—How to Live.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: "The Dream of Gerontius" —Five Christmas Books—"Heroes and Heroines of Fiction"—"Around Old Chester"—Some Very Recent Books—"The Book of Musical Knowledge"—"The Camp by Copper River"—"Joyful Star" — "The Little Ambassadors" — Court Life from Within"—A Batch of Books for the Young—"The Book of the Thin Red Line"—A Christmas Ballad.....232-237

EDUCATION

School-Discipline and the "Fond Parent." 237, 238

ECONOMICS

The Jobless Man.....239

NOTE AND COMMENT

The New York Alien Labor Law Valid—A Union of Sodalities—Imports and Exports—Monument to French and German Heroes—Usury in National Banks—The Real Jail Problem—Discord in the Coming Luther Celebration. 239, 240

CHRONICLE

Home News.—The important event of the week was the opening of the sixty-fourth Congress, which took place on December 7. President Wilson, addressing a joint session, read a comparatively short but an extremely important message. His chief theme was "the thorough preparation of the nation to care for its own security and to make sure of entire freedom to play the impartial rôle in this hemisphere and in the world." In discussing phases of this preparedness, the President developed the Monroe Doctrine into a Pan-Americanism, which is a "unity among the nations of this hemisphere in their purpose to make a common cause of national independence." This appears to be different from the Monroe Doctrine in that the United States no longer considers itself sole guardian of the other American republics, but only a member of a "full and honorable association, as of partners, between ourselves and our neighbors in the interests of America, North and South." Mr. Wilson then reviewed the plans of the War Department, which contemplate an increase of the standing force of the regular army from its present strength of 5,023 officers and 102,985 enlisted men of all services to a strength of 7,136 officers and 134,707 enlisted men, or 141,843 all told, all services, rank and file, by the addition of fifty-two companies of coast artillery, fifteen companies of engineers, ten regiments of infantry, four regiments of field artillery and four aero squadrons, besides 750 officers required for a great variety of extra service, especially the all-important duty of training the citizen force of which I shall presently speak, 792 non-commissioned officers for service in drill, recruiting and the like, and the necessary quota of enlisted men for the Quartermaster Corps, the Hospital Corps, the Ordnance Department and other similar auxiliary services. By way of making the country ready to assert some part of its real power promptly and upon a larger scale, should occasion arise, the plan also contemplates supplementing the army by a force of 400,000 disciplined citizens, raised in increments of 133,000 a year throughout a period of three years.

The President's Message

Passing to the Navy, the President announced that the new naval program contemplates the construction within five years of ten battleships, six battle cruisers, ten scout cruisers, fifty destroyers, fifteen fleet submarines, eighty-five coast submarines, four gunboats, one hospital ship, two ammunition ships, two fuel-oil ships and one repair ship. It is proposed that of this number we shall the first year provide for the construction of two battleships, two battle cruisers, three scout cruisers, fifteen destroyers, five fleet submarines, twenty-five coast submarines, two gunboats and one hospital ship; the second year, two battleships, one scout cruiser, ten destroyers, four fleet submarines, fifteen coast submarines, one gunboat and one fuel-oil ship; the third year, two battleships, one battle cruiser, two scout cruisers, five destroyers, two fleet submarines and fifteen coast submarines; the fourth year, two battleships, two battle cruisers, two scout cruisers, ten destroyers, two fleet submarines, fifteen coast submarines, one ammunition ship and one fuel-oil ship, and the fifth year, two battleships, one battle cruiser, two scout cruisers, ten destroyers, two fleet submarines, fifteen coast submarines, one gunboat, one ammunition ship and one repair ship.

The Secretary of the Navy is asking also for the immediate addition to the personnel of the Navy of 7,500 sailors, 2,500 apprentice seamen and 1,500 marines. This increase would be sufficient to care for the ships which are to be completed within the fiscal year 1917 and also for the number of men which must be put in training to man the ships which will be completed early in 1918. It is also necessary that the number of midshipmen at the Naval Academy at Annapolis should be increased by at least 300 in order that the force of officers should be more rapidly added to; and authority is asked to appoint, for engineering duties only, approved graduates of engineering colleges, and for service in the aviation corps a certain number of men taken from civil life.

If this full program should be carried out we should have built or building in 1921, according to the estimates of survival and standards of classification followed by the general board of the department an effective navy consisting of twenty-seven battleships of the first line, six battle cruisers, twenty-five battleships of the second line, ten armored cruisers, thirteen scout cruisers, five first-class cruisers, three second-class cruisers, ten third-class cruisers, 108 destroyers, eighteen fleet submarines, 157 coast submarines, six monitors, twenty gunboats, four supply ships, fifteen fuel-oil ships, four transports, three tenders to torpedo vessels, eight vessels of special types and two ammunition ships.

Other items discussed were: the Mexican policy; legislation for the Philippines and Porto Rico; the shipping interests of the country; the financial program outlined not long since by Secretary McAdoo; naturalized citizens "who have poured the poison of disloyalty into the very arteries of our national life"; coordination between the Government and industries for defense purpose; industrial education on lines parallel with the work of the national Agricultural Department; a joint commission of Congress to investigate railroad regulation with a view to legislation improving conditions under which the railroads now operate. In discussing the additional revenues required to carry out the program of preparedness the President states that it is the "plain counsel of prudence to continue all of the present taxes or their equivalents, and confine ourselves to the problem of providing $112,000,000 of new revenue." The new bills, he thinks, should be paid by internal taxation. The scope of the income tax should be enlarged, a tax of one cent per gallon on gasoline and naphtha would yield at the present estimated production $10,000,000 a year; a tax of fifty cents per horsepower on automobiles and internal explosion engines, $15,000,000; a stamp tax on bank checks, probably $18,000,000; a tax of twenty-five cents per ton on pig iron, $10,000,000; a tax of twenty-five cents per ton on fabricated iron and steel, probably, $10,000,000.

Other Items

The opinion of the press on the message is much too lengthy and varied for adequate notice.

The War.—There have been only minor actions in Belgium and France, with slight gains by the British and French in Artois, and some little advantage obtained by the Germans in Champagne. From the eastern front nothing of importance is reported by either side. Along the Isonzo the Austrians have successfully blocked all attempts of the Italians to better their positions. At the Dardanelles and in Persia there have been no developments. The Russian army along the Rumanian border has shown no activity whatever.

Bulletin: Dec. 7, p. m.-Dec. 14, a. m.

In northwestern Montenegro the Austrians have advanced south of Plevlje, and have defeated the Montenegrins both north and east of Berane; further south they have also taken Ipek from the combined Montenegrin and Serbian forces, and are now pursuing them west of that city. The Bulgarians have captured Djakova.

Montenegro

Pushing west from Krusevo and Monastir, the Bulgarians have occupied Dibra, Struga, Ochrida and Resna, although they did not succeed in cutting off the Serbian retreat from Monastir. The failure of the Serbians, who are now in Albania, to effect a juncture with the French left wing necessitated the withdrawal of the French from the Cerna. This move together with violent pressure from both sides of the Vardar on the French salient at Krivolak and Kavadar resulted in the retirement of the French to Demir Kapu, and afterwards when the Bulgarians had driven them from this town also, to positions along the northern bank of the Bojimia. At the same time the Bulgarians have been violently attacking the whole Anglo-French line along the Vardar, and have taken, according to German official reports, both Doiran and Ghevgeli. It is not expected that the Allies will be able to hold their present positions, and it seems inevitable that before long they will have evacuated all Serbian territory.

Southern Serbia

The German Government has acquiesced in the demand made by Secretary Lansing for the recall of the two attachés whose activities rendered them no longer acceptable to this Government. Dissatisfied with the procrastination of Austria in the matter of the sinking of the Ancona, and further incensed by the attacks made on two American oil tankers in the Mediterranean, the United States Government has forwarded to Vienna a strong note demanding satisfaction. After rehearsing what Mr. Lansing accepts as the facts in the case, the note characterizes the act of the commander in torpedoing the Ancona before the persons on board had been put in a place of safety or even given sufficient time to leave the vessel as "wanton slaughter of defenseless noncombatants." The most significant paragraph is the following:

Other Items

As the good relations of the two countries must rest upon a common regard for law and humanity, the Government of the United States cannot be expected to do otherwise than to demand that the Imperial and Royal Government denounce the sinking of the Ancona as an illegal and indefensible act, that the officer who perpetrated the deed be punished and that reparation by the payment of an indemnity be made for the citizens of the United States who were killed or injured by the attack on the vessel.

The note ends with an expression of belief that the Austro-Hungarian Government will accede to the "demand" of the United States, and will not "sanction or defend an act which is condemned by the world as inhumane and barbarous, which is abhorrent to all civilized nations and which has caused the death of innocent American citizens."

Germany.—The attitude of the German Government towards the conclusion of peace was clearly defined in the Reichstag's session of December 9, described by the Peace Discussion in Reichstag

Berlin press as "one of the greatest in German history." Germany, said the Imperial Chancellor, is not fighting to subjugate other nations. Her war has from the first been a war of defense for the protection of her life and liberty. Peace can therefore be possible only on terms that will give "human certitude that the war will not return."

As long as in the countries of our enemies the guilt and ignorance of statesmen are entangled with confusion of public opinion, it would be folly for Germany to make proposals which would not shorten but lengthen the duration of the war. First the masks must be torn from their faces. At present they speak of a war of annihilation against us. We have to consider this fact, that theoretical arguments for peace or proposals for peace will not advance us; they will not bring the end nearer. If our enemies make peace proposals compatible with Germany's dignity and safety, then we shall always be ready to discuss them. Fully conscious of our unshaken military successes, we decline the responsibility for the continuation of the misery which now fills Europe and the whole world.

The "pretext" that the enemies of Germany are waging war for the protection of small countries had lost force, he said, since the recent events in Greece. "Small countries are in a severe plight, since England is fighting for them." The time, he thought, had come when it would be opportune for Germany's enemies to make overtures of peace: "after the successes which we have gained against Serbia, after opening the road towards our Turkish ally, and after threatening the most vulnerable points of the British Empire." Yet no such overtures had been made. Germany's foodstuffs, the Chancellor continued, suffice. "The great economic unit stretching from Arras into Mesopotamia cannot be crushed." The more her enemies "continue the war with bitterness, the more will Germany need guarantees to insure her future position." The Chancellor's speech was greeted with vigorous applause. In approval of it, Dr. Spahn, the leader of the Center Party, said:

Though our enemies pledge themselves anew to persistence in the war we await in complete unity, with calm determination and confidence in God, the hour which will make possible peace negotiations whereby the military, economic, financial, and political interests of Germany will be permanently assured to the most complete extent and by all measures, including such extensions of territory as are necessary for this purpose.

The Socialist spokesman, Landsberg, agreed with the Chancellor that safe guarantees for Germany's security, and against the repetition of the present conflict, were conditional to peace, and asserted that the Socialists would never consent to a peace involving the surrender of Alsace-Lorraine. "If Germany's opponents," he declares, "do not desire peace because they insist upon the destruction of Germany's defensive force and the annexation of German territory, they must learn that the Socialist appeal for peace was based on no anxiety about the outcome of the war." Nothing, he added, could increase the courage of the German soldiers more than to know that the responsibility for a further continuance of the war rested with their opponents. The Chancellor, said the Socialist spokesman, designated the occupied territories as "redemption pledges," and pledges are given back. The argument that Germany is not aiming at annexation, as her enemies state, made even the Socialist party caucus decide in favor of the Government's attitude in spite of some dissenting voices.

Great Britain.—By the time these lines are in print, Lord Derby's voluntary enlistment plan will have proved a complete failure, or else will have taken its place as a permanent part of England's war machinery. Originally planned to end on November 30, a first extension carried it over to December 11, a second to December 15. In an official announcement providing the first extension, the following statement was made:

Recruiting

It should be understood clearly by every available man, especially single men, at present unattested, that the opportunity offered carries with it an equal responsibility to present himself today or tomorrow, and so add to the volume of evidence now presented to other nations, allied, hostile, and neutral, that the determination of the country is resolute to prosecute the war to a victorious conclusion.

This appeal seems to have awakened the expected sense of "responsibility." The recruiting during the three days preceding December 11 equaled, it is reported, the recruiting of the preceding three weeks; the second extension, in fact, was made necessary because the offices in London and other cities could not properly register the crowds that presented themselves. Many, however, who registered will never see active service. The War Office will exclude those who are engaged in Government work, or who are considered indispensable in the munition factories, in the mines, railroads, and for the conduct of business. Others, and possibly a large proportion, will be barred on further examination by the medical officers. The exact number of recruits has not been made known; but the trade union leaders declare that the success of Lord Derby's scheme does away with all apprehension of conscription. The last general census gave the number of men between the ages of eighteen and forty in England, Scotland, and Wales, as 8,100,000, nearly half of whom are single. It is generally understood that about 3,000,000 entered the service before Lord Derby's plan was adopted, and the claim is now made that between eighty and ninety per cent of the remainder have presented themselves. This would mean that seven out of every eight Britons have volunteered, which the agitation for conscription shows to be absurd.

Ireland.—Members of the Irish Party still continue to protest against the enactment of conscription. Recently Mr. Dillon declared against it twice, once at Mary-borough and a second time at the County Cavan Convention. On the latter occasion he renewed his famous declaration that "no Government will attempt to put conscription in force in this country." Recalling the Prime Minister's admission that conscription would be impossible without general assent, he said:

The Irish Party and War Problems

> In Ireland the overwhelming majority are irreconcilably opposed to conscription, compulsion, or coercion in any shape or form, and, therefore, the preliminary condition laid down by the Prime Minister does not exist, and any attempt on the part of the Government to enforce conscription in Ireland would, first of all, kill recruiting; and secondly, involve the country in scenes of turmoil and bloodshed, the consequences of which are horrible to contemplate.

Mr. Devlin denounces compulsion because "it would endanger national unity and arouse bitter feelings among all classes of the people," and Mr. Dillon > is particularly anxious to make it clear that we are not seeking to make any bargain for the exemption of Ireland from conscription. We are opposed to conscription in any part of Great Britain or Ireland. . . . Whatever may be the result in England, and I feel confident that there will be no conscription, in Ireland the situation is outside the limits of controversy. We are a separate nation, and our separate nationality has been recognized by the Prime Minister, by the Legislature, and by the King.

New Ireland believes that the Irish Party has completely established its position, but has serious doubts that Ireland can send any more men to the front, conscription or no conscription. The paper remarks that if the "new recruiting campaign does not succeed in collecting 50,000 men, the army will have to continue without their assistance," for whatever the outcome of the war, "the future upbuilding of the Irish nation is the supreme task which those who live in Ireland must bear in mind." New Ireland discusses statistics in relation to the war, stating: "that the total of 250,000 who are either with the forces or have attempted to join . . . must be approximately correct." This leaves at the most 600,000 available men at home; of these 430,000 are farmers or farmers' sons, or agricultural laborers. Neglecting the agricultural class there are some 170,000 to be accounted for. Of these there are at least 100,000 who cannot be spared from present occupations, viz: police, civil servants, clergy, 17,500; men engaged in transit and shipping, 17,500; skilled workers in indispensable industries, 49,000; coal-heavers, navvies, etc., 11,000, making in all 95,000, while "other classes too small for separate mention in the aggregate amount to many thousands." This leaves 70,000 men unplaced. Numbers of these have found temporary employment in England and Scotland, there are over 9,000 lunatics, approximately 4,500 invalids, temporary or permanent, so that the number available for future enlistment is extremely small.

Despite this, last month, the recruiting authorities demanded 10,000 men at once, and 1,100 men a week in December. Such papers as the Irish Weekly Independent, The Weekly Freeman, New Ireland, and The National Volunteer are in accord with the Irish Party. On the other hand the remarkably clever and patriotic Leader says:

> There is no alternative Party at present, and so all we can do is remain disgusted with the Party that lost its opportunity and went on the run when the great crisis came last year. And Mr. Devlin and Mr. Dillon may take it from us that the country is pretty well sick of the Party.

All this will give our readers a good idea of Ireland's present attitude regarding the recruiting question.

Mexico.—Official acts are rapid in unfortunate Mexico, and most of them are adverse to religion and morality. A summary of recent events will make this clear. On November 5 the de facto Government executed three pastors in the Federal District, for alleged sympathy with Zapata. Authentic news comes from the city of Leon that the new Carranzista Governor, one Doctor Siurob from Queretaro, is showing the meaning of the religious freedom promised on October 8, 1915. In Queretaro this man banished priests, burned confessionals in public places, and held a ball in a church. All these acts, except the burning of the confessionals, he repeated in eight different places, the last being Leon. Church goods have been confiscated in that city, the parish church has been closed and armed sentinels are posted at the doors. The teachers of Leon have protested against the Carranzista program, but without avail. In his recent visit to Ciudad Victoria, in Tamaulipas, Carranza heard that the leaders of the city had held a bazaar to obtain money for an organ for the Cathedral. Forthwith out of a desire "to guarantee individual freedom of worship according to every one's conscience," the First Chief ordered that the money be used for "civic purposes," not for the contemplated organ. Recently the ladies of Monterey petitioned Carranza that the decree against confession be revoked. He refused the request. The pastor of Cuidad Camargo, relying on the promise of religious freedom, returned to his parish, rang the church bell for Mass, and was immediately sentenced by the commandant to hard labor on the public works. In Hermosillo the seminary, with all its contents, has been confiscated and the students dispersed. In Michoachan priests are forbidden to own property and one official has issued an order that a blanket form part of their dress. Further down in the country a commandant has decreed that priests shall marry and spend eight hours a day in "official work." This last expression apparently refers to work assinged them by State officials. In Tlaxcala, Catholic education is forbidden, and the full exercise of religion has been made impossible. Carranza's divorce decree, the most infamous among civilized people, is in operation despite the provision of the Constitution forbidding divorce. Palavicini, Minister of Public Instruction, recently divorced his wife and was married to another woman by a judge.

Religion and Morality

TOPICS OF INTEREST

For Christmas Day

CARDINAL NEWMAN in that perfect sermon, "Omnipotence in Bonds," has toward its close an arresting reflection. He has been describing the infinite attributes of God and enumerating the more striking conditions and limitations to which God subjected Himself in the Incarnation. He confesses that the contrast between God in His Divine nature, infinite, all-powerful, everlasting, and God in His freely assumed human nature, in the womb of the Blessed Virgin, in swaddling clothes, in filial subjection to Mary and Joseph, in the cruel hands of the Jewish officials, in the tomb, and in the consecrated Host, is a contrast that many may find staggering to faith. "For me," he continues, "I can only say that its effect upon myself lies just in the very opposite direction, and, awful as it is, it does but suggest matter, as for adoration, so for faith also. What human teacher could thus open for us an insight into the infinitude of the Divine counsels? Eye of man hath not seen the face of God; and the heart of man could never have conceived or invented so wonderful a manifestation, as the Gospel contains, of His ineffable, overwhelming attributes. I believe the Infinite condescension of the Highest to be true, because it has been imagined."

It is true, apologists of the Church do not emphasize this argument of Christian evidence. Perhaps it is too subtle for the weak eyes of unbelief. But for any one, who has pored over the history and life of mankind and has formed definite conclusions of human limitations, Newman's thought, as I have here reproduced it, must be fortifying to our faith. And if we are impressed by the thought that the history of our Redemption must be true simply because it has been "imagined," the impression deepens when we descend to details, and nowhere perhaps grows so much in strength as when we dwell on the story of Christ's birth.

In the first place, who could have imagined that God, the infinite, the everlasting, loved us with a love so surpassingly delicate and tender and intense that the combined mother-love of all time is only a weak and broken image of it? Homer, Plato, Sophocles, Vergil, what have these rare masters of truth and honesty ever uttered in their most exalted moments that might lead us to entertain the notion that the soul of man at its best and highest could imagine such an overwhelming fact? Greek genius fills us with reverential respect for the capacities of the human intellect; but its noblest achievement falls pitifully short of conveying even remotely the expectation that it could ever, on its own wings, soar to the outer edges of the Divine mystery of love. Before any man could think of the infinitely tender love of God for us, it had to be Divinely revealed. Only God Himself could launch such a mystery upon the world.

And then think of the Divine problems of which the first Christmas morn gave us our earliest intimation in giving to us its infinitely sweet solution! How was the Almighty and Eternal to show His creatures in a visible and convincing and humanly tender fashion that He loved them beyond the power of their minds or their speech to express but faintly? Fancy that problem flung wherever human minds and human imaginations were boldest and strongest and finest. Plato, if he were a thousand times Plato, could never, in the wildest flight of his genius, have had the dimmest inkling of the simple and touching story which is read in the Gospel of the Christmas Mass. This had to happen before it could be imagined by man. It had to find lodgment among earthly realities before the human mind could discover it in the realm of possible things. That we can imagine it at all is conclusive proof that it has actually come to pass. We give " thanks to Thee, Holy Lord, Father Almighty, Everlasting God, because by the mystery of the Word made Flesh a new ray of Thy glory has shone upon the eyes of our minds; that, while we know our God visibly, we may by Him be drawn to the love of things invisible."

The Christmas mystery, as it stands in the Divine plan of Redemption, is the uttermost finite expression of infinite love and infinite beauty. The extreme capacity of created and visible signs and symbols was exhausted, as no creature could exhaust it, to signify God's love for us. Only the Divine Master could thus use the materials of His creation to pour the Infinite into terms of human comprehension. He is a pitiful judge of spiritual values who can not detect unmistakable traces of the Divine daring of God's hand in the beautiful picture of that first Christmas night in Bethlehem.

And what is the clear message of that picture? God loves us, and He yearns for our love. How incredible, if He Himself had not said it! And how inspiriting in the loneliness and amid the fugitive shadows of time! The winds and snows of the centuries leave that picture and that message resplendent and unfading. Countless generations have knelt before the Crib, with the shepherds and the kings, to draw life for their souls, consolation for their griefs, strength for their temptations, hope for their despairs, and love for one another, from the Divine Babe nestling in His Blessed Mother's arms. It is even so today where pride has not hardened the heart and passion has not blinded the vision of the soul.

Of a certainty we ought to be glad on Christmas Day. And, by God's grace, we are glad. But there is a sadness, too. It is the sadness of beauty in excess, akin to the sadness which brings tears to the eyes at the loveliness of an evening sky, of a magical landscape of fields and trees and waters, of a glorious autumnal woodland. It is the exquisite sadness of glad meetings, not of sorrowful partings. For the heart is weak and feeble to bear the burden of great joy. We suffer the pain of defeated desire. An ocean of beauty! And the soul can only sip from it! The heart strives bravely to enfold the torrents of delight which swept the Angels out of heaven down to the midnight hills of Bethlehem, and it can only sip a little sweetness here and there. And the anguish of its own smallness in the presence of Infinite Love and Infinite Loveliness makes joy itself a struggle and a trial.

But it is a blessed struggle and a sweet trial, and the sadness of it has no kinship with sorrow. For we know the heart can be expanded to receive larger and larger draughts of beauty by reason of that Divine principle of life within us, which we call the supernatural life of grace, growing in capacity and power with every good act, to be lost only by sin, to be changed at the last into the very light of God's glory, in which we shall see and enjoy the Divine Lover of our soul face to face forever.

JAMES J. DALY, S.J.

XLIV—The Young Man and Farming

IN this day of sensational writing, country life has not escaped. Many articles appear in conspicuous places in leading papers pointing out to the retiring city man and the nature-inspired city boy the opportunities, financial success, and enjoyment of pleasant environment on the farm.

At the outset, we should clearly recognize that a large part of this advice is of little value. In fact, the road to success in farming is not easy to travel. On all sides are difficulties which try the fiber of men. At one time it is excessive rain, at another time excessive drought, at still another it is the depredation of insects and the toll exacted by pernicious plant and animal diseases. If indeed these obstacles are overcome, the farmer has to meet organization on the part of those who handle his produce, which in some particular lines means a combination in restraint of trade which depresses his prices almost to the limit of non-profit.

There is no idea more misleading than that which the consumer often entertains regarding profits, based on what he pays for farm products in the city. Acting on this misconception, many consumers have left the city to engage in the production of farm produce, only to find that the tables are completely turned, and that probably not more than one-third of the consumer's dollar, often not even that much, goes to the producer. Therefore, the city man going into farming should make sure that he will engage in the raising of produce which will bring him the largest net return for his labor. Then, too, there is a great deal of idle talking about the freedom on the farm. While the farmer is not held to a time clock as is the city workmen, yet in many instances he is held to the equally exacting time clock of the farm, which requires him to put in long hours regularly.

I speak of these difficulties not because I think the city man may not succeed at farming, but because he should realize the many obstacles that he confronts and should act accordingly. A full recognition of these difficulties ought to prevent many city men from leaving good positions to engage in that for which they are not fitted. The obstacles will only encourage those city men who have a real fitness for farming, and have what Professor Bailey calls "farm-mindedness."

But there are real opportunities for those city men and boys who wish to face the stern realities of the farm. I am speaking now to the city people because, of course, the farm boys know the situation themselves. There are in our cities many people with a real love for the out-of-doors life, who are just as much at a loss in the city as is the city-minded man in the country. Such a man should make every endeavor to get out of doors where he may enjoy plants and animals, but unless he is supplied with unlimited funds, he must make sure to engage in some lucrative phase of farming if his enjoyment is to continue.

In the East when we speak of farming, we mean ordinarily, farming on a comparatively small scale, the owning or operating of seventy-five to 150 acres of land, with an investment of from $5,000 to $15,000. Successful work on a farm like this, or even on a small poultry or fruit farm requires exacting attention to details, and this attention may not be delegated. The owner, in the main, must see to a large number of matters himself, and he must be particularly vigilant during the growing season. This constant attention is sometimes drudgery that wears down many producers, but without it there is no success.

On a well-managed farm there is plenty of manual labor that must be done, and the owner should expect to do a considerable part of it himself. Farming, as a rule, will not pay a man who merely oversees and does not work with his hands, so our prospective city man going into the country must be willing to labor. But if he likes the out-of-doors life, will give attention to details, and will work reasonably hard, the outlook is hopeful. He will in the first place make a very good living, and a profit ranging from five to fifteen per cent on his investment.

Probably one of the strongest advantages to be noted in farming is the opportunity it gives a person to grow old in the business. The sad feature of so much city life is that a city man is often out of place and just as often out of work after he reaches an age where more skill or speed may be secured from younger hands. In farming there is need of the ripe judgment of old age, and there is every opportunity for helpful and remunerative labor on the farm from aged hands.

So far I have been speaking of general farming, but I would not have the reader think that opportunities are to be found in general farming alone. There is a demand for good butter-makers, cheese-makers, stockmen, horsemen, both market and flower gardeners, and then there is always the place of foreman on the large farms which are run either for profit or for pleasure. The raising of small fruits and poultry makes an appeal to the city man which should receive his careful attention, but he should take up such callings only after securing a rather thorough training.

In taking up farming it is not necessary that a place should be purchased outright. In many instances it is much better to rent a farm. In this way there is not so much risk involved and oftentimes a larger percentage may be secured on one's investment than where an outright purchase is made. Renting may be either according to the cash or share system. For the beginner it is preferable to work under the share system. After one has rented a farm for a while and saved some money, preferably through long-term leases, that is, for more than one year, the renter may then look about for a place which he may make his own.

In the ownership of the farm, there comes that sense of proprietorship and independence for which perhaps our city man has been looking for a long time. It is not necessary that he pay the full amount of the purchase price, as it is comparatively easy to get a loan from a bank or from some private individual for possibly half or even more than half the value of the farm. Those intending to buy a farm should be warned that often more attention is given to appearances than to real earning power. If the buildings look well and the yards are in good condition many a city purchaser is prone to overlook the fact that the fields are wet, stony or infertile, and that the revenues of the place are not sufficient to carry the necessary upkeep of the buildings. It is much wiser to examine carefully the crop yield and the productivity of the soil. Buildings and yards may easily come afterwards if the earning power is in the farm.

But I hear our city friend say, that so many risks have been pointed out that he is confused as to where to turn. My urgent suggestion is that he first secure practical experience, if possible, at the expense of some one else. Let him hire out for six months or a year on a good farm where he can make observations at close hand and take part in successful methods. After an experience of this kind let him go to the New York State College of Agriculture, or some other school of agriculture for a winter's term of twelve weeks, in order to get a somewhat wider view of the situation, and an opportunity to bring theories to bear on his already acquired practice. Let him take long counsel with able, practical farmers who have spent their entire lives in the calling. There is no mistake which the city man is more likely to make than that of overlooking the plain every-day suggestions of the man who has been brought up on the farm.

State and Government experts are, of course, willing and able to give specialized information as to the improvement of this crop, or the success of that method, but all this agricultural lore must be mastered by a practical man so that the application of methods bring a good profit for the capital and labor involved. It may be satisfying to a wealthy man to produce beautiful fields of oats or hay, regardless of cost; he may point with pride to a dairy which produces large quantities of milk at an expense which is prohibitive in the commercial field, but the kind of success which the city boy of limited means desires is that which is built on a solid financial basis and means a steady production of revenue from a well-organized business. Many farmers are securing this revenue. Their ways are not secret. The city man will do well to get into intimate touch with such men.

Therefore, provided he has a real love for the out-of-doors life, is careful about details, is ready to work hard, has laid a sound foundation of practical experience, and has acquired a little theoretical training at the agricultural college, there are many opportunities open for the city boy, not only in general farming, but in many specialized fields.

CHARLES H. TUCK,
Cornell University.

Capital Punishment and Moral Order

THE principal end of punishment is the satisfaction of justice by the reparation of violated order, as we showed not long ago. To this a Presbyterian clergyman of some fame took exception a few months since. "Your moral order," he argued, "is unintelligible. It is less than an abstraction, for I find no reality from which it can be derived. Are human lives to be sacrificed to a figment of the imagination?" Things are sometimes called unintelligible, because people will not take the trouble to understand them. It is certain that the moral order, or, inasmuch as it is man's rule of action, the moral law, is something very real. Of nothing are all men more convinced than that there is an eternal rule of right and wrong, beyond all human control, above the highest emperor or Pope, to which every one is bound to conform his actions. Even those who assert the changeableness of morals, imply the existence of that higher law. For to say that something is now right which a thousand years ago was wrong, is merely to say that in this world of change something is so changed in its circumstances, as to bear to the immutable right relations different from those of the past. One may pretend to rest this false system of morals on the consent of mankind, on its changing views of moral questions; but this cannot be the lowest foundation. However views may change, or judgments, however men may agree rightly or wrongly in such changes; behind it all is the measuring of things by the unchanging standard. The old measurements are revised: the standard remains the same. Essential justice, man can neither make, nor unmake, nor change. What, then, is this essential justice, this moral law, this moral order, from which, try as he will, the most rebellious modernist of this rebellious age cannot free himself?

Order is the reduction of many things to one. In a number of books lying about there is multiplicity; but there is also a root of unity. Among them are relations of size, subject, language, author, etc. When they are arranged according to these relations, they form one thing, a library. That they are so arranged, comes from the intelligence and will of the owner which visitors to the library are bound to respect. Here, then, we have an example of order binding others independently of their consent. If we examine the world of which we form a part, we shall find these same three things, multiplicity, mutual relations, and arrangement according to those relations. We shall find individual men, of whom each is dependent on others for the full exercise of his faculties, or, in other words, we shall find man both individual and social. We shall find him, moreover, living naturally in society. We shall see that authority is essential to society. We shall see that man must live according to his highest dignity as an individual cooperating with other individuals to the highest welfare of all. He cannot do this if he has to live from hand to mouth, procuring each day the things necessary for that day. He must, therefore, be able to accumulate possessions against future needs. He has intelligence, and so can understand daily more perfectly the relations between all creatures in the world; he has free will and the physical power to coordinate and to subordinate all things, and first of all himself, according to those relations. Moreover, as he and all creatures in all their relations come absolutely and entirely from the Creator, who of His own free will has so created them, manifesting in all His supreme will, man is bound to live according to those fundamental facts of the world and to carry them to their perfection. Hence arise duties and rights, the obligation of performing the one and of respecting the other. This is the moral order; and, inasmuch as it is a manifestation of the Divine will binding every human will, it is the moral law. Inasmuch as it comes from the Divine wisdom, it is founded in the Divine truth, and its observance is clearly the highest justice, its violation, the deepest injustice.

The constant obligation of observing this order, requires one who violates it to restore its integrity. It is not enough to return to its observance, as if nothing had happened. Something has happened. The offender has broken his relations with God and with creatures. He has drawn creatures out of God's established order, to make them share in his own lawlessness. He has attacked God's justice, which is bound up with God's truth. The creature abused, God's order, His justice, demands satisfaction; and, in public offenses, public authority, charged by God with the protection of His order, is bound to see satisfaction made. In the measure he could, man has withdrawn the creature from God. From him, therefore, must be withdrawn proportionally something of the creatures that are, as far as possible, his own. These are his goods, his bodily liberty, his life; and there are offenses too grave to be satisfied for otherwise than by the last. For instance, human life comes from God; to fix its term belongs to God. To each his life is most precious. By it he has his place in God's order in this world, and is able to do his part in that order. The malice that takes another's life, invades God's most absolute domain, violates His order in the highest degree, robs its victim of the noblest good, makes God's chief creatures in this world the instrument of its most audacious rebellion. For this God authorizes the penalty of death: public authority may inflict this penalty. This is one of the great natural truths, which have persisted among all peoples from the beginning. Obscure in its reasons by the darkness that has been induced by sin, it has never been blotted out as regards the sin itself.

"But your moral order supposes God." Quite true. It is also true that without God every notion of right, wrong, justice, obligation, vanishes. That those who deny Him still keep these ideas in some way, only proves how hard it is to cast off the convictions of ages; it shows, not that these ideas can subsist logically without God, but how monstrous is the error of rejecting Him. Without God, society with inherent rights can find no solid foundation. It can protect itself only because it has the physical power to do so, not the moral right. Brute force would take the place of justice; and Governor Dunne, of Illinois, would be right: "If one man, or three, may not kill a man, neither may twenty." For social aggregation, if God be left out of our social life, could add nothing to individuals taken separately but material force. But the dictum would have to be enlarged. Neither could twenty, nor twenty million, fine or imprison a man otherwise than by brute force. Whatever profession of a desire to reform the individual were made, its execution would be but an act of brute force. We should have also to reverse the dictum. Whatever twenty millions could do collectively, one could do individually. Each might sit in judgment on the other, and, were he strong enough, imprison his neighbor, mutilate him for his own protection or his neighbor's reformation, an error to which not a few seem to be hastening. As for any moral signification, Governor Dunne's dictum and a hundred others that are being tossed backward and forward by penal reformers, would be meaningless.

The war against capital punishment is, therefore, but a phase of the relentless war that is being waged today against God, the Creator of human society, the fountain of its rights, its duties, its justice, its laws. Of this some engaged in it are well enough aware. As to others inclined to enter into it through a false clemency, we warn them in the words of Gamaliel to the Sanhedrin, to take heed, lest they "be found to fight even against God."

HENRY WOODS, S.J.

Mexico's Plight

THOUGH "hope deferred maketh the heart sick" and we, the unfortunate inhabitants of Mexico, both natives and foreigners, already so depressed, were driven well-nigh to despair by the news of the recognition of Carranza, it is nevertheless a consolation to note the unanimous sympathy of the American press for us in our trials. On the other hand, we are discouraged to see that those nearest the scene of the Pan-American Conference have taken its decision seriously. We fondly trusted some explanation would be forthcoming and that possibly the recognition carried with it certain conditions tending to render the Carranzistas innocuous by drawing them into a compromise making for law and order, as well as a general amnesty and guarantees to life and property. But it seems there is nothing of the sort. Not only is Carranza's faction to be looked upon as the de facto government of Mexico, but it will be assisted to consolidate its rule and carry out its utterly perverse and infamous designs. This is an ugly nightmare from which for us, so far, there has been no awakening.

As, however, one month has elapsed and no apparent change for the better has taken place in our situation here, it may not be amiss to send you a brief account of the recent doings of the Carranzistas in this city and the Federal District, as far as we have any knowledge or experience of them.

The Mexican Herald, an American paper, and the only reliable organ left in this capital, was suppressed by the authorities on October 26. It was publishing an English and Spanish daily edition and was naturally reticent owing to the strict censorship; still we regarded the paper as a kind of bridge connecting us with the outer world. It is gone, and we have only our immediate knowledge to be guided by, and, occasionally, some items that leak through the mails or are brought to us by travelers. It seems pretty certain that in the hour of its triumph the Carranzista faction is breaking up into several groups and that all is not well with it by any means. The ominous silence of officials does not augur any good. Mysterious preparations for defense at several points in the vicinity of the capital make us feel as though we were nearer the beginning than the end of the contest; while frequent interruption of railway traffic and the likelihood that traffic may be stopped altogether are very depressing. Add to this the material cost of living, foodstuffs and other articles ranging from five to twenty times their normal price, the menace of starvation, which is not less imminent today, but is more so, than when Mr. O'Connor and the American Red Cross were here, and the utter chaos of finances on account of the worthless fiat currency with which the men in authority are scandalously speculating at our expense, and some idea can be formed of our sad situation.

As regards order and guarantees, we are in the same old predicament. Consternation over the execution of Alberto Garcia Granados and Gustavo Navarro is still fresh. The first was hurried off to his death after a mock trial, though even the public prosecutor had demanded for him only two years' imprisonment. The second, Navarro, who had been solemnly acquitted by a court martial on October 14, was immediately re-arrested and shot without further trial, on October 19. Some day a white light will be cast on these proceedings. Suffice it now to say that these two men, who died like Christians and heroes, were both in possession of proofs that Carranza, a few days before the Ciudadela revolt, was about to take up arms against Madero, the constitutional President, whom he now pretends to avenge.

Respecting the Carranzista amnesty, many persons who applied for it were simply arrested and others to whom it was granted were afterward thrown into jail. Hence hundreds have had to hide.

Property of all kinds likewise continues in jeopardy. Up to November 4, 713 houses had been confiscated in this city. This information comes from the corresponding department, and I can bear witness to its absolute accuracy. Some of these houses, the finest perhaps, are personally occupied by the Carranzista military chiefs. Others are used for government offices, such as the police headquarters. Many belong to Mexican families who have never taken any part in politics, or even of late resided in the country. I may mention as an instance the beautiful mansion of the Iturbide family, generally called "The House of Azulejos" (blue tiles) which was for many years rented to the Jockey Club. It stands on the main street and is one of the most characteristic buildings of the town. It has been seized and handed over to the Casa del Obrero Mundial, a Ferrer socialistic gathering which in January and February occupied the Jesuits' residence in San Juan de Letran, and on March 10 desecrated the church of Santa Brigida and the Academy of St. Joseph next door. Of course, there is the usual grabbing of automobiles, carriages, carts, horses and mules, which was such a scandal a year ago, and is being repeated now. I could also describe several attacks on private houses for the purpose of stealing money and jewels, all done by men in Carranzista uniforms, a farcical imitation of the honored garb of the United States army. The police, of course, when applied to, know nothing, can do nothing and give no assistance. A young lady, not many weeks ago, was fired at and killed in full-daylight in the public park of Chapultepec, and the perpetrator of the crime, who was closely related to General Pablo Gonzalez, got off perfectly free.

As to the Church and clergy, though there is now more hypocrisy in method, the Carranzistas have not relinquished any of their evil plans. Only a few days ago eleven of the most respected priests in this very city were arrested, no one knows why; and though they were soon set free, it was under an injunction to present themselves daily at military headquarters. There is also news of several curates in the Federal District having been shot by the Carranzistas on the plea of being in sympathy with Zapata, a stupid pretext for such dastardly crimes. The Carranzistas have threatened to seize several of the principal churches of the city, but so far they have refrained, though a decree is out enjoining the clergy to draw up and present to the authorities an inventory of ornaments, furniture, and other belongings in their possession, which the revolutionists say belong to the nation. The readers of AMERICA know that such decrees have been enforced in other towns, such as Leon, Queretaro, Puebla, and Toluca.

In the meantime one may ask, where is the respect for religion promised by the "First Chief" and demanded of him by the American State Department? Where is his "material and moral capacity to protect the lives and property of nationals and foreigners?" Where are the ideals of justice and liberty for which the revolution professed such a hunger and thirst? Surely Mr. Lind or one of President Wilson's numerous confidential agents, or the Pan-American conferees can supply an answer to such queries.

Mexico City, November 13. A. DE F.

Invention and Progress

THE idea of constant human progress now so practically universal, with its corollary of a comparatively near future when, as the result of progress, men are to be so happy here on earth that heaven will be quite unnecessary, has had some severe "jolts" from the present war with all its connotations. A large number of people who thought they understood mankind very well were quite sure that a great war among the cultured nations of the earth had become quite impossible. We had progressed entirely too far to revert to such barbaric methods as war necessarily involves. Not only were they entirely mistaken as to the impossibility of war, but we are actually in the midst of what is probably the worst war that men have ever witnessed, and it is costing more in suffering, both for combatants and non-combatants, than any human conflict ever did, no matter how distant from us in time and place or any other conceivable circumstance.

Surely this ought to make it very clear that the assumption that human progress is inevitable is quite without any evidence in history. The idea of evolution has come to form the background of so much of our modern thinking that even to suggest that there is no objective evidence for it seems at once to indicate to most people that there must be something wrong with anyone making such a suggestion. It is certainly time, however, for those who think progress is constant to review the evidence which they believe they have on that subject. Most of them appeal at once to our great discoveries and inventions, the modes by which human intercourse is facilitated and time saved for mankind. It is surprising, however, if even this narrow view of human progress be taken, how much there is to make one doubt seriously the significance of these inventions and discoveries for real human advance or true human happiness. Everyone now admits that man cannot think more deeply, cannot create better literature and philosophy than in the past; he has no better vision and no finer artistic power to express his vision, whether as painter, architect, or sculptor, and when we come to analyze what the facilitation of human intercourse and the invention of things that make for human convenience amount to for humanity, the conclusion is rather dubious, if not actually discouraging.

I suppose that three of the most vaunted advances in human progress would be accepted generally as language, mechanical inventions and medicine. It so happens that three very interesting expressions from three men whose lives have been occupied to a great extent with the study of these three subjects have lately been brought to my attention.

Viscount Morley, in his "Notes on Politics and History," a university address which he delivered as Chancellor of the University of Manchester, in the summer of 1912, therefore long before the present war came to awaken men so poignantly to the realization that a good deal of our vaunted progress is mere empty show, uses these words: "It will do us no harm to digest a sobering thought from Locke: 'If anyone shall well consider the errors and obscurity, the mistakes and confusion that are spread in the world by an ill use of words, he will find some reason to doubt whether language as it has been employed has contributed more to the improvement or hindrance of knowledge among mankind.'" That is, of course, a very disturbing thought, for usually it is assumed that language has been a wonderful help to knowledge in every way, and that it represents one of God's most important gifts or perhaps man's greatest invention.

Indeed the thought is so disturbing that at first blush some might rejoin: "Well, why should we take Locke seriously in the matter? He is an old-fashioned philosopher who did not know anything about the wonderful results in the distribution of knowledge that were to come in our time." Which is all very true, only Viscount Morley is not an old-fashioned individual at all, at least he has lived a life as full as any man's in the modern time, yet he is inclined to think that the demonstration of the truth of Locke's words was never more clear than in our own time.

The second expression quoted by Morley is scarcely less disturbing. It refers to that wonderful development of our time which so many people are inclined to be proud of, viz., our labor and time-saving mechanical inventions. Morley says: "John Stuart Mill puzzled us many years ago (1857) by what seemed an audacious doubt. 'Hitherto it is questionable if all the mechanical inventions yet made,' he said, 'have lightened the day's toil of any human being. They have enabled a greater population to live the same life of drudgery and imprisonment, and an increased number to make fortunes. But they have not yet begun to effect those great changes in human destiny which it is in their nature and in their futurity to accomplish.'"

Literally the drudgery and imprisonment of mankind has been increased by our industrial era of which we are so proud. Men and women worked hard before, but worked, as a rule almost without exception, outside in the free air of heaven, amidst reasonably healthy surroundings; they slept well, not in the slums created by factory conditions, and fed on simple things abundantly, and were much better off than our manufacturing populations. We are improving these sad conditions, but not nearly so much as a great many people think. Occasionally when I talk of the lack of progress of mankind, men say to me that if there was nothing else but the amount of time we are saving by our fast express trains, our telegraph, our telephone and, above all, by all our industrial system, that alone would represent a very great improvement and real progress and definite advance among mankind. One of the telegraph companies announced, not very long ago, that the telegraph alone had probably saved men thousands of years of time. To this argument and question there is just one response, which is very telling, it seems to me, and that consists in taking the Irishman's privilege of answering a question by asking another. I ask, then: Do you know anyone that has any time? We are saving so much time. Where is it all? Everyone that I know is on a rush, not only without any time to spare, but not even to do things that he thinks absolutely necessary to do. Above all, no one in the cities has any time. I may confess that I do know a very few people who have some time. They live far away from the telegraph office or a telephone and miles away from an express train or a trolley service, out in the country, and they have some time. We have filled up the time supposed to be saved with fussy occupations of all kinds, most of them quite insignificant in their results, and people rush ahead without having any time to themselves because it is all taken up with trivial things that pass with the setting of the sun.

The third expression that seems very striking to me is a quotation from Professor Holmes' "Address on Currents and Counter-currents in Medical Science," delivered before the Massachusetts Medical Society, at its annual meeting, May 30, 1860. Dr. Holmes, whom Americans of our generation are likely to think of as a poet and a literary man, but scarcely as a physician, was not only a graduate in medicine, but actually practised very successfully for a time, wrote a famous essay on "The Contagiousness of Puerperal Fever," which well deserves the term epoch-making, though that word is so often abused, and was the Professor of Anatomy at Harvard Medical School for more than twenty-five years, in the chair afterwards occupied by Professor Dwight. He had made his medical studies in Europe, coming under the influence of the great physicians of France in the first half of the nineteenth century, and particularly of that great clinical observer, Louis. Dr. Holmes made the following remark:

Throw out opium, which the Creator Himself seems to prescribe, for we often see the scarlet poppy growing in the cornfields, as if it were foreseen that wherever there is hunger to be fed, there must also be pain to be soothed; throw out a few specifics which our art did not discover and is hardly needed to apply; throw out wine, which is a food, and the vapors which produce the miracle of anesthesia, and I firmly believe that if the whole materia medica as now used [italics his] could be sunk at the bottom of the sea, it would be all the better for mankind, and all the worse for the fishes.

Of course it may be said that this expression was used fifty-five years ago, and that since then the whole aspect of medicine has changed and we are now in a very different order of things and have a great many valuable remedies at our command. Within the last few years, however, Professor Richet of Paris, quoting a French historical writer, reminded us that "the therapeutics of any generation is always absurd to the second succeeding generation," with the innuendo that ours will probably share the same fate. Of course this generation is quite sure that what we have discovered in the line of remedies is final. But then for that matter so was every other generation for the last 2,500 years.

Now these three expressions of the nullity of speech, mechanical invention and medicine for progress are not final and are not Gospel truth, but they are startling opinions given by conservative, thoughtful men, and ought to make many people in our time hesitate about being so confident in the use of vaunting terms of praise for our wonderful progress.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., LL.D.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words

Rational Athletics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have acted on Mr. Shortall's suggestion given in AMERICA of October 30, and have referred to my English Dictionary. And I am still of the opinion that "athletics" is essentially a contest. But I am not finding fault with it for that. In fact that is what I like about it. That is what every live boy and girl likes about it. What I am finding fault with is the practice of our schools and colleges, where they give "physical training" at all, of imposing upon their students a mass of dry and uninteresting calisthenics, formal gymnastics, "corrective and educational exercises," and allowing only a few to get the benefits, the fun, character-building and love of wholesome outdoor sports, that are the fruits of athletics, properly conducted. I am so strong a believer in athletics that instead of allowing the men in our school to spend weeks in training a handful of boys to go out and win prizes and notoriety for the school, we are giving every boy except those excluded by doctor's orders, a good all-around training in running, broad and high jumping, hop, step and leap, putting the shot, chinning the bar, trunk lifting, combination dip, pitching a baseball, chest expansion and strength of grip. Our "school team" consists of 80 per cent of the boys on the register of each grade, and on that basis we have a standing challenge to any boy's school, to compete with us in any five of these events they may choose! This is what we call "rational athletics," as distinguished from the usual "intensive athletics" in which a school selects and trains only a few of the strongest to represent the school, while neglecting the great majority who become merely "rooters." We all believe in athletics, Dr. Walsh and all the other critics, just as truly as Mr. Shortall or myself. But even Mr. Shortall must admit that there is something wrong with the system that allows only 16.4 per cent of all the young men in our colleges to get the benefits of athletic training in competitive sport!

New York. FREDERICK J. REILLY.

Woman Suffrage

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have read with great interest Mrs. Martha Moore Avery's articles on woman suffrage and would like very much to know just what she means by "Man is the head of the family and woman the head of the home." I knew an old German once who said, "I am the head of the house. My wife has a seat in it." His wife, however, went out working to help support the home. Many husbands act as though "head of the family" meant "head of the home." Perhaps if the two spheres could be distinctly outlined in her reader's mind, Mrs. Avery's article would have more weight. Again, if she is head of the home and society, should she not vote to make the laws which affect home and society, like school laws, juvenile court laws, divorce laws, marriage laws, etc? In many cases, before the agitation for woman suffrage began in this country, many women had nothing or very little to say about the home except to do the physical work therein. When husbands trangressed, and family life was broken, there were no civil laws to mend matters. In many cases canon law and church jurisdiction count for little in such affairs, as their results follow in the next world. A vote is needed to pass those laws which directly concern woman's province, the home and society, and women should have that vote.

San José, Cal. M. E. S.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mrs. Avery presents "Right Reason the Cure" to the readers of your issue of November 13 in such a manner as to leave one in doubt as to whether votes for women is right reason or the cure. She incidentally includes a number of implications and assumptions in regard to woman suffrage that seem to have little connection with right reason and none with the question of votes for women. Among these assumptions are the following: Suffrage is a male right; female suffrage a "social disorder"; female suffrage is a rebellion against the moral order. Suffrage is as much a "male right" as teaching is, or working in the fields. There are many males who claim that teaching is a male right, but few, alas, who claim that for ploughing, or scrubbing floors. If there is any social disorder connected with a woman's voting, there must be as much connected with a man's voting. The same applies to the rebellion against moral order. What moral order? There is a vague implication that the Decalogue is mixed up in the matter too, and also the Transcendentalists! That is too much.

Mrs. Avery seems to fear danger to the "political integrity of families" from voting women. But what is the political integrity of families? And why is it that the voting man cannot menace it? And then the Socialist is in favor of votes for women! That damns it at once. The Socialist also favors widows' pensions, but Mrs. Avery condones that; at any rate, she favors the pensions. Mrs. Avery also sees rebellion to the moral law, social disorder, and many other evils in women asking for the vote, and none of these evils in their voting! The argument against woman suffrage in Mrs. Avery's article is not of a character to cause the proponents for that cause much concern; but the implication therein against Catholic women and men, who favor and work for the political equality of men and women is uncharitable as well as illogical. Now as to the family being the unit in the moral order, there is this to be said, that nowhere in the Decalogue or the Commandments of the Church can be found any mention of the family. One of the things that Catholics hold most firmly is the truth that Christ was born of woman to save individual souls.

New York. CHARLES O. HAINES.

Mr. Moore and Transubstantiation

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In reply to Mr. Rusk's letter of Nov. 20:

Article XXVIII does two things: (1) It denies a certain unofficial teaching of certain pre-Tridentine Roman theologians about Transubstantiation, and (2) it makes an assertion to guard the spirituality of Our Lord's Presence in the Eucharist. The article cannot be said to condemn a dogmatic teaching of the Catholic Church, for it explicitly states that what it does condemn "overthroweth the nature of a Sacrament," and the official Tridentine definition does not do this. A slight reading of earlier continental theologians is sufficient to show that the term "Transubstantiation" was used before the Council of Trent in many quite different senses, some of them materialistic to an extreme—as in the declaration forced upon Berengarius by Pope Nicholas II in 1059 that "the very Body and Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ" are "sensibly (sensualiter) and not in a Sacrament only, but in truth" (a strange antithesis indeed) "handled by the hands of the priests, and broken and ground by the teeth of the faithful." Opposed to this materialistic definition of Transubstantiation is the spiritual and official teaching of St. Thomas and the Council of Trent. The materialistic view which our Article condemns denies the reality of the outward sign—the "species," in the technical terminology, of the Bread and Wine—making the effect of consecration a "transpeciation" rather than a true "transubstantiation," and so truly "overthroweth the nature of a Sacrament:" the spiritual, and authoritative Roman interpretation does not in any sense suffer under the same condemnation.

As to what the Article asserts, it is true that the Anglican Church has never wished to promulgate any detailed theory of the mode of the Real Presence, but has always been satisfied with a simple assertion of the fact. But any careful reading and study of the Article, and the circumstances of its composition, ought to be sufficient to refute my antagonist's strictures. All that he says on this point, indeed, presupposes a peculiarly false antithesis between the real and the spiritual. Innumerable references to St. Thomas could be made which show conclusively how far such an interpretation of those terms is from the mind of the Angelic Doctor. To assert that "the Body of Christ is given, taken and eaten in the Supper, only after an heavenly and spiritual manner" is not to deny His Real Presence, but to assert It; while at the same time denying It to be a material presence—a "natural presence," or presence according to nature. St. Thomas himself states that "the Body of Christ as It is natural is in heaven, and according as It is sacramental It is on earth;" and again, "the Body of Christ is not in the Sacrament in the manner in which a Body is in place—that is, commensurate with the place by its dimensions" (i.e., materialistically) —"but in a certain spiritual manner, which is proper to this Sacrament," (Summa III, 75.1). In other words, it is His Spiritual Body that is present; not a material one. The term "corporeal" is evidently used by Cranmer in the sense of "material" or "natural;" as also by St. Thomas when he says, "Christ in His corporeal Presence has left the world and gone to heaven." (Expositio in Canticis Canticorum, cap. 1).

Mr. Rusk entirely misquotes the Article as saying that Christ is "given, perceived, and eaten by Faith only." Now what the Article really says is that "the Body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the Supper only in an heavenly and spiritual manner;" and that "the means whereby the Body of Christ is perceived (not "given") "and eaten in the Supper is Faith." So also St. Thomas: "that the Body and Blood of Christ are in the Sacrament, can be comprehended neither by the senses nor by the intellect, but by faith alone which rests upon the divine authority" (Summa, loc. cit.) Faith, of course, is the means of spiritual discernment and of all participation in spiritual gifts. If "spiritually only" means "not sacramentally and really," then we as well as you anathematize such a proposition; but if the "sacramental and real" are the "spiritual," as you and we seem to agree that they are, then there is no real opposition between us.

Finally: I agree with Mr. Rusk in condemning the "horrid" Royal Oath against Transubstantiation; and the matter of the so-called "Supreme Headship" I have treated in another letter. No authority whatever is assigned by the Anglican Church to the Westminster Confession of 1647.

Cleveland. JARED S. MOORE.

The Open Shop

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. V. N. Daspit, in AMERICA for December 4, as is usual with pro-union sympathizers, overlooks the fact that aside from the few who control the manufacture of patented articles, most manufacturers have to meet competition and are not free to pay a scale of wages other than the one that prevails in each particular line. Core-making is not a skilled occupation, if it were it would mean a four years' apprenticeship instead of only thirty days' practice at pounding sand into a hole, before commanding wages above those of a common laborer. It is precisely this grade of slightly skilled, as well as the larger class of wholly unskilled laborers, that creates distressful situations. During the 1914-15 industrial depression, I saw, day after day at the factory gates from fifty to a hundred applicants for laborers' jobs while some of our machines stood idle for dearth of four-dollar-a-day men to run them. No amount of paternal relief would help these laborers, even if such relief were possible for an industry, in more than a temporary way; the remedy needed should start further back, in the provision of trade schools where the workman's skill would be raised to a point above the low one now a glut on the labor market. We have such provision in the "Milwaukee School of Trades for Boys," originally organized and financed by employers until its worth to the community was so established that it was taken over by the public school system. Its ever increasing success makes the school an object of admiring interest to visitors from all parts of the country.

I have great respect for Cardinal O'Connell, but as President Cleveland said on one occasion, "It is a condition, not a theory that confronts us," and the employer, whatever his philosophy, has to make the best of that condition or cease being an employer. It seems to me that a man who, aside from his religious affiliations, installs every workable safety device and who makes his plant as sanitary as the nature of the work will allow, who pays the highest rate of wages in that industry and in his intercourse with his employees observes the golden rule, comes pretty close to complying with his responsibility to God and man. The closed shop, where it dominates the labor market, is invariably honey-combed with graft; a few fatten on the turmoil and the majority are ground between the greed of their leaders and the reprisals of the owners who have to take a stand in self-defense. Chicago is a present example; fifty-four of the business agents of the unions were indicted there last Friday, December 3, for blackmail to an amount upward of $10,000,000.00. On the other hand, all is peace and serenity in Milwaukee because here the open-shop plan prevails, except in the railroad shops and the breweries, and these the unions keep in hot water a-plenty!

Milwaukee. T. J. NEACY.

Mr. Moore and Anglican Claims

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In his letter of December 4 Mr. Moore did not answer the specific challenge that if the Anglican Church is Catholic, he give to the readers of AMERICA a set of absolutely Catholic doctrines to which all the bishops, clergy, and laity of the English Church would interiorly and conscientiously assent. Instead of this he honestly admits the shameful fact that Anglicanism, though claiming to be a true part of the Catholic Church, the pillar and ground of truth, does through its highest officials teach heresy. Here then we have the anomaly of a church which teaches truth and falsehood at the same time. What a contradiction in terms! What an insult to the Church of the God of Truth, to that Church which expelled from its bosom an Arius, a Pelagius, a Nestorius for teaching doctrines similar to those advocated by the Anglican Church of the present day! But out of his own mouth do I again condemn him. For how, except to an Anglo-Catholic, can a church pretend to be in any sense, a part of Christ's Church, which not only teaches heresy but is absolutely incapable of purging itself of these blasphemous tenets? To insist then that in spite of such heresies, Anglicanism is nevertheless a branch of the true Church is, though perhaps unintentionally, a most outrageous insult to Christ who in unmistakable language, promised that His Church should never teach error, that the Spirit of Truth would always abide with it. This promise of Christ means, as Mr. Moore well knows, that no part of Christ's Church, supposing that there are parts, can ever teach error or allow it to be taught. If it does, then of a surety Christ's Church has failed. This then settles the whole dispute between us. Either Christ has kept His promise or He has not. If He has, then it is metaphysically impossible that Anglicanism can be a true part of His Church, and Mr. Moore stands self-condemned since he admits Anglicanism teaches error. If He has not, then no matter what other admirable qualities He may possess, one thing is at least certain, He is not God, but a detestable charlatan, an infamous impostor. Now the Roman Church which alone dares openly lay claim to an indwelling of the Spirit of Truth, which has prevented her from teaching error and from allowing it to be taught, is either the true and only representative of God in the world, or else is the most reckless, depraved and audacious impostor that ever mocked God or man. If the first alternative is true then Mr. Moore and his fellow-Anglican-Catholics must submit to it; if the second is true, then it merits not his esteem and friendship but his supreme contempt and execration. Either, however, is fatal to his own theory of a church. If High Churchmen imprudently insist upon a literal fulfilment of Christ's solemn promises, they must not only honestly acknowledge that these promises were never accomplished in their own church, as facts testify and Mr. Moore admits, but also confess that the Roman Church has at least a plausible claim to be the only heir to such promises. This plausibility is derived from the indisputable facts that such a claim was acknowledged by the whole Western Church from its beginning until now, by the whole Eastern Church and the Anglican for over a thousand years. Either then these promises were fulfilled in the Roman Church—and this Mr. Moore must admit since it is from its bishops he claims to derive Anglican orders—or they were never fulfilled at all, which cannot be said without blasphemy. And consequently if Christ intended His Church to be one both in doctrine and in discipline, then it is evidently the Church of England, the most energetic living protest against that idea, since it admits such an infinite diversity of contradictory doctrinal opinions, and not the "Church of Rome," which is in error.

Mobile. E. I. F.

[The controversy between E. I. F. and Mr. Jared Moore is now closed.—Editor AMERICA.]

The Celt and Politics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

May one admire the glowing picture of the future of the Celt in Boston as limned by James D. Russell in your issue of December 4, and yet grieve that he should decry the background which brings out all the beautiful possibilities of his canvas? What can he know of the days when the Celt was a hewer of wood and a drawer of water? Mr. Russell's choice vocabulary and well-rounded periods bespeak his nearness to his college days and betray his youth. How, then, should he know that through "politics," and through "politics" alone, was the Celt of that other day enabled to blaze the way for the Russells of this generation to enter the promised land and take the place in the business world so long denied them, but which was, and is, theirs of right? "Talents prostituted," "parading of our shame" These be harsh terms, my masters!

Exploited we have been. One may not deny it. Nor may one deny that out of each exploitation we have extracted some profit. We began by voting, and the candidates were not ours. Then we bred men and votes, and brought forth our own candidates. Surely that was a natural and proper and substantial progress.

It has been a matter of concern to others besides Mr. Russell that our choice for political preferment was not always wise. Peccavimus! Therefore our political activities were shameful? O, Mr. Russell et al! Can we say to our young man who has gone into business that he will never hear of a premeditated failure? Can we say to our insurance novice that he will never encounter a corruptionist? Can we say to our mercantile neophyte that no one will ever impress upon him the unwritten, but immutable, law that "there are tricks in all trades"?

We rail not at the bridge that carries us over, though we stumble occasionally on our way. A very handy thing around Boston is that little "Irish vote." It may be that our "best minds" are made uncomfortable by referring to it. But they know it, and fear it, and respect it. It enters into all their calculations. Dissipate or merge it and we shall quickly become the negligible quantity we were. Once more, if that day come, we shall be hewers of wood and drawers of water, scriveners at desks, cogs in the wheels, animated pieces of office furniture, to be remembered annually by our benevolent patrons and rewarded at Christmas with a five-dollar gold-piece.

But that day cannot come again. The old Celt builded too well for that. The fields where he won his political battles have fructified, and from them, Mr. Russell, you may forever draw subsistence for the greater conquests which you plan.

Yours is a great work. It is the work we have expected of you. Send forth our young men, full panoplied, to do great deeds in the business arena, but do not forget that your political forbears made possible the opportunities which you grasp.

This above all. When the "best minds are in accord," beware! There was once a man who is described as giving thanks to the Lord that he was not like unto one of these—politicians.

Roxbury, Mass. THOMAS J. HURLEY.

AMERICA

A · CATHOLIC · REVIEW · OF · THE · WEEK

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1915

Entered as second-class matter, April 15th, 1909, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3d, 1879.

Published weekly by the America Press, New York.
President, RICHARD H. TIERNEY; Secretary, JOSEPH HUSSLEIN; Treasurer, JOHN D. WHEELER.

SUBSCRIPTIONS, POSTPAID:
United States, 10 cents a copy; yearly, $3.00
Canada, $3.50 Europe, $4.00 (16s.)

Address:
THE AMERICA PRESS, 59 East 83d Street, New York City, N. Y., U. S. A.
CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

Stamps should be sent for the return of rejected manuscripts.

The Bond of Peace

TO its many readers in many lands, who in spite of clashing interests, divided sympathies and race antagonisms, are nevertheless men of undoubted good will, AMERICA extends the compliments of the season, wishing them at the same time all the blessings that come with the Christ Child each succeeding Christmas, and especially the peace that passeth understanding, peace with self, peace with God, and where unhappily it does not now obtain, peace also with the neighbor. It behooves us this year more than ever before to emphasize and insist on the Christmas bond of union that binds all men together in the mystical body of the Lord. Never, perhaps, in the history of the world has the human race been so torn asunder in strife and hatred; other ties fashioned out of flesh and blood, commercial and financial relations, propinquity of territory, and the common heritage of a suffering humanity, have to a great extent been rent in twain. Nothing remains to make the sons of men one but the sole bond that is in Christ, a bond invisible but strong beyond the breaking, a bond forged out of the love of the God-Man who extended tiny hands in pleading from the straw at Bethlehem and outstretched tired arms in patient anguish on the Cross. Other relationships have been ruthlessly and recklessly repudiated, but at least our brotherhood in Jesus Christ still endures. On Christmas Day may the nations at war acknowledge this kinship, and in virtue of it invoke upon one another the peace that is promised to good will. Above the roar of the cannon, the groans of the dying, and the sobs of the widows will be heard on Christ's Birthday the words of benediction, "Unto us is born a Saviour." Not unto me, but unto us. The word us embraces all the world. Thanks be to God, amid the wrack and ruin of human ties, men are still one in the common friendship of Christ, who this year no less than in other years is the Prince of Peace.

The Angel of Riverside Drive

"THROUGH this rough camp the Maid moved like an angel of God." So writes the old chronicler in after years. His memory lives in those stirring days when the banner of Jesus and Mary roused the land against the Burgundian. He has not forgotten the valiant deeds of the Maid of France as she fought for her King. The peal of the glorious trumpets of Orleans, the triumphant chanting of exultant choirs on the day when the rightful King came to his own at Reims, yet re-echoes in his ears and he sees uncertainly through wet eyes the mingled flame and smoke of Rouen's pyre. But neither time nor smoke nor aged eyes can pale the radiant vision of that holy child who, in court and camp and prison, "moved like an angel of God."

Angels are the bearers of messages from the Most High. What is the message of Blessed Joan of Arc, now enthroned in bronze on Riverside Drive? She has but one; love of God above all things, and love of home and country in God. The sweetness of an unspoiled child, the bravery of a chevalier without fear and without reproach, the purity of an angel, given for a little time to earth; these things made the life of Lorraine's matchless maid, because more than all else she loved with all her innocent heart "her fair Father, Christ." She left her beloved home, she put herself at the head of armies, she gave her life for her country, because she knew that sacrifice is the burden and test of love. Her home with all its dear memories, the mystic tree about which she danced as a child, her playmates, the little church in the village, she recalled in the days of sorrow, with that tender affection of which only the heart that is fixed on God is capable. Love was her only Lord and guide; and flame, the instrument of man's barbarity, by a cruel fitness wreathed itself as tendrils around the heart that had ever been an ardent fire, burning on God's altar.

Love of God, love of home, love of country. This is the message, so much needed in these days of broken ideals, brought us by the angelic Maid. May she become in truth the Angel of Riverside Drive, and may the thousands who, intent on trifles, now hurry along this beautiful avenue pause for a moment to learn wisdom from this "most womanly of women who ever lived," Blessed Joan of Arc.

Additions to the "White List"

THE Catholic Theater Movement has just published a list of twenty plays "which in the main are free from objectionable features." These additions, together with the list issued last February, make up a total of 199 plays that in the judgment of a committee of competent Catholic critics are such that they may be attended with a safe conscience. Not all of them indeed meet with entire approval, in our opinion one mentioned is objectionable, but it is much to know that amidst the deluge of dramatic representations of one kind or another that are making their appeal to the modern theater-goer, there are not a few that can at least be "tolerated."

To our shame it must be confessed that the vast majority of the musical comedies and problem plays, now on the stage, are confessedly pornographic in character and are exploiting the discussion of sex to allure the unwary to destruction. To our shame it must also be admitted that many of our Catholic men, and what is worse, our Catholic women, are frequenting these productions, sometimes surreptitiously but often with an unblushing disregard for appearances. There was a time when parents were careful about what plays they would allow their children, and especially their young daughters, to attend. Such a state of things is passing. Not only do the children themselves determine what schools they shall enter, what books they shall read, they decide what plays they shall see. An indication of this trend is found in the expression, such and such a play is "not one to which a girl could take her mother." Thank God, there are still left some such mothers! But how many of them will there be in the next generation? One shrinks from the answer. In the name of Catholic purity, which is the heritage of Catholic youth, we urge all who care to keep their hearts clean, to get the list of permissible plays, published by the Catholic Theater Movement at 120 West Sixtieth Street, New York City, and save their children and themselves from the degradation of Sodom and Gomorrha.

Treated Like a Dog!

WITH tear-dimmed eyes the lady of the mansion stood watching her dying servitor. For twenty long years he had served her faithfully, always at hand, obedient to her slightest wish. And now he lay a-dying. As she watched him he breathed his last sigh, his life of service was over, he was dead. And that the memory of his faithfulness might not be held cheaply, the lady of the mansion commanded the body to be prepared for burial. The undertaker was called in to embalm it, and it was laid in a casket mounted with silver, the most expensive casket the undertaker had, and found honorable burial in the family lot. Thus is the faithful servant honored in death.

But it was not the family butler who had died, nor was it the aged and faithful negro servant who had served the master when he was a boy: it was the pet dog. And it happened, not in Europe where the seats of the mighty are made mightier and the humble and meek are encouraged to show a respectful deference, but in New England, where, so it is said, all men are born with equal chances.

There is one thing we may learn from this incident, and that is that the use of language may become almost a sacred and awful thing. We say "treated like a gentleman" when we should really say "treated like a dog!" For the unhappy child whose little life is stunted and spoiled by work in the mill or factory, the tiny babes crying for food, the tired mothers who toil day and night at some unhealthful task for the barest necessities of life, the sad fathers gaunt and hollow-cheeked tramping the streets for work, are not treated like dogs: they are treated like "gentlemen" or, say, Mexicans!

Of course, there are many pet dogs that are faithful, and many more men who are unfaithful. But the cry of the most unlovable and most undeserving of "God's poor" smites upon the doors of Heaven, until it reaches to the ear of Him who is the "Father of the Poor." And what shall it profit the most tender-hearted lover of pet dogs to gain a whole front page of a newspaper, and to hear at the last reckoning: "Depart from me. . . . Amen I say to you, as long as you did it not unto one of these least, neither did you do it to me." For the justice of the courts of Heaven judges not of sanctity in terms of sanitation, nor is the plea of a soul heard there according to devotion to a dog.

The Supreme Preparedness

THE cry of preparedness is in the air. It is a preparedness consisting in unlimited supplies of guns and men, of aeroplanes and submarines and superdreadnaughts, of bombs and shells and rounds of ammunition. Meanwhile the Church is recalling to our minds, during the Advent season, the preacher of another and very different preparedness. The world is embroiled in wars, there is rumor of social upheavals and coming revolutions, and all the while our gay "society" is dancing its way to ruin like the daughter of Herodias, and all because that message of preparedness has not been heeded. Yet amid the wilderness of the warring world we still hear a voice calling: "Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight his paths."

Here alone, therefore, is the preparedness that can save civilization and re-Christianize it. "Do penance, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand," is the warning of the great Precursor to our age as to the Jews of his generation. More necessary than all martial preparations is that spiritual preparedness. The world is in a fever of passion, unable to judge calmly. Nothing is seemingly farther from its thought than the repentance and penance which it needs most of all. It has cast forth the Prince of Peace as of old He was rejected at Bethlehem. It cannot hear Him now for the din it is making. But there is no salvation for it save in Him alone. Whatever we may think of the need of material preparedness or the limits to be set to it, we cannot be indifferent to the necessity of uniting all our forces for leveling the mountains of prejudice and filling up the valleys of ignorance, for making straight the devious ways of error and sin, and smoothing the roughness of social discord that the Prince of Peace may enter in. "And all flesh shall see the salvation of God."

There is no hope of lasting peace, whether social or international, in the world without, until the charity of Christ first comes again into the souls of men, bringing with it the true Christmas peace which the Angels announced to the shepherds on the Judean hills. Whatever we can do to prepare men's hearts for the acceptance of Christ and His Church is a forward step toward true preparedness, not for the war of nations, but for the fulness of the love of universal brotherhood.

Caught at Last!

THE game is up! The Jesuits' carefully laid plot to secure entire control of this country has been detected just in the nick of time by the astute and high-minded John Jay Chapman. In a little book which bears the innocent title, "Notes on Religion," and which Laurence J. Gomme, of New York, has thought it worth while to publish, the zealous author lays bare the Society's secret machinations against all that is best in American civilization. After laying it down as almost self-evident that "Loyola's invention is undoubtedly the most evil thought in history" and that "the Society of Jesus is probably the tightest knot of reactionary influence upon the globe," he volunteers the information that "the Order has, at times [Half-a-dozen, say?] been dissolved by the Papacy," and that Jesuits, practically speaking, are born so, for they "are men who have been at school and college together" and their "comradeship from early childhood in an exclusive secret society makes them into a species by themselves." But the most striking page in Mr. Chapman's marvelous book is his lively description of how the Society and the Hierarchy are conspiring to destroy American institutions:

> If you apply to the Archbishop in New York for some aid in church matters, he will, as soon as he understands that a question of doctrine is concerned, ring a bell and ask if Father So-and-So is at leisure; saying, that as the matter is one of theology, the Jesuits will attend to it. You will then be ushered in to the sanctum of a highly-educated English priest, perhaps from Stonyhurst, who will deal with you as ably and as readily as the most perfected cash register deals with the confiding five cent piece. So also, at the close of some great day in Roman Catholic history—some day when a glorious victory has been won, a great step forward has been taken, a newspaper founded, or a tablet to the Pope attached to the exterior of a United States Custom House—if you should enter late at night into the Archbishop's Palace on Madison Avenue, you would find the Cardinals and Princes of the church sitting up in solemn conclave, eager, powerful men. And if you should linger on unobserved until the hour of parting came, you would see all of these great men retire and disperse with holy salutations; going in two bands, and in two different directions, the Jesuits in one direction, and the non-Jesuits in another, each band to its own lair to talk it over.

Though he has some misgivings, indeed, that "the Roman Catholic laymen" may read such important disclosures as the foregoing "with a smile," Mr. Chapman does not permit himself to treat with lightness the peril of Roman domination that menaces this country. He warns the reader:

> You must take the dollar given by the devout Boston housemaid and trace it into the pocket of the Catholic spy in Berlin. . . . Rome has proclaimed openly her intention of ruling America. . . . "Unless you sit silent and accept our insolence," [say the arrogant Catholics to the meek Protestants] "pay us our money, destroying your own social system and substitute ours, we will raise such a revolt, and such an outcry that you'll have a religious war on your hands." . . . Our press is easily ruled. Catholic business men are marshaled behind the advertisement columns; the rest follows. . . . The doings and pictures of great Prelates are recorded with unctious civility in the great dailies. Their insolent sermons are printed at great length. The social life of Roman Catholicism is chronicled. English Jesuits adorn the drawing rooms of Irish magnates, and rich American ladies besiege the foyers of the Prelates, laying their great position, their sins, and their jewels at the feet of Rome. . . . It is not necessary for the American to be eaten up by Rome, to have his public moneys directed to a foreign secret society, and the books in his public libraries censored by Jesuits. It is not necessary for him to sit still while his children are taught that patriotism is a sin and that the priest shall control in politics.

How a twentieth-century literary man can deliberately write such solemn nonsense as the foregoing is a nine-day's wonder. But it is even a ten-day's marvel how he managed to get a reputable publishing house to bring out such a book. What in the world made Mr. Gomme do it? Finally, these two queries clamor for answers: Why is it that a church credited with so much secret influence cannot have excluded from the mails scurrilous sheets that ridicule what Catholics hold sacred? Why is it that we cannot keep our fellow-Catholics in Mexico from being plundered, outraged and murdered? What little use we Papists make of the vast influence Mr. Chapman says we have!

LITERATURE

The Makers of Images

IN a great many ways the pagans of old were not so bad after all. Generally speaking, until they reached that state of degeneracy when they began to talk of efficiency and the preservation of the race, they appear in most instances to have held definite, and certainly distinct, ideas of religion. And like all people whose religious ideas are definite, they had a sound democratic sense of poetry as a thing to be understood and enjoyed. On the other hand, the modern pagans, who are not pagans really, have no sense of religion at all, and their poetic sense is correspondingly vague. Just as if having lost themselves in a "dim gray twilight" of their own invention, they were doing their best to drag the poetic art in after them, that it too might get lost in the fog.

This can be well illustrated by a comparison of the methods of the ancients and the moderns. The Ancient Britons, who were certainly pagans, had an unkind custom of constructing large images to represent certain gods in whom they believed, and into these images they crammed their victims, and roasted them to the accompaniment of stanzas of popular poetry. The moderns have reversed the process. Having conceived a thing they call "imagism" which is said to represent their god Ego, they too construct little images like the shadows on the wall, which they try to cram into the intelligence of their victims; not so much to please their gods, as the ancient pagans did, as to please themselves. I am not saying that the Ancient Britons are at all a model to be followed, but their poetry had the advantage of making an appeal to the people, whereas the modern "imagist" generally makes his appeal to an aristocracy of one, an audience that receives it with unbounded satisfaction.

Mr. Charles Erskine Scott Wood very probably might resent being called a pagan: so too might the shades of the pagans long departed. But his volume of verse "The Poet in the Desert" has this neo-pagan quality; it takes you, not into the desert, but into the fog, and loses you there. Not even the excitement of rushing through line after line of vers libre, which is not at all unlike such sport as leaping over a succession of back-yard fences, can save the reader from being conscious of the platitudes of revolt. For like so many of the moderns, and especially the modern revolutionists, Mr. Wood becomes conventional even in his unconventionality. In a vein of cheerful melancholy the poet pitches into the melting-pot civilization, authority, marriage, and "black gowned preachers," to the accompaniment of such *un*popular strains as

There is no sin, save to deny Nature.
Man maketh sin, and the strength of sin is the law.

Free verse finds another exponent in Mr. Edgar Lee Masters in his "Spoon River Anthology" (Macmillan). Mr. Masters digs up, poetically, the Spoon River cemetery, but among the two hundred and twenty defunct Illinoisians who are resuscitated in the interests of romanticism, there are some whose memory might be left with better savor undisturbed. These poetical short stories, for free verse is ultimately a contradiction in terms, lack the essential egoism that is the stock-in-trade of the makers of vers libre, and this gives them a certain simplicity and sincerity. There are among these imaginary epitaphs with which the poet makes the dead of Spoon River tell their story, some few in which moral value is sacrificed to make a poet's holiday. It would be idle to imagine for a moment that the exigencies even of free verse call for a story of suicide to be rounded off with the words of Christ to the dying thief. It is a curious phase of modern literature that some of our advanced poets who cannot restrain their eagerness to cast aside the bonds of rhyme and regular rhythm, should not disdain to make use of whole sentences from the Scripture. It is, of course, as a creator of images that Mr. Masters makes his first appeal, and in "Roger Heston" he presents a picture of humor, perhaps the real function of free verse:

Oh, many times did Ernest Hyde and I
Argue about the freedom of the will.
My favorite metaphor was Prickett's cow
Roped out to grass, and free you know as far
As the length of the rope.
One day while arguing so, watching the cow
Pull at the rope to get beyond the circle
Which she had eaten bare,
Out came the stake, and tossing up her head,
She ran for us.
"What's that, free-will or what?" said Ernest running.
I fell just as she gored me to my death.

It might be said that the only strikingly honest thing about "Some Imagist Poets" (Houghton), is its title, and its only mollification the fact that its contents were written before the war came to purge away some of the artificiality that broke out like a rash in imagism. But the doctrine of the "exact word," which means that the poet knows just what he means but that no one else does, has at times the appearance of verging on the psychopathic, and the visions of the imagist are, for all the world, like the visions of a lunatic, as for example, in these verses which the author entitles "Bullion":

My thoughts
Chink against my ribs
And roll about like silver hail-stones.
I should like to spill them out,
And pour them, all shining,
Over you.
But my heart is shut upon them
And holds them straitly.

Come, You! and open my heart;
That my thoughts torment me no longer,
But glitter in your hair.

This love of the vague, and wandering in mental fog, which gives so much secret pleasure to the imagist, is well summed up in a poem which is significantly called "Malady."

I move;
perhaps I have wakened;
this is a bed;
this is a room;
and there is light.

Darkness!

Have I performed
the dozen acts or so that make me the man men see?

The door opens,
and on the landing—
quiet!
I can see nothing: the pain, the weariness!

Stairs, banisters, a handrail:
all indistinguishable.
One step farther down or up,
and why?
But up is harder. Down!
Down to this white blur;
it gives before me.

Me?

I extend all ways:
I fit into the walls and they pull me. . . .

There you have it all, the sixth stanza contains the whole secret of imagism, "Me"; and the ordinary poets who felt themselves to be but the servants of the sanctuary were wrong, all wrong. But the makers of images have done us this service: they have shown us that we may find poetry in all kinds of unlooked-for places. A reshuffling of the type in the advertising columns of these pages may even yield some hidden gem. For instance:

A gift that's different.
Not like the ordinary gift,
Which is soon forgotten,
But a constant and worthy reminder
Of the giver
The whole year round.

Perhaps, after all, the ultimate word lies not with the modern poet, but with so democratic and unpoetical a person as the foreman printer!

HENRY C. WATTS.

REVIEWS

Pioneer Laymen of North America. By THOMAS J. CAMPBELL, S.J. Vol. II. New York: The America Press. $1.75.

It is a unique recommendation for a book that it should have been written by the one who above all others was most fitted to be its author. Such is the case with the present volume. Father Campbell long since demonstrated his right to speak authoritatively of the pioneers in the work of civilizing North America and especially the regions that border on the St. Lawrence. His three volumes on "Pioneer Priests" and the first volume of the present series are the best possible introduction to the sketches that have just appeared; and those who have had the privilege of following with him the intrepid clerics and laymen who planted the Faith in the wilderness of Canada and opened the way to the great Northwest, will be glad to continue the story of their successors under the skilful guidance of so able a panegyrist. Father Campbell's latest book shows the same care of detail, the same critical sifting of evidence, sometimes with the happy result of clearing a calumniated name, the same familiarity with original sources, and the same facile pen, that have been so evident in his previous works; and although none of the subjects in the present volume makes so wide an appeal to American interest as does the youthful Marquette, or has so heroic a setting as the tortured Jogues or the martyred Brébeuf, they have each a distinct charm of their own, for the story of the "Pioneer Laymen" is no less adventurous and scarcely less dramatic than that of the "Pioneer Priests."

The history of the Le Moyne family is continued and its glorious record receives its due share of praise. The careers of Frontenac and La Salle, though familiar, are treated from fresh points of views. The sketch of Dr. John McLoughlin is perhaps the most valuable part of the book. Here the author has had access, apparently, to documents hitherto not open to the public. Father Campbell vindicates the memory of this great layman by proving that he was always a stanch Catholic and that assertions to the contrary are a clear case of misrepresentation. Another interesting item, this time of New England ecclesiastical history, is recorded in the sketch of De la Vérendrye. On the morning of April 12, 1714, in the church of the Ursulines of Quebec, Esther Wheelwright was invested with the robe of the Ursulines. The clear implication of Father Campbell's account of the incident is that the girl was of New England origin, an implication that is also contained in the article on the Ursulines in Quebec (Cath. Encycl., Vol. XV, p. 320), where it is further stated Esther Wheelwright was elected superior of her convent in 1760. This would mean that her religious profession antedated, by almost a century, that of Frances, Ethan Allen's daughter, to whom is generally attributed the honor of being the first New England woman to become a nun. (Cath. Encycl., Vol. I, p. 320.) J. H. F.

The Sequel to Catholic Emancipation: The Story of the English Catholics Continued Down to the Re-establishment of Their Hierarchy in 1850. By the Right Rev. Monsignor BERNARD WARD, F.R.Hist.S. In Two Volumes. Vol. I. 1830-1840. Vol. II. 1840-1850. With Illustrations. New York: Longmans, Green. $6.00.

Mgr. Ward has now successfully completed the history of Catholicism in England from the year 1781 down to 1850, leaving us in nine large volumes a work which will always be of high authority. These two latest volumes are particularly interesting, for the period they cover was marked by the formal repeal of the penal laws, the Gothic revival, the Irish famine, the awakening of the old "Garden-of-the-Soul" Catholics, the founding of the Tablet and the Dublin Review, the influx of distinguished converts and the "Papal aggression" excitement. There is a great deal to tell about Dr. Baines, a masterful man, who was wont to preach "a very excellent and appropriate sermon—yet—rather too long," about Dr. Gentili, who tried to fill with his Italian fervor the professors and students of Prior Park; about Augustus Welby Pugin, whose passion for the Gothic was so intense that even his dessert had to be served in pointed molds; about Ambrose Lisle Phillipps and his Cistercian monks, and about the fiery Quaker convert, Frederick Lucas, who gave English Catholics a backbone, and championed the cause of starving Ireland, vigorously berating fellow-countrymen of his who were Tories first and Catholics afterwards.

The author tells again the story of the Oxford Movement and of the new converts' early Catholic life, and he gives some amusing instances of the excesses to which "Romanizers" used to go with the object of correcting "the supposed Gallican tendencies of the hereditary Catholics." To disprove the charge of intellectual stagnation made against the Catholics of the United Kingdom in 1846, Mr. Miles Keon was able to bring forward a list bearing the names of Thomas Moore, "the greatest British poet" then living, Lingard "the greatest British historian," Father Prout "the greatest British writer in light letters," Mr. Newman, Dr. Wiseman a "most celebrated man of science," the Rev. M. A. Tierney, Dr. Miley, Mr. Faber, Mr. Phillipps, Mr. Shiel, Mr. Digby, Mr. Waterton "the first ornithologist of the day," and Dr. Oliver "the greatest antiquary of the day." In the second volume of his work, Mgr. Ward has some very interesting matter, hitherto unpublished, regarding the reestablishment of diplomatic relations between England and the Holy See. The negotiations came to nothing, however, owing chiefly to the outbreak of the revolution in Rome. The author deserves to be congratulated for bringing this big work to a satisfactory conclusion in so short a time. W. D.

The Famous Cities of Ireland. By STEPHEN GWYNN. New York: The Macmillan Company. $2.00.

Those of our readers who are acquainted with the literary work of Stephen Gwynn, the scholarly Irish member of Parliament, will need no further inducement to read this companion volume to his "Fair Hills of Ireland." The "Famous Cities of Ireland," blending in a fascinating way history, romantic tradition, travel, statistics, and curious bits of lore, the whole illustrated by new and interesting pictures, makes an opportune appearance at the holiday season. Not only the lovers of Ireland but also those unacquainted with her romantic past, and in this category we may place a large part of Americans of Irish blood, will find a wealth of curious information set forth with literary grace, with that mingling of the "smile and the tear" inseparable from all things Irish. Ancient history, medieval history, the Reformation and penal days, and modern times, all have been laid under requisition to furnish material for this fascinating book. No reader will put it down without the desire of knowing more of the Isle of Destiny. Amid so much that is praiseworthy, it seems unfortunate that the author should have to go outside the domain of strict fact, and assert at this day, as he does in more than one place, as an undoubted truth, the much debated and debatable sanction given by the Pope for the Norman invasion of Ireland. And why did not Drogheda receive adequate recognition? Surely she has enough to her credit to render any city famous. J. F. X. M.

The Collected Poems of Rupert Brooke. With an Introduction by GEORGE EDWARD WOODBERRY, and a Biographical Note by MARGARET LAVINGTON. New York: John Lane Co. $1.25.

This is a collection of the poetic achievements of a brilliant young Englishman who was one of the victims of the European war, for death for his country claimed him at the age of twenty-seven. His early taking off mournfully suggests the author of "Endymion" nor do his poetic temper and his promise fall far short in confirming the parallel. Mr. Brooke left enough to prove himself a past-master of lyric phrasing and movement and when we reflect that such poems as "Second Best" and "Day That I Have Loved" came from his pen before the age of twenty-one, we may well concede that the genius reaped in its early flower might have grown to fling its shadow across the generation. To begin critical comment, one is left uncertain on reading the first of the above-named poems as to whether the half-despair expressed in it is the poet's own, or the mere portrayal of a soul's crying insultingly after hope to make her turn. "The Soldier," which made the author famous, expresses the proudest patriotism so wonderfully versified that the reader will condone the apparent pantheism under plea of the exuberance that pours without pausing from the splendid central thought. "Mary and Gabriel" is unquestionably fine art and only falls short because the theme is infinitely above idealization. Sometimes the very wealth of Mr. Brooke's diction obscures the thought, the echo of resounding line on line resulting in a musical but not altogether articulate boom. His poem called "The Fish" cannot be too highly praised. It is an exposition of his very best form and for its kind is hardly surpassed in our language. So popular has this volume of poems become that it is now in its tenth thousand.

T. B. C.

The Wondrous Childhood of the Mother of God. Translated from the French of Blessed JOHN EUDES. Peekskill, N. Y.: House of the Good Shepherd. $1.50.

The translator has given us an excellent rendition of the work of the Blessed John Eudes on the mysteries and prerogatives of the holy childhood of our Blessed Mother. The author, who is the Founder of the Congregation of Jesus and Mary, and of the Order of Our Lady of Charity of the Refuge and of the Good Shepherd, is famous for his devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus and the Immaculate Heart of Mary, but the special attraction the childhood of Mary had for him many will learn for the first time from this volume. "I can say truly," he writes, "that this book is the work of my heart rather than of my hand, and had I a million lives I would sacrifice them all to imprint these teachings upon the hearts of mankind." He has gathered a wealth of lore from the Fathers and spiritual writers who have written about the Mother of God, and has linked it all together with his own reflections. As the book was written in the seventeenth century, "it would be strange indeed if it did not bear the impression of the style of that age," for the legends of the holy childhood are freely accepted by the author and woven into his work without further question. The plan of the book is taken from St. John's vision, which suggested to Father Eudes the "twelve mysteries, twelve excellencies, twelve virtues and twelve means," forming the stars of glory that surround the head of the wondrous child predestined to become the Maiden Mother of God. J. H.

The Social Principle. By HORACE HOLLEY. New York: Lawrence J. Gomme. $0.75.

"Holley" suggests Christmas; but let it not be concluded that "The Social Principle" is a Christmas gift-book. Mr. Holley is a serious person, and all are solemnly assured in a leaflet accompanying his book that here is promulgated "the gospel of a higher individualism set forth in a prose at once lucid and eloquent." It is likewise "tremendously significant." Happy the author thus lauded by the public as well as by his publisher; but to the chance reader, the book's function seems to be twofold. The first is to observe with an air of profundity, that "the true artist is sensitive to different influences," that "executives are not social parasites," that "the perceptive mind functions on the most available material," and to utter similar banalities. The second function is illustrated when, in obedience to the surge of his centrifugal impulses, Mr. Holley remarks airily: "Through successive planes of being from outward interest and impulse to the inner; from the whirling periphery of being to the fixed centre, the mystic continually transfers consciousness, impelled by a sheer necessity, and finally establishes it in a state controlled by new laws." "O, these dear peripheries!" exclaims Hermione. "Don't you love them? They're so soulful, if you know what I mean." P. L. B.

How to Live. By IRVING FISHER and EUGENE LYMAN FISK, M.D. New York: Funk & Wagnall Co. $1.00.

Of all the books treating of the subject of hygiene and healthful living which the reviewer has seen of late, this is by far the most sane. It inculcates practices which both experiments and theories have proved to be of value, and corrects many false ideas about health which should prove the salvation of many a hypochondriac. But alas! hypochondriacs do not read such books; or, if they do, dismiss their findings with a disdainful shrug. The book is very readable and not couched in language too scientific for the average reader. Especially valuable are the chapters, entitled Alcohol, Tobacco, Air, Posture, and Avoiding Colds. It is too bad that people cannot be made to realize that fresh air is a boon and not a curse; that a draft is not harmful but is actually a preventive of colds; and that in order to live a healthy life it is necessary not only to supply the body with wholesome substances, but also to exclude whatever is unwholesome in quantity or quality. All this is clearly explained by our authors, and if any person would only carry into effect what is here prescribed, he could prove for himself the truth of Pasteur's words: "It is within the power of man to rid himself of every parasitic disease."

The book, however, is not altogether free from blemish, for the writers cling to the exploded fallacy of "our apelike progenitors;" and Catholics who remember St. Christopher, St. Thomas, and St. Sebastian, to name but a few, do not like to be told that "consumptives are chosen as models for saints." Also the approval of marriage regulation, and the suggested laws of eugenics are based on principles from which all consideration of a Supreme Law-giver is rigorously excluded. The book is endorsed by a foreword from the Hon. Wm. H. Taft. F. J. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Gordon Tidy in his excellent introduction to a holiday edition of "The Dream of Gerontius" (Lane, $1.25) seems to have missed nothing that was to be found out about the circumstances attending that poem's composition and publication. Gerontius, it appears, was Newman himself, an "old man" who felt death near, but the widely circulated story of the manuscript's being rescued from the waste-basket by the editor of the Month is proved a myth. Stella Langdale, who appears to be something of a futurist, undertakes to illustrate the text with ten pictures, but regarding her success in doing so, readers will probably differ. This unique poem of the great convert would make a suitable Christmas gift for his admirers.

A dainty booklet which will make a good Christmas card is "The Sweet Miracle" (Longmans, $0.40), by Eça de Queiroz, done into English by Edgar Prestage. The story tells how the slaves of the wealthy Obed, and the soldiers of the proud Publius Septimus sought in vain for the Divine Wonder-worker, but how He came of His own accord to the crippled beggar boy.——"The Story Teller" by Marian Lindsay (Lothrop, Lee & Shepard, $1.00) will make many a little reader happy at Christmas time. The book is beautifully printed and illustrated; but why do publishers insist upon issuing books for children in such insecure bindings?——"Christmas in Legend and History, (Same publishers, $1.50) is an excellent collection of Christmas readings for children, and is illustrated by reproductions of famous Nativity paintings. A very pretty bit of verse, probably new to most readers, is Archibald Sullivan's "The Little Grey Lamb."——

"A Divine Friend" (Reilly, $0.50), Father Henry C. Schuyler's study of Our Saviour's character, is out in a Yule-tide edition, and so is Stevenson's "Treasure Island" (Rand, McNally, $1.35), with fourteen pictures in color by Milo Winter.

"Heroes and Heroines of Fiction, Classical, Medieval, Legendary; Famous Characters and Famous Names in Novels, Romances, Poems and Dramas, Classified, Analyzed and Criticized, with Supplementary Citations from the Best Authorities" (Lippincott, $3.00) is the full title of a valuable book of reference by William S. Walsh, whose "Heroes and Heroines of Fiction (Modern Prose and Poetry)" we reviewed a year ago. Making the year 1500, A. D., the dividing date, the compiler now fills 379 double-columned pages with a vast deal of information about the paladins of Christendom and the deities of heathenesse. We are told, for instance, that when Prester John "went forth to war, thirteen gold crosses preceded him as his standards, each followed by 10,000 horsemen and 100,000 foot soldiers. In his palace he was waited on by seven kings, sixty dukes and 365 counts; twelve archbishops sat on his right hand and twenty bishops on his left." But after all for a mythical monarch that was a very moderate retinue.

Dr. Lavendar's countless friends will be glad to learn that under the title "Around Old Chester" (Harper, $1.35), Margaret Deland has brought together seven more tales of that quaint Pennsylvania town. "The Harvest of Fear" tells what happened to the lawyer whose son married a Catholic; "An Encore" tells how an interrupted elopement eventually came to a happy issue; "The Third Volume" describes the tragic backgammon game played beside Eunice's bier, and "Miss Clara's Perseus" narrates how the mutual attachment of two little girls finally ended. "Annie had not been married long enough to know that the cook is always 'hers' when the dinner is not good," and "'Poor dear' marks the death of affection between equals; it is not virile enough for disapproval, and not unqualified enough for love," are two bits of wisdom garnered from this author's pages. When such quantities of fiction that is worthless or worse than worthless are being published it is refreshing to read so good a book as "Around Old Chester."

Some recently published books which the Christmas shopper should know about but which the limits of time and space forbid more than mentioning here are these: A new edition of Dr. James J. Walsh's "Makers of Modern Medicine" (Fordham University Press, $2.00), which has been enlarged by the addition of the life of Virchow; "The Shepherd of My Soul" (Murphy, $1.00), eleven discourses on the Shepherd Psalm by the Rev. Charles J. Callen, O.P.; "To Your Dog and to My Dog" (Houghton, $1.00), an anthology of verses compiled by Lincoln Newton Kinnicutt; "My Changeless Friend" (Apostleship of Prayer, $0.25), a little book of Eucharistic papers by Father Francis P. LeBuffe, S.J., and Father F. X. Lasance's "The New Missal in English for Every Day in the Year, According to the Latest Decrees, with Introduction, Notes, and a Book of Prayer." (Benziger, $1.50 to $3.25).

Books of knowledge in all departments are in demand these days, and so no apology is necessary for Arthur Elson's "The Book of Musical Knowledge," (Houghton, $3.50) which ought to make an appeal to a wide circle of readers—so many are the concerts and concert-goers these days. Collected together in this volume are treatises on all departments of music: history of music and musical forms, great composers and performers, musical instruments, orchestration, conducting, voice culture, appreciation of music, and to these are added a dictionary of musical terms, and a course of study, with references, for students. Strange to say there seems to be no systematic discussion of harmony, a subject made important and interesting just now by modern French and German music. The amateur musician for whom this book of knowledge has been compiled will find within its 600 pages octavo much information on a great variety of topics, and all discussed in an easy and readable style. The volume would well become the library of music-lovers.

The numberless Catholic boys who eagerly read the stories of Father Henry S. Spalding, S.J., will be glad to learn that his "latest," "The Camp by Copper River" (Benziger, $0.85), has appeared in time for the holidays. Mr. Sherwood takes four boys with him for a summer's outing and of course they have no dearth of adventures. How the weeks in camp proved the undoing of John Newell but the making of Charlie Zip is sure to interest youthful readers.——Emelyn Newcomb Partridge has gathered into a volume entitled "Joyful Star: Indian Stories for Camp Fire Girls" (Sturgis & Walton, $1.25) some tales and legends about Indian women. What good the pale-face maiden is to get from these stories of heathen savages is not clear, though Catherine Tegakwitha, the "Lily of the Mohawks" could teach her something.——An interesting description of a Christmas in Rome, eventful for the characters in the book, gives an atmosphere of timeliness to "The Little Ambassadors" (Kilner, $0.75), by Henriette Eugénie Delamare, and exciting adventures in New York, and humorous situations in the Yosemite country add to the reader's pleasure. The children in the story, for all their mischievousness, are full of faith and strength, and finally make their Protestant father a Catholic.

Her Royal Highness the Infanta Eulalia of Spain seems to regard as the greatest of misfortunes the fact that she was born a princess. This pose she successfully maintains throughout a volume of reminiscences entitled "Court Life from Within," (Dodd, $2.50) which must be very annoying reading for her Spanish relatives and for members of other royal houses in Europe. Evidently her Highness is neither a very patriotic Spaniard nor a very devout Catholic, for the book is full of slurs on both her country and her Church. To be a democratic princess is it necessary to bid farewell to a lady's reserve?

Here is a collection of books for the young: In "White Eagle," (Ave Maria Press, $0.75) Mary Waggaman has given the Catholic boy another first-rate story. There are adventures in plenty, of Indians and wild animals, of precipices and blinding snow-storms; even the traditional rich relative has a part, though not in the traditional way. For an example of a brave, frank boy, we need search no further than White Eagle himself, as Donald Carruthers is called among his Indian mother's people.——Far different in tone and execution is the story of "Two American Boys in the War Zone," (Houghton, $1.00) by L. Worthington Green. It is a typical boy book of impossible adventure and prodigious intrepidity. Surprised in Russia at the opening of the present war, two brothers are forced to traverse a country hostile alike in people, climate and land-formation.——"Prisoners of War," (Houghton, $1.35) is E. T. Tomlinson's tale of the deeds done by a band of Federal soldiers within the enemy's lines during our Civil War. There are vivid descriptions of life at Andersonville prison and the historic sketch of the course of the conflict from Antietam to Appomattox is interesting, and instructive.——Rübezahl, in "Silesian Folk Tales," (American Book Company, $0.40) is a very mischievous gnome, whom no one can describe, for sometimes he is a giant and sometimes a dwarf. Woe to the miser and the cheat, for one of Rübezahl's pranks will teach them better manners. This collection of Silesia's folk-lore tales is a welcome addition to the nursery library, and will afford good reading for the imaginative child.——Tita and Tonio, "The Mexican Twins," (Houghton, $1.00) are the latest children to find a sympathetic biographer in Lucy Fitch Perkins, who describes for little readers the life that peons lead.

As nearly every paper, and magazine, and a large number of the books published nowadays are filled with descriptions of the horrors and the glories of the present war, it would seem that Sir Henry Newbolt's "The Book of the Thin Red Line" (Longmans, $1.50) would not be meeting a particularly clamorous demand. The author sketches for boys the military careers of five British soldiers who fought in the Napoleonic or East Indian wars, and of Stonewall Jackson, the Confederate general. The volume is well illustrated with pictures in color and in black and white which will please youthful readers. But why was that story of a seduction dragged in?

"Gates and Doors" is the title of the following "Ballad of Christmas Eve," which Mr. Joyce Kilmer contributes to the December House and Garden:

There was a gentle hostler
  (And blessed be his name!)
He opened up the stable
  The night Our Lady came.
Our Lady and Saint Joseph,
  He gave them food and bed,
And Jesus Christ has given him
  A glory round his head.

So let the gate swing open
  However poor the yard,
Lest weary people visit you
  And find their passage barred.
Unlatch the door at midnight
  And let your lantern's glow
Shine out to guide the traveler's feet
  To you across the snow.

There was a courteous hostler
  (He is in Heaven tonight)
He held Our Lady's bridle
  And helped her to alight;
He spread clean straw before her
  Whereon she might lie down,
And Jesus Christ has given him
  An everlasting crown.

Unlock the door this evening
  And let your gate swing wide,
Let all who ask for shelter
  Come speedily inside.
What if your yard be narrow?
  What if your house be small?
There is a Guest is coming
  Will glorify it all.

There was a joyous hostler
  Who knelt on Christmas morn
Beside the radiant manger
  Wherein his Lord was born.
His heart was full of laughter,
  His soul was full of bliss
When Jesus, on His Mother's lap,
  Gave him His hand to kiss.

Unbar your heart this evening
  And keep no stranger out,
Take from your soul's great portal
  The barrier of doubt.
To humble folk and weary
  Give hearty welcoming,
Your breast shall be tomorrow
  The cradle of a King.

Venit hospes, venit Christus, that fine old Catholic proverb, has been beautifully developed in Mr. Kilmer's ballad and his last two lines contain a thought for Christmas communicants.

EDUCATION

School-Discipline and the "Fond Parent"

UNDER the guidance of Bunscheider, Kahlbaum, and other princes of intensive study, the fractiousness of Johnny-at-school has been considered. The known facts are these. Johnny occasionally girds at the tedium of scholastic pursuits and transfers this inner urge to the sphere of outward phenomena, violently anti-social in character. In plain language, Johnny's teachers find him "hard to manage."

I have made bold to suggest two causes underlying these facts. The first, presented by way of a modest excursus on the cogitations of the learned German, was held to be an overloaded curriculum, filling its victims with sentiments of a morose or vengeful nature when actually followed; and teaching them contempt for authority when neglected. The second will now be discussed. It is "the fond parent," famed in song, story, and schools.

THE OXFORD DICTIONARY

The Oxford Dictionary is not a scold, but that well-known work suggests a generous supply of meanings for "fond." "Infatuated" is among the first variants; "foolish" is encountered without much search, and is followed by "silly, idiotic, imbecile, mad, and doting." A charming litany this, of pat phrases, but their fitness will be readily allowed when brought in conjunction with the term "parent." Touching his offspring and his trials at school, father is either wholly indifferent, or a copy of that gloomy disciplinarian who was wont to correct his small son "with a piece of plank." Father has troubles enough of his own, he thinks. The settlement of all quasi-domestic disputes he readily entrusts to the partner of his joys and the bearer of most of his woes. Here we meet the origin of many sad breaches of school discipline, for this lady, ruled by her heart rather than by her head, too often justifies the judgment of the Oxford Dictionary.

To clear the ground of a noisome creature, let it be noted that these reflections do not refer to the mother so engaged in civic reform, or in the uplift of sick cats and homeless happy pups, as to have no time for the welfare of her household. Our care is with the "fond mother," the foolishly-affectionate mother whose well-meant concern for Cissy and Johnny bids fair to make a social parasite of the one and a social gangster of the other. As to the lady of the cats and pups, she is beneath discussion and beyond reform.

THE BREAKDOWN OF DISCIPLINE

School discipline is a wide phrase. It is particular enough to include measures which will prevent Johnny from punching Reginald in the stomach; general enough to find its truest meaning in the process of inducing the pupil to assimilate the fundamental principles of right order which will make him a useful citizen. But it often fails to accomplish either purpose. What is the cause of the breakdown?

Usually, and for the most part incorrectly, it is ascribed to the teacher. In the vast majority of teachers the true professional spirit is high. They are ready, eager, to devote themselves, the Sisters without recompense and the public school teachers for a meager stipend, to the training of the children entrusted to them. They are not without their imperfections, certainly; they may be short-sighted, some of them, as well as short-tempered; and a few whom I have met would have been the downfall of Job himself. But these are the rare exception. The average teacher is competent both as an instructor and as a disciplinarian; but he cannot work miracles. What the "fond parent," and many of the public, cannot understand, is the elemental fact that the teacher is not the sole factor in the disciplinary process. Back of the recalcitrant pupil are the unhealthy environments created and maintained by his parents.

PARENTAL COOPERATION

Without parental cooperation, teachers can do very little, and discipline, as few parents realize, begins in the cradle. Little Cissy, for instance, notoriously rules the domestic roost. Her parents publicly proclaim her "brightness" and her "cuteness," and hers are the little ears that hear much. She has learned very early that she can procure all things necessary, convenient or harmful, by the simple process of puckering up her lips. She spins not neither does she sow; she simply "howls," and all things are gathered unto her. At the age of six, she is precocious, forward, pert, vain; that insufferable nuisance and saddest of sights, "a spoiled child."

How can the wisest of teachers undo the fatal work of these early years? "Train up a fig tree in the way it should go," advises Captain Cuttle, "and when old, sit in the shade on it." But these parents have never read Dickens. "You don't seem to be able to manage my child at all," they complain to harassed teachers who fully realize that what Cissy needs is the treatment so generously meted out to Master Alexander MacStinger—a brisk battery of slaps with a subsequent jolting application to a cool paving-block. "Why can't you manage her? We never have any trouble," they glibly romance, conveniently forgetting Cissy's tantrums of the preceding evening. Courtesy usually forbids the tu quoque.

These fond parents "manage" the children by allowing them to do precisely what they wish to do. Adopting an easy principle of government, not unknown indeed to modern educators and sociologists, they suppress lawlessness at home by abolishing law. They then affect wonder and indignation when a polite note from the principal informs them that he "will be greatly obliged by the withdrawal of Cissy and Johnny from the school. Their example is harmful, and he really cannot" and so forth. Even the fashionable schools sometimes find these missives necessary. One mistress readily condoned a "poor child's" first elopement with the village barber; but on a repetition of the offense, forthwith reached for her stationery, remarking primly, that "discipline must be maintained." "Poor" seems an ill-chosen epithet, until one begins to inquire whether this girl, or her foolish parents who had always allowed her the indulgence of every whim, rightly bears the greater blame.

SAVING THE PARENT

Some fond parents are beyond reform; others may yet be saved. The mother who fears the dire effect of some vagrant autumn breeze upon Johnny's thorax or complexion, who is always convinced that the teacher is absolutely wrong and Johnny absolutely right, has the courage of her feelings. She knows her darling's perfections; she does not suspect the dark potentialities for school-anarchy lurking within his young soul. But she is really interested in her child, and this interest spells her salvation. If it can be rightly directed, if her horizon can be widened to embrace something of the school's point of view, she will prove an educational factor of high value. With parents of this kind, most school conflicts are based upon some misunderstanding. The zealous teacher does not sympathize with their over-great tenderness; and parents in turn, certainly do not appreciate what they term the teacher's "harshness." A satisfactory coordination of these two factors will greatly further educational progress. But how can it be secured?

PARENTS' ASSOCIATIONS

Many public school authorities have answered this question admirably by forming Parents' Associations. These organizations, in which membership is restricted to parents of past or present pupils, convene once or twice a month in the school auditorium or in one of the larger class-rooms, where they meet the principal and the teachers. Occasionally a brief address will be made by a member of the School Board, or by teachers or principals from other schools; oftener fathers or mothers themselves are asked to "read a paper" or to discuss some local school problem.

In one public school, where this plan has succeeded excellently, a social element adds variety and interest. Perhaps the fathers will arrange for a "smoker"; at Christmas, there is a community tree; in the spring, fathers and mothers take part in the school picnic; music and moving-pictures are frequently introduced, while one school principal does not think it beneath his dignity to lead the assembly to the gymnasium for a dance, and himself preside at the piano. Parents are invited to inspect the building, to learn what is being done in the various classes, to offer suggestions; they are encouraged to talk about their children and their work, and thus are brought to take an interest in the school as something devoted exclusively to the welfare of the children.

THEIR EXCELLENT RESULTS

The best result of these meetings is that parents and teachers come to know one another. The teacher is not regarded as an impersonal school official or as a tyrant, but as a personal friend who is giving her best efforts to help the children. Under these cordial relations, misunderstandings will not persevere. Parents will be ready to admit that Johnny is occasionally at fault; more than this, that they themselves are, in part, at least, the cause of Johnny's shortcomings, and may help in making up for them. They realize by degrees that they do not fulfil their obligations merely by sending the children to school; ultimately, they will understand, and with happy results for all parties, that education is a process in which the home must cooperate with the school.

So far as I know, very few Catholic schools have these or similar organizations, yet in some sense they would seem to stand in greater need of them. By reason of their position, our teaching Sisters and Brothers cannot devote much time to house to house visitation; but there is surely no reason why they should not encourage parents to meet them in the schools. It would be truly unfortunate if Catholic parents were reminded of the school only when some disciplinary difficulty is reported, or when they are asked to contribute to its maintenance. An organization similar to the Parents' Association would stimulate interest in the school, its work, and teachers, and would bring about that happy cooperation between school and home which is so much needed. Incidentally, it would also result in a more general and generous support of the school. Even when giving to the Lord, generosity is stimulated when it can see practical results.

In the smaller, more compact parishes, there should be little difficulty in organizing these Associations. Greater difficulties may be presented by the larger and more varied populations of the city parishes, although the most successful Parents' Association that I know of, was organized by a principal whose school numbered nearly two thousand children, drawn chiefly from four different nationalities. Certainly zeal and energy are required to found and maintain these organizations; but the men who against heavy odds have built and now conduct our parochial schools, have these necessary qualities in a high degree.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

ECONOMICS

The Jobless Man

THE jobless man for the manless job. This is not a baffling problem, but it is certainly urgent. Its neglect is responsible for a generous measure of discontent, simply because labor cannot move so easily as credit. Just how are we preparing to meet the great shift of labor at the close of the war?

I may say at the outset that the Federal Department of Labor is already performing a giant's task. With the assistance of the Postal Department the Department of Labor is conducting a post-card campaign to learn just what parts of the country are running short of labor, and what parts are surfeited; just where men are hungry, and where they can find abundant food and work. Thousands of men have found employment through the Washington Government during the last year. But this is only a beginning. The Government cannot do all; and for several good reasons.

INADEQUACY OF THE BUREAU

Perhaps the most cogent of these reasons depends ultimately on a bit of every-day psychology. The Federal Government seems remote. The average jobless man in New York or Chicago, for example, would feel appalled at the idea of writing to a Department of State. He would prefer to try his luck in going from factory to factory, from shop to shop. He really wants the human element of the "boss." Yet we know that if labor is superabundant in New York, even the most tender-hearted boss cannot always find a vacant job. The Federal Government has the machinery without the soul; New York, or any other labor center, has the soul without the machinery.

Now this is a situation we must meet, and meet squarely, and with energy. The Federal Government has a few branch employment offices, and it is seeking more. It is also seeking to cooperate with the various State employment offices. But even this will be insufficient. No State institution has the real personal element which encourages the "down-and-out" man to seek its assistance. But it is precisely the personal element that many of our Catholic charitable societies can supply.

THE PERSONAL ELEMENT

This is the concrete proposition then, as it occurs to me:

Why not attempt to work with the Government machinery and to supply the soul? For example, the Saint Vincent de Paul Society comes nearer to the core of the poor man's trouble than perhaps any other charitable organization. It is loved and respected and its aid is sought voluntarily. A special committee of the Saint Vincent de Paul Society cooperating with the Federal Bureau of Labor would become invaluable, not only to the Government but to the laborer. The man without a job could make his appeal for work personal. The Society could take charge of the formal machinery of application. The assistance of the Government could be rendered without imposing the usual amount of awe and even distrust.

But organized assistance of this sort is not enough. Many Catholic employers receive applications from jobless men every day. It is fatally easy to "turn down" such applications with damaging gruffness. But it is not easy to be turned down. The man turned down becomes first discouraged, then sullen, then defiant. He is the legitimate prey of the Socialist or anarchist; and who can say that the fault is entirely his?

CATHOLIC COOPERATION

I feel very strongly indeed that a little time spent in assisting the jobless man to find the manless job is worth thousands of anti-socialist tracts. The basic discontent of today is not so much with organized capitalism as with unorganized capitalism. Capital that makes its demand for labor sporadic, defeats its own best interests, and every interest, good and indifferent, of labor. The man with a steady job is generally able to save money, and in time to become a small-scale capitalist himself. Unemployment over a period of weeks or months is what eats up savings, and keeps the laborer very literally and cruelly a wage slave.

With the proper attention to making labor fluid, one great source of extreme poverty is removed, because employment becomes steadier and the chances for saving become greater. "The jobless man for the manless job" is a work for individual Catholics; it is a work for organized Catholics; it is a work for every Catholic who values practical religion more than the last dollar of profit and the ultimate moment of personal leisure.

RICHARD DANA SKINNER.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The decision of the Supreme Court declaring the validity of the New York alien labor law seems at first sight a contradiction of the Court's previous decision in the case of the Arizona anti-alien law already quoted in AMERICA. The difference, however, is that in the latter instance the anti-alien regulation of private employment was pronounced to be unconstitutional, as opposed to the rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment; while in the former there is question of the employment of alien labor on public works. The New York law as it now stands excludes the employment of aliens on public works until the supply of strictly American labor has been exhausted. The original law permitted the employment on public works of no laborers except such as were native or naturalized citizens. Justice McKenna was careful to remark that the court in its latest decision was not concerned with the worth of public policy embodied in the law.

The parish sodalities of eight different cities in the Hudson Valley have leagued together under the title of "The Hudson Valley Union of the Children of Mary Sodalities." General conventions are held by them and a quarterly bulletin is issued to unite the members still more closely in their great purpose of increasing devotion to our Blessed Lady and giving encouragement and help to one another. Members of all the sodalities, we are informed, assist in church work by teaching Christian doctrine, decorating the altars, and in general, aiding, wherever possible, in the parish activities. Several of the sodalities have sewing circles which make wearing apparel for the needy poor and all the funds of these classes are devoted to charity. Many of them have established reading clubs and literary societies among their members and are doing very profitable work in general literature, church history, Christian doctrine and also in dramatic and musical productions. Intimate social relations are fostered among the sodalists and a place is given even to physical culture. Since the idea of the sodality is to carry the activity of its members into almost every field where the glory of God can be promoted, some fruitful suggestions may be gathered by sodalists in other parts from the work of the Hudson Valley Union of the Children of Mary.

Important statistics have been published by the Department of Commerce regarding the value of merchandise imported or exported. The imports from Europe have fallen in general from $621,406,314.00 to $392,321,420.00 during the nine months ending with September, 1915, as compared with the nine months ending with September, 1914. Not only the imports of the Central Powers but those also of the other belligerent nations have been reduced considerably. Thus while German imports have fallen from $122,620,200.00 to $38,209,283.00 those of the United Kingdom have dropped from $226,749,071.00 to $181,573,698.00; of France from $83,127,345.00 to $53,214,054.00 and of Russia from $12,234,127.00 to $1,630,506.00. Italy has fairly well maintained its position. Our exports to Europe on the other hand have increased by almost a billion within the same time, being $873,899,459.00 for the nine months ending with September, 1914, and $1,845,911,868.00 for the nine months ending with September, 1915. Exports to the United Kingdom have risen from $374,282,472.00 to $849,849,145.00. Those to Germany have dropped from $156,041,307.00 to $11,785,307.00. It is to be noted, however, that there has been an enormous increase in the exports to the neutral countries of Norway and Sweden, the value rising in the former case from $8,682,570.00 to $32,541,379.00 and in the latter from $9,673,809.00 to $66,462,650.00. Our exports to France, Italy and Russia have all risen exceedingly. There has been an increase in our exports to each of the great divisions of the globe, China and Canada being the only leading countries which have registered a decrease.

An event strangely recalling to us, even at the present stage of European hostilities, our own commemorative celebrations in honor of the Blue and the Gray at the yearly return of Decoration Day, recently took place in the cemetery of St. Quentin. The occasion was the dedication of a monument erected by the Germans in honor of both their own and the French heroes who have died in the war hospitals. Among the speakers of the occasion both French and Germans were represented. The ceremony took place in the presence of the Sisters of the Red Cross, of the German Emperor, Prince Eitel Friedrich and the German officers and troops as well as of the Maire and local French representatives. After addresses delivered by the French and German clergy, the presentation of the monument, the work of the artist, Professor Wandscheider, was made to the French city. The Maire, in an eloquent speech, accepted it, promising that it would be held in honor by his fellow-citizens and by their descendants as a memorial of the fraternité de l'héroisme. The Emperor then approached and laid two wreaths upon the work of art, one for the German and one for the French heroes. It is a beautiful incident, fortunately not the only one of its kind.

The practice of usury in "a great many national banks" has apparently become so excessive that it has called forth a protest from Washington. The Comptroller of the Currency has mailed a letter to all national banks calling their attention to the law against usury. The letter states:

> This office regrets to report that the sworn statements of condition of a great many national banks show that section 5197, U. S. revised statutes, against usury, has been grossly violated by these banks. You are respectfully advised and admonished that this provision of the national bank act should be faithfully observed by all national banks, their officers and directors, in accordance with the solemn oaths taken by directors. You are requested to read this letter at the next meeting of your board of directors, and to have it inscribed upon the minutes, and to send a copy of this letter to every member of your board who may not be present at such meeting.

In the course of a speech made some weeks ago by a Federal bank official he charged that in some cases usury as high as 2,400 per cent was being exacted by certain national banks. "Here in this country," he said, "we find bankers, men in a business who should be the most respectable, as it is the most responsible of all secular avocations, literally crushing the faces of their neighbors, deliberately fastening their fangs in the very heart of poverty." These are terrible words and seem to indicate an appalling condition of morality in certain financial circles, at a level with the "law" of the jungle. There is sore need for Christianity among the rich, and among the poor.

The Juvenile Protective Association of Chicago has issued a booklet entitled "The Real Jail Problem." According to statistics 8,600 persons are annually sent to the county jail. Of these, it is said, only about 1,600 are found guilty. What then of the other 7,000 who are imprisoned? Men, it seems, become jail-birds and suffer the trials of imprisonment only because they are too poor to provide bonds. It is stated that the vast majority of the 15,000 persons committed to the house of correction every year have not been found guilty of any offense deserving a house of correction sentence, but are there because they were too poor to pay the small fines imposed.

> In 1913, 82 per cent; in 1912, 82 per cent; in 1911 and 1910, about 86 per cent of all the prisoners in the house of correction had been committed solely for the non-payment of fines. It is scarcely necessary to point out that ultimately these fines are paid not only by the men and their families in suffering and privation, but also by the taxpayers who support the institution.

The following recommendations are suggested by the Juvenile Protective Association:

> Persons accused of crime should be placed on probation when unable to secure bonds. A different jail should be used for persons awaiting trial than the one for persons sentenced. A county jail should be a place of detention only for the few persons who cannot safely be released pending trial. A sentenced prisoner should be given an opportunity to work outdoors and a chance for improvement.

The manner in which persons, perfectly innocent perhaps, have often been confined with criminals, constitutes a sad page in prison history. Not extravagant reforms, but sound justice is to be desired. Our jails must not become occasions for making criminals instead of correcting them.

Premonitory signs are not wanting to show that there may be a discord in the coming Luther centenary. The Guardian, to quote a single instance, has the following reflections to make upon the subject:

> Germans will certainly receive no such message as Queen Victoria addressed to the great gathering of 1868, when Luther's monument was unveiled at Worms. "Protestant England," her majesty wrote, "cordially sympathizes with an occasion which unites the Protestant Princes and Peoples of Germany." The phrase reflects a mentality which belongs very much to the past. Religious Englishmen of today bethink themselves rather of the primary truths which make up the Catholic Faith than of the points on which they may differ from Rome, and they are more interested in St. Francis or St. Theresa than in Luther. No doubt Providence used him for great ends, but his character looks less and less beautiful in the searchlight of history.

A striking comparison between Luther and Balaam is strongly suggested here. Having gone thus far may not the writer likewise come to see that even such a comparison gives undue credit to a man whose rebellious spirit was assuredly not chosen as an oracle by God? By their fruits ye shall know them is the test of the Holy Scripture. Luther himself acknowledged with supreme chagrin that the world which had accepted his doctrine soon became far worse than it had been before. Certain it is that the Catholic Church could not have gone wrong in her teaching, else the promise of Christ would have been false and Christianity itself a delusion. There was merely need of a reformation of morals, owing to a sad neglect in many parts of the precepts of the true Faith which in itself can be productive of sanctity only. But the required reformation in morals did not necessitate a denial of doctrine and a rejection of Peter to whom Christ gave the keys of His kingdom.

AMERICA

A·CATHOLIC·REVIEW·OF·THE·WEEK

VOL. XIV, No. 11
WHOLE No. 350

DECEMBER 25, 1915

PRICE, 10 CENTS
$3.00 A YEAR

CHRONICLE
Home News: Labor, Revenue, Preparedness. The War: Bulletin, Dec. 14, p. m.-Dec. 21, a. m.—Montenegro—Southern Serbia—The Austrian Note. China: Yuan to Become Emperor. Great Britain: Changes in the Staff—Training the Recruits. Ireland: Two Leaders and a Problem. Mexico: Famine, Disease, Persecution. Rome: The Pope and Proselyting; Canadian Archbishoprics.....241-244

TOPICS OF INTEREST
The Return of Pageantry—"Let Wives be Subject"—Why Not a Catholic Drama?—Glad Tidings—Catholic Landmarks of Detroit—II--Books and Men.....245-251

COMMUNICATIONS
Woman Suffrage—Back to Shakespeare—Congregational Singing—The Fraternity Evil—Back to the Farm.....251-253

EDITORIALS
The World Needs Christ—Mother Goose and the Censor—Huxley and St. Paul—"Who Has Not Known a Carcassonne?"—"Not Such a Bad Man"—Dr. Gates and Bible Societies....254-257

LITERATURE
XVI--The Golden Legend.

REVIEWS: The Normans in European History—Interpretations of Literature—Chaff and Wheat—Universal Pronouncing Dictionary of Biography and Mythology—Historic Churches in Mexico.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS: The Catholic Mind—"My Changeless Friend"—"The Path of Mary"—Catholic Art Calendars—"The Double Road"—"Darby O'Gill and the Good People"—"Attila and the Huns"—"The Baby's First Two Years"—"Battleground Adventures in the Civil War"—"Left Tackle Thayer"—"Heart's Content"—"Smuggler's Island"—"Drink and Be Sober"—A Christmas Carol.

BOOKS RECEIVED 257-261

EDUCATION
Bringing Up Percy.....261, 262

SOCIOLOGY
At the Crib.....262, 263

NOTE AND COMMENT
Children's Lack of Respect for Authority—Neglect of the Three R's—The Moderate Drinker—Our Ever Recurring Italian Problem—A Venerable Calumny Exposed Again—Ireland's Criminal Statistics.....263, 264

CHRONICLE

Home News.—Mr. W. Jett Lauck, who was connected with the late United States Commission on Industrial Relations, has completed his report on the underlying economic causes of industrial unrest. He outlines these causes as follows:

Labor, Revenue, Preparedness

The constant increase in the price of goods during recent years, resulting in a decline in real wages, very marked in this country and abroad.

Inequalities in the distribution of the output of industry, due to the coordination of industry, and the improvement of facilities for transportation and communication; and, coincident with this "the subordination of the industrial worker to machinery and the consequent weakening of his bargaining power"

Unrestricted immigration, which has enormously increased the labor supply, checked wage advances by lowering the standard of living and intensifying unemployment.

The uncontrolled issuance of stocks and bonds in all industries, including railroads, resulting in the absorption, by interest and dividend requirements of fictitious securities, of the increased productivity of the laborer.

The insecurity of employment to workers in mines and mills.

The growing physical and nervous pressure placed upon industrial workers.

Lack of accident and sickness insurance.

Woman and child labor.

Control of industrial communities by corporations.

Excessive hours of work.

Lack of organization for collective bargaining among the workers.

Lack of aspiration for advancement on the part of many workers, chiefly recent immigrants from Southern and Eastern Europe.

Mr. Lauck finds general conditions bad and declares that present economic forces must be supplanted by others which will gradually work out a new industrial order. This ultimate goal is to be attained, not by a legislative panacea, but "by codes of business, corporate and political conduct, by general and industrial education, and by the attitude and programs of labor organization." The report emphasizes the idea that the workman should receive a fair share of the output of the industry; this share should be based partly on the worker's efficiency and productivity and partly on the results of industrial progress. At the same time the rights of capital and property must be carefully considered. In conclusion the report states "the fundamental problems of developing better industrial relations and a larger measure of industrial peace, as follows:

Equity in the distribution of industry by proper regulation of the corporation organization of industry.

Industrial education for the development of productive efficiency.

The adoption of better agricultural methods of production and distribution and the reduction of wasteful habits of consumption among all classes of population.

The contents of this report became known on December 16; the following day Mr. Mann, minority leader of the House introduced a bill providing for a Bureau of Labor Safety in connection with the Department of Labor; the purpose of this Bureau will be to investigate labor safety plans and devices of all kinds, and also to study means for the prevention of vocational disease. A similar bill passed the House last year and was debated but not passed by the Senate.

An extension of the emergency revenue law till December 31, 1916, has been declared necessary to meet the 1916 deficit which, according to estimates, will be $81,525,000, including a $10,000,000 postal deficit. The extension of the law will provide $6,800,000 a month.

It is interesting to note that revenue from distilled spirits, fermented liquors and tobacco decreased $25,000,000 the last fiscal year. Estimates of ordinary internal revenue receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, are $272,000,000, compared with $283,398,760 last year, "thus indicating a further anticipated revenue reduction from this source of more than $11,000,000."

Preparedness is still keenly discussed. There was read in the House a letter of Admiral Dewey to Congressman Gardner, advocating a strong navy. The Admiral declared that only a fleet strong enough to meet on equal terms the navy of the strongest possible enemy could prevent hostile forces from landing at a large number of important places on the Atlantic seaboard. In the Senate, Mr. Weeks argued for a standing army of 1,000,000 men and proposed as part of his scheme a mobile land force and military reserve of 200,000 men at a cost of $50,000,000 a year for ten years.

The proposed enlisted men in civil and military reserve would be settled with their families in comfortable five-acre tracts provided by the Government, supplementing ten months of productive work at reforestation, irrigation and flood prevention with two months of military training each year. They would be soldier-settlers under control of the Secretary of the Interior in times of peace and subject to orders of the War Department in times of war.

This program conflicts somewhat with an item in the report of the Secretary of Labor, which suggests that Congress in order to solve the problem of the distribution of labor, put to use for purposes of settlement, land to which it now holds title, large areas granted to railroads and extensive unused farms. The final and detailed outcome of the discussion of preparedness is not entirely clear; that some organized opposition to the plans submitted has developed is clear from the fact that Senator Shafroth has introduced a bill for universal disarmament through an international tribunal.

The War.—Nothing of importance has happened in any of the theaters of war except the Balkans. Here the Austrians are vigorously prosecuting their campaign against Montenegro, from the west, north, and east. On the west, in Herzegovina, the Montenegrins have had their only success, having driven the Austrians across the Subeska River. On the north the Montenegrins have been compelled to evacuate southern Bosnia and to abandon more of northeastern Montenegro. On the east they have retreated more than twenty miles from their eastern boundary, having yielded to the Austrians, Bjelopolje and Mojkovac and retired to the west bank of the Tara River. Further south, leaving Ipek they have been driven back toward Plava and Gusinje. Of the Bulgarians in Albania nothing has been reported, but it is supposed that they are making ready to withstand the Italians who are said to be marching east from Avlona.

Bulletin, Dec. 14, p. m.-Dec. 21, a. m.

Montenegro

The campaign in southern Serbia has come to a close and has been succeeded by a lull in the fighting. The Allies finding themselves subjected to a vigorous frontal attack and menaced on both wings, withdrew from southern Serbia to strongly fortified positions in the mountainous district near Salonica. Neither the Bulgarians nor the Germans have crossed the boundary. Bulgaria and Greece have come to provisional agreement that neither of them will approach within ten miles of the Greek-Serbian boundary, but Germany has intimated to Greece that German armies intend to follow the Allies into Greek territory and to attack them at Salonica.

Southern Serbia

Current rumor has it that the Allies after discussing the advisability of relinquishing the Balkan campaign, have finally decided to defend Salonica at all costs. Accordingly 100,000 British troops have been withdrawn from Gallipoli, presumably to be sent to Greece.

Replying to the note of the United States concerning the sinking of the Ancona, the Austrian Government raises two questions of doubt, first, as to the facts themselves, and second, as to the correctness of the legal interpretation put upon those facts by the United States. It leaves, therefore, to the United States Government to set forth the particular circumstances of the affair on which it bases its case, and to formulate the particular points of law against which the commanding officer of the submarine is alleged to have offended. Moreover it asserts that it is under no obligation to be guided by the correspondence that has passed between Berlin and Washington, and reserves to itself "as a matter of course" "full freedom to maintain its own legal views in the discussion of the case of the Ancona." The communication closes with the assurance that "the Imperial and Royal Government in no less a degree than the American Government, and under all circumstances, most sincerely deplores the fate of the innocent victims of the incident in question."

The Austrian Note

The answer of the United States to this communication has already been forwarded to Vienna but has not yet been given to the public. According to reports, however, our Government has refused to enter into a discussion either of the circumstances of the case or of the legality of its claims. It simply reiterates its demands, and declares that the statement made by the Austrian Admiralty is ample justification for all that was contained in its previous note.

China.—Recent dispatches from China confirm the report of last week that President Yuan Shih-Kai was offered the Imperial Crown by the Council of State, sitting as a Parliament, and that he accepted the honor. Some time ago fifteen out of the eighteen provinces in the country were reported to be in favor of a monarchy, 1,993 representatives out of 2,043 voting for the change. It is probably China's fear of Japanese aggression that has brought about this peaceful revolution. The people have such confidence in Yuan that they wish to strengthen his hand, and secure the continuation of his policy by having him become in name what he has long been in fact. The recent disturbances in Shanghai harbor are said to have been fomented by the Japanese with the help of Dr. Sun Yat-sen, in the hope of preventing the restoration of the monarchy. When the Council of State announced last month the coming change of government, Japan, Great Britain and Russia protested so strongly, that China assured those Powers that her form of government would not be altered this year. But the growing belief that Japan was trying to secure commercial and military control of China has now made Yuan's subjects suddenly place him on the throne of the Manchus. He does not appear to be very enthusiastic about the change, for when the Cabinet on December 13 went to the palace to congratulate him on his forthcoming accession, Yuan spoke feelingly of the increased responsibility he would have as Emperor, avoided naming a day for his coronation, discouraged all plans for a big celebration, and urged his Ministers to work harder than ever to better conditions in China.

Yuan to Become Emperor

Great Britain.—The event of the week was the long expected recall of Sir John French. Since the appointment of General Castelnau as chief of the French General Staff, it has been rumored that the appointment of a new British commander would be made as a necessary step in consonance with a new policy. Sir John's retirement is, according to the official bulletin of the War Department, "at his own instance" and he has been advanced to the dignity of a viscount of the United Kingdom. He has also accepted an appointment as Field-Marshal and Commander-in-Chief of the troops in the United Kingdom. His successor is Sir Douglas Haig. Sir Douglas, who is fifty-four years of age, began his military career in 1884, and won distinguished honors in the Sudan and South African campaigns. Several times during the present war, he has been praised in dispatches, and his conduct at the battle of the Aisne was described by Sir John French as "bold, skilful and decisive." Through his skilful management of the troops, he prevented the retreat at Mons from becoming a rout. With the recall of Sir John French and the dispatch of General Sir Horace Smith-Dorrien to the command in South Africa, it is thought that Lord Kitchener has completed his reorganization of the General Staff. A number of changes in commands of lesser importance will follow as a matter of course.

Changes in the Staff

On December 18, a Royal Proclamation summoned groups, number two, three, four and five, recruited under the Derby plan, for service beginning on January 20. These groups are composed of unmarried men between the ages of nineteen and twenty-two; the first group, which will probably be the last to be called, consists of eighteen-year-old boys. Lord Derby has publicly stated that he does not know the precise number of enlistments secured under his direction, and has declared that conscription, should it be necessary, will be applied in the first instance to unmarried eligible men who refused to register before December 15. Such men will prove indifferent soldiers.

Training the Recruits

Ireland.—Conscription continues to be the topic of the hour in Ireland. The subject is discussed in cities, towns, and villages with an earnestness that shows how close it lies to the Irish heart. As far as can be learned from the chief Irish papers, this manner of obtaining soldiers is entirely unwelcome. The Irish Party has again put itself on record against it, in a long letter written by Mr. Dillon to the Secretary of the Cavan Urban District Council, in answer to resolutions expressing "confidence in the assurances of Mr. John Redmond and the Irish Party, that conscription will not be enforced."

Two Leaders and a Problem

Though the Irish people are united in opposition to enforced enlistment, yet it cannot be said that they are altogether in agreement with the whole policy of the Irish leaders. The Weekly Freeman, the National Volunteer, the Weekly Independent, are entirely loyal; New Ireland approves the Party's general policy, but does not hesitate to speak out its mind in criticisms that are always sane and illuminating. The incisive Leader is out of sympathy with the Party. In its issue of December 4 it terms Mr. John Dillon a "political fossil," and declares that "he has been a melancholy calamity for the country during the past twenty years." The Hibernian of the same date addresses an open letter to Mr. Redmond; its trend can be judged from this passage:

> So it has turned out, and for a quarter of a century or so you have in conjunction with your colleagues reveled in an orgy of masterly inactivity. The Anglicizing process begun in your early youth has developed so much that now you avow yourself an upholder of the Empire, the Empire which has devastated the population of your native country by scattering it to the four winds of the earth, and would now have the remnant of its manhood spill its blood on the Continent of Europe to save the bully of the world from ignominious defeat. And now you have returned from the Western battle front, where you went at the command of your paymasters to delude the Irishmen fighting in the British ranks into the belief that the people of Ireland were at one with them in their endeavor to save the Empire, and that recruiting was proceeding apace at home so that the gaps made by the German hail of lead may be filled. What a terminological inexactitude, due no doubt to your colossal ignorance of the trend of events in an island called Ireland!

Just how many people think with the Leader and the Hibernian, it is difficult to say, but that their number is not inconsiderable may be surmised from this sentence written by one of AMERICA's Irish correspondents: "The Independent and Freeman have done good work in the past, but their present attitude has displeased a large number of the Irish people."

Mexico.—The truth about Mexico is gradually seeping into places which at one time seemed "truth-proof." As reported in the Boston Globe of December 15, Miss Louisa T. Loring, emergency secretary of the Red Cross, told an audience in the Arlington Street Church Boston, that conditions are worse today in Mexico than in Serbia. From 300 to 400 persons are dying each day of starvation in the city of Mexico; typhus is epidemic in many of the cities, and the Red Cross is helpless because its agents were driven from the country the 21st of last October, the day President Wilson recognized General Carranza.

Famine, Disease, Persecution

The report continues:

For some months prior to that date, the Red Cross had been feeding from 100,000 to 125,000 daily in the city of Mexico alone, people who otherwise would have starved, and what happened to these people after that date she was unable to tell, but through Mr. O'Connor, who had charge of this work for the Red Cross in the city of Mexico, it had been learned that the conditions are now beyond belief, and that other Mexican cities are almost in as deplorable a condition, with the added horror of an epidemic of typhus, such as swept over and ravaged Serbia a year ago.

Asked after the meeting how it was that these facts had not been made public, Miss Loring shook her head and simply remarked that the public was not aware of what was going on in Mexico, but the Red Cross knew and had the facts in its possession. She also said that the Red Cross was ready at a moment's notice with all necessary supplies and help to renew its work in Mexico, and was only waiting for the removal of the ban or embargo that had been placed on this work by Carranza.

Meantime persecution continues as usual. A recent article in El Presente, which is published in San Antonio, says:

Religious persecution by the Carranzistas still continues at full speed, in our unfortunate country, as can be proved from information that we receive daily. . . . The famous Siroub, whose many exploits we have already told, has just driven from Leon the gentle and popular Sisters of Mercy; and from Guanajuato the Sisters of the Good Shepherd who had charge of an orphan asylum, a maternity hospital and a home for Magdalens. The scenes which took place when the Sisters were expelled were heartrending. The unfortunate and helpless creatures, who in the exiled Sisters were losing their only help, comfort and protection on earth bade their benefactors farewell with sobs and tears. But neither their sobs nor their tears could move the hearts of the unprincipled adventurers, who pretend to be so deeply interested in the welfare of the people. The same Siroub also drove out from Guanajuato the Ladies of the Sacred Heart who, by the education they give to the girls and young ladies of Mexico, have rendered such important services to the country. The Carranzistas of Puebla, as cruel and heartless as those of Guanajuato, have taken over the monumental church of the Jesuits and have turned it into a library. There is no doubt about it. Carranza is keeping the promise about religious freedom which he made to President Wilson.

This same paper announces that later on it will print the names of priests recently murdered in Mexico.

Rome.—The text of a speech recently delivered by the Pope to the Roman "Society of the Propagation of Faith" is now at hand. His Holiness protested with vigor against those who are striving to lure Roman children from the Church by material inducements. He praised the work of the society, and expressed surprise that it was not more widely extended, for it aimed at the protection of poor Catholics against "robbers worse than those who come from the woods"; the latter are concerned with material goods only, while the former rob souls of their most precious gift, Faith. After detailing some of the methods of the proselyters, the Pope said in part:

The Pope and Proselyting; Canadian Archbishoprics

Oh, wretched fathers, to whom the free education of their little ones is offered at the price of their separation from the Church! Wretched children, who are given the promise of help for the declining years of their parents if they only join the evangelical sects! There is no need of further insisting on the dangers that threaten the Faith of the children of Rome. One only has to pass through the streets of the dear city in order to see the multiplied methods by which the Catholic Faith is assailed in this its native seat. Nor is it necessary to multiply words in order to put in due relief the greater infamy of this warfare because it is undertaken against the very center of the Catholic religion.

. . . . . .

We must preserve the Faith of Our poor brethren; We must hinder the execrable robbery from being done to their utter ruin. Let no one tax Us with the language of exaggeration; the sum total of the assaults against the Faith of the children of Rome We stigmatize as robbers' work. The conspiracy of these thieves must be destroyed by a powerful organization of the defenders of the Faith, and this is already realized in the Society for the Preservation of the Faith in Rome. It opens schools and industrial centers, it opposes the good press to the bad press, it furthers the education of youth, and leads parents and children back to the holy Church of God. Continue your support of this movement, and, above all, make its importance and necessity widely known. It is only by such apostolic work that this Society for the Preservation of the Faith in Rome will assume that character of universality without which We shall hope in vain for results equal to the urgent need of the case. . . .

Among the official acts of the Holy Father, this past week, was one of far-reaching importance to Canada, the creation of two new ecclesiastical provinces. The first is that of Saskatchewan, with Regina as the residence of the archbishop, who will be Bishop Mathieu, at present Bishop of Regina. The second province, Winnipeg, has been made by dividing the Province of St. Boniface, Manitoba. The new archdiocese comprises the territory west of Lake Winnipeg and the Red River, the Archbishopric of St. Boniface retaining the territory to the east. The new Archbishop of Winnipeg will be the Reverend Alfred Sinnott, at present secretary to the Apostolic Delegation for Canada and Newfoundland, while the Rt. Reverend Arthur Beliveau, Auxiliary Bishop of St. Boniface, will become Archbishop of that See, in succession to the late Archbishop Langevin of pious memory.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Return of Pageantry

THOUGH still in an eclipse of economic slavery and desolate irreligion there is some real sign that the English-speaking people may again become a gay and poetical race, as they were in the Middle Ages. I have always thought that the English coronation service might not unworthily be called the last and greatest of the pageants. But we do not, unfortunately, have coronation services frequently enough to enliven our dull lives. It is in other directions that we must look for changes; and it so happens that certain celebrations have really shown the culmination of a change in the English people; a change which is widespread, profound, and, I think, historic.

The outbreak of those earnest and archeological fancy dress balls of recent years all over England, and I hear all over America as well, was largely spontaneous and was extremely astonishing. For nearly two hundred years the whole trend of the English had been in the direction of despising symbolic vestments and rococo festivals and telling everybody to stick to mutton-chop whiskers and to mutton chops. We looked lovingly on the shapes of our own policemen, merely because they were ugly; and we regarded the mildest gendarme at a foreign railway station as a sabred brigand. This view was not only general, but genuine, deep, native and sincere. The merchants and farmers who felt it were far more English than the Young England dandies or the mountebanks who tried to interfere with it. Yet it is being abandoned now; not by dandies or mountebanks, but seemingly by the genuine British public, and its adoption and its abandonment are equally subtle enigmas of history. Why did we ever have this shyness about dressing up, and why are we losing it? I have a notion of my own, which I fear brings in controversial issues, as most real things will, and I think it worth while to outline it: I can outline it in one sentence. The night is still about us; but Puritanism has died in the night.

The Puritans, in their hours of pride, seem actually to claim that the English peoples, in whatever land, are fundamentally Puritan, were made by the Puritan spirit. They put Cromwell in the place of Alfred; they put him not merely at the head of English patriotism, but at the beginning of English history. They make old England a sort of Puritan colony, like New England. All this, of course, is a ludicrous delusion. The first facts or names that jump to the mind will remind any one that England had a splendid national literature and a very unmistakable type of national life before the hat of a single Puritan had been seen and hooted in England. Chaucer is even more English than Bunyan; Shakespeare is certainly more English than Milton. The Tabard and the Mermaid, Lady Godiva and St. George, Robin Goodfellow and Robin Hood, belong to a national tradition that has not even been touched by Puritanism; yet which is quite different from the tradition of Spain, of Scotland, or of France. Chaucer's Franklin, whose beard was white as a daisy, and in whose house "it snewed meate and drink," was as certainly an Englishman as he most certainly was not a Puritan.

Puritanism was something put into the English people after they had grown to their full national stature. Some hated it as an alien poison; some praised it as a violent medicine. But nobody pretended that it was the natural bread and ale that had hitherto built up the countrymen of Colet and Ben Jonson. It might indeed be maintained that in all the three cases of nations thus raided by Puritanism, the Scotch, the English and the Dutch, this religion has been rather a sort of spell or possession than a true change of personality. It might be suggested that in each case a merrier and more medieval nation went alive into that land of bondage and is now coming alive out of it. Thus the Scotch romance and witchery which Scott and Stevenson have brought to life is only the return of a spirit most marked in the old Scottish ballads and chronicles, in the tales of Tamlane in the forest, and Thomas the Rhymer among the fairies; and in that almost Arthurian romance of the roving court of Robert Bruce, which left, like a gypsy blood for generations, a tradition of wandering Scotch kings. Even in Scotland, I believe, Calvinism has only been an episode. The Scotch are taking off their "blacks" and appearing again in the purple of their ancient poetry. We may yet hear the twang of the last precentor before we really hear the Lay of the Last Minstrel.

Even in the third case of Holland, of which I know far less, something of the same kind could be suggested. Before the coming of the Puritan, the people of the flat country had already shown that talent for a certain detail and domesticity in art which fills so many galleries with their quaint interiors and their convincing still life. It might well be maintained that the same note of half religious realism, of an almost mystical silence and solidity, is being sounded in much of the new literature of the Netherlands. Nothing could be more like the almost conventional quietude and neatness of the pre-Reformation art among the Flemings. And nothing certainly could be more unlike the somewhat vulgar yet really demonic energy, the curious mixture of bourgeois smugness and visionary anarchy, that marked the mighty days of the Puritan. Nothing could be further from the new tone in Dutch literature than the sensational art and literature of the Protestant extremists, as you may see it in old Bibles or illustrations of Bunyan; an atmosphere at once monstrous and prosaic, mixed of a mild view of this world and a mad view of the other; the earth an endless London suburb like Clapham, and the sky a permanent apocalypse. It left on the mind a confused sense that angels had whiskers and saints had top hats; and certainly the dull energy in it was at the opposite extreme from the spirit of a small room as described by the Belgian poet Verhaeren or painted by Memling.

But the case of England at least admits of no mistake. Not only did England produce a most anti-Puritan literature before the Puritans existed, but it went on, under the Puritans and in spite of the Puritans, producing a literature quite anti-Puritan. There is as little that is Puritan about Fielding and Dickens as there is about Chaucer and Shakespeare. Dickens quite obviously existed to champion everything that the Puritans existed to destroy; when Mr. Scrooge is converted to Christmas, Cromwell or Ireton would have thought that Scrooge was relapsing and not repenting. When Scrooge and his clerk sit down to "a bowl of smoking bishop," the Puritan would have been equally disgusted with the spirit and with the name. Nevertheless, the Ironside element, though alien to England, was to a certain extent mixed with it; and I myself believe that it is to this partial mingling of a foreign and a native idea that we owe the curious attitude of the English peoples, until lately, towards processions, religious and secular, pomps and historical pageants. Nothing else will explain this phenomenon so well.

The Calvinist color, mixing with each separate national color, made in each case a different blend or tint. The Scotch had been restless, rebellious, fond of mystery, valiant and sometimes cruel. The combination of Calvinism with this produced a sort of somber romanticism which one can feel very strongly in Burns and in the blacker tales of Stevenson. The Dutch, I imagine, were domestic and devout; the combination of Calvinism with this produced a slight dullness and a rage for keeping things clean. The English certainly were lusty, casual and full of broad fun. The combination of Calvinism with this produced a curious kind of bourgeois embarrassment, part humor, part respectability, and part good sense. Since the Englishman was not to wear crimson clothes carelessly, the next most English thing was to wear black clothes casually and unobtrusively. Where the Catholic Englishman had been modest enough to make a fool of himself, the Protestant Englishman had only that lower sort of modesty that will not make a show of itself. He objected to making a pageant, because it is, literally speaking, "making a scene." It is said that the Frenchman shrugs his shoulders; but the Victorian Englishman was born with his shoulders shrugged. His whole attitude until lately has been "What's the good of making a fuss?". It is a sensible and pleasant temper; it is the remains of the real Englishman who gave its patient Pickwickian cheerfulness to the Canterbury Pilgrimage. But it will be gain and not loss if this minor humility of drab and gray can give place to that higher, and more humble humility, which can forget itself in flowers and fireworks and in the colors of carnival.

G. K. CHESTERTON.

"Let Wives Be Subject"

